The advocates for such a literary institution may reply, that in what has been advanced against it, we may perhaps find more glory than profit. Had an academy been established in this country, we should have possessed all our present advantages with the peculiar ones of such an institution. A series of volumes composed by the learned of England, had rivalled the precious 'Memoirs of the French Academy,' probably more philosophical, and more congenial to our modes of thinking! The congregating spirit creates by its sympathy; an intercourse exists between its members, which had not otherwise occurred; in this attrition of minds the torpid awakens, the timid is emboldened, and the secluded is called forth; to contradict, and to be contradicted, is the privilege and the source of knowledge. Those original ideas, hints and suggestions which some literary men sometimes throw out, once or twice during their whole lives, might here be preserved; and if endowed with sufficient funds, there are important labours, which surpass the means and industry of the individual, which would be more advantageously formed by such literary unions.

An academy of literature can only succeed by the same means in which originated all such academies—among individuals themselves! It will not be 'by the favour of the MANY, but by the wisdom and energy of the FEW.' It is not even in the power of Royalty to create at a word what can only be formed by the co-operation of the workmen themselves, and of the great taskmaster, Time!

Such institutions have sprung from the same principle, and have followed the same march. It was from a private meeting that 'The French Academy' derived its origin; and the true beginners of that celebrated institution assuredly had no foresight of the object to which their conferences tended. Several literary friends of Paris, finding the extent of the city occasioned much loss of time in their visits, agreed to meet on a fixed day every week, and chose Conrat's residence as central. They met for the purposes of general conversation, or to walk together, or, what was not least social, to partake in some refreshing collation. All being literary men, those who were authors submitted their new works to this friendly society, who, without jealousy or malice, freely communicated their strictures; the works were improved, the authors were delighted, and the critics were honest! Such was the happy life of the members of this private society during three or four years. Pelisson, the earliest historian of the French Academy, has delightfully described it: 'It was such that now, when they speak of these first days of the academy, they call it the golden age, during which, with all the innocence and freedom of that fortunate period, without pomp and noise, and without any other laws than those of friendship they enjoyed together all which a society of minds, and a rational life, can yield of whatever softens and charms.'

* Mr Fuseli describes the gallery of the Farnese palace as a work of uniform vigour of execution, which nothing can equal but its imbecility and incongruity of conception. This deficiency in Annibale was always readily supplied by the taste and learning of Agostino; the vigour of Annibale was deficient both in sensibility and correct invention.

† Long after this article was composed, a Royal Academy of Literature has been projected; with the state of its existence, I am unacquainted. It has occasioned no alteration in these searches.

They were happy, and they resolved to be silent; nor was this bond and compact of friendship violated, till one of them, Malleville, secretary of Marshal Bassompierre, being anxious that his friend Faref, who had just printed his L'Homme, which he had drawn from the famous 'Il Cortigiano' of Castiglione, should profit by all their opinions, procured his admission to one of their conferences; Faref presented them with his book, heard a great deal concerning the nature of his work, was charmed by their literary communications, and returned home ready to burst with the secret. Could the society hope that others would be more faithful than they had been to themselves? Faref happened to be one of those lighthearted men who are communicative in the degree in which they are grateful, and he whispered the secret to Des Marets and to Boisrobert. The first, as soon as he heard of such a literary senate, used every effort to appear before them and read the first volume of his 'Ariane'; Boisrobert, a man of distinction, and a common friend to them all, could not be refused an admission; he admired the frankness of their mutual criticisms. The society besides, was a new object; and his daily business was to furnish an amusing story to his patron Richelieu. The cardinal minister was very literary, and apt to be sohipped in his hours of retirement, that the physician declared, that 'all his drugs were of no avail, unless his patient mixed with them a drachm of Boisrobert.' In one of those fortunate moments, when the cardinal was 'in the vein,' Boisrobert painted, with the warmest hues, this region of literary felicity, of a small, happy society formed of critics and authors! The minister, who was ever considering things in that particular aspect which might tend to his own glory, instantly asked Boisrobert, whether this private meeting would not like to be constituted a public body, and establish itself by letters patent, offering them his protection. The flatterer of the minister was overjoyed, and executed the important mission; but not one of the members shared in the rapture, while some regretted an honour which would only disturb the sweetness and familiarity of their intercourse. Malleville, whose master was a prisoner in the Bastille, and Serisay, the intendant of the Duke of Rochefoucault, who was in disgrace at court, loudly protested, in the style of an opposition party, against the protection of the minister; but Chapelain, who was known to have no party-interests, argued so clearly, that he left them to infer that Richelieu's offer was a command; that the cardinal was a minister who willed not things by halves; and was one of those very great men who avenge any contempt shown to them, even on such little men as themselves! In a word, the dogs bowed their necks to the golden collar. However, the appearance, if not the reality, of freedom was left to them; and the minister allowed them to frame their own constitution, and elect their own magistrates and citizens in this infant and illustrious republic of literature. The history of the further establishment of the French academy is elegantly narrated by Pelisson. The usual difficulty occurred of fixing on a title; and they appear to have changed it so often, that the academy was at first addressed by more than one title; Academie des beaux Esprits; Academie de l'Eloquence; Academie Eminente, in allusion to the quality of the cardinal, its protector.—Desirous of avoiding the extravagant and mystifying titles of the Italian academies,* they fixed on the most unaffected, 'L'Academie Francaise'; but though the national genius may disguise itself for a moment, it cannot be entirely got rid of, and they assumed a vaunting device of a laurel wreath, including their epigraph 'à l'immortalité.' The academy of Petersburg has chosen a more enlightened inscription Paulatim ('little by little,') so expressive of the great labours of man—even of the inventions of genius!

Such was the origin of L'Academie Francaise; it was long a private meeting before it became a public institution. Yet, like the Royal Society, its origin has been attributed to political motives, with a view to divert the attention from popular discontents; but when we look into the real origin of the French Academy, and our Royal Society, it must be granted, that if the government either France or England ever entertained this project, it came to them so accidentally that at least we cannot allow them the merit of profound invention. Statesmen are often considered by speculative men in their closets to be mightier wonder-workers than they often prove to be.

Were the origin of the Royal Society inquired into, it might be justly dated a century before its existence: the real founder was Lord Bacon, who planned the ideal institution in his philosophical romance of the New Atlantis. This notion is not fanciful, and it was that of its first founders, as not only appears by the expression of old Aubrey, when alluding to the commencement of the society, he adds, secundum mentem Domini Baconi; but by a rare print designed by Evelyn, probably for a frontispiece to Bishop Sprat's history, although we seldom find the print in the volume. The design is precious to a Grangerian, exhibiting three fine portraits. On one side is represented a library, and on the table lie the statutes, the journals, and the mace of the Royal Society; on its opposite side are suspended numerous philosophical instruments; in the centre of the print is a column, on which is placed a bust of Charles II, the patron; on each side whole lengths of Lord Brouncker, the first president, and Lord Bacon, as the founder, inscribed Artium Instaurator. The graver of Holiar has preserved this happy intention of Evelyn's, which exemplifies what may be called the continuity and genealogy of genius, as its spirit is perpetuated by its successors.

When the fury of the civil wars had exhausted all parties, and a breathing time from the passions and madness of the age allowed ingenious men to return once more to their forsaken studies, Bacon's vision of a philosophical society appears to have occupied their reveries. It charmed the fancy of Cowley and Milton; but the politics and religion of the times were still possessed by the same frenzy, and divinity and politics were unanimously agreed to be utterly proscribed from their inquiries. On the subject of religion they were more particularly alarmed, not only at the time of the foundation of the society, but at a much later period, when under the direction of Newton himself Even Bishop Sprat, their first historian, observed, that 'they have freely admitted men of different religions, countries, and professions of life; not to lay the foundation of an English, Scotch, Irish, popish, or protestant philosophy, but a PHILOSOPHY OF MANKIND.' 'A curious protest of the most illustrious of philosophers may be found: when 'the Society for promoting Christian Knowledge' was desirous of holding their meetings at the house of the Royal Society, Newton drew up a number of arguments against their admission. One of them is, that 'It is a fundamental rule of the society not to meddle with religion; and the reason is, that we may give no occasion to religious bustle to meddle with us.' Newton would not even comply with their wishes, lest by this compliance the Royal Society might 'dissatisfy those of other religions.' The wisdom of the protest by Newton is as admirable as it is remarkable,—the preservation of the Royal Society from the passions of the age.

It was in the lodgings of Dr Wilkins in Wadham College, that a small philosophical club met together, which proved to be, as Aubrey expresses it, the incunabula of the Royal Society. When the members were dispersed about London, they renewed their meetings first at a tavern, then at a private house; and when the society became too great to be called a club, they assembled in 'the parlour' of Gresham College, which itself had been raised by the munificence of a citizen who endowed it liberally and presented a noble example to the individuals now assembled under its roof. The society afterwards derives its title from a sort of accident. The warm loyalty of Evelyn in the first hopeful days of the Restoration, in a dedicatory epistle of Naude's treatise on libraries, called a philosophical meeting the Royal Society. These men immediately voted their thanks to Evelyn for happy designation, which was so grateful to Charles who was himself a virtuoso of the day, that the charter was soon granted: the king, declaring himself their founder, sent them a mace of silver gilt, of the same fashion & figures as those carried before his majesty, to be borne for the president on meeting days." To the zeal of Evelyn the Royal Society owe no inferior acquisition to this and its mace; the noble Arundelian library, the literary accumulation of the noble Howards; the last member of which had so little inclination for books, that treasures which his ancestors had collected lay open at the mercy of any purloiner. This degenerate heir to the name and the name of Howard seemed perfectly revealed when Evelyn sent his marbles which were perishing in his gardens, to Oxford, and his books which were vanishing daily, to the Royal Society!

The Society of Antiquaries might create a deeper interest, could we penetrate to its secret history: it was interrupted, and suffered to expire, by some obscure cause political jealousy. It long ceased to exist, and was only revived almost in our own days. The revival of learning under Edward VI, suffered a severe check from the papal government of Mary; but under Elizabeth a new era opened to our literary pursuits. At this period several students of the inns of court, many of whose names illustrious for their rank or their genius, formed a literary society, which they called 'the Antiquaries' College.' From very opposite quarters we are furnished with curious particulars of their literary intercourse: it is delightful to discover Rawleigh borrowing manuscripts from the library of Sir Robert Cotton, and Selden deriving studies from the collections of Rawleigh. Their mode of proceeding has even been preserved. At every meeting they proposed a question or two respecting the history of the antiquities of the English nation, on which each member was expected, at the subsequent meeting, to deliver a dissertation or an opinion. They also 'sopped together.' From the days of Athenæus to those of Dr Johnson, the pleasures of the table have enlivened those of literature. A copy of each question and a summons for the time of conference were sent to the absent members. The names were carefully registered by the secretary, and the dissertations deposited in their archives. One of these manuscripts to Stowe, the antiquary, with his memoranda on the back, exists in the Ashmolean Museum. I shall weave it with all its verbal serge:

"Of the antiquitie, etimologie, and priviledges of parishes in Englande.

"It is desired that you give not notice hereof to any, such as haue the like questions."

"Such is the summons; the memoranda in the handwriting of Stowe are these:

"Honorus Romanus, Archbyschop of Canterbury, divided his province into parishes; he ordeyned clerks and others, commanding them that they should instruct the people, as well by good lyfe, as by doctrine.

"Cuthbert, Archbyschop of Canterbury, procured the Pope that in cities and townes there should be appointed church yards for buriall of the dead, whose bodies were used to be buried abroad, &c. &c.]

"Their meetings had hitherto been private; but to give publicity to them, they petitioned for a charter of incorporation, under the title of the Academy for the Study of Antiquity and History founded by Queen Elizabeth. And preserve all the memorials of history which the dissolution of the monasteries had scattered about the kingdom, proposed to erect a library, to be called 'The Library of Queen Elizabeth.' The death of the queen overturned this venerable project. The society was somewhat interrupted by the usual casualties of human life; the members were dispersed, or died, and it ceased for twenty

"Spelman, Camden, and others, desirous of renovating the society, met for this purpose at the Herald's office; they settled their regulations, among which, one for avoiding offence, they should neither meddle with matters of state nor religion. 'But before our next meeting,' says Spelman, 'we had notice that his majesty took a little mislike of our society, not being informed that we had resolved to decline all matters of state. Yet hereupon we forebore to meet again, and so all our labour's lost!' Unquestionably much was lost, for much could have been produced; and Spelman's work on law terms, where I find this information, was one of the first projected. James I has incurred the censure of those who have written more boldly than Spelman on the suppression of this society; but whether James was misinformed by 'taking a little mislike,' or whether the antiquaries failed in exerting themselves to open their plan more clearly to that 'timid pedant,' as Gough and others designate this monarch, may yet be doubtful; assuredly James was not a man to condemn their erudition!

The king at this time was busied by furthering a similar project, which was to found 'King James's College at Chelsea,' a project originating with Dean Sutchell, and zealously approved by Prince Henry, to raise a nursery for young polemics in scholastical divinity, for the purpose of defending the protestant cause from the attacks of catholics and sectaries; a college which was afterwards called by Laud 'Controversy College.' In this society were appointed historians and antiquaries, for Camden and Haywood filled these offices.

The society of Antiquaries, however, though suppressed, was perhaps never extinct: it survived in some shape under Charles II, for Ashmole in his Diary notices 'the Antiquaries' Feast,' as well as 'the Astrologers,' and another of the 'Freemasons.' The present society was only incorporated in 1751. There are two sets of their Memoirs; for besides the modern Archæologia, we have two volumes of 'Curious Discourses,' written by the Fathers of the Antiquarian Society in the age of Elizabeth, collected from their dispersed manuscripts, which Camden preserved with a parental hand.

The philosophical spirit of the age, it might have been expected, would have reached our modern antiquaries; but neither profound views, nor eloquent disquisitions, have imparted that value to their confined researches and languid efforts, which the character of the times, and the excellence of our French rivals in their Academies, so peremptorily required. It is, however, hopeful to hear Mr Hallam declare, 'I think our last volumes improve a little, and but a little! A comparison with the Academy of Inscriptions in its better days must still inspire us with shame.'

Among the statutes of the Society of Antiquaries, there is one which expels any member 'who shall by speaking, writing, or printing, publicly defame the society. Some things may be too antique and obsolete even for the Society of Antiquaries! and such is this vile restriction! Should there be a stray wit among them, or a critical observer, are they to compromise the freedom of the republic of letters, by the monopolizing spirit of excellence this statute necessarily attributes to their works—and their 'gestes' be

QUOTATION.

It is generally supposed that where there is no quotation, there will be found most originality; and as people like to lay out their money according to their notions, our writers usually furnish their pages rapidly with the productions of their own soil: they run up a quickset hedge, or plant a poplar, and get trees and hedges of this fashion much faster than the former landlords procured from their timber. The great part of our writers, in consequence, have become so original, that no one cares to imitate them; and those who never quote, in return are never quoted!

This is one of the results of that adventurous spirit which is now stalking forth and raging for its own innovations. We have not only rejected authority, but have also cast away experience; and often the unburdened vessel is driving to all points of the compass, and the passengers no longer know whither they are going. The wisdom of the wise, and the experience of ages, may be preserved by quotation.

It seems, however, agreed, that no one would quote if he could think; and it is not imagined that the well-read may quote from the delicacy of their taste, and the fulness of their knowledge. Whatever is felicitously expressed risks being worse expressed: it is a wretched taste to be gratified with mediocrity when the excellent lies before us. We quote, to save proving what has been demonstrated, referring to where the proofs may be found. We quote to screen ourselves from the odium of doubtful opinions, which the world would not willingly accept from ourselves; and we may quote from the curiosity which only a quotation itself can give, when in our own words it would be divested of that tint of ancient phrase, that detail of narrative, and that naïveté which we have for ever lost, and which we like to recollect once had an existence.

The ancients, who in these matters were not perhaps such blockheads as some may conceive, considered poetical quotation as one of the requisite ornaments of oratory. Cicero, even in his philosophical works, is as little sparing of quotations as Plutarch. Old Montaigne is so stuffed with them, that he owns if they were taken out of him, little of himself would remain; and yet this never injured that original turn which the old Gascon has given to his thoughts. I suspect that Addison hardly ever composed a Spectator which was not founded on some quotation, noted in those three folio manuscript volumes which he had previously collected; and Addison lasts, while Steele, who always wrote from first impressions and to the times, with perhaps no very inferior genius, has passed away, inasmuch that Dr. Beattie once considered that he was obliging the world by collecting Addison's papers, and carefully omitting Steele's.

Quotation, like much better things, has its abuses. One may quote till one is compe. The ancient lawyers used to quote at the bar till they had stagnated their own cause. 'Retourneons nos moutons,' was the cry of the client. But these vagrant prowlers must be consigned to the beaches of criticism. Such do not always understand the authors whose names adorn their barren pages, and which are taken, too, from the third or the thirtieth hand. Those who trust to such false quoters will often learn how contrary this transmission is to the sense and application of the original. Every transplantation has altered the fruit of the tree; every new channel, the quality of the stream in its remove from the spring-head. Bayle, when writing on 'Comets,' discovered this; for, having collected many things applicable to his work, as they stood quoted in some modern writers, when he came to compare them with their originals, he was surprised to find that they were nothing for his purpose! the originals conveyed a quite contrary sense to that of the pretended quoters, who often, from innocent blundering, and sometimes from purposeful deception, had falsified their quotations. This is a useful story for second-hand authorities!

Selden had formed some notions on this subject of quotations in his 'Table-talk,' art. 'Books and authors;' but, as Le Clerc justly observes proud of his immense reading, he has too often violated his own precept. 'In quoting of books,' says Selden, 'quote such authors as are usually read; or others read for your own satisfaction, but not name them.' Now it happens that no writer names more authors, except Prynne, than the learned Selden. La Mothe le Vayer's curious works consists of fifteen volumes; he is among the greatest quoters. Whoever turns them over will perceive that he is an original thinker, and a great wit; his style, indeed, is meagre, which, as much as his quotations, may have proved fatal to him. But in both these cases it is evident, that even quoters who have abused the privilege of quotation, are not necessarily writers of a mean genius.

The Quoters who deserve the title, and it ought to be an honorary one, are those who trust to no one but themselves. In borrowing a passage, they carefully observe its connexion; they collect authorities, to reconcile any disparity in them before they furnish the one which they adopt; they advance no fact without a witness, and they are not loose and general in their references, as I have been told is our historian Henry so frequently, that it is suspected he deals much in second-hand ware. Bayle lets us into a mystery of author-craft. 'Suppose an able man is to prove that an ancient author entertained certain particular opinions, which are only insinuated here and there through his works, I am sure it will take him up more days to collect the passages which he will have occasion for, than to argue at random on those passages. Having once found out his authorities and his quotations, which perhaps will not fill six pages, and may have cost him a month's labour, he may finish in two mornings' work, twenty pages of arguments, objections, and answers to objections; and, consequently, what proceeds from our own genius sometimes costs much less time than what is requisite for collecting. Corneille would have required more time to defend a tragedy by a collection of authorities, than to write it; and I am supposing the same number of pages in the tragedy and in the defence. Hæc sicut perhaps bestowed more time in defending his Médecine infanticide against Balzac, than a Spanish (or a Scotch) metaphysician bestows on a large volume of controversy where he takes all from his own stock.' I am somewhat concerned in the truth of this principle. There are articles in the present work occupying but a few pages, which could never have been produced had not more time been allotted to the researches which they contain than was would allow to a small volume, which might excel in genius, and yet be likely not to be long remembered! All this is labour which never meets the eye. It is quiet work, with special pleading and poignant periods, to fill sheets with generalising principles: those bird's-eye views of philosophy for the senes seem as if things were seen clearer when at a distance and en masse, and require less knowledge of the individual parts. Such a sort of writing may resemble the famous Lullian method, by which the doctor Iluminatus enabled any one to invent arguments at a machine! Two tables, one of attributes, and the other of subjects, worked about circularly in a frame, and placed correlatively to one another, produced certain combinations; the number of questions multiplied as they were used! So that here was a mechanical invention, by which they might dispute without end, and write on without any particular knowledge of their subject!

But the pains-taking gentry, when heaven sends the genius enough, are the more instructive sort, and they are those to whom we shall appeal while time and truth meet together. A well-read writer, with good taste, and who has the command of the wit of other men; he search where knowledge is to be found; and though he may himself excel in invention, his ingenuity may compose of those agreeable books, the delices of literature, that would last the fading meteors of his day. Epicurus is said to have borrowed from no writer in his three hundred insight volumes, while Plutarch, Seneca, and the elder Pliny made such free use of their libraries; and it has happened that Epicurus, with his unsubstantial nothingness, is 'melted into thin air,' while the solid treasures have been themselves up amidst the wrecks of nations.

On this subject of Quotation, literary politics, for a commonwealth has its policy and its cabinet-secrets, is more concerned than the reader suspects. Authoritative matters of fact are often called for; in matters of opinion indeed, which, perhaps, are of more importance, and requires any authority. But too open and generous revelation of the chapter and the page of the original quoted, has often proved detrimental to the legitimate honours of the quoter. They are unfairly appropriated the next corner; the quoter is never quoted, but the authority he has afforded is produced by his successor in the air of an original research. I have seen MSS. so confidently referred to, which could never have met the eye of the writer. A learned historian declared to me a contemporary, that the latter had appropriated his research; he might, indeed, and he had a right to raise the same originals; but if his predecessor had opened sources for him, gratitude is not a silent virtue. Gib Stuart thus lived on Robertson: and as Professor David Stewart observes, 'his curiosity has seldom led him any path where the genius and industry of his predecessor had not previously cleared the way.' It is for this reason some authors, who do not care to trust to the equity of gratitude of their successors, will not furnish the means supplanting themselves; for, by not yielding up their authorities, they themselves become one. Some authors who are pleased at seeing their names occur in the titles of other books than their own, have practised this litigious management; such as Alexander ab Alexandro and other compilers of that stamp, to whose labour small value, we are often obliged to refer, from the circumstance that they themselves have not pointed out authorities.

One word more on this long chapter of quotation. To make a happy one is a thing not easily to be done. Cardinal du Perron used to say, that the happy application of a verse from Virgil was worth a talent; and he perhaps too much prepossessed in their favour, has insinuated, that there is not less invention in a just and happy application of a thought found in a book, than in being the first author of that thought. The art of quotation requires more dexterity in the practice than those could who can see nothing more in a quotation than an Whenever the mind of a writer is saturated with the full inspiration of a great author, a quotation gives completeness to the whole; it seals his feelings with undisputed authority. Whenever we would prepare the mind by a sensible appeal, an opening quotation is a symphony prelude on the chords whose tones we are about to harmonize. Perhaps no writers of our times have discovered more of this delicacy of quotation than the author of the Persuaders of Literature; and Mr Southey, in some of his beautiful periodical investigations, where we have often acknowledged the solemn and striking effect of a quotation from our elder writers.

THE ORIGIN OF DANTE'S INFERNO.

Nearly six centuries have elapsed since the appearance of the great work of Dante, and the literary historians of his age are even now disputing respecting the origin of this poem, singular in its nature and in its excellence. In ascertaining a point so long inquired after, and so keenly desired, it will rather increase our admiration than detract from the genius of this great poet; and it will illustrate the great principle, that every great genius is influenced by its objects and the feelings which occupy his own times, by differing from the race of his brothers by the magical force of his developments; the light he sends forth over the world he often catches from the faint and unobserved spark which would die away, and turn to nothing, in another hand.

The Divina Commedia of Dante is a visionary journey through the three realms of the after-life existence; and though in the classical ardour of our political pilgrim, he also has his conductor to be a Pagan, the scenes are those of his own imagination. The invention of a vision was the usual vehicle for religious instruction in his age; it was adapted to the genius of the sleeping Homer of a monastery, and to the comprehension, and even to the faith, of the populace, whose minds were then awake to these awful themes.

This mode of writing visions has been imperfectly defined by several modern inquiries. It got into the Fabliaux the Jongleurs, or Provencal bards, before the days of Dante; they had these visions or pilgrimages to Hell; the ventures were no doubt solemn to them—but it seemed hard to attribute the origin of a sublime poem to such inferior, and to us even ludicrous inventions. Every one, therefore, found out some other origin of Dante's Inferno—but they were resolved to have one—in other works congenial to its nature; the description of a second Hell, the melancholy or the glorified scenes of punishment below, with the animated shades of men who were no more, had been opened to the Italian bard by his favourite poet, and might have been suggested, according to Warburton, by the Scipionis Ciceronis of Cicero.

But the entire work of Dante is Gothic; it is a picture of his times, of his own ideas, of the people about him; the king of classical antiquity resembles it; and although the name of Virgil is introduced into a Christian Hades, assuredly not the Roman, for Dante's Virgil speaks facts as the Latin poet could never have done. It is of the absurdities of Dante, who, like our Shakespeare, the Gothic architecture itself, has many things which lead to nothing amidst their massive greatness.

And the Italian and the French commentators, who have misled themselves on this occasion, known the art which have happily practised in this country, of illustrating great national bard, by endeavouring to recover the temporary writings and circumstances which were mixed with his studies and his times, they had long ere discovered the real framework of the Inferno.

Within the last twenty years it had been rumoured that he had borrowed, or stolen his Inferno from 'The Vision of Alberico,' which was written two centuries before him. The literary antiquary Bottari had discovered a manuscript of this Vision of Alberico, and, in haste, he extracted of a startling nature. They were well calculated to inflame the curiosity of those who are eager for any thing new about something old; it throws an air of mystery over the small talker, who otherwise would be little about the original! This was not the first time the whole edifice of genius had been threatened by the shock of a remote earthquake; but in these cases it happens that those early discoverers who can judge little part, are in total blindness when they would do so as a whole. A poisonous mildew seemed to have fallen on the laurels of Dante; nor were we relieved from constant inquiries till! Sig. Abate Casaliotti at Rome, published, in 1814, this much talked of manuscript, and has now enabled us to see and to decide, and even to add the present little article as a useful supplement.

True it is, that Dante must have read with equal attention and delight, this authentic vision of Alberico; for it is given, as we are assured by the whole monastery, as it happened to their ancient brother, when a boy; many a striking, and many a positive resemblance in the 'Divina Commedia' has been pointed out; and Mr Cary, in his English version of Dante, so English, that he makes Dante speak in blank verse very much like Dante in stanzas, has observed, that 'The reader will, in these marked resemblances, see enough to convince him that Dante had read this singular work.' The truth is, that the 'Vision of Alberico' must not be considered as a singular work—but on the contrary, as the prevalent mode of composition in the monastic ages. It has been ascertained that Alberico was written in the twelfth century, judging of the age of a manuscript by the writing. I shall now preserve a vision which a French antiquary had long ago given, merely with the design to show how the monks abused the simplicity of our Gothic ancestors, and with an utter want of taste for such inventions, he deems the present one to be 'monstrous.' He has not told us the age in which it was written. This vision, however, exhibits such complete scenes of the Inferno of the great poet, that the writer must have read Dante, or Dante must have read this writer. The manuscript, with another of the same kind, is in the King's library at Paris, and some future researcher may ascertain the age of these Gothic compositions; doubtless they will be found to belong to the age of Alberico, for they are alike stamped by the same dark and awful imagination, the same depth of feeling, the solitary genius of the monastery!

It may, however, be necessary to observe, that these 'Visions' were merely a vehicle for popular instruction; nor must we depend on the age of their composition by the names of the supposititious visionaries affixed to them: they were the sautes of the times. The following elaborate views of some scenes in the Inferno were composed by an honest monk who was dissatisfied with the bishops, and took this covert means of pointing out how the neglect of their episcopal duties was punished in the after life; he had an equal quarrel with the feudal nobility for their oppressions: and he even boldly ascended to the throne.

'The Vision of Charles the Bald, of the places of punishment, and the happiness of the just.'

'I, Charles, by the gratuitous gift of God, king of the Germans, Roman patrician, and likewise emperor of the Franks;

'On the holy night of Sunday, having performed the divine offices of matins, returning to my bed to sleep, a voice most terrible came to my ear; "Charles! thy spirit shall now issue from thy body; thou shalt go and behold the judgments of God; they shall serve thee only as presages, and thy spirit shall again return shortly afterwards." Instantly was my spirit rapt, and he who bore me away was a being of the most splendid whiteness. He put into my hand a ball of thread, which shed about a blaze of light, such as the comet darts when it is apparent. He divided it, and said to me, "Take thou this thread, and bind it strongly on the thumb of thy right hand, and by this I will lead thee through the infernal labyrinth of punishments."

'Then going before with velocity, but always unwinding this luminous thread, he conducted me into deep valleys filled with fire, and wells inflamed, blazing with all sorts of unctuous matter. There I observed the prelates who had served my father and my ancestors. Although I trembled, I still, however, inquired of them to learn the cause of their torments. They answered "We are the bishops of your father and your ancestors; instead of uniting them and their people in peace and concord, we sowed among them discord, and were the kindlers of evil; for this are we burning in these Tartarean punishments; we, and other men-slayers and devourers of rapine. Here also shall come your bishops, and that crowd of satellites who surround you, and who imitate the evil we have done."

'And whilst I listened to them tremblingly, I beheld the blackest demons flying with hooks of burning iron, who would have caught that ball of thread which I held in my hand, and have drawn it towards them, but it darted such a reverberating light, that they could not lay hold of the thread. These demons, when at my back, hustled to precipitate me into those sulphureous pits; but my conductor, who carried the ball, wound about my shoulder a doubled thread, drawing me to him with such force, that we ascended high mountains of flame, from whence issued lakes and burning streams, melting all kinds of metals. There I found the souls of lords who had served my father and my brothers; some plunged in up to the hair of their heads, others to their chins, others with half their bodies immersed. These yelling, cried to me, "It is for inflaming discontents with your father, and your brothers, and yourself, to make war and spread murder and rapine, eager for earthly spoils, that we now suffer these torments in these rivers of boiling metal." While I was timidly bending over their suffering, I heard at my back the clamour of voices, potentes potenter tormenta patientur! "The powerful suffer torments powerfully." And I looked up, and beheld on the shores boiling streams and ardent furnaces, blazing with pitch and sulphur, full of great dragons, large scorpions, and serpents of a strange species; where also I saw some of my ancestors, princes, and my brothers also, who said to me, "Alas, Charles! behold our heavy punishment for evil, and for proud malignant counsels, which in our realms and in thine we yielded to from the lust of dominion." As I was grieving with their groans, dragons hurried on, who sought to devour me with throats opened, belching flame and sulphur. But my leader trobbled the thread over me, at whose resplendent light these were overcome. Leading me then securely, we descended into a great valley, which on one side was dark, except where lighted by ardent furnaces, while the amenity of the other was so pleasant and splendid that I cannot describe it. I turned however, to the obscure and flaming side; I beheld some kings of my race agonized in great and strange punishments, and I thought how in an instant the huge black giants who in turmoil were working to set this whole valley into flames, would have hurled me into those gulfs; I still trembled, when the luminous thread cheered my eyes, and on the other side of the valley a light for a little while whitened, gradually breaking: I observed two fountains; one, whose waters had extreme heat, the other more temperate and clear; and two large vessels filled with these waters. The luminous thread rested on one of the fervid waters, where I saw my father Louis covered to his thighs, and though labouring in the anguish of bodily pain, he spoke to me, "My son Charles, fear nothing! I know that thy spirit shall return unto thy body; and God has permitted thee to come here that thou mayst witness, because of the sins I have committed, the punishments I endure. One day I am placed in the boiling bath of this large vessel, and on another changed into that of more temperate waters: this I owe to the prayers of Saint Peter, Saint Denis, Saint Remy, who are the patrons of our royal house; but if by prayers and masses, offerings and alms, psalmody and vigils, my faithful bishops and abbots, and even all the ecclesiastical order, assist me, it will not be long before I am delivered from these boiling waters. Look on your left!" I looked, and beheld two tuns of boiling waters. "These are prepared for thee," he said, "if thou wilt not be thine own corrector, and do penance for thy crimes!" Then I began to sink with horror; but my guide perceiving the panic of my spirit, said to me, "Follow me to the right of the valley bright in the glorious light of Paradise." I had not long proceeded, when, amidst the most illustrious kings, I beheld my uncle Lotharius seated on a topaz, of marvellous magnitude, crowned with a most precious diadem; and beside him was his son Louis, like him crowned, and seeing me, he spake with a blandishment of air, and a sweetness of voice, "Charles, my successor, now the third in the Roman Empire, approach! I know that thou hast come to view these places of punishment, where thy father and my brother groans to his destined hour; but still to end by the intercession of the three saints, the patrons of the kings and the people of France. Know that it will not be long ere thou shalt be dethroned, and shortly after thou shalt die!" Then Louis turning towards me: "Thy Roman empire shall pass into the hands of Louis, the son of my daughter; give him the sovereign authority, and trust to his hands that ball of thread thou holdest." Directly I loosened it from the finger of my right hand to give the empire to his son. This invested him with empire, and he became brilliant with all light; and at the same instant, admirable to see, my spirit, greatly wearied and broken, returned and glided into my body. Hence let all know whatever happen, that Louis the young possesses the Roman empire destined by God. And so the Lord will reigneth over the living and the dead, and whose kingdom endureth for ever and for aye, will perform when he shall call me away to another life."

The French literary antiquaries judged of these 'Visions,' with the mere nationality of their taste. Every thing Gothic with them is barbarous, and they see nothing in the redeeming spirit of genius, nor the secret purpose of the curious documents of the age.

The Vision of Charles the Bald may be found in the ancient chronicles of St Denis, which were written under the eye of Abbé Suger, the learned and able minister Louis the Young, and which were certainly composed before the thirteenth century. The learned writer of the fourth volume of the Mélanges tirés d'une grande Bibliothèque, who had as little taste for these mysterious visions as the other French critic, apologizes for the venerated Abbé Suger's admission of such visions: "Assuredly," says, 'the Abbe Suger was too wise and too enlightened to believe in similar visions; but if he suffered its merits or if he inserted it himself in the chronicle of St Denis, is because he felt that such a fable offered an excellent lesson to kings, to ministers and bishops, and it had been well if they had not had worse tales told them.' The last part is as philosophical as the former is the reverse.

In these extraordinary productions of a Gothic age, we may assuredly discover Dante; but what are they more than the frame work of his unimitated picture! It is only a mechanical part of his sublime conceptions that we can pretend to have discovered; other poets might have adopted these 'Visions,' but we should have had no 'Divina Commedia.' Mr Carey has finely observed of the pretended origins of Dante's genius, although Mr Cas knew only The Vision of Alberico, 'It is the scale of magnificence on which this conception was framed, the wonderful development of it in all its parts, that may justly entitle our poet to rank among the few minds whom the power of a great creative faculty can be ascribed.' Milton might originally have sought the seminal of his great work from a sort of Italian mystery. In the words of Dante himself,

'Poca favilla gran fiamma seconda.'

Il Paradiso, Canto I.

From a small spark

Great flame hath risen.'

Carey.

After all, Dante has said in a letter, 'I found the original my hell in the world which we inhabit;' and he said greater truth than some literary antiquaries can always comprehend!*

OF A HISTORY OF EVENTS WHICH HAVE NOT BEEN FINISHED.

Such a title might serve for a work of not incurious and unphilosophical speculation, which might enlarge our general views of human affairs, and assist our comprehension of these events which are enrolled on the registers of history. The scheme of Providence is carrying on subtle and mysterious events, by means inscrutable to us,

'A mighty maze, but not without a plan.'

Some mortals have recently written history, and 'Lectures on History,' who presume to explain the great secret of human affairs, affecting the same familiarity with the signs of Providence, as with the events which they despise from human authorities. Every party discovers

* In the recent edition of Dante, by Romanin, in four volumes, quarto, the last preserves the Vision of Alberico, in strange correspondence on its publication; the resemblance in numerous passages are pointed out. It is curious to state that the good Catholic Abbat Cancellieri, at first maintained the authenticity of the Vision by alleging that similar revelations have not been unusual.—the Cavalieri Gherardi attacked the whole as the crude legend of a boy who was made the instrument of the monks, and was either a liar, or a parrot! We may express our astonishment that at the present day, a subject of mere literary inquiry should have been involved with 'the faith of the Roman Church.' Carey becomes at length submissive to the lively attacks of Romanin, and the editor gravely adds his 'conclusion,' which he has boldly concluded nothing! He discovers pictures, sculptures, a mystery acted, as well as Visions in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, from which he imagines the Inferno, the Purgatorio, and the Paradiso, owe their first conception. Originality of Dante, however, is maintained on a right principle; that the poet only employed the ideas and the manner which he found in his own country and his own times.

to events which at first were adverse to their own cause, as finally terminate in their favour, that Providence had a peculiar and particular interference: this is a source of human error, and intolerant prejudice. The Jesuit farina, exulting over the destruction of the kingdom and ruin of the Goths in Spain, observes, that 'It was by a particular providence, that out of their ashes might rise a new and holy Spain, to be the bulwark of the Catholic religion; and unquestionably he would have adduced as such of this 'holy Spain,' the establishment of the inquisition, and the dark idolatrous bigotry of that hoodwinked people. But a protestant will not sympathize with the feelings of the Jesuit; yet the protestants too, will discover particular providences, and magnify human events into supernatural ones. This custom has long prevailed among fanatics: we have had books published by individuals of 'particular providences,' which, as they imagined, had fallen to their lot; they are called passages of providence; and as I recollect by a cracked brained puritan, whose experience never went beyond his own neighbourhood, but who, being a very bad temper, and many whom he considered as enemies, wrote down all the misfortunes which happened to them as acts of particular providences, and showed his blessedness on the efficacy of his curses!

Without venturing to penetrate into the mysteries of the secret order of human affairs, and the great scheme of utility or of accident, it may be sufficiently evident to us, that often on a single event revolve the fortunes of men and of nations.

An eminent writer has speculated on the defeat of Charles I. at Worcester, as 'one of those events which not strikingly exemplify how much better events are directed by Providence, than they would be if the direction were left to the choice even of the best and the wisest man.' He proceeds to show, that a royal victory must not have been succeeded by other severe struggles, and by different parties. A civil war would have contained within itself another civil war. One of the blessings of his defeat at Worcester was, that it left the commonwealth's men masters of the three kingdoms, and afforded them 'full leisure to complete and perfect their own structure of government. The experiment was fairly tried; there was nothing from without to disturb the process; it went on duly and change to change.' The close of this history is well known. Had the royalists obtained the victory of Worcester, the commonwealth party might have obstinately insisted, that had their republic not been overthrown, their free and liberal government would have diffused a universal happiness through the three kingdoms. This he is ingenious; and might have been pursued in my supposed 'History of Events which have not happened,' under the title of 'The Battle of Worcester won by Charles I.' The chapter, however, would have had a brighter tone, if the sovereign and the royalists had proved themselves better men than the knaves and fanatics of the commonwealth. It is not for us to scrutinize into 'the ways' of Providence; but if Providence conducted Charles to the throne, it appears to have deserted him when he was.

Historians, for a particular purpose, have sometimes used themselves with a detail of an event which did not happen. A history of this kind we find in the ninth book of Livy; and it forms a digression, where, with his delightful copiousness, he reasons on the probable consequences which would have ensued had Alexander the Great invaded Italy. Some Greek writers, to raise the Parthians on a equality with the Romans, had insinuated that the son of a this military monarch, who is said never to have lost a battle, would have intimidated the Romans, and would have checked their passion for universal dominion. The patriotic Livy, disdainful that the glory of his nation, which had never ceased from war for nearly five hundred years, should be put in competition with the fear of a young conqueror, which had scarcely lasted a century, enters into a parallel of 'man with man, general with general, and victory with victory.' In the full charm of imagination he brings Alexander down into Italy, he makes him with all his virtues, and 'dunks their lustre' in all his defects. He arranges the Macedonian army, he exultingly shows five Roman armies at that moment pursuing their conquests; and he cautiously counts numerous allies who would have combined their forces; even descends to compare the weapons and the modes of warfare of the Macedonians with those of the Romans. As if he had caught a momentary panic at the first success which had probably attended Alexander in his descent into Italy, brings forward the great commanders he would have had to encounter; he compares Alexander with each, and at length terminates his fears, and claims his triumph, by discovering that the Macedonians had but one Alexander, while the Romans had several. This beautiful digression in Livy is a model for the narrative of an event which never happened.

The Saracens from Asia had spread into Africa, and at length possessed themselves of Spain. Eude, a discontented Duke of Guienne, in France, had been vanquished by Charles Martel, who derived that humble but glorious surname from the event we are now to record. Charles had left Eude the enjoyment of his dukedom, provided that he held it as a fief of the crown; but blind with ambition and avarice, Eude adopted a scheme which threw Christianity itself, as well as Europe, into a crisis of peril which has never since occurred. By marrying a daughter with a Mahometan emir, he rashly began an intercourse with the Ishmaelites, one of whose favourite projects was, to plant a formidable colony of their faith in France. An army of four hundred thousand combatants, as the chroniclers of the time affirm, were seen descending into Guienne, possessing themselves in one day of his domains; and Eude soon discovered what sort of workmen he had called, to do that of which he himself was so incapable. Charles, with equal courage and prudence, beheld this heavy tempest bursting over the whole country; and to remove the first cause of this national evil, he reconciled the discontented Eude, and detached the duke from his fatal alliance. But the Saracens were fast advancing through Touraine, and had reached Tours by the river Loire: Abderam, the chief of the Saracens, anticipated a triumph in the multitude of his infantry, his cavalry, and his camels, exhibiting a military warfare unknown in France; he spread out his mighty army to surround the French, and to take them, as it were, in a net. The appearance terrified, and the magnificence astonished. Charles, collecting his far inferior forces, assured them that they had no other France than the spot they covered. He had ordered that the city of Tours should be closed on every Frenchman, unless he entered it victorious; and he took care that every fugitive should be treated as an enemy by bodies of gens d'armes, whom he placed to watch at the wings of his army. The combat was furious. The astonished Mahometan beheld his battalions defeated as he urged them on singly to the French, who on that day had resolved to offer their lives as an immolation to their mother country. Eude on that day, ardent to clear himself from the odium which he had incurred, with desperate valour, taking a wide compass, attacked his new allies in the rear. The camp of the Mahometan was forced: the shrieks of his women and children reached him from amidst the massacre; terrified, he saw his multitude shaken. Charles, who beheld the light breaking through this dark cloud of men, exclaimed to his countrymen, 'My friends, God has raised his banner, and the unbelievers perish!' The mass of the Saracens, though broken, could not fly; their own multitude pressed themselves together, and the Christian sword mowed down the Mahometans. Abderam was found dead in a vast heap, unwounded, stifled by his own multitude. Historians record that three hundred and sixty thousand Saracens perished on la journée de Tours; but their fears and their joy probably magnified their enemies. Thus Charles saved his own country, and at that moment, all the rest of Europe, from this deluge of people which had poured down from Asia and Africa. Every Christian people returned a solemn thanksgiving, and saluted their deliverer as 'the Hammer of France. But the Saracens were not conquered; Charles did not even venture on their pursuit; and a second invasion proved almost as terrifying; army still poured down on army, and it was long, and after many dubious results, that the Saracens were rooted out of France. Such is the history of one of the most important events which has passed; but that of an event which did not happen, would be the result of this famous conflict, had the Mahometan power triumphed! The Mahometan dominion had predominated through Europe! The imagination is startled when it discovers how much depended on this invasion, at a time when there existed no political state in Europe, no balance of power in one common tie of confederation! A single battle, and a single treason had before made the Mahometans sovereigns of Spain. We see that the same events had nearly been repeated in France; and had the crescent towered above the cross, as every appearance promised to the Saracenic hosts, the least of our evils had now been that we should have worn turbans, combed our beards instead of shaving them, have beheld a more magnificent architecture than the Grecian, while the public mind had been bounded by the arts and literature of the Moorish university of Cordova.

One of the great revolutions of modern Europe, perhaps, had not occurred, had the personal feelings of Luther been respected, and had his personal interest been consulted. Guicciardini, whose veracity we cannot suspect, has preserved a fact which proves how very nearly some important events which have taken place, might not have happened! I transcribe the passage from his thirteenth book. Cæsar (the Emperor Charles V.) after he had given a hearing in the Diet of Worms to Martin Luther, and caused his opinions to be examined by a number of divines, who reported that his doctrine was erroneous and pernicious to the Christian religion, had, to gratify the pontiff, put him under the ban of the empire, which so terrified Martin, that, if the injurious and threatening words which were given him by Cardinal San Sisto, the apostolical legate, had not thrown him into the utmost despair, it is believed it would have been easy, by giving him some preferment, or providing for him some honourable way of living, to make him renounce his errors! By this we may infer, that one of the true authors of the Reformation was this very apostolical legate; they had succeeded in terrifying Luther, but they were not satisfied till they had insulted him; and with such a temper as Luther's, the sense of personal insult would remove even that of terror; it would unquestionably survive it. A similar proceeding with Franklin, from our ministers, is said to have produced the same effect with that political sage. What Guicciardini has told of Luther preserves the sentiment of the times. Charles V. was so fully persuaded that he could have put down the Reformation, had he rid himself at once of the chief, that having granted Luther a safe-guard to appear at the Council at Worms, in his last moments he repented, as of a sin, that having had Luther in his hands, he suffered him to escape; for to have violated his faith with a heretic he held to be no crime!

In the history of religion, human instruments have been permitted to be the great movers of its chief revolutions; and the most important events concerning national religions appear to have depended on the passions of individuals, and the circumstances of the time. Impure means have often produced the most glorious results; and this, perhaps, may be among the dispensations of Providence.

A similar transaction occurred in Europe and in Asia. The motives and conduct of Constantine the Great, in the alliance of the Christian faith with his government, are far more obvious than any one of those qualities with which the panegyric of Eusebius so vainly cloaks over the crimes and unchristian life of this polytheistical Christian. In adopting the new faith as a coup d'état, and by investing the church with temporal power, at which Dante so indignantly exclaims, he founded the religion of Jesus, but corrupted its guardians. The same occurrence took place in France under Clovis. The fabulous religion of Paganism was fast on its decline; Clovis had resolved to unite the four different principalities, which divided Gaul into one empire. In the midst of an important battle, as fortune hung doubtful between the parties, the Pagan monarch invoked the god of his fair Christian queen, and obtained the victory! St Remi found no difficulty in persuading Clovis, after the fortunate event, to adopt the Christian creed. Political reasons for some time suspended the king's open conversion, at length the Franks followed their sovereign to the baptismal fonts. According to Pasquier, Naudé, and other political writers, these recorded miracles,* like those of Constantine, were but inventions to authorize the change of religion. Clovis used the new creed as a lever by whose machinery he would be enabled to crush the petty princes his neighbors; and like Constantine, Clovis, sullied by crimes of as dark a dye, retained the title of 'the Great.' Had not the most odious 'Defender of the Faith' been influenced by the violent of passions, the Reformation, so feebly and so imperfectly begun and continued, had possibly never reached England from the papal thralldom;

* For gospel-light first beam'd from Bullen's eye!

The catholic Ward, in his singular Hudibrastic poem 'England's Reformation,' in some odd rhymes, has characterized it by a satire, which we are much too dull to repeat. The catholic writers censure Philip for raising the Duke of Alva from the Netherlands. According to these humane politicians, the unsparing sword, and penal fires of this resolute captain had certainly accomplished the fate of the heretics; for angry lions, being numerous, would find their numerical force diminished by gibbets, and pit-holes. We have lately been informed by a curious writer that Protestantism once existed in Spain, it was actually extirpated at the moment by the crushing of the inquisition.* According to these catholic politicians, a great event in catholic history did not occur—spirit of catholicism, predominant in a land of protestants—from the Spanish monarch failing to support Alva, finishing what he had begun! Had the armada of Spain safely landed, with the benedictions of Rome, in England—at a moment when our own fleet was short of powder, and at a time when the English catholics formed a powerful party in the nation—we might now be going to Mass!

After his immense conquests, had Gustavus Adolphus not perished in the battle of Lutzen, where his genius attained a glorious victory, unquestionably a wondrous change had operated on the affairs of Europe; the protestant cause had balanced, if not preponderated, over the catholic interest; and Austria, which appeared a universal monarchy, had seen her eagle's wing clipped. But 'the Anti-Christ,' as Gustavus was called by the priests of Spain and Italy, the saviour of protestantism, he is called by England and Sweden, whose death occasioned so many bonfires among the catholics, that if Spanish court interfered lest fuel should become too scarce at the approaching winter—Gustavus fell—the fit hour of those great events which have never happened!

On the first publication of the 'Icon Basilide' of Chast the First, the instantaneous effect produced on the nation was such, fifty editions it is said, appearing in one year that Mr Malcolm Laing observes, that 'had this book, sacred volume to those who considered that sovereign a martyr, appeared a week sooner, it might have preserved the king,' and possibly, have produced a reaction of popular feeling! The chivalrous Dundee made an offer to James II, which, had it been acted on, Mr Laing acknowledges might have produced another change! What it had become of our 'glorious Revolution,' which from its earliest step, throughout the reign of William, was vacillating amidst the unstable opinions and contending interests of so many of its first movers?

The great political error of Cromwell is acknowledged by all parties to have been the adoption of the French interest in preference to the Spanish; a strict alliance with Spain had preserved the balance of Europe, enriched the commercial industry of England, and above all, it checked the overgrowing power of the French government. Before Cromwell had contributed to the predominance of the French power, the French Huguenots were of consequence enough to secure an indulgent treatment. To parliament, as Elizabeth herself had formerly done, considered so powerful a party in France as useful allies; it was anxious to extend the principles of the Reformation, to further the suppression of popery, the parliament was once listened to, and had even commenced a treaty with deputies from Bourdeaux, the purport of which was the assistance of the French Huguenots in their scheme of forming themselves into a republic, or independent state; but Cromwell, on his usurpation, not only overthrew the design, but is believed to have betrayed it to Mazarin. What a change in the affairs of Europe had Cromwell adopted the Spanish interests, and assisted the French Huguenots in becoming an independent state! The revocation of the edict of Nantes and the increase of the French dominion, which so long afterwards disturbed the peace of Europe, were the consequence of this fatal error of Cromwell's. The independent state of the French

* The miracles of Clovis consisted of a shield, which was picked up after having fallen from the skies; the anointing oil, conveyed from Heaven by a white dove in a phial, which, till the reign of Louis XVI, consecrated the Kings of France; and the oriflamme, or standard with golden flames, long suspended over the tomb of St Denis, which the French Kings only raised over the tomb when their crown was in imminent peril. No future king of France can be anointed with the salve ampolle, or oil brought down to earth by a white dove; in 1794 it was broken by some profane hand, and antiquaries have since agreed that it was only an ancient lachrymatory!

* This fact was probably quite unknown to us, till it was given in the Quarterly Review. Vol. XXIX

Huguenots, and the reduction of ambitious France, perhaps, to a secondary European power, had saved Europe from the scourge of the French revolution!

The elegant pen of Mr Roscoe has lately afforded me another curious sketch of a history of events which have not happened.

M. De Sismondi imagines, against the opinion of every historian, that the death of Lorenzo de'Medici was a matter of indifference to the prosperity of Italy; as 'he could not have prevented the different projects which had been matured in the French cabinet, for the invasion and conquest of Italy; and therefore he concludes that all historians are mistaken who bestow on Lorenzo the honour of having preserved the peace of Italy, because the great invasion that overthrew it did not take place till two years after his death.' Mr. Roscoe has philosophically vindicated the honour which his hero has justly received, by employing the principle which in this article has been developed. 'Though Lorenzo de'Medici could not perhaps have prevented the important events that took place in other nations of Europe, it by no means follows that the life or death of Lorenzo were equally indifferent to the affairs of Italy, or that circumstances would have been the same in case he had lived, as in the event of his death.' Mr. Roscoe then proceeds to show how Lorenzo's 'prudent measures, and proper representations,' might probably have prevented the French expedition, which Charles VIII was frequently on the point of abandoning. Lorenzo would not certainly have taken the precipitate measures of his son Piero, in surrendering the Florentine fortresses. His family would not in consequence have been expelled the city; a powerful mind might have influenced the dissident politics of the Italian princes in one common defence; a slight opposition to the fugitive army of France, at the pass of Faro, might have given the French sovereigns a wholesome lesson, and prevented those bloody contests that were soon afterwards renewed in Italy. As a single remove at Chess varies the whole game, so the death of an individual of such importance in the affairs of Europe as Lorenzo de' Medici, could not fail of producing a change in its political relations, as must have varied them in an incalculable degree.' Pigott also describes the state of Italy at this time. Had Lorenzo lived to have seen his son elevated to the papacy, this historian, adopting our present principle, exclaims, 'A happy era for Italy and Tuscany HAD THEN OCCURRED! On this head we can, indeed, be only allowed to conjecture; but the fancy, guided by reason, may expatiate at will in this imaginary state, and contemplate Italy reunited by a stronger bond, flourishing under its own institution and laws, and delivered from all those lamented struggles which occurred within so short a period of time.'

Whitaker in his 'Vindication of Mary Queen of Scots,' has a speculation in the true spirit of this article. When such dependance was made upon Elizabeth's dying without issue, the Countess of Shrewsbury had her son purposely poisoning in London, with two good and able horses continually ready to give the earliest intelligence of the sick Elizabeth's death to the imprisoned Mary. On this the historian observes, 'And had this not improbable event actually taken place, what a different complexion would our history have assumed from what it wears at present! Mary would have been carried from a prison to a throne. Her wise conduct in prison would have been applauded by all.—From Tubury, from Sheffield, and from Chatsworth, she would have been said to have touched with a gentle and masterly hand the springs that actuated all the nation, against the death of her tyrannical cousin,' &c. So much is history in the hands of man! and so peculiarly does it bend to the force of success, and warp with the warmth of prosperity!

Thus important events have been nearly occurring, which however, did not take place; and others have happened which may be traced to accident and to the character of an individual. We shall enlarge our conception of the nature of human events, and gather some useful instruction in our historical reading, by pausing at intervals; and contemplating, for a moment, on certain events which have not happened!

OF FALSE POLITICAL REPORTS.

'A false report, if believed during three days, may be of great service to a government.' This political maxim has been ascribed to Catherine of Medici, an adept in jeu d'état, the arsene imperii! Between solid lying and disguised truth there is a difference known to writers skilled in 'the art of governing mankind by deceiving them;' as politics, ill understood, have been defined, and as are all party politics, these forgers prefer to use the truth disguised, to the gross fiction. When the real truth can no longer be concealed, then they confidently refer to it; for they can still explain and obscure, while they secure on their side the party whose cause they have advocated. A curious reader of history may discover the temporary and sometimes the lasting advantages of spreading rumours designed to disguise, or to counteract the real state of things. Such reports, set a going, serve to break down the sharp and fatal point of a panic, which might instantly occur; in this way the public is saved from the horrors of consternation, and the stupefaction of despair. These rumours give a breathing time to prepare for the disaster, which is doled out cautiously; and, as might be shown, in some cases these first reports have left an event in so ambiguous a state, that a doubt may still arise whether these reports were really so destitute of truth! Such reports, once printed, enter into history, and sadly perplex the honest historian. Of a battle fought in a remote situation, both parties for a long time, at home, may dispute the victory after the event, and the pen may prolong what the sword had long decided. This has been no unusual circumstance: of several of the most important battles on which the fate of Europe has hung, were we to rely on some reports of the time, we might still doubt of the manner of the transaction. A skirmish has been often raised into an arranged battle, and a defeat concealed, in an account of the killed and wounded, while victory has been claimed by both parties! Villeroi, in all his encounters with Marlborough, always sent home despatches by which no one could suspect that he was discomfited. Pompey, after his fatal battle with Caesar, sent letters to all the provinces and cities of the Romans, describing with greater courage than he had fought, so that a report generally prevailed that Caesar had lost the battle! Plutarch informs us, that three hundred writers had described the battle of Marathon. Many doubtless had copied their predecessors; but it would perhaps have surprised us to have observed how materially some differed in their narratives.

In looking over a collection of manuscript letters of the times of James the First, I was struck by the contradictory reports of the result of the famous battle of Lutzen, so glorious and so fatal to Gustavus Adolphus; the victory was sometimes reported to have been obtained by the Swedes; but a general uncertainty, a sort of mystery, agitated the majority of the nation, who were staunch to the protestant cause. This state of anxious suspense lasted a considerable time. The fatal truth gradually came out in reports changing in their progress; if the victory was allowed, the death of the Protestant Hero closed all hope! The historian of Gustavus Adolphus observes on this occasion, that 'Few couriers were better received than those who conveyed the accounts of the King's death to declared enemies or concealed ill wishers; nor did the report greatly displease the court of Whitehall, where the ministry, as it usually happens in cases of timidity, had its degree of apprehensions for fear the event should not be true; and, as I have learned from good authority, imposed silence on the news writers, and intimated the same to the pulpit in case any funeral encomium might proceed from that quarter.' Although the motive assigned by the writer, that of the secret indisposition of the cabinet of James the First towards the fortunes of Gustavus, is to me by no means certain; unquestionably the knowledge of this disastrous event was long kept back by 'a timid ministry,' and the fluctuating reports probably regulated by their designs.

The same circumstance occurred on another important event in modern history, where we may observe the artifice of party writers in disguising or suppressing the real fact. This was the famous battle of the Boyne. The French catholic party long reported that Count Lauzun had won the battle, and that William III was killed. Bussy Rabutin in some memoirs, in which he appears to have registered public events without scrutinizing their truth, says, 'I chronicled this account according as all the first reports gave out, when at length the real fact reached them, the party did not like to lose their pretended victory.' Pere Londei, who published a register of the times, which is favourably noticed in the 'Nouvelles de la République des Lettres,' for 1699, has recorded the event in this decepfive manner: 'The battle of the Boyne as Ireland; Schomberg is said there at the head of the English.' This is 'an equivocal.' The writer resolved to conceal the defeat of James's party, and cautiously suppresses any mention of a victory, but very carefully gives a real fact, by which his readers would hardly doubt of the defeat of the English! We are so accustomed to this traffic of false reports, that we are scarcely aware that many important events recorded as history were in their day strangely disguised by such mystifying accounts. Thus we can only discover by reaching private letters written at the moment. Bayle has collected several remarkable absurdities of this kind, which were spread abroad to answer a temporary purpose, but which had never been known to us and these contemporary letters not been published. A report was prevalent in H.A. and in 1580, that the kings of France and Spain and the Duke of Alva were dead; a frolic which for a time sustained the exhausted spirits of the revolutionists. At the invasion of the Spanish Armada, Barrogh spread reports of the thumb screws, and other instruments of torture, which the Spaniards had brought with them, and thus inflamed the hatred of the nation. The horrid story of the bloody Colonel Kirke is considered as one of those political forgeries to serve the purpose of blackening a zealous partisan.

False reports are sometimes strangers of war. When the chiefs of the league had lost the battle at Ivry, with an army broken and discomfited, they still kept possession of Paris merely by imposing on the inhabitants all sorts of false reports, such as the death of the king of Navarre, at the fortunate moment when victory, undetermined on which side to incline, turned for the league; and they gave out false reports of a number of victories they had elsewhere obtained. Such tales, distributed in pamphlets and ballads among a people agitated by doubts and fears, are glad to be believed; flattering their wishes, or soothing their alarms; they contribute to their ease, and are too agreeable to allow of time for reflection.

The history of a report creating a panic may be traced in the Irish insurrection, in the curious memoirs of James II. A forged proclamation of the Prince of Orange was set forth by Joe Spoke, and a rumour spread that the Irish troops were killing and burning in all parts of the kingdom! A panic like magic instantly ran through the people, so that in one quarter of the town of Drogheda they imagined that the other was filled with blood and runs. During this panic pregnant women miscarried, aged persons died with terror, while the truth was, that the Irish themselves were dispersed and dispersed, in other want of a meal or a lodging!

In the unhappy times of our civil wars under Charles the First, the newspapers and the private letters afford specimens of this political contrivance of false reports of every species. No extravagance of invention to spread a terror against a party was too gross, and the city of London was one day alarmed that the royalists were occupied by a plan of blowing up the river Thames, by an immense quantity of powder ware-housed at the river side; and that there existed an organized though invisible brotherhood of many thousands with consecrated knives; and those who hesitated to give credit to such rumours were branded as malcontents, who took not the danger of the parliament to heart. Forged conspiracies and reports of great but distant victories were inventions to keep up the spirit of a party, but of course prognosticated some intended change in the government. When they were desirous of augmenting the army, or introducing new garrisons, or using an extreme measure with the city, or the royalists, there was always a new conspiracy set afloat; or when any great affair was to be carried in parliament, letters of great victories were published to dishearten the opposition, and infuse additional boldness in their own party. If the report lasted only a few days, it obtained its purpose, and verified the observation of Catharine of Medicis. Those politicians who raise such false reports obtain their end: like the architect, who, in building an arch, supports it with circular props and pieces of timber, or any temporary rubbish, till he closes the arch; and when it can support itself, he throws away the props! There is no class of political lying which can want for illustration if we consult the records of our civil wars; there we may trace the whole art in all the nice management of its shades, its guile, and its more complicate parts, from invective to jest, and from insinuation to perverberation! we may admire the superb and correction of a lie which they had told, by another which they are telling! and triple lying to overreach their opponents; royalists and parliamentarians were alike; for to tell one great truth, 'the father of lies' is of no party!

As 'nothing is new under the sun,' so this art of deceiving the public was unquestionably practiced among the ancients. Sylla sent Scipio word that he could not come with the Romans, but, on the contrary, had declined for the Carthaginians. The Roman army were then anxiously waiting for his expected succor: Scipio was careful to show the utmost civility to these ambassadors, and ostentatiously treated them with presents, that his soldiers might believe they were only returning to hasten his army of Sylla to join the Romans. Livy censures that Roman consul, who, after the defeat at Cannæ, told the deputies of the allies the whole loss they had sustained. 'This consul,' says Livy, 'by giving too faithful and open an account of his defeat, made both himself and his army appear still more contemptible.' The result of the simplicity of the consul was, that the allies, despairing that the Romans would ever recover their losses, deemed it prudent to make terms with Hannibal. Photarch tells an amusing story, in his way, of the natural progress of a report, which was contrary to the wishes of the government; the unhappy reporter suffered punishment as long as the rumour prevailed, though at last it proved true. A stranger landing from Sicily, at a barber's shop delivered all the particulars of the defeat of the Athenians; of which, however, the people were yet uninformed. The barber leaves untrimmed the reporter's beard, and flies away to vent the news in the city, where he told the Archons what he had heard. The whole city was thrown in a ferment. The Archons called an assembly of the people, and produced the luckless barber, who in his confusion could not give any satisfactory account of the first reporter. He was condemned as a spreader of false news, and a disturber of the public quiet; for the Athenians could not imagine but that they were invincible! The barber was dragged to the wheel and tortured, till the disaster was more than confirmed. Bayle, referring to this story observes, that had the barber related a victory, though it had proved to be false, he would not have been punished; a shrewd observation, which occurred to him from his recollection of the fate of Stratocles. This person persuaded the Athenians to perform a public sacrifice and thanksgiving for a victory obtained at sea, though he well knew at the time that the Athenian fleet had been totally defeated. When the calamity could no longer be concealed, the people charged him with being an impostor; but Stratocles saved his life and mollified their anger by the pleasant turn he gave to the whole affair. 'Have I done you any injury?' said he. 'Is it not owing to me that you have spent three days in the pleasures of victory? I think that this spreader of good, but fictitious news, should have occupied the wheel of the luckless barber, who had spread bad but true news; for the barber had no intention of deception, but Stratocles had; and the question here to be tried, was not the truth or the falsity of the reports, but whether the reporters intended to deceive their fellow-citizens? The 'Chronicle' and the 'Post' must be challenged on such a jury, and all the race of news-scribes, whom Patin characterises as hominum genus oedecicissimum mendacissimum acutissimum. Latin superlatives are too rich to suffer a translation. But what Patin says in his letter 356 may be applied: 'These writers insert in their papers things they do not know, and ought not to write. It is the same trick that is playing which was formerly played: it is the very same farce, only it is exhibited by new actors. The worst circumstance, I think, in this, is, that this trick will continue playing a long course of years, and that the public suffer a great deal too much by it.'

OF SUPPRESSORS AND DELAPIDATORS OF MANUSCRIPTS.

MANUSCRIPTS are suppressed or destroyed from motives which require to be noticed. Plagiarists, at least, have the merit of preservation: they may blush at their artifice, and deserve the pillory, but their practices do not incur the capital crime of felony. Serassi, the writer of the curious life of Tasso, was guilty of an extraordinary suppression in his zeal for the poet's memory. The story remains to be told, for it is little known.

Galileo, in early life, was a lecturer at the university of Pisa: delighting in poetical studies, he was then room of a great man, a philosopher, and had Aristotle by heart. The critic man caught the literary mania which broke out about his time, when the Crusicans so absurdly began their 'Cutrouerie Tassese,' and raised up two poetical factions, which infected the Italians with a national fever. Tasso and Ariosto were perpetually weighed and outweighed against each other; Galileo wrote annotations on Tasso, stanza after stanza, and without reserve, treating the majestic bard with a severity which must have thrown the Tassists into an agony. Our critic lent his manuscript to Jacopo Mazzoni, who, probably being a disguised Tassist, by some unaccountable means contrived that the manuscript should be absolutely lost!—to the deep regret of the author and all the Ariostists. The philosopher descended to his grave—not without occasional groans—not without exulting reminiscences of the blows he had in his youth inflicted on the great rival of Ariosto—and the rumour of such a work long floated on tradition! Two centuries had nearly elapsed, when Serassi, employed on his elaborate life of Tasso, among his uninterrupted researches in the public libraries of Rome, discovered a miscellaneous volume, in which, on a cursory examination, he found deposited the lost manuscript of Galileo! It was a shock from which, perhaps, the zealous biographer of Tasso never fairly recovered; the awful name of Galileo sanctioned the asperity of critical decision, and more particularly the severe remarks on the language; a subject on which the Italians are so morbidly delicate, and so trivially grave. Serassi's conduct on this occasion was at once political, timorous and cunning. Gladly would he have annihilated the original, but this was impossible! It was some consolation that the manuscript was totally unknown—for having got mixed with others, it had accidentally been passed over, and not entered into the catalogue; by his own diligent eye only had detected its existence. 'Nessuno fu ora sa, fuori di me, se vi sia, né dove sia, e così non potrà darla alla luce,' &c. But in the true spirit of a collector, avacious of all things connected with his pursuits, Serassi cautiously but completely, transcribed the precious manuscript, with an intention, according to his memorandum, to unravel all its sophistry. However, although the Abate never wanted leisure, he persevered in his silence; yet he often trembled lest some future explorer of manuscripts might be found as sharp-sighted as himself. He was so cautious as not even to venture to note down the library where the manuscript was to be found, and to this day no one appears to have fallen on the volume! On the death of Serassi, his papers came to the hands of the Duke of Ceri, a lover of literature; the transcript of the yet undiscovered original was then revealed! and this secret history of the manuscript was drawn from a note on the title-page written by Serassi himself. To satisfy the urgent curiosity of the literati, these annotations on Tasso by Galileo were published in 1793. Here is a work, which, from its earliest stage, much pains had been taken to suppress; but Serassi's collecting passion inducing him to preserve what he himself so much wished should never appear, finally occasioned its publication! It adds one evidence to the many, which prove that such sinister practices have been frequently used by the historians of a party, poetic or politic.

Unquestionably this entire suppression of manuscripts has been too frequently practised. It is suspected that our historical antiquary Speed owed many obligations to the learned Hugh Broughton, for he possessed a vast number of his MSS. which he burnt. Why did he burn? If persons place themselves in suspicious situations, they must not complain if they be suspected. We have had historians who, whenever they met with information which has not suited their historical system, or their inveterate prejudices, have employed interpolations, castrations, and forgeries, and in some cases have annihilated the entire document. Leland's invaluable manuscripts were left at his death in the confused state in which the mind of the writer had sunk, overcome by his incessant labours, when this royal antiquary was employed by Henry VIII to write our national antiquities. His scattered manuscripts were long a common prey to many who never acknowledged their fountain head; among those suppressors and dilapidators pre-eminently stands the crafty Italian Polydore Vergil, who not only drew largely from this source, but, to cover the robbery, did not omit to depreciate the father of our antiquities—an act of a piece with the character of the man, who is said to have collected and burnt a greater number of historical MSS than would have loaded a wagon, to prevent the detection of the numerous fabrications in his history of England, which was composed to gratify Mary and the catholic cause.

The Harleian manuscript, 7379, is a collection of state-letters. This MS. has four leaves entirely torn out, and is accompanied by this extraordinary memorandum, signed by the principal librarian.

'Upon examination of this book, Nov. 12, 1764, these four last leaves were torn out.

'C. Morton.

'Mem. Nov. 12, sent down to Mrs Macaulay.'

As no memorandum of the name of any student to whom a manuscript is delivered for his researches was ever made before or since, or in the nature of things will ever be, this memorandum must involve our female historian in the obloquy of this dilapidation.* Such 'dishonest practices of party feeling, indeed are not peculiar to any party. In Mr Roscoe's interesting 'Illustrations' of his life of Lorenzo de' Medici, we discover that Fabroni, whose character scarcely admits of suspicion, appears to have known of the existence of an unpublished letter of Sixtus IV, which involves that pontiff deeply in the assassination projected by the Pazzi; but he carefully suppressed its notice; yet, in his conscience, he could not avoid alluding to such documents, which he concealed by his silence. Mr Roscoe has ably defended Fabroni, who may have overlooked this decisive evidence of the guilt of the hypocritical pontiff in the mass of manuscripts; a circumstance not likely to have occurred, however to this laborious historical inquirer. All party feeling is the same active spirit with an opposite direction. We have a remarkable case, where a most interesting historical production has been silently annihilated by the consent of both parties. There once existed an important diary of a very extraordinary character, Sir George Saville, afterwards Marquis of Halifax. This master-spirit, for such I am inclined to consider the author of the little book of 'Maxims and Reflections,' with a philosophical indifference, appears to have held in equal contempt all the factions of his times, and, consequently, has often incurred their severe censures. Among other things, the Marquis of Halifax had noted down the conversations he had had with Charles the Second, and the great and busy characters of the age. Of this curious secret history there existed two copies, and the noble writer imagined that by this means he had carefully secured their existence; yet both copies were destroyed from opposite motives; the one at the instigation of Pope, who was alarmed at finding some of the catholic intrigues of the court developed; and the other at the suggestion of a noble friend, who was equally shocked at discovering that his party, the Revolutionists, had sometimes practised mean and dishonourable deceptions. It is in these legacies of honourable men, of whatever party they may be, that we expect to find truth and sincerity; but thus it happens that the last hope of posterity is frustrated by the artifices, or the malignity, of these party-passions. Pulteney, afterwards the Earl of Bath, had also prepared memoirs of his times, which he proposed to confide to Dr Douglas, bishop of Salisbury, to be composed by the bishops; but his lordship's heir, the general, insisted on destroying these authentic documents, of the value of which we have a notion by one of those conversations which the earl was in the habit of indulging with Hooke, whom he at that time appears to have intended for his historian.

The same hostility to manuscripts, as may be easily imagined, has occurred, perhaps more frequently, on the continent. I shall furnish one considerable fact. A French canon, Claude Joly, a bold and learned writer, had finished an ample life of Erasmus, which included a history of the restoration of literature, at the close of the fifteenth and the beginning of the sixteenth century. Colomies tells us, that the author had read over the works of Erasmus seven times; we have positive evidence that the

* It is now about twenty-seven years ago since I first published this anecdote; at the same time I received information that our female historian and dilapidator had acted in this manner more than once. At that distance of time this rumour so notorious at the British Museum it was impossible to substantiate. The Rev. William Graham, the surviving Leland (= Mrs Macaulay, imperpetrately called on Dr Morton, in a very advanced period of life, to declare that 'it appeared to him that the note does not contain any evidence that the leaves were torn out by Mrs Macaulay.' It was more apparent to the unprejudiced, that the doctor must have singularly lost the use of his memory, when he could not explain his own official note, which, perhaps, at the time he was compelled to insert. Dr Morton was not unfriendly to Mrs Macaulay's political party, he was the Editor of Whitelocke's Diary of his Embassy to the Queen of Sweden, and has, I believe, largely carried the work. The original lies at the British Museum.

ms. was finished for the press; the Cardinal De Noailles would examine the work itself; this important history was not only suppressed, but the hope entertained of finding it among the cardinal's papers was never realized.

These are instances of the annihilation of history; but there is a partial suppression, or castration of passages, equally fatal to the cause of truth; a practice too prevalent among the first editors of memoirs. By such deprivations of the text we have lost important truths, while in some cases, by interpolations, we have been loaded with the fictions of a party. Original memoirs, when published, should now be deposited at that great institution consecrated to our national history—the British Museum, to be verified at all times. In Lord Herbert's history of Henry the Eighth, I find, by a manuscript note, that several things were not permitted to be printed, and that the original ms. was supposed to be in Mr Sheldon's custody, in 1687. Camden told Sir Robert Filmer that he was not suffered to print all his annals of Elizabeth; but he providently sent these expurgated passages to De Thou, who printed them faithfully; and it is remarkable that De Thou himself used the same precaution in the continuation of his own history. We like distant truths, but truths too near us never fail to alarm ourselves, our connexions, and our party. Milton, in composing his history of England, introduced, in the third book, a very remarkable digression, on the characters of the Long Parliament; a most animated description of a class of political adventurers, with whom modern history has presented many parallels. From tenderness to a party then imagined to be subdued, it was struck out by command, nor do I find it restituted in Kennett's Collection of English histories. This admirable and exquisite delineation has been preserved in a pamphlet printed in 1681, which has fortunately exhibited one of the warmest pictures in design and colouring by a master's hand. One of our most important volumes of secret history, 'Whitelocke's Memorials,' was published by Arthur, Earl of Anglesea, in 1682, who took considerable liberties with the manuscript; another edition appeared in 1732, which restored the many important passages through which the earl appears to have struck his castrating pen. The restitution of the castrated passages has not much increased the magnitude of this folio volume; for the omissions usually consisted of a characteristic stroke, or a short critical opinion, which did not harmonize with the private feelings of the Earl of Anglesea. In consequence of the volume not being much enlarged to the eye, and being unaccompanied by a single line of preface to inform us of the value of this more complete edition, the booksellers imagine that there can be no material difference between the two editions, and wonder at the bibliopolical mystery that they can afford to sell the edition of 1682 at ten shillings, and have five guineas for the edition of 1732! Hume, who, I have been told, wrote his history usually on a sofa, with the epicurean indolence of his fine genius, always refers to the old truncated and faithless edition of Whitelocke—so little in his day did the critical history of books enter into the studies of our authors, or such was the carelessness of our historians. There is more philosophy in editions, than some philosophers are aware of. Perhaps most 'Memoirs' have been unfaithfully published, 'Curtailed of their fair proportions;' and not a few might be noticed which subsequent editors have restored to their original state, by uniting their dislocated limbs. Unquestionably, passion has sometimes annihilated manuscripts, and tamely revenge itself on the papers of hated writers! Louis XIV, with his own hands, after the death of Fenelon, burnt all the manuscripts which the Duke of Burgundy had preserved of his preceptor.

As an example of the suppressors and dilapidators of manuscripts, I shall give an extraordinary fact concerning Louis XIV more in his favour. His character appears, like some other historical personages, equally disguised by adulation and calumny. That monarch was not the Nero which his revocation of the edict of Nantes made him seem to the French protestants. He was far from approving of the violent measures of his catholic clergy. This opinion of that sovereign was, however, carefully suppressed when his 'Instructions to the Dauphin' were first published. It is now ascertained that Louis XIV was for many years equally zealous and industrious; and, among other useful attempts, composed an elaborate 'Discours' for the Dauphin for his future conduct. The king gave his manuscript to Pelisson to revise; but after the revision, our royal writer frequently inserted additional paragraphs. The work first appeared in an anonymous 'Recueil d'Opuscules Litteraires, Amsterdam, 1767,' which Barbier, in his 'Anonymes,' tells us, was rédigé par Pelisson; je l'ai publié par l'Abbé Olivet.' When at length the printed work was collated with the manuscript original, several suppressions of the royal sentiments appeared, and the editors, too catholic, had, with more particular caution, thrown aside what clearly showed Louis XIV was far from approving of the violence used against the protestants. The following passage was entirely omitted. 'I seems to me, my son, that those who employ extreme and violent remedies do not know the nature of the evil, occasioned in part, by heated minds, which, left to themselves, would insensibly be extinguished, rather than rekindle them afresh by the force of contradiction; above all, when the corruption is not confined to a small number, but diffused through all parts of the state; besides, the Reformers said many true things! The best method to have reduced little by little the Huguenots of my kingdom, was not to have pursued them by any direct severity pointed at them.'

Lady Mary Wortley Montagu is a remarkable instance of an author nearly lost to the nation: she is only known to posterity by a chance publication, for such were her famous Turkish letters; the manuscript of which her family once purchased with an intention to suppress, but they were frustrated by a transcript. The more recent letters were reluctantly extracted out of the family trunks and surrendered in exchange for certain family documents which had fallen into the hands of a bookseller. Had it depended on her relatives, the name of Lady Mary had only reached us in the satires of Pope. The greater part of her epistolary correspondence was destroyed by her mother; and what that good and Gothic lady spared, was suppressed by the hereditary austerity of rank, of which her family was too susceptible. The entire correspondence of this admirable writer, and studious woman—for once, in perusing some unpublished letters of Lady Mary, I discovered that 'she had been in the habit of reading seven hours a day for many years'—would undoubtedly have exhibited a fine statue, instead of the torso we now possess; and we might have lived with her ladyship, as we do with Madame de Sevigné. This I have mentioned elsewhere; but I have since discovered that a considerable correspondence of Lady Mary's, for more than twenty years, with the widow of Col. Forrester, who had retired to Rome, has been stifled in the birth. These letters, with other MSS of Lady Mary's, were given by Mrs Forrester to Philip Thicknesse, with a discretionary power to publish. They were held as a great acquisition by Thicknesse and his bookseller; but when they had printed off the first thousand sheets, there were parts which they considered might give pain to some of the family. Thicknesse says, 'Lady Mary had in many places been uncommonly severe upon her husband, for all her letters were loaded with a scrap or two of poetry at him.' A negotiation took place with an agent of Lord Bute's—after some time Miss Forrester put in her claims for the MSS—and the whole terminated, as Thicknesse tells us, in her obtaining a pension, and Lord Bute all the MSS.

The late Duke of Bridgewater, I am informed, burnt many of the numerous family papers, and bricked up a quantity, which, when opened after his death, were found to have perished. It is said he declared that he did not choose that his ancestors should be traced back to a person of a mean trade, which it seems might possibly have been the case. The loss now cannot be appreciated; but unquestionably, stores of history, and, perhaps, of literature, were sacrificed. Milton's manuscript of Comus was published from the Bridgewater collection, for it had escaped the bricking up!

Manuscripts of great interest are frequently suppressed from the shameful indifference of the possessors.

Mr Mathias, in his Essay on Gray, tells us, that 'in addition to the valuable manuscripts of Mr Gray, there is reason to think that there were some other papers, folia Sibylla, in the possession of Mr Mason; but though a very diligent and anxious inquiry has been made after them, they cannot be discovered since his death.' There was, however, one fragment, by Mr Mason's own description of it, of very great value, namely, 'The plan of an intended speech in Latin on his appointment as professor of Modern History in the University of Cambridge.' Mr Mason says, 'Immediately on his appointment Mr Gray sketched out an admirable plan for his inauguration speech; in which after enumerating the preparatory and auxiliary studies requisite, such as ancient history, geography, chronology, &c. he descended to the authentic sources of the science, such as public treaties, state-records, private correspondence of ambassadors, &c. He also wrote the exordium of this thesis, not, indeed, so correct as to be given by way of fragment, but so spirited in point of sentiment, as leaves it much to be regretted that he did not proceed to its conclusion.' This fragment cannot now be found; and after so very interesting a description of its value, and of its importance, it is difficult to conceive how Mr Mason could prevail upon himself to withhold it. If there be a subject on which more, perhaps, than on any other, it would have been peculiarly desirable to know, and to follow the train of the ideas of Gray, it is that of modern history, in which no man was more intimately, more accurately, or more extensively conversant than our poet. A sketch or plan from his hand, on the subjects of history, and on those which belonged to it, might have taught succeeding ages how to conduct these important researches with national advantage, and, like some wand of divination, it might have

 DRYDEN.

I suspect that I could point out the place in which these precious 'folia Sibyllæ' of Gray's lie interred; it would not doubt be found among other Sibylline leaves of Mason, of which there are two large boxes, which he left to the care of his executors. These gentlemen, as I am informed, are so extremely careful of them, as to have intrepidly resisted the importunity of some lovers of literature, whose curiosity has been aroused by the secreted treasures. It is a misfortune which has frequently attended this sort of bequests of literary men, that they have left their manuscripts, like their household furniture; and in several cases we find that many legatees conceive that all manuscripts are either to be burnt, like obsolete receipts, or to be nailed down in a box, that they may not stir a hair-out!

In a manuscript note of the times, I find that Sir Richard Baker, the author of a chronicle, formerly the most popular one, died in the Fleet; and that his son-in-law, who had all his papers, burnt them for waste paper; and he said, that 'he thought Sir Richard's life was among them!' An auto-biography of those days which we should now highly prize.

Among these mutilators of manuscripts we cannot too strongly remonstrate with those who have the care of the works of others, and convert them into a vehicle for their own particular purposes, even when they run directly counter to the knowledge and opinions of the original writer. Hard was the fate of honest Anthony Wood, when Dr Fell undertook to have his history of Oxford translated into Latin; the translator, a sullen dogged fellow, when he observed that Wood was enraged at seeing the perpetual alterations of his copy made to please Dr Fell, delighted to alter it the more; while the greater executioner supervising the printed sheets, by 'correcting, altering, or dashing out what he pleased,' compelled the writer publicly to disavow his own work! Such I have heard was the case of Bryan Edwards, who composed the first accounts of Mungo Park. Bryan Edwards, whose personal interests were opposed to the abolition of the slave trade, would not suffer any passage to stand in which the African traveller had expressed his conviction of its inhumanity. Park, among confidential friends, frequently complained that his work did not only not contain his opinions, but was even interpolated with many which he utterly disclaimed!

Suppressed books become as rare as manuscripts.—When I was employed in some researches respecting the history of the Mar-prelate faction, that ardent conspiracy against the established Hierarchy, and of which the very name is but imperfectly to be traced in our history, I discovered that the books and manuscripts of the Mar-prelates have been too cautiously suppressed, or too completely destroyed; while those on the other side have been as carefully preserved. In our national collection, the British Museum, we find a great deal against Mar-prelate, but not Mar-prelate himself.

I have written the history of this conspiracy in the third volume of 'Quarrels of Authors.'

PARODIES.

A lady of bas bleu celebrity (the term is getting odious, particularly to our secessants) had two friends, whom she equally admired—an elegant poet and his parodist. She had contrived to prevent their meeting as long as her stratagems lasted, till at length she apologized to the serious bard for inviting him when his mock umbræ was to be present. Astonished, she perceived that both men of genius felt a mutual esteem for each other's opposite talent; the ridiculed had perceived no malignity in the playfulness of the parody, and even seemed to consider it as a compliment, aware that parodists do not waste their talent on obscure productions; while the ridiculer himself was very sensible that he was the inferior poet. The lady-critic had imagined that a parody must necessarily be malicious; and in some cases it is said those on whom the parody has been performed, have been of the same opinion.

Parody strongly resembles mimicry, a principle in human nature not so artificial as it appears: Man may be well defined a mimic animal. The African boy, who amused the whole kaffe he journeyed with, by mimicking the gestures and the voice of the auctioneer who had sold him at the slave market a few days before, could have had no sense of scorn, of superiority, or of malignity; the boy experienced merely the pleasure of repeating attitudes and intonation which had so forcibly excited his interest. The numerous parodies of Hamlet's soliloquy were never made in derision of that solemn monologue, any more than the travesties of Virgil by Scarron and Cotton; their authors were never so gaily mad as that. We have parodies on the Psalms by Luther; Doddsley parodied the book of Chronicles, and the scripture style was parodied by Franklin in his beautiful story of Abraham; a story he found in Jeremy Taylor, and which Taylor borrowed from the East, for it is preserved in the Persian Sadi. Not one of these writers, however, proposed to ridicule their originals; some ingenuity in the application was all that they intended. The lady critic alluded to had suffered by a panic, in imagining that a parody was necessarily a corrosive satire. Had she indeed proceeded one step further, and asserted that parodies might be classed among the most malicious inventions of literature, when they are such as Colman and Lloyd made on Gray, in their ode to 'Oblivion and Obscurity,' her reading possibly might have supplied the materials of the present research.

Parodies were frequently practised by the ancients, and with them, like ourselves, consisted of a work grafted on another work, but which turned on a different subject by a slight change of the expressions. It might be a sport of fancy, the innocent child of mirth; or a satirical arrow drawn from the quiver of caustic criticism; or it was that malignant art which only studies to make the original of the parody, however beautiful, contemptible and ridiculous. Human nature thus enters into the composition of parodies, and their variable character originates in the purpose of their application.

There is in 'the million' a natural taste for farce after tragedy, and they gladly relieve themselves by mitigating the solemn seriousness of the tragic drama; for they find, that it is but 'a step from the sublime to the ridiculous.' The taste for parody, will, I fear, always prevail; for whatever tends to ridicule a work of genius, is usually very agreeable to a great number of contemporaries. In the history of parodies, some of the learned have noticed a supposititious circumstance, which, however may have happened, for it is a very natural one. When the rhapsodists, who strolled from town to town to chant different fragments of the poems of Homer, had recited, they were immediately followed by another set of strollers—buffoons, who made the same audience merry by the burlesque turn which they gave to the solemn strains which had just so deeply engaged their attention. It is supposed that we have one of these travesties of the Iliad in one Sotades, who succeeded by only changing the measure of the verses without altering the words, which entirely disguised the Homeric character; fragments of which, scattered in

* I have seen a transcript, by the favour of a gentleman who sent it to me, of Gray's directions for reading History. It had its origin at a time when our best histories had not been published, but it is entirely superseded by the admirable 'Methode' of Lenglet du Fresnoy.

Dionysius Halicarnassensis, I leave to the curiosity of the learned Grecian.* Homer's battle of the frogs and mice, a learned critic, the elder Heinsius, asserts, was not written by the poet, but is a parody on the poem. It is evidently as good humoured an one as any in the 'Rejected Addresses.' And it was because Homer was the most popular poet, that he was most susceptible of the playful honours of the parodist; unless the prototype is familiar to us, a parody is nothing! Of these parodists of Homer we may regret the loss of one, Timon of Philus, whose parodies were termed Silli, from Silenus being their chief personage; he levelled them at the sophistical philosophers of his age; his invocation is grafted on the opening of the Iliad, to recount the evil doings of those babblers, whom he compares to the bags in which Æolus deposited all his winds; balloons inflated with empty ideas! We should like to have appropriated some of these silli, or parodies of Timon the Sillograph, which, however, seem to have been at times calumnious.† Shenstone's 'School Mistress,' and some few other ludicrous poems, derive much of their merit from parody.

This taste for parodies was very prevalent with the Grecians, and is a species of humour which perhaps has been too rarely practised by the moderns: Cervantes has some passages of this nature in his parodies of the old chivalric romances; Fielding in some parts of his Tom Jones and Joseph Andrews, in his burlesque poetical descriptions; and Swift in his 'Battle of Books,' and 'Tale of a Tub;' but few writers have equalled the delicacy and felicity of Pope's parodies in the 'Rape of the Lock.' Such parodies give refinement to burlesque.

The ancients made a liberal use of it in their satirical comedy, and sometimes carried it on through an entire work, as in the Menippean satire, Seneca's mock Eloge of Claudius, and Lucian in his Dialogues. There are parodies even in Plato; and an anecdotal one recorded of this philosopher shows them in their most simple state. Dissatisfied with his own poetical essays, he threw them into the flames; that is, the sage resolved to sacrifice his verses to the god of fire; and in repeating that line in Homer where Thetis addresses Vulcan to implore his aid, the application became a parody, although it required no other change than the insertion of the philosopher's name instead of the goddess's:‡

'Vulcan, arise! 'tis Plato claims thy aid!'

Boileau affords a happy instance of this simple parody.—Corneille, in his Cid, makes one of his personages remark,

Four grands que solent les rois ils sont ce que nous sommes,
Ils peuvent se tromper comme les autres hommes.'

A slight alteration became a fine parody in Boileau's 'Chaplain decoiffé,'

'Pour grands que solent les rois ils sont ce que nous sommes, Ils se trompent en vers comme les autres hommes.'

We find in the Athenæus the name of the inventor of a species of parody which more immediately engages our notice—DRAMATIC PARODIES. It appears this inventor was a satirist, so that the lady critic, whose opinion we had the honour of noticing, would be warranted by appealing to its origin to determine the nature of the thing. A dramatic parody, which produced the greatest effect, was 'the Gigantomachia,' as appears by the only circumstance known of it. Never laughed the Athenians so heartily as at its representation, for the fatal news of the deplorable state to which the affairs of the republic were reduced in Sicily arrived at its first representation—and the Athenians continued laughing to the end! as the modern Athenians, the volatile Parisians, might in their national concern of an opera comique. It was the business of the dramatic parody to turn the solemn tragedy,

* Henry Stephens appears first to have started this subject of parody; his researches have been borrowed by the Abbé Sallier, to whom, in my turn, I am occasionally indebted. His little dissertation is in the French Academy's Memoires, Tome vii., 286.

† See a specimen in Aulus Gellius, where this parodist reproaches Plato for having given a high price for a book, whence he drew his noble dialogue of the Timæus. Lib. iii., c. 17.

‡ See Spanheim Les Cæsars de l'Empereur Julien in his 'Preuves.' Remarque 8. Sallier judiciously observes 'Il nous donne une juste idée de cette sorte d'ouvrage, mais nous ne savons pas précisément en quel tems il a été composé; 'no more truly than the Iliad itself!

which the audience had just seen exhibited, into a farcical comedy; the same actors who had appeared in magnificent dresses, now returned on the stage in grotesque habits, with odd postures and gestures, while the many, though the same, was incongruous and ludicrous. The Cyclops of Euripides is probably the only remaining specimen; for this may be considered as a parody of the ninth book of the Odyssey—the adventures of Ulysses in the cave of Polyphemus, where Silenus and a chorus of satyrs are farcically introduced, to contrast with the grave narrative of Homer, of the shifts and escapes of the cunning man 'from the one eyed ogre.' The jokes are too coarse for the French taste of Brumoy, who, in his translation, goes on with a critical growl and foolish apology for Euripides having written a farce; Brumoy, like Pistol, is forced to eat his onion, but with a woe grace, swallowing and execrating to the end.

In dramatic composition, Aristophanes is perfectly looking in parodies of Euripides, whom all poets he hated, as well as of Æschylus, Sophocles, and other tragic bards. Since that Grecian wit, at length, has found a translator saturated with his genius, and an interpreter as philosophical, the subject of Grecian parody will probably be reflected in a clearer light from his researches.

Dramatic parodies in modern literature were introduced by our vivacious neighbours, and may be said to constitute a class of literary satires peculiar to the French nation. What had occurred in Greece a similar gaiety of national genius inconsciously reproduced. The dramatic parodies in our own literature, as in 'The Rehearsal,' 'Tom Thumb,' and 'the Critic,' however exquisite, are confined to particular passages, and are not grafted on a whole original; we have neither naturalized the dramatic poetry into a species, nor dedicated it to the honours of a separate theatre.

This peculiar dramatic satire, a burlesque of an entire tragedy, the volatile genius of the Parisians accomplished. Whenever a new tragedy, which still continues the favourite species of drama with the French, attracted the notice of the town, shortly after uprose its parody at the Italian theatre, so that both pieces may have been performed in immediate succession in the same evening. A French tragedy is most susceptible of this sort of ridicule, by applying its declamatory style, its exaggerated sentiments, and its romantic out-of-the-way nature to the commonplace incidents and persons of domestic life; out of the stuff of which they made their emperors, their heroes, and their princesses, they cut out a pompous country justice, a hectoring tailor, or an impudent mantua-maker; but it was not merely this travesty of great personages, nor the lofty effusions of one in a lowly station, which terminated the object of parody; it was designed for a higher object, that of more obviously exposing the original for any absurdity in its scenes, or in its catastrophe, and dissecting its faulty characters; in a word, weighing in the critical scales, the nonsense of the poet. It sometimes became a refined instructor for the public, whose discernment is often blinded by party or prejudice. But it was, too, a severe touchstone for genius: Racine, some say, smiled, others say he did not, when he witnessed Harlequin, in the language of Titus to Berenice, declaiming on some ludicrous affair to Columbine; La Motte was very sore, and Voltaire, and others, shrunk away with a cry—from a parody! Voltaire was angry when he witnessed his Marianne parodied by La mauvaise Menage; or 'Bad Housekeeping,' the aged, jealous Herod was turned into an old cross country justice; Varus, bewitched by Marianne, strutted a dragon; and the whole establishment showed it was under very bad management. Fuzelier collected some of these parodies, and not unskillfully defends their nature and their object against the protest of La Motte, whose tragedies had severely suffered from these burlesques. His celebrated domestic tragedy of Inez de Castro, the fable of which turns on a concealed and clandestine marriage, produced one of the happiest parodies in Agnes de Chaillet. In the parody, the cause of the mysterious obstinacy of Pierrot the son, in persisting to refuse the hand of the daughter of his mother-in-law Madame la Bailline, is thus discovered by her Monsieur le Bailly:

'Mon mari, pour le coup j'ai decouvert l'affaire,
Ne vous étournez plus qu'à nos desirs contraindre.

* Les Parodies du Nouveau Theatre Italien 4 vol. 1728. Observations sur la Comedie et sur le Genre de Moliere, par Louis Riccoboni. Liv. iv. Digitized by Google

Pour ma fi le, Pierrot, ne montre que mepris :
Voilà l'unique objet dont son cœur est épris.
[Pointing to Agnes de Chaillos.]

The Bailiff exclaims,

'Ma servante ?'

This single word was the most lively and fatal criticism of the tragic action of Inez de Castro, which, according to the conventional decorum and fastidious code of French criticism, grossly violated the majesty of Melpomene, by giving a motive and an object so totally undignified to the tragic tale. In the parody there was something ludicrous when the secret came out which explained poor Pierrot's long-concealed perplexities, in the maid-servant bringing forwards a whole legitimate family of her own! La Motte was also galled by a projected parody of his 'Machabees'—where the hasty marriage of the young Machabees, and the sudden conversion of the amorous Antigone, who, for her first penitential act, persuades a youth to marry her, without first deigning to consult her respectable mother, would have produced an excellent scene for the parody. But La Motte prefixed an angry preface to his Inez de Castro; he inveighs against all parodies, which he asserts to be merely a French fashion, (we have seen, however, that it was once Grecian) the offspring of a dangerous spirit of ridicule, and the malicious amusements of superficial minds.—'Were this true,' retorts Fuzelier, 'we ought to detest parodies; but we maintain, that far from converting virtue into a paradox, and degrading truth by ridicule, PARODY will only strike at what is chimerical and false; it is not a piece of buffoonery so much as a critical exposition. What do we parody but the absurdities of dramatic writers, who frequently make their heroes act against nature, common sense and truth? After all,' he ingenuously adds, 'it is the public, not we, who are the authors of these PARODIES; for they are usually but the echoes of the pit, and we parodists, have only to give a dramatic form to the opinions and observations we hear. Many tragedies,' Fuzelier, with admirable truth, observes, 'disguise vices into virtues, and PARODIES unmask them.' We have had tragedies recently which very much required parodies to expose them, and to shame our inconsiderate audiences, who patronized these monsters of false passions. The rants and bombast of some of these might have produced, with little or no alteration of the inflated originals, 'A Modern Rehearsal,' or a new 'Tragedy for Warm Weather.'

Of parodies, we may safely approve of their legitimate use, and even indulge their agreeable maliciousness; while we must still dread that extraordinary facility to which the public, or rather human nature, are so prone, as sometimes to laugh at what at another time they would shed tears.

Tragedy is rendered comic or burlesque by altering the action and manners of the persons; and the reverse may occur, of raising what is comic and burlesque into tragedy. On so little depends the sublime or the ridiculous! Beattie says, 'In most human characters there are blemishes, moral, intellectual, or corporeal; by exaggerating which, to a certain degree, you may form a comic character; as by raising the virtues, abilities, or external advantages of individuals, you form epic or tragic characters;*' a subject humorously touched on by Lloyd, in the prologue to 'the Jealous Wife.'

'Quarrels, upbraidings, jealousies, and spleen,
Grow too familiar in the comic scene;
Tinge but the language with heroic chime,
'This passion, pathos, character sublime.
What big round words had swell'd the pompous scene,
A king the husband, and the wife a queen.'

ANECDOTES OF THE FAIRFAX FAMILY.

Will a mind of great capacity be reduced to mediocrity by the ill-choice of a profession?

Parents are interested in the metaphysical discussion, whether there really exists an inherent quality in the human intellect which imparts to the individual an aptitude for one pursuit more than for another. What Lord Shaftesbury calls not innate, but connatural qualities of the human character, were, during the latter part of the last century, entirely rejected; but of late there appears a tendency to return to the notion which is consecrated by antiquity. Experience will often correct modern hypothesists. The term 'pre-disposition' may be objectionable, as are all terms which pretend to describe the occult operations of Nature—and at present we have no other!

Our children pass through the same public education, while they are receiving little or none for their individual dispositions, should they have sufficient strength of character to indicate any. The great secret of education is to develop the faculties of the individual; for it may happen that his real talents may lie hidden and buried under his education. A profession is usually adventitious, made by chance views, or by family arrangements. Should a choice be submitted to the youth himself, he will often mistake slight and transient tastes for permanent dispositions. A decided character, however, we may often observe, is repugnant, to a particular pursuit, delighting in another; talents, languid and vacillating in one profession, we might find vigorous and settled in another; an indolent lawyer might be an admirable architect! At present all our human bullion is sent to be melted down in an university, to come out, as if thrown into a burning mould, a bright physician, a bright lawyer, a bright divine—in other words, to adapt themselves for a profession, preconceived by their parents. By this means we may secure a titular profession for our son, but the true genius of the avocation in the bent of the mind, as a man of great original powers called it, is too often absent! Instead of finding fit offices for fit men, we are perpetually discovering, on the stage of society, actors out of character! Our most popular writer has happily described this error.

'A laughing philosopher, the Democritus of our day, once compared human life to a table pierced with a number of holes, each of which has a pin made exactly to fit it, but which pins being stuck in hastily, and without selection, chance leads inevitably to the most awkward mistakes. For how often do we see, the orator pathetically concluded,—'how often, I say, do we see the round man stuck into the three-cornered hole!'

In looking over a manuscript life of Tobie Matthews, archbishop of York in James the First's reign, I found a curious anecdote of his grace's disappointment in the dispositions of his sons. The cause, indeed, is not uncommon, as was confirmed by another great man, to whom the archbishop confessed it. The old Lord Thomas Fairfax one day found the archbishop, very melancholy, and inquired the reason of his grace's pensiveness: 'My lord,' said the archbishop, 'I have great reason of sorrow with respect of my sons; one of whom has wit and no grace, another grace but no wit, and the third neither grace nor wit.' 'Your case,' replied Lord Fairfax, 'is not singular. I am also sadly disappointed in my sons: one I sent into the Netherlands to train him up a soldier, and he makes a tolerable country justice, but a mere coward at fighting; my next I sent to Cambridge, and he proves a good lawyer, but a mere dunce at divinity; and my youngest I sent to the inns of court, and he is good at divinity, but nobody at the law.' The relation of this anecdote adds, 'This I have often heard from the descendant of that honourable family, who yet seems to mince the matter because so immediately related.' The eldest son was the Lord Ferdinand Fairfax—and the gunsmith to Thomas Lord Fairfax the son of this Lord Ferdinand, heard the old Lord Thomas call aloud to his grandson, 'Tom! Tom! mind thou the battle! Thy father's a good man, but mere coward! all the good I expect is from thee!' It is evident that the old Lord Thomas Fairfax was a military character, and in his earnest desire of continuing a line of heroes, had preconceived to make his eldest son a military man, who we discover turned out to be admirably fitted for a worshipful justice of the quorum. This is a lesson for the parent who consults his own inclinations and not those of natural disposition. In the present case the same lord, though disappointed, appears still to have persisted in the same wish of having a great military character in his family: having missed one in his elder son, and settled his other sons in different avocations, the grandfather persevered, and fixed his hopes, and bestowed his encouragements, on his grandson Sir Thomas Fairfax, who makes so distinguished a figure in the civil wars.

The difficulty of discerning the aptitude of a youth for any particular destination in life, will, perhaps, even for the most skillful parent, be always hazardous. Many will be inclined, in despair of any thing better, to throw dice with fortune; or adopt the determination of the father who settled his sons by a whimsical analogy which he appears to have formed of their dispositions or aptness for different pursuits. The boys were standing under a hedge in the rain, and a neighbour reported to the father the conversation he had overheard. John wished it would rain books, for he wished to be a preacher; Bezaleel, wool, to be a clothier, like his father; Samuel, money, to be a merchant; and Edmund, plums, to be a grocer. The father took these wishes as a hint, and we are told in the life of John Angier the elder son, a puritan minister, that he chose for them these different callings, in which it appears that they settled successfully. 'Whatever a young man at first applies himself to is commonly his delight afterwards.' This is an important principle discovered by Hartley, but it will not supply the parent with any determined regulation how to distinguish a transient from a permanent disposition; or how to get at what we may call the conatural qualities of the mind. A particular opportunity afforded me some close observation on the characters and habits of two youths, brothers in blood and affection, and partners in all things, who even to their very dress shared alike; who were never separated from each other; who were taught by the same masters, lived under the same roof, and were accustomed to the same uninterrupted habits; yet had nature created them totally distinct in the qualities of their minds; and similar as their lives had been, their abilities were adapted for very opposite pursuits; either of them could not have been the other. And I observed how the 'predisposition' of the parties was distinctly marked from childhood: the one slow, penetrating and correct; the other quick, irritable, and fœsical: the one persevering in examination; the other rapid in results: the one unexhausted by labour; the other impatient of whatever did not relate to his own pursuit: the one logical, historical, and critical; the other having acquired nothing, decided on all things by his own sensations. We would confidently consult in the one a great legal character, and in the other an artist of genius. If nature had not secretly placed a bias in their distinct minds, how could two similar beings have been so dissimilar?

A story recorded of Cecco d'Ascoli and of Dante, on the subject of natural and acquired genius, may illustrate the present topic. Cecco maintained that nature was more potent than art, while Dante asserted the contrary. To prove his principle, the great Italian bard referred to his cat, which, by repeated practice, he had taught to hold a candle in its paw while he supped or read. Cecco desired to witness the experiment, and came not unprepared for his purpose; when Dante's cat was performing its part, Cecco, lifting up the lid of a pot which he had filled with mice, the creature of art instantly showed the weakness of a talent merely acquired, and dropping the candle, flew on the mice with all its instinctive propensity. Dante was himself disconcerted; and it was adjudged that the advocate for the occult principle of native faculties had gained his cause!

To tell stories, however, is not to lay down principles, yet principles may sometimes be concealed in stories.*

MEDICINE AND MORALS.

A stroke of personal ridicule is levelled at Dryden when Bayes informs us of his preparations for a course of study by a course of medicine! 'When I have a grand design,' says he, 'I ever take physic and let blood; for when you would have pure swiftness of thought, and fiery flights of fancy, you must have a care of the pensive part; in fine, you must purge the belly!' Such was really the practice of the poet, as La Motte, who was a physician, informs us, and in his medical character did not perceive that ridicule in the subject which the wits and most readers unquestionably have enjoyed. The wits here were as cruel against truth as against Dryden; for we must still consider this practice, to use their own words, as 'an excellent recipe for writing.' Among other philosophers, one of the most famous disputants of antiquity, Carneades, was accustomed to take copious doses of white hellebore, a great aperient, as a preparation to refute the dogmas of the stoics. Dryden's practice was neither whimsical nor peculiar to the poet; he was of a full habit, and, no doubt, had often found by experience the beneficial effects without being aware of the cause, which is nothing less than the reciprocal influence of mind and body.

This simple fact is, indeed, connected with one of the most important inquiries in the history of man: the history which regulate the invisible union of the soul with the body, in a word, the inscrutable mystery of our being!—a mystery, but an undoubted intercourse, which probably must elude our perceptions. The combination of metaphysics with physics has only been productive of the wildest tales among philosophers: with one party the soul seems to pass away in its last puff of air, while man seems to perish in 'dust to dust;' the other as successfully gets at our bodies altogether, by denying the existence of matter. We are not certain that mind and matter are distinct existences, since the one may be only a modification of the other; however this great mystery be imagined, we shall find with Dr Gregory, in his lectures 'on the duties and qualifications of a physician,' that it forms an equally necessary inquiry in the sciences of morals and of medicine.

Whether we consider the vulgar distinction of mind and body as an union, or as a modified existence, no philosopher denies that a reciprocal action takes place between our moral and physical condition. Of these sympathetic-like many other mysteries of nature, the cause remains occult, while the effects are obvious. This close yet inscrutable association, this concealed correspondence of parts seemingly unconnected, in a word, this reciprocal influence of the mind and the body, has long fixed the attention of medical and metaphysical inquirers; the one having the care of our exterior organization, the other that of the interior. Can we conceive the mysterious instant as forming a part of its own habitation? The temple and the house are so inseparable, that in striking at one part of the building, you inevitably reach the dweller. If the mind is disordered, we may often look for its seat in some corporeal derangement. Often are our thoughts disturbed by a strange irritability, which we do not even pretend to account for. This state of the body, called Idgets, is a disorder to which the ladies are particularly liable. A physician of my acquaintance was earnestly entreated by a female patient to give a name to her known complaints; this he found no difficulty to do, as he is a steady asserter of the materiality of our nature; he declared that her disorder was atmospheric. It was a disorder of her frame under damp weather, which was acting on her mind; and physical means, by operating on her body, might be applied to restore her to her lost senses. Our imagination is highest when our stomach is not overloaded; in spring than in winter; in solitude than amidst company; and in an obscured light than in the blaze and heat of the noon. In all these cases the body is evidently acted on, and re-acts on the mind. Sometimes our dreams present us with images of our realness, till we recollect that the seat of our brain may perhaps lie in our stomach, rather than on the pineal gland of Descartes; and that the most artificial logic to make us some what reasonable, may be swallowed with 'the blue pill.' Our domestic happiness often depends on the state of our biliary and digestive organs, and the little disturbances of conjugal life may be more efficaciously cured by the physician than by the moralist; for a sermon misapplied will never act so directly as a sharp medicine. The learned Gaubius, an eminent professor of medicine at Leyden, who called himself 'professor of the passions,' gives the case of a lady of too inflammable a constitution, whom her husband, unknown to herself, had gradually reduced to a model of decorum by phlebotomy. Her complexion, indeed, lost the roses, which some, perhaps, had too wantonly admired for the repose of her conjugal physician.

The art of curing moral disorders by corporeal means has not yet been brought into general practice, although it is probable that some quiet ages of medicine have made use of it on some occasions. The Leyden professor we have just alluded to, delivered at the university a discourse 'on the management and cure of the disorders of the mind by application to the body.' Descartes conjectured, that as the mind seems so dependent on the disposition of the bodily organs, if any means can be found to render men wiser and more ingenious than they have been hitherto, such a method might be sought from the assistance of medicine. The science of morals and of medicine will therefore be found to have a more intimate connection than has been suspected. Plato thought that a man must have natural dispositions towards virtue to become virtuous; that it cannot be educated—you cannot make a bad man a good man; which he ascribes to the evil dispositions of the body, as well as to a bad education.

* I have arranged many facts, connected with the present subject, in the fifth chapter of what I have written on 'The Literary Character' in the third edition, 1822.

we are unquestionably, constitutional moral disorders good tempered but passionate persons have willed, that they cannot avoid those temporary which they are liable, and which, they say, they suffered 'from a child.' If they arise from too a fullness of blood, is it not cruel to upbraid rather to cure them, which might easily be done by taking their redundant humours, and thus quieting the passionate man alive? A moral patient, who allows him to be disordered by the fumes of liquor, instead of suffering to be a ridiculous being, might have been prescribed; for in laying him asleep as soon as he, you remove the cause of his sudden madness. are crimes for which men are hanged, but of which might easily have been cured by physical means. me out of their senses with love, by throwing them into a river, and being dragged out nearly lifeless, recovered their senses, and lost their bewildering sea. Submersion was discovered to be a cure for some of the disorders, by altering the state of the body, as Van nos notices, 'was happily practised in England.' h the circumstance this sages of chemistry alludes to a unacquainted; but this extraordinary practice was only known to the Italians; for in one of the tales of go we find a mad doctor of Milan, who was celebrated curing lunatics and demoniacs in a certain time. His vice consisted in placing them in a great high walled yard, in the midst of which there was a deep well of water, cold as ice. When a demoniac was brought his physician, he had the patient bound to a pillar in well, till the water ascended to the knees, or higher, even to the neck, as he deemed their malady required. their bodily pain they appear to have forgot their me- tholy; those by the terrors of the repetition of cold or, a man appears to have been frightened into his me! A physician has informed me of a remarkable s: a lady with a disordered mind, resolved on death, swallowed much more than half a pint of laudanum; closed her curtains in the evening, took a farewell of attendants, and flattered herself she should never then from her sleep. In the morning, however, notwithstanding this incredible dose, she awoke in the agonies death. By the usual means she was enabled to get of the poison she had so largely taken, and not only overed her life, but what is more extraordinary, her first senses! The physician conjectures that it was influence of her disordered mind over her body which vented this vast quantity of laudanum from its usual use by terminating in death.

moral vices or infirmities, which originate in the state the body, may be cured by topical applications. Pre- and ethics in such cases, if they seem to produce a mentary cure, have only mowed the weeds, whose life in the soil. It is only by changing the soil itself we can eradicate these evils. The senses are five vices for the physician to enter into the mind, to keep in repair. By altering the state of the body, we are ing that of the mind, whenever the defects of the al depend on those of the organization. The mind, or it, however distinct its being from the body, is disturbed excited, independent of its volition, by the mechanical pulses of the body. A man becomes stupefied when circulation of the blood is impeded in the viscera; he is more from instinct than reflection; the nervous fibres too relaxed or too tense, and he finds a difficulty in wing them; if you heighten his sensations, you awaken ideas in this stupid being; and as we cure the stupid / increasing his sensibility, we may believe that a more cious fancy may be promised to those who possess a, when the mind and the body play together in one monious accord. Prescribe the bath, frictions, and so- tations, and though it seems a round about way, you t at the brains by his feet. A literary man, from long tary habits, could not overcome his fits of melan- dy, till his physician doubled his daily quantity of wine; the learned Henry Stephens, after a severe ague, had th a disgust of books, the most beloved objects of his hole life, that the very thought of them excited terror a considerable time. It is evident that the state of a body often indicates that of the mind. Insanity itself he results from some disorder in the human machine. What is this mind, of which men appear so vain? ex- tains Flechier. 'If considered according to its nature, is a fire which sickness and an accident most sensibly out; it is a delicate temperament, which soon grows disordered; a happy conformation of organs, which wear out; a combination and a certain motion of the spirits which exhaust themselves; it is the most lively and the most subtle part of the soul, which seems to grow old with the body.'

It is not wonderful that some have attributed such virtues to their system of diet, if it has been found productive of certain effects on the human body. Cornaro perhaps imagined more than he experienced; but Apollonius Tyaneus, when he had the credit of holding an intercourse with the devil, by his presumed gift of prophecy, defended himself from the accusation of attributing his clear and prescient views of things to the light aliments he lived on, never indulging in a variety of food. 'This mode of life has produced such a perspicuity in my ideas, that I see as in a glass things past and future.' We may, therefore, agree with Bayes, that 'for a sonnet to Amanda, and the like, stewed prunes only' might be sufficient; but for 'a grand design, nothing less than a more formal and formidable dose.

Camus, a French physician, who combined literature with science, the author of 'Abdeker, or the Art of Cosmetics which he discovered in exercise and temperance, produced another fanciful work, written in 1768, 'La Medecine de l'Esprit.' His conjectural cases are at least as numerous as his more positive facts; for he is not wanting in imagination. He assures us, that having reflected on the physical causes, which, by differently modifying the body, varied also, the dispositions of the mind, he was convinced that by employing these different causes, or by imitating their powers by art, we might by means purely mechanical affect the human mind, and correct the infirmities of the understanding and the will. He considered this principle only as the aurora of a brighter day. The great difficulty to overcome was to find out a method to root out the defects, or the diseases of the soul, in the same manner as physicians cure a fluxion from the lungs, a dysentery, a dropy and all other infirmities, which seem only to attack the body. This indeed, he says, is enlarging the domain of medicine, by showing how the functions of the intellect and the springs of volition are mechanical. The movements and passions of the soul, formerly restricted to abstract reasoning, are by this system reduced to simple ideas. Insisting that material causes force the soul and body to act together, the defects of the intellectual operations depend on those of the organization, which may be altered or destroyed by physical causes; and he properly adds, that we are to consider that the soul is material, while existing in matter, because it is operated on by matter. Such is the theory of 'La Medecine de l'Esprit,' which, though physicians will never quote, may perhaps contain some facts worth their attention.

Camus's two little volumes seem to have been preceded by a medical discourse delivered in the academy of Dijon in 1748, where the moralist compares the infirmities and vices of the mind to parallel diseases of the body. We may safely consider some infirmities and passions of the mind as diseases, and could they be treated as we do the bodily ones, to which they bear an affinity, this would be the great triumph of 'morale and medicine.' The passion of avarice resembles the thirst of dropsical patients; that of envy is a slow-wasting fever; love is often frenzy, and capricious and sudden restlessness, epileptic fits. There are moral disorders which at times spread like epidermal maladies through towns and countries, and even nations. There are hereditary vices and infirmities transmitted from the parent's mind as there are unquestionably such diseases of the body: the son of a father of a hot and irritable temperament inherits the same quickness and warmth; a daughter is often a counterpart of her mother. Morality, could it be treated medicinally, would require its prescriptions, as all diseases have their specific remedies; the great secret is perhaps discovered by Camus—that of operating on the mind by means of the body.

A recent writer seems to have been struck by these curious analogies. Mr. Haslam, in his work on 'Sound Mind,' says, p. 90, 'There seems to be a considerable similarity between the morbid state of the instruments of voluntary motion (that is the body,) and certain affections of the mental powers, that is, the mind. Thus, paralysis has its counterpart in the defects of recollection, where the utmost endeavour to remember is ineffectually exerted. Tremor may be compared with incapability of fixing the attention, and this involuntary state of muscles ordinarily subjected to the will, also finds a parallel where the mind loses its influence in the train of thought, and becomes subject to spontaneous intrusions; as may be exemplified in reveries, dreaming, and some species of madness.

Thus one philosopher discovers the analogies of the mind with the body, and another of the body with the mind. Can we now hesitate to believe that such analogies exist—and advancing one step farther, trace in this reciprocal influence that a part of the soul is the body, as the body becomes a part of the soul? The most important truth remains undivulged, and ever will in this mental pharmacy; but none is more clear than that which led to the view of this subject, that in this mutual intercourse of body and mind the superior is often governed by the inferior; others think the mind is more wilfully outrageous than the body. Plutarch, in his essays, has a familiar illustration, which he borrows from some philosopher more ancient than himself: 'Should the Body sue the Mind before a court of judicature for damages, it would be found that the Mind would prove to have been a ruinous tenant to its landlord.' The sage of Cheronessa did not foresee the hint of Descartes and the discovery of Camus, that by medicine we may alleviate or remove the diseases of the mind; a practice which indeed has not yet been pursued by physicians, though the moralists have been often struck by the close analogies of the Mind with the Body! A work by the learned Dom Pernetty, La connaissance de l'homme moral par celle de l'homme physique, we are told is more fortunate in its title than its execution; probably it is one of the many attempts to develop this imperfect and obscured truth, which hereafter may become more obvious and be universally comprehended.

PSALM-SINGING.

The history of Psalm singing is a portion of the history of the reformation; of that great religious revolution which separated for ever, into two unequal divisions, the great establishment of Christianity. It has not, perhaps, been remarked, that Psalm singing, or metrical Psalms, degenerated into those scandalous compositions which, under the abused title of hymns, are now used by some sects.* These are evidently the last disorders of that system of Psalm singing which made some religious persons early oppose its practice. Even Sternhold and Hopkins, our first Psalm enditors, says honest Fuller, 'found their work afterwards met with some frowns in the faces of great clergymen.' To this day these opinions are not adjusted. Archbishop Secker observes, 'that though the first Christians (from this passage in James v. 13, "Is any merry? let him sing Psalms!") made singing a constant part of their worship, and the whole congregation joined in it; yet afterwards the singers by profession, who had been prudently appointed to lead and direct them by degrees usurped the whole performance. But at the Reformation the people were restored to their rights!' This revolutionary style is singular: one might infer by the expression of the people being restored to their rights, that a mixed assembly roaring out confused tunes, nasal, guttural, and sibilant, was a more orderly government of Psalmody than when the executive power was consigned to the voices of those whom the archbishop had justly described as having been first prudently appointed to lead and direct them; and who, by their subsequent proceedings, evidently discovered, what they might have safely conjectured, that such an universal suffrage, where every man was to have a voice, must necessarily end in clatter and chaos!†

Thomas Warton, however, regards the metrical Psalms of Sternhold as a puritanic invention, and asserts, that notwithstanding it is said in their title page that, they are 'set forth and allowed to be sung in all churches,' they were never admitted by lawful authority. They were first introduced by the Puritans, and afterwards continued by connivance. As a true poetical antiquary, Thomas Warton condemns any modernisation of the venerable text of the old Sternhold and Hopkins, which, by changing obsolete for familiar words, destroys the texture of the original style; and many stanzas, already too naked and weak like a plain old Gothic edifice stripped of its few signatures of antiquity, have lost that little and almost only strength in support which they derived from ancient phrases. 'Such alterations, even if executed with prudence and judgment only corrupt what they endeavour to explain; and exhibit a motly performance, belonging to no character of writing and which contain more improprieties than those which it professes to remove. This forcible criticism is worth of our poetical antiquary; the same feeling was experienced by Pasquier, when Marot, in his Refractions: the Roman de la Rose, left some of the obsolete phrases while he got rid of others; cette bigarrure de langage men et moderne, was with him writing no language at all. The same circumstance occurred abroad when they resolved to retouch and modernise the old French metrical version: the Psalms, which we are about to notice. It produced a same controversy and the same dissatisfaction. The church of Geneva adopted an improved version, but the charm of the old one was wanting.

To trace the history of modern metrical Psalmody, we must have recourse to Bayle, who, as a mere literary historian, has accidentally preserved it. The inventor was a celebrated French poet; and the invention, though perhaps in its very origin inclining towards the abuse to which it was afterwards carried, was unexpectedly adopted by the austere Calvin, and introduced into the Geneva discipline. It is indeed strange, that while he was stripping religion not merely of its pageantry, but even of its decent ceremonies, that this levelling reformer should have introduced this taste for singing Psalms in opposition to reading Psalms. 'On a parallel principle,' says Thomas Warton, 'and if any artificial aids to devotion were to be allowed he might at least have retained the use of pictures in the church.' But it was decreed that statues should be mutilated of 'their fair proportions,' and painted glass be dashed into pieces while the congregation were to sing! Calvin sought for proselytes among 'the rabble of a republic, who can have no relish for the more elegant externals.' But have made men sing in concert, in the streets, or at the work, and merry or sad, on all occasions to tickle the ears with rhymes and touch the heart with emotion, was betraying no deficient knowledge of human nature.

It seems, however that this project was adopted accidentally, and was certainly promoted by the fine nature genius of Clement Marot, the favoured bard of Francis the First, that 'Prince of Poets, and that Poet of Princes' as he was quaintly but expressively dignified by his contemporaries. Marot is still an inimitable and true poet for he has written in a manner of his own with such marked felicity, that he has left his name to a style of poetry called Mariotique. The original La Fontaine is his master. Marot delighted in the very forms of poetry, as well as its subjects and its manner. His life, indeed, took the shape, and indulged in more poetical licenses, than even his poetry: licentious in morals; often in prison, or court, or in the army, or a fugitive, he has left in his numerous little poems many a curious record of his varied existence. He was indeed very far from being devoted when his friend the learned Vatable, the Hebrew professor, probably to reclaim a perpetual sinner from profane rhymes, as Marot was suspected of heresy, confession a meagre days being his abhorrence! suggested the new project of translating the Psalms into French verse, and doubt assisted the bard; for they are said to, 'traduction: rithme Française selon la verité Hebraïque.' The same Theodore Beza was also his friend and prompter, & afterwards his continuator. Marot published fifty-five Psalms, written in a variety of measures, with the old style he had done his ballads and rondeaux. He dedicated to the king of France, comparing him with the very Hebrew, and with a French compliment!

Dieu le donne aux peuples Hebraïques
Dieu to devolt, ce pense-je, aux Gallicques.

He insinuates that in his version he had received assistance

'—par les divins esprits
Qui ont sous toy Hébreu langage appris,
Nous sont jetés les Psameans en lumière
Clairs, et au sons de la forme premiere.'

This royal dedication is more solemn than usual; Marot, who was never grave but in prison, soon recovered from this dedication to the king for on turning the leaf

* It would be polluting these pages with ribaldry, obscenity, and blasphemy, were I to give specimens of some hymns of the Moravians and the Methodists, and some of the still lower sects.

† Mr Hamper, of Birmingham, has obligingly supplied me with a rare tract, entitled 'Singing of Psalms, vindicated from the charge of Novelty,' in answer to Dr Russell, Mr. Marlow, &c. 1693. It furnishes numerous authorities to show that it was practised by the primitive Christians on almost every occasion. I shall shortly quote a remarkable passage.

another, 'Aux Dames de France!' Warton says of it, that 'He seems anxious to deprecate the railleury of the new tone of his versification was likely to incur, is embarrassed to find an apology for turning saint, embarrassments however, terminate in a highly poetical fancy. When will the golden age be restored, exclaim this lady's Psalmists,

'Quand n'aurons plus de cours ne lieu
Les chansons de ce petit Dieu
A qui les peintres font des saies ?
O vous dames et demoiselles
Que Dieu fait pour estre son temple
Et faites, sous mauvais exemple
Retenir et chambres et saies,
De chansons mondaines ou saies,' &c.

showing, continues the poet, that songs that are silent at love can never please you, here are some composed love itself; all here is love, but more than mortal! Sing as at all times,

Et les convertir et muier
Faisant vos levres remuer,
Et vos doigts sur les epluyettes
Pour dire saintes chansonnettes.

but then breaks forth with that enthusiasm, which permits at first conveyed to the sullen fancy of the austere him the project he so successfully adopted, and, whose hence we are still witnessing.

O bien heureux qui voir pourra
Fleurir le temps, que l'on orra
Le labourer & sa charrue
Le charretier parmy la rue,
Et l'artisan en sa boutique
Avecques un Peasme ou cantique,
En son labour se soulager ;
Heureux qui orra le berger
Et la bergère en bois exans
Faire que rochers et estangs
Après eux chantent la hauteur
Du saint nom de leurs Createur
Commencez, da res, commences
Le siècle doré ! avancez !
En chantant d'un cœur debonnaire.
Dedans ce saint cancionnaire.

Thrice happy they, who may behold,
And listen, in that age of gold !
As by the plough the labourer strays,
And carman mid the public ways,
And tradesmen in his shop shall swell
Their voice in Psalm or Canticle,
Singing to solace toil ; again,
From woods shall come a sweeter strain !
Shepherd and shepherdess shall vie
In many a tender Psalmody ;
And the Creator's name prolong
As rock and stream return their song !
Begin then, ladies fair ! begin
The age renew'd that knows no sin !
And with light heart, that wants no wing,
Sing ! from this holy song-book, sing !*

This 'holy song-book' for the harpsichord or the voice a gay novelty, and no book was ever more eagerly seized by all classes than Marot's 'Psalms.' In the year of that day, they sold faster than the printers could to them off their presses ; but as they were understood to sing, and yet were not accompanied by music, every set them to favourite tunes, commonly those of popular bards. Each of the royal family, and every nobleman, as a psalm or a song, which expressed his own personal taste, adapted to his own tune. The Dauphin, afterwards Henry II, a great hunter, when he went to the chase singing ainsi qu'on vit le cerf bruyre. 'Like as the deer with the water-brooks.' There is a curious portrait of the mistress of Henry, the famous Diane de Poitiers, recently published, on which is inscribed this of the Psalm. On a portrait which exhibits Diane in attitude rather unsuitable to so solemn an application, she can be found to account for this discordance : she, the painter, or the lady herself, chose to adopt the Psalm of her royal lover, proudly to designate the curious tract already referred to, the following quotation remarkable ; she creeds the fancy of Marot pictured to her so anciently occurred. St Jerome in his seventeenth century to Marcellus thus describes it : 'In christian villages there is to be heard but Psalms ; for which way soever you walk, either you hear the Ploughman at his plough Hallelujah, the heavy Brewer refreshing himself with Ale, or the Vine-dresser chanting forth somewhat of Da-the object of her love, besides its double allusion to her name. Diane, however, in the first stage of their mutual attachment, took Du fond de ma pensée, or 'From the depth of my heart.' The Queen's favourite was, that is, 'Rebuke me not in thy indignation,' which she sung to a fashionable jig. Antony, king of Navarre, sung Revenge may prens la querelle, or, 'Stand up, O Lord, to revenge my quarrel,' to the air of a dance of Poitou.*—We may conceive the ardour with which this novelty was received, for Francis sent to Charles the Fifth Marot's collection, who both by promises and presents encouraged the French bard to proceed with his version, and entreating Marot to send him as soon as possible Confitemini Domino quoniam bonus, because it was his favourite Psalm. And the Spanish as well as French composers hastened to set the Psalms of Marot to music. The fashion lasted, for Henry the Second set one to an air of his own composing. Catharine de Medici had her Psalm, and it seems that every one at court adopted some particular Psalm for themselves, which they often played on lutes and guitars, &c. Singing Psalms in verse was then one of the chief ingredients in the happiness of social life.

*Ne vueilles pas, o sire,
Me reprendre en ton ire*

The universal reception of Marot's Psalms induced Theodore Beza to compile the collection, and ten thousand copies were immediately dispersed. But these had the advantage of being set to music, for we are told, they were 'admirably fitted to the violin and other musical instruments.' And who was the man who had thus adroitly taken hold of the public feeling to give it this strong direction ? It was the solitary Thaumaturgus, the ascetic Calvin, who, from the depth of his closet at Geneva, had engaged the finest musical composers, who were no doubt warmed by the zeal of propagating his faith, to form these simple and beautiful airs to assist the Psalm singers. At first this was not discovered, and Catholics as well as Huguenots, were solacing themselves on all occasions with this new music. But when Calvin appointed these Psalms, as set to music, to be sung at his meetings, and Marot's formed an appendix to the Catechism of Geneva, this put an end to all Psalm singing for the poor Catholics ! Marot himself was forced to fly to Geneva from the fulminations of the Sorbonne, and Psalm singing became an open declaration of what the French called 'Lutheranism,' when it became with the reformed a regular part of their religious discipline. The Cardinal of Lorraine succeeded in persuading the lovely patroness of the 'holy song book,' Diane de Poitiers, who at first was a Psalm singer and an heretical reader of the Bible, to discontinue this new fashion. He began by finding fault with the Psalms of David, and revived the amatory elegancies of Horace : at that moment even the reading of the Bible was symptomatic of Lutheranism ; Diane, who had given way to these novelties, would have a French Bible, because the queen, Catharine de Medici, had one, and the Cardinal finding a bible on her table, immediately crossed himself, beat his breast, and otherwise so well acted his part, that, 'having thrown the Bible down and condemned it, he remonstrated with the fair penitent, that it was a kind of reading not adapted for her sex, containing dangerous matters ; if she was uneasy in her mind she should hear two masses instead of one, and rest content with her Paternosters and her Primer, which were not only devotional but ornamented with a variety of elegant forms from the most exquisite pencils of France.' Such is the story drawn from a curious letter, written by a Huguenot, and a former friend of Catharine de Medici, and by which we may infer that the reformed religion was making considerable progress in the French court,—had the Cardinal of Lorraine not interfered by persuading the mistress, and she the king, and the king his queen, at once to give up Psalm singing and reading the Bible !

'This infectious frenzy of Psalm-singing,' as Warton describes it, under the Calvinistic preachers had rapidly propagated itself through Germany as well as France. It was admirably calculated to kindle the flame of Fanaticism, and frequently served as the trumpet to rebellion. These energetic hymns of Geneva excited and supported a variety of popular instructions in the most flourishing cities of the Low Countries, and what our poetical antiquary could never forgive,' 'fomented the fury which defaced many of the most beautiful and venerable churches of Flanders.'

At length it reached our island at that critical moment when it had first embraced the Reformation; and here its domestic history was parallel with its foreign, except, perhaps, in the splendour of its success. Sternhold, an enthusiast for the reformation, was much offended, says Warton, at the lascivious ballads which prevailed among the courtiers, and with a laudable design to check these indecencies, he undertook to be our Marot—without his genius; 'thinking thereby,' says our cynical literary historian, Antony Wood, 'that the courtiers would sing them instead of their sonnets but did not, only some few excepted.' They were practised by the puritans in the reign of Elizabeth; for Shakespeare notices the puritan of his day 'singing Psalms to hornpipes,'* and more particularly during the protectorate of Cromwell, on the same plan of accommodating them to popular tunes and jigs, which one of them said 'were too good for the devil.' Psalms were now sung at Lord Mayors' dinners and city feasts; soldiers sang them on their march and at parade; a few houses which had windows fronting the streets, but had their evening psalms; for a story has come down to us, to record that the hypocritical brotherhood did not always care to sing unless they were heard!

ON THE RIDICULOUS TITLES ASSUMED BY THE ITALIAN ACADEMIES.

The Italians are a fanciful people, who have often mixed a grain or two of plesantry and even folly with their wisdom. This fanciful character betrays itself in their architecture, in their poetry, in their extemporary comedy, and their improvvisatori; but an instance not yet accounted for of this national levity, appears in those denominations of exquisite absurdity given by themselves to their Academies! I have in vain inquired for any assignable reason why the most ingenious men, and grave and illustrious personages, cardinals and princes, as well as poets, scholars, and artists, in every literary city, should voluntarily choose to burlesque themselves and their serious occupations, by affecting mysterious or ludicrous titles, as if it were carnival time, and they had to support masquerade characters, and accepting such titles as we find in the cant style of our own vulgar clubs, the Society of 'Odd Fellows,' and of 'Eccentrics!' A principle so whimsical but systematic, must surely have originated in some circumstance not hitherto detected.

A literary friend, recently in an Italian city, exhausted by the stirocco, entered a house whose open door and circular seats appeared to offer to passengers a refreshing sorbetto; he discovered, however, that he had got into 'the Academy of the Cameleons,' where they met to delight their brothers, and any 'spirito gentil' they could nail to a recitation. An invitation to join the academicians alarmed him, for with some impatient prejudices against these little creatures, vocal with prose e rime, and usually with odes and sonnets begged for, or purloined for the occasion, he waived all further curiosity and courtesy, and has returned home without any information how these 'Cameleons' looked, when changing their colours in an 'accademia.'

Such literary institutions, prevalent in Italy, are the spurious remains of those numerous academies which simultaneously started up in that country about the sixteenth century. They assumed the most ridiculous denominations, and a great number is registered by Quadrio and Tiraboschi. Whatever was their design, one cannot fairly reproach them, as Mencken, in his 'Charlatanaria Eruditorum,' seems to have thought, for pompous quackery; neither can we attribute to their modesty their choice of senseless titles, for to have degraded their own exalted pursuits was but folly! Literary history affords no parallel, to this national absurdity of the refined Italians.

* My friend, Mr Douce, imagines, that this alludes to a common practice at that time among the Puritans of burlesquing the plain chant of the Papists, by adapting vulgar and ludicrous music to psalms and pious compositions. Illust. of Shakespeare, l. 335. Mr Douce does not recollect his authority. My idea differs. May we not conjecture that the intention was the same which induced Sternhold to versify the Psalms, to be sung instead of lascivious ballads; and the most popular tunes came afterwards to be adopted, that the singer might practise his favourite one, as we find it occurred in France

Who could have suspected that the most eminent scholars and men of genius, were associates of the Oziozi, the Pasticci, the Inacanti? Why should Genoa boast of her 'Sleepy,' Viterbo of her 'Obstinates,' Sienna of her 'l'aspids,' her 'Blockheads,' and her 'Thunderstruck,' a Naples of her 'Furioso,' while Macerata exults in her 'Madmen chained'? Both Quadrio and Tiraboschi cannot deny that these fantastical titles have occasioned the Italian academies to appear very ridiculous to the oltramontani; but these valuable historians are no philosophic thinkers. They apologize for this bad taste, by describing the ardour which was kindled throughout Italy at the restoration of letters and the fine arts, so that every one, even every man of genius, were eager to enroll their names in these academies, and prided themselves in bearing the emblems, that is, the distinctive arms each academy had chosen. But why did they mystify themselves?

Folly, once become national, is a vigorous plant, which sheds abundant seed. The consequence of having adopted ridiculous titles for these academies, suggested to the many other characteristic fopperies. At Florence every member of the 'Umidì' assumed the name of something equal or of any quality pertaining to humidity. One was called 'the Frozen,' another 'the Damp,' one was 'the Phil,' another 'the Swan,' and Grazzini, the celebrated socialist, is known better by the cognomen of La Lince, 'the Roach,' by which he whimsically designates himself among the 'Humids.' I find among the Inacanti, one man of learning taking the name of Stordito Inacanto, another Tenelo so Inacanto. The famous Florentine academy of La Crusca amidst their grave labours to sift and purify their language, threw themselves headlong into this vortex of folly. The title, the academy of 'Bran,' was a conceit to indicate the art of sifting; but it required an Italian prodigality of conceits to have induced these grave scholars to exhibit themselves in the burlesque scenery of a pantomimical academy, if their furniture consists of a mill and a bake-house; a pit for the orator is a hopper, while the learned dreads to sit on a mill-stone; the other seats have the forms of miller's dosers, or great panniers, and the backs consist of the long shovels used in ovens. The table is a baker's kneading-trough, and the academician who reads has his body thrust out of a great bolting sack, with his hat not what else for their inkstands and portfolios. But the most celebrated of these academies is that 'degli Arcadi' at Rome, who are still carrying on their pretensions as high. Whoever inspires to be aggregated to these Arcadian shepherds, receives a pastoral name and a title, not the deeds, of a farm, picked out of a map of the ancient Arcadia or its environs; for Arcadia itself soon became too small a possession for these partitioners of moonshine. Their laws, modelled by the twelve tables of the ancient Romans; their language in the venerable majesty of the renowned ancestors; and this erudite democracy dictated by the Grecian Olympiads which Creacembini, their custode, or guardian, most painfully adjusted to the volgar era, were designed that the sacred erudition of antiquity might for ever be present among these shepherds.* Quidoni, in his Memoirs, has given an amusing account of these honours. He says 'he was presented with two diplomas; the one was my charter of aggregation to the Arcadi of Rome, under the name of Polissimo, the other gave me the investiture of the Phlegrean Fields. I was on this saluted by the whole assembly in chorus, under the name of Polissimo Phlegio, and embraced by them as fellow shepherd and brother. The Arcadians are so rich, as you may perceive, my dear reader: we possess estates in Greece; we water them with our labours for the sake of reaping laurels, and the Turks sow them with grain, plant them with vines, and laugh at both titles and our songs.' When Fontenelle became an Arcadian, they baptised him Il Pastor Pigrasso, that 'amiable Fountain' allusive to his name and his delightful style; and magnificently presented him with the Isle of Delos! The late Joseph Walker, an enthusiast for an Italian literature, dedicated his 'Memoir on Italian Tragedy' to the Countess Spencer: not inscribing it in his christian but his heathen name, and the title of his Arcadian estates, Eubante Tirinzio! Plain Joseph Walker, his masquerade dress, with his Arcadian surnames of Po reads dangling in his title-page, was performing a character which however well adapted, not being understood, he got stared at for his affectation! We have nd of some licentious revellings of these Arcadians, in giving a man of genius from our own country, who, him-composing Italian Rime, had 'conceit' enough to sume a shepherd! Yet let us inquire before we critieven this ridiculous society of the Arcadians became a morable literary institution; and Tiraboschi has shown it successfully arrested the bad taste which was then railing throughout Italy; recalling its muses to purer scot; while the lives of many of its shepherds have fur-ished an interesting volume of literary history under the title of 'The illustrious Arcadians.' Crescimbeni, and its others, had formed the most elevated conceptions of the ity at its origin; but poetical vaticinations are prophets while we read their verses—we must not look for that matter of fact—the event predicted!

Il vostro seme eterno
Occuperà la terra, ed i confini
D'Arcadia oltrappassando,
Di non più vidi gloriosi germi
L'aureo fecondarà l'ito del Gange
E de' Cimмери l'infocenda arena.

Mathias has recently with warmth defended the origi-Arcadia; and the assumed character of its members, has been condemned as betraying their affectation, attributes to their modesty. 'Before the critics of the media (the pastori, as they modestly styled themselves with Crescimbeni for their conductor, and with the brave Albano for their patron, (Clement XI,) all that is depraved in language, and in sentiment, fied and disappeared.'

The strange taste for giving fantastical denominations literary institutions grew into a custom though, probably we know how. The founders were always persons of talent and learning, yet still accident or caprice created the justifying title, and invented those appropriate emblems, which still added to the folly. The Arcadian society declined its title from a spontaneous conceit. This assembly it held its meetings, on summer evenings, in a meadow on the banks of the Tiber; for the fine climate of Italy renders such assemblies in the open air. In the recital of an eclogue, an enthusiast, amidst all he was hearing of all he was seeing, exclaimed 'I seem at this moment to be in the Arcadia of ancient Greece, listening to the pure and simple strains of its shepherds.' Enthusias in contagious amidst susceptible Italians, and this name, inspiration and by acclamation, was conferred on the society! Even more recently at Florence the accademia the Colombaria, or the 'Pigeon-house,' proves with its levity the Italians name a literary society. The leader was the Cavallero Pazzi, a gentleman, who, like those, abhorring noise, chose for his study a garret in Florence; it was, indeed, one of the old turrets which it not yet fallen in; there he fixed his library, and there assembled the most ingenious Florentines to discuss objects of science, and to reveal their own contributions in this retreat of silence and philosophy. To get to this place it was necessary to climb a very steep and very narrow staircase, which occasioned some facetious wit to move, that these literati were so many pigeons who flew evening to their dove-cot. The Cavallero Pazzi, to relieve this humour, invited them to a dinner entirely composed of their little brothers, in all the varieties of cookery; and, after a hearty laugh, assumed the title of the colombaria, invented a device consisting of the top of a turret, with several pigeons flying about it, bearing an epigram from Dante, Quanto veder al pao, by which they named their design not to apply themselves to any other object. Such facts sufficiently prove that some of the absurd or facetious denominations of these literary societies originated in accidental circumstances, or in mere humour; but this will not account for the origin of those society titles we have noticed; for when grave men assume themselves doct or lunatics, unless they are really they must have some reason for laughing at themselves.

To attempt to develop this curious but obscure singularity in literary history, we must go farther back among the beginnings of these institutions. How were they founded by the governments in which they first appeared? These academies might, perhaps, form a chapter in the history of secret societies, one not yet written, but of which many curious materials lie scattered in history. It is certain that such literary societies, in their first origins, have always excited the jealousy of governments, but more particularly in ecclesiastical Rome, and the rival principalities of Italy. If two great nations, like those of England and France, had their suspicions and fears roused by a sober assembly of philosophical men, and either put them down by force, or closely watched them, this will not seem extraordinary in little despotic states. We have accounts of some philosophical associations at home, which were joined by Sir Philip Sidney and Sir Walter Rawleigh, but which soon got the odium of atheism attached to them; and the establishment of the French academy occasioned some umbrage, for a year elapsed before the parliament of Paris would register their patent, which was at length accorded by the political Richelieu observing to the president, that 'he should like the members according as the members liked him.' Thus we have ascertained one principle, that governments in those times looked on a new society with a political glance; nor it is improbable that some of them combined an ostensible with a latent motive.

There is no want of evidence to prove that the modern Romans, from the thirteenth to the fifteenth century, were too feelingly alive to their obscure glory, and that they too frequently made invidious comparisons of their ancient republic with the pontifical government; to revive Rome, with every thing Roman, inspired such enthusiasts as Rienzi, and charmed the visions of Petrarch. At a period when ancient literature, as if by a miracle, was raising itself from its grave, the learned were agitated by a correspondent energy; not only was an estate sold to purchase a manuscript, but the relic of genius was touched with a religious emotion. The classical purity of Cicero was contrasted with the barbarous idiom of the Missal;
the glories of ancient Rome with the miserable subjugation of its modern pontiffs; and the metaphysical reveries of Plato, and what they termed the 'Enthusiasmus Alexandrinus,' the dreams of the Platonists seemed to the fanciful Italians more elevated than the humble and pure ethics of the Gospels. The vain and amorous Eloisa could even censure the gross manners, as it seemed to her, of the apostles, for picking the ears of corn in their walks, and at their meals eating with unwashed hands.— Touched by this mania of antiquity, the learned affected to change their vulgar christian name, by assuming the more classical ones of a Junius Brutus, a Pomponius, or a Julius; or any other rusty name unwashed by baptism. This frenzy for the ancient republic not only menaced the pontificate; but their Platonic, or their pagan ardours, seemed to be striking at the foundation of Christianity itself. Such were Marcius Ficinus, and that learned society who assembled under the Medici.
Pomponius Letus, who lived at the close of the fifteenth century, not only celebrated by an annual festival the foundation of Rome, and raised altars to Romulus but openly expressed his contempt for the christian religion, which this visionary declared was only fit for barbarians;
but this extravagance and irreligion, observes Nicéron, were common with many of the learned of those times, and this very Pomponius was at length formally accused of the crime of changing the baptismal names of the young persons whom he taught, for pagan ones! 'This was the taste of the times,' says the author we have just quoted; but it was imagined that there was a mystery concealed in these changes of names.

At this period these literary societies first appear: one at Rome had the title of 'Academy,' and for its chief this very Pomponius; for he is distinguished as a 'Romanus Princeps Academicus,' by his friend Politian, in the 'Mis-cellanea,' of that elegant scholar. This was under the pontificate of Paul the Second. The regular meetings of 'the Academy' soon excited the jealousy and suspicions of Paul, and gave rise to one of the most horrid persecutions and scenes of torture, even to death, in which these academicians were involved: This closed with a decree of Paul's, that for the future no one should pronounce, either seriously or in jest, the very name of academy, under the penalty of heresy! The story is told by Platina, one of the sufferers, in his life of Paul the Second; and although this history may be said to bear the bruises of the wounded and dislocated body of the unhappy historian, the facts are unquestionable, and connected century.'

with our subject. Platina, Pomponius, and many of their friends, were suddenly dragged to prison; on the first and second day torture was applied, and many expired under the hands of their executioners. 'You would have imagined,' says Platina, 'that the castle of St Angelo was turned into the bull of Phalaris, so loud the hollow vault resounded with the cries of those miserable young men, who were an honour to their age for genius and learning. The torturers, not satisfied, though weary, having racked twenty men in those two days, of whom some died, at length sent for me to take my turn. The instruments of torture were ready; I was stripped, and the executioners put themselves, to their work. Vianesius sat like another Minos on a seat of tapestry work, gay as at a wedding; and while I hung on the rack in torment, he played with a jewel which Sanga had, asking him who was the mistress which had given him this love token? Turning to me, he asked 'why Pomponio in a letter should call me Holy Father?' Did the conspirators agree to make you Pope?' 'Pomponio,' I replied, 'can best tell why he gave me this title, for I know not.' At length, having pleased, but not satisfied himself with my tortures, he ordered me to be let down that I might undergo tortures much greater in the evening. I was carried, half dead, into my chamber; but not long after, the inquisitor having dined, and being fresh in drink, I was fetched again, and the archbishop of Spalatro was there. They inquired of my conversations with Malatesta. I said, it only concerned ancient and modern learning, the military arts, and the characters of illustrious men, the ordinary subjects of conversation. I was bitterly threatened by Vianesius, unless I confessed the truth on the following day, and was carried back to my chamber, where I was seized with such extreme pain, that I had rather have died than endured the agony of my battered and dislocated limbs. But now those who were accused of heresy were charged with plotting treason. Pomponius being examined why he changed the names of his friends, he answered boldly, that this was no concern of his judges or the pope: it was perhaps out of respect for antiquity, to stimulate to a virtuous emulation. After we had now lain ten months in prison, Paul comes himself to the castle, where he charged us, among other things, that we had disputed concerning the immortality of the soul, and that we held the opinion of Plato: by disputing you call the being of a God in question. This, I said, might be objected to all divines and philosophers, who to make the truth appear, frequently question the existence of souls and of God, and of all separate intelligences. St Austin says, the opinion of Plato is like the faith of Christians. I followed none of the numerous heretical factions. Paul then accused us of being too great admirers of pagan antiquities; yet none were more fond of them than himself, for he collected all the statues and sarcophagi of the ancients to place in his palace, and even affected to imitate, on more than one occasion, the pomp and charm of their public ceremonies. While they were arguing, mention happened to be made of 'the Academy,' when the Cardinal of San Marco cried out, that we were not 'Academics,' but a scandal to the name; and Paul now declared that he would not have that term evermore mentioned under pain of heresy. He left us in a passion, and kept us two months longer in prison to complete the year, as it seems he had sworn.'

Such is the interesting narrative of Platina, from which we may surely infer, that if these learned men assembled for the communication of their studies; inquiries suggested by the monuments of antiquity, the two learned languages, ancient authors, and speculative points of philosophy, these objects were associated with others, which terrified the jealousy of modern Rome.

Sometime after, at Naples, appeared the two brothers, John Baptiste and John Vincent Porta, those twin spirits, the Castor and Pollux of the natural philosophy of that age, and whose scenica. museum delighted and awed, by its optical illusions, its treasure of curiosities, and its natural magic, all learned natives and foreigners. Their name is still famous and their treatises De humana physiognomia and Magia naturalis, are still opened by the curious, who discover these 'children of philosophy, wandering in the arcana of nature, to them a world of perpetual beginnings! These learned brothers united with the Marquis of Manso, the friend of Tasso, in establishing an academy under the whimsical name of degli Orsini, (the Lazy) which so ill described their intentions. This academy my did not sufficiently embrace the views of the two brothers, and then they formed another under their roof, which they appropriately named di Secreti; the sensible motive was, that no one should be admitted into this interior society who had not signalized himself by experiment or discovery. It is clear, that, whatever intended by the project, the election of the members to pass through the most rigid scrutiny—and what was consequence? The court of Rome again started up all its fears, and secretly obtaining information of the discussions which had passed in this academy degli Orsini, prohibited the Portas from holding such assemblies applying themselves to those illicit sciences, whose elements are criminal, and turn us aside from the study of Holy Scriptures.* It seems that one of the Portas delivered him in the style of an ancient oracle; but it was more alarming in this prophetic spirit, several of predictions had been actually verified. The infatuated court was in no want of a new school of prophecy. The two Portas went to Rome to justify himself, and, to wear his head, placed his tongue in the custody of Holiness, and no doubt preferred being a member of Accademia degli Orsini, to that of gli Secreti. To confirm this notion that these academies excited the jealousy of these despotic states of Italy, I find that several of them at Florence, as well as at Sienna, were considered dangerous meetings; and in 1588, the Medici suddenly suppressed those of the 'Inspids,' the 'Shy,' the 'Heartened,' and others, but more particularly the 'Sneaked,' gli Intronati, which excited loud laments. We have also an account of an academy which called itself Lanterini, from the circumstance that their first meetings were held at night, the academicians not carry torches, but only Lanterns. This academy, indeed, was at Toulouse, but evidently formed on a model of its neighbours. In fine, it cannot be denied, that these literary societies or academies were frequently objects of alarm to the governments of Italy, and were often interrupted by political persecution.

From all these facts I am inclined to draw an inference. It is remarkable that the first Italian Academies were only distinguished by the simple name of their founders: one was called the Academy of Pomponius Læstus, and of Panormita, &c. It was after the melancholy fall of the Roman Academy of Læstus, which could not, however, extinguish that growing desire of creating literary societies in the Italian cities, from which the members derived both honor and pleasure, that suddenly we discover these academies bearing the most fantastical names. I have not found any writer who has attempted to solve the extraordinary appearance in literary history, and the difficulty seems great, because, however frivolous or fanciful the titles they assumed, their members were illustrious for rank and genius. Tiraboschi, aware of this difficulty, can only express his astonishment at the absurdity, and vexation at the ridicule to which the Italians have been exposed by the coarse jokes of Menkenius in his Charactaria Eruditorum.† I conjecture, that the invention of these ridiculous titles, for literary societies, was an attempt to throw a sportive veil over meetings which had alarmed the papal and the other petty courts of Italy; and to give their fears, and turn aside their political wrath, they implied the innocence of their pursuits by the jocularity of which the members treated themselves, and were well that others should treat them. This otherwise incredible national levity so refined a people has not occurred in any other country, because the necessity did not exist anywhere but in Italy. In France, in Spain, and in England, the title of the ancient ACADEMUS was never profaned by an adjunct which systematically degraded or ridiculed its venerable character, and its illustrious members.

Long after this article was finished, I had an opportunity of consulting an eminent Italian, whose name is celebrated in our country, Il Sign. Ugo Foscolo; decision ought necessarily to outweigh mine; but when it is incumbent on me to put the reader in possession of the opinion of a native of his high acquirements, it is easy for me, on this obscure and curious subject, to relinquish my own conjecture.

Il Sigr. Foscolo is of opinion, that the origin of the satirical titles assumed by the Italian Academies entirely arose from a desire of getting rid of the air of pomposity, and to insinuate that their meetings and their works were to be considered merely as sportive relaxations, and an idle business.

This opinion may satisfy an Italian, and this he may deem a sufficient apology for such absurdity; but when pariet robes and cowed heads, laureated bards and Monfrances, and Cavalleros, baptize themselves in a public assembly 'Blockheads or 'Madmen,' we ultramontanes, let of mere compliment to such great and learned men, would suppose that they had their good reasons; and that a little there must have been 'something more than meets the ear.' After all, I would almost flatter myself that our opinions are not so wide of each other as they at first seem to be.

ON THE HERO OF HUDIBRAS; BUTLER VINDICATED..

That great Original, the author of Hudibras, has been repeatedly censured for exposing to ridicule the Sir Samuel Luke, who whose roof he dwelt, in the grotesque character of a hero. The knowledge of the critic in our literary history is not curious; he appears to have advanced no farther, than to have taken up the first opinion he found; but he served for an attempt to blacken the moral character of Butler! 'Having lived,' says our critic, 'in the family of Sir Samuel Luke, one of Cromwell's Captains, at the very time he planned the Hudibras, of which he was assisted to make his kind and hospitable Patron the Hero. He defied the history of Whiggism to match this anecdote,*—as if it could not be matched! Whigs and Tories are as like as two eggs when they are wits and satirists; his friends too often become their first victims! If Sir Samuel resembled that renowned personification, the ridicule was legitimate and unavoidable when the poet had pursued his cause, and espoused it too from the purest source—a detestation of political and fanatical hypocrisy. Comic satirists, whatever they may allege to the contrary, always draw largely and most truly from their own tale. After all, it does not appear that Sir Samuel sat Sir Hudibras; although from the hiatus still in the poem, at the end of Part I, Canto I, his name would accommodate both the metre and the rhyme! But who, said Warburton, ever compared a person to himself! Butler left him a sly stroke at Sir Samuel by hinting to him how well he resembled Hudibras, but with a remarkable bearing he has left posterity to settle the affair, which certainly not worth their while. But Warburton tells, that a friend of Butler's had declared the person was a Devonshire man; one Sir Henry Rosewell, of Ford Abbey, in that county. There is a curious life of our learned Birch, made the most authentic researches, from the contemporaries of Butler, or their descendants; and from Charles Longueville, the son of Butler's great friend, he mined much of the little we possess. The writer of the life believes that Sir Samuel was the hero of Butler, and to his evidence on the hiatus we have noticed; but with candour which becomes the literary historian, he has added the following marginal note: 'Whilst this sheet was at press, I was assured by Mr Longueville, that Sir Samuel Luke is not the person ridiculed under the name of Hudibras.'

It would be curious, after all, should the prototype of Hudibras turn out to be one of the heroes of 'the Role'—a circumstance, which, had it been known to the authorship of that comic epic, would have furnished a episode and a memorable hero to their line of descent. When Butler wrote his Hudibras, one Coll. Rolle, a Devonshire man, lodged with him, and was exactly like his conception of the Knight; whence it is highly probable, that it was this gentleman, and not Sir Samuel Luke, who person he had in his eye. The reason that he gave for his poem Hudibras was, because the name of the tutelary saint of Devonshire was Hugh de Bras. In this is the Grub street Journal, January, 1731, a critical paper conducted by two eminent literary physicians, under the appropriate names of Bavius and Marvius, and which for some time enlivened the towns with Edinburgh Review, No. 67—159, on Jacobite Relics. Bavius and Marvius were Dr Martyn, the well-known an-

the excellent design of ridiculing silly authors and stupid critics.

It is unquestionably proved, by the confession of several friends of Butler, that the prototype of Sir Hudibras was a Devonshire man: and if Sir Hugh de Bras be the old patron saint of Devonshire, (which however I cannot find in Prince's or in Fuller's Worthies,*) this discovers the suggestion which led Butler to the name of his hero; burlesquing the new Saint by pairing him with the chivalrous Saint of the county; hence, like the Knights of old, did

'Sir Knight abandon dwelling,
And out he rode a Colonelling!

This origin of the name is more appropriate to the character of the work than deriving it from the Sir Hudibras of Spenser, with whom there exists no similitude.

It is as honourable as it is extraordinary, that such was the celebrity of Hudibras, that the workman's name was often confounded with the work itself; the poet was once better known under the name of Hudibras than of Butler. Old Southern calls him: 'Hudibras Butler;' and if any one would read the most copious life we have of this great poet in the great General Dictionary, he must look for a name he is not accustomed to find among English authors—that of Hudibras! One fact is remarkable; that, like Cervantes, and unlike Rabelais and Sterne, Butler, in his great work, has not sent down to posterity a single passage of indecent ribaldry, though it was written amidst a court which would have got such by heart, and in an age in which such trash was certain of popularity.

We know little more of Butler than we do of Shakspeare and of Spenser! Longueville, the devoted friend of our poet, has unfortunately left no reminiscences of the departed genius whom he so intimately knew, and who bequeathed to Longueville the only legacy a neglected poet could leave—all his manuscripts; and to his care, though not to his spirit, we are indebted for Butler's 'Remains.' His friend attempted to bury him with the public honours he deserved, among the tombs of his brother bards in Westminster Abbey; but he was compelled to consign the bard to an obscure burial place in Paul's, Covent-Garden. Many years after, when Alderman Barber raised an inscription to the memory of Butler in Westminster Abbey, others were desirous of placing one over the poet's humble gravestone. This probably excited some competition; and the following fine one, attributed to Dennis, has perhaps never been published. If it be Dennis's, it must have been composed at one of his most lucid moments.

To this too brief article I add a proof that that fanaticism, which is branded by our immortal Butler, can survive the castigation. Folly is sometimes immortal, as nonsense is irrefutable. Ancient follies revive, and men repeat the same unintelligible jargon; just as contagion keeps up the plague in Turkey by lying hid in some obscure corner, till it breaks out afresh. Recently we have seen a notable instance where one of the school to which we are alluding, declares of Shakspeare, that 'it would have been happy if he had never been born, for that thousands will look back with incessant anguish on the guilty thor of the Dissertation on the Eneid of Virgil, and Dr Russell, another learned physician, as his publications attest. It does great credit to their taste, that they were the hebdomadal defenders of Pope from the attacks of the heroes of the Dunciad.

* There is a great reason to doubt the authenticity of this information concerning a Devonshire tutelary saint. Mr Charles Butler has kindly communicated the researches of a catholic Clergyman, residing at Exeter, who having examined the voluminous registers of the See of Exeter, and numerous MSS and records, of the Diocese, cannot trace that any such saint was particularly honoured in the county. It is lamentable that ingenious writers should invent fictions, for authorities but with the hope that the present authors have not done this. I have preserved this apocryphal tradition.

delight which the plays of Shakspeare ministered to them.* Such is the anathema of Shakspeare! We have another of Butler, in 'An historic defence of experimental religion'; in which the author contends, that the best men have experienced the agency of the Holy Spirit in an immediate illumination from heaven. He furnishes his historic proofs by a list from Abel to Lady Huntingdon! The author of Hudibras is denounced, 'One Samuel Butler, a celebrated buffoon in the abandoned reign of Charles the Second, wrote a mock heroic poem, in which he undertook to burlesque the pious puritan. He ridicules all the gracious promises by comparing the divine illumination to an ignis fatuus, and dark lantern of the spirit.'† Such are the writers whose ascetic spirit is still descending among us from the mockery of the deserts, adding poignancy to the very ridicule they would annihilate. The satire which we deemed obsolete, we find still applicable to contemporaries!

The first part of Hudibras is the most perfect; that was the rich fruit of matured meditation, of wit, of learning, and of leisure. A mind of the most original powers had been perpetually acted on by some of the most extraordinary events and persons of political and religious history. Butler had lived amidst scenes which might have excited indignation and grief; but his strong contempt of the actors could only supply ludicrous images and caustic railery. Yet once, when villany was at its zenith, his solemn tones were raised to reach it.‡

The second part was precipitated in the following year. An interval of fourteen years was allowed to elapse before the third and last part was given to the world; but then every thing had changed: the poet, the subject, and the patron! the old theme of the sectarists had lost its freshness, and the cavaliers, with their royal libertine, had become as obnoxious to public decency as the Tartuffes. Butler appears to have turned aside, and to have given an adverse direction to his satirical arrows. The slavery and dotage of Hudibras to the widow revealed the voluptuous epicurean, who slept on his throne, dissolved in the arms of his mistress. 'The enchanted bower,' and 'the amorous suit,' of Hudibras reflected the new manners of this wretched court; and that Butler had become the satirist of the party whose cause he had formerly so honestly espoused, is confirmed by his 'Remains,' where among other nervous satires, is one, 'On the licentious age of Charles the Second, contrasted with the puritanical one that preceded it.' This then is the greater glory of Butler, that his high and indignant spirit equally satirized the hypocrites of Cromwell, and the libertines of Charles.

SHENSTONE'S SCHOOL-MISTRESS.

The inimitable 'School-Mistress' of SHENSTONE is one of the felicities of genius; but the purpose of this poem has been entirely misconceived. Johnson, acknowledging this charming effusion to be 'the most pleasing of Shenstone's productions,' observes, 'I know not what claim it has to stand among the moral works.' The truth is, that it was intended for quite a different class by the author, and Dodsley, the editor of his works, must have strangely blundered in designating it 'a moral poem.' It may be classed with a species of poetry till recently, rare in our language, and which we sometimes find among the Italians, in their rime piacevoli, or poesia barlesca, which do not always consist of low humor in a facetious style with jingling rhymes, to which form we attach our idea of a burlesque poem. There is a refined species of ludicrous poetry, which is comic yet tender, luxury yet elegant, and with such a blending of the serious and the facetious, that the result of such a poem may often, among its other pleasures, produce a sort of ambiguity; so that we do not always know whether the writer is laughing at his subject, or whether he is to be laughed at. Our admirable Whistlercraft met this fate! 'The School-Mistress' of SHENSTONE has been admired for its simplicity and tenderness, not for its exquisitely ludicrous turn!

This discovery I owe to the good fortune of possessing the original edition of 'The School-Mistress,' which the author printed under his own directions, and to his own fancy. To this piece of LUDICROUS PORTRAY, as he calls it, 'lost it should be mistaken,' he added a LUDICROUS INDEX, 'purely to show fools that I am in jest.' But the fool, his subsequent editor, who, I regret to say, was Robert Dodsley, thought proper to suppress this amusing 'ludicrous index,' and the consequence is, as the poet foresaw, that his aim has been 'mistaken.'

* See Quarterly Review, vol. viii, p. 111, where I found this quotation justly reprobated.

The whole history of this poem, and this edition, may be traced in the printed correspondence of SHENSTONE. Our poet had pleased himself by ornamenting 'A sixpenny pamphlet' with certain 'seemly' designs of his, and for which he came to town to direct the engraver; he appeared also to have intended accompanying it with 'The deform portrait of my old school dame, Sarah Lloyd.' The frontispiece to this first edition represents the 'Thatched house' of his old school-mistress, and before it is a 'birch tree' with the 'sun setting and gilding the scene.' He writes on this, 'I have the first sheet to correct upon the table. I have laid aside the thoughts of fame a good deal in this unpromising scheme; and fix them upon a landscape which is engraving, the red letter of my purpose, and the fruit piece which you see, being the most seemly ornaments of the first sixpenny pamphlet that I ever so highly honoured. I shall incur the same reflection with Ogilby, of having nothing good but my decorous! I expect that in your neighbourhood and in Warwickshire there should be twenty of my poems sold. I print it myself. I am pleased with Mynde's engravings.'

On the publication Shenstone has opened his ideas on poetical characteristic. 'I dare say it must be very incorrect; for I have added eight or ten stanzas within a fortnight. But inaccuracy is more excusable in ludicrous poetry than in any other. It strikes any it must be merely people of taste; for people of sense without taste which comprehends the larger part of the critical tribe will unavoidably despise it. I have been at some pains to recover myself from A Phillips' misfortune of mere cleverness, "Little charm of placid mien," &c. I have added ludicrous index purely to show (fools) that I am in jest, and my motto, "O, qua sol habitabiles illustrat oras, ma principium!" is calculated for the same purpose. You cannot conceive how large the number is of those that mistake burlesque for the very foolishness it exposes: vide observation I made once at the Rehearsal, at Tom Tom at Chronophotologues, all which are pieces of elegant humour. I have some mind to pursue this caution farther, and advertise it "The School-Mistress," &c. a childish performance every body knows (nocturnum sonnet). But if a person seriously calls this, or rather burlesque, childish or low species of poetry, he says wrong. For it is most regular and formal poetry may be called trifling, feeble and weakness, in comparison of what is written with more manly spirit in ridicule of it.

The first edition is now lying before me, with its splendid 'red-letter,' its 'seemly designs,' and, what is so precious, its 'Index.' Shenstone, who had greatly pleased himself with his graphical inventions, at length fell that his engraver, Mynde had sadly bungled with the ideal. Vexed and disappointed, he writes, 'I have been plagued to death about the ill execution of my design. Nothing is certain in London but expense, which I can bear.' The truth is, that what is placed in the landscape over the thatched-house and the birch-tree, is like a half monster rather than a setting sun; but the fruit-piece attend, the grapes, the plums, the melon, and the Catherine pears, Mr Mynde has made sufficiently tempting. The edition contains only twenty-eight stanzas, which were afterwards enlarged to thirty-five. Several stanzas have been omitted, and they have also passed through many corrections, and some improvements, which show that Shenstone had more judgment and felicity in severe correction, than perhaps is suspected. Some of these I point out.*

In the second stanza, the first edition has,

In every mart that stands on Britain's isle,
In every village less reveal'd to fame,
Dwells there in cottage known about a mile,
A matron old, whom we school-mistress name.

Improved thus:

In every village mark'd with little spire,
Embow'd in trees, and hardly known to fame,

* I have usually found the School-Mistress printed with numbering the stanzas; to enter into the present view will be necessary for the reader to do this himself with a pencil-mark.

There dwells in lowly shed and mean abode,
A matron old, whom we school-mistress name.

The eighth stanza, in the first edition, runs,

The gown, which o'er her shoulders thrown she had,
Was russet stuff (who knows not russet stuff?)
Great comfort to her mind that she was clad
In texture of her own, all strong and tough;
Nix did she o'er complain, no deem it rough, &c.

More elegantly descriptive is the dress as now depicted:

A russet stole was o'er her shoulders thrown,
A russet kirtle fenced the nipping air;
'Twas simple russet, but it was her own:
'Twas her own country bred the flock so fair,
'Twas her own labour did the fleece prepare, &c.

The additions made to the first edition consists of the 22, 23, 24, and 25th stanzas, in which are so beautifully introduced the herbs and garden stores, and the psalmist of the school mistress; the 29th and 30th stanzas are also subsequent insertions. But those lines which are original a view of genius in its infancy,

A little bunch of heedless bishops here,
And there a chancellor in embryo, &c.

printed in 1742; and I cannot but think that the farthest stanzas in Gray's Elegy, where he discovers men of genius in peasants, as Shenstone has in children, was suggested by this original conception:

Some mute inglorious Milton here may rest,
Some Cromwell guiltless of his country's blood, as a congenial thought, with an echoed turn of expression of the lines from the School Mistress.

I shall now restore the ludicrous INDEX, and adapt it to the stanzas of the later edition.

BEN JONSON ON TRANSLATION.

I have discovered a poem by this great poet, which has even escaped the researches of his last unrivalled editor, Mr. Gifford. Prefixed to a translation, translation is the theme; with us an unvalued art, because our translators have usually been the jobbers of booksellers; but no glorious one among our French and Italian rivals. In this poem, if the reader's ear be guided by the compressed sense of the massive lines, he may feel a rhythm which, should they be read like our modern metre, he will find wanting; here the fulness of the thoughts form their own cadences. The mind is musical as well as the ear. One verse running into another, and the sense often closing in the middle of a line, is the Club of Hercules; Dryden sometimes succeeded in it, Churchill abused it, and Cowper attempted to revive it. Great force of thought only can wield this verse.

On the AUTHOR, WORKS, and TRANSLATOR, prefixed to the translation of Mateo Aleman's Spanish Rogue, 1639.

Who tracks this author's or translator's pen
Shall find, that either, hath read books, and men:
To say but one, were single. Then it chimes,
When the old words doe strike on the new times,
As in this Spanish Proteus; who, though writ
But in one tongue, was form'd with the world's wit:
And hath the noblest marke of a good booke,
That an ill man dares not securely looke
Upon it, but will loath, or let it passe,
As a deformed face doth a true glasse.
Such bookes, deserve translators of like coats
As was the genius wherewith they were wrote;
And this hath met that one, that may be still'd
More than the foster-father of this child;
For though Spaine, gave him his first ayre and vogue
He would be call'd, henceforth, the English rogue,
But that hee's too well suited, in a cloth,
Finer than was his Spanish, if my oath
Will be received in court; if not, would I Had cloth'd him so! Here's all I can supply
To your desert who have done it, friend! And this Faile emulation, and no envy is;
When you behold me wish my selfe, the man
That would have done, that, which you only can!

BEN JONSON.

The translator of Guzman, was James Mabbe, which he disguised under the Spanish pseudonym of Diego Pseudo-ser; Diego for James, and Pseudo-ser for Mabbe or Maybe! He translated with the same spirit as his Guzman, Celestine, or the Spanish bawd; a version still more remarkable. He had resided a considerable time in Spain, and was a perfect master of both languages; a rare talent in a translator; and the consequence is, that he is a translator of Genius.

THE LOVES OF 'THE LADY ARABELLA.'

And as shee heard the waves arise,
And as shee heard the blaake windes reare,
As fast did heave her heartfelle sighs,
And still so fast her tears hid poure!

The name of Arabella Stuart, Mr. Lodge observes, is scarcely mentioned in history. The whole life of this

* Long after this article was composed, Miss Aikin published her 'Court of James the First.' That agreeable writer has written her popular volumes, without wasting the bloom of life in the dust of libraries, and our female historian has not occasioned me to alter a single sentence in these remarks.

lady seems to consist of secret history, which, probably, we cannot now recover. The writers who have ventured to weave together her loose and scattered story are ambiguous and contradictory. How such slight domestic incidents as her life consisted of could produce results so greatly disproportioned to their apparent cause, may always excite our curiosity. Her name scarcely ever occurs without raising that sort of interest which accompanies mysterious events, and more particularly when we discover that this lady is so frequently alluded to by her foreign contemporaries.

The historians of the Lady Arabella have all fallen into the grossest errors. Her chief historian has committed a violent injury on her very person, which, in the history of a female, is not the least important. In hastily consulting two passages relative to her, he applied to the Lady Arabella the defective understanding and headstrong dispositions of her aunt, the Countess of Shrewsbury; and by another misconception of a term, as I think, asserts that the Lady Arabella was distinguished neither for beauty, nor intellectual qualities.* This authoritative decision perplexed the modern editor, Kippis, whose researches were always limited; Kippis had gleaned from Oldys's precious manuscripts a single note, which shook to its foundations the whole structure before him; and he had also found, in Ballard, to his utter confusion, some hints that the Lady Arabella was a learned woman, and of a poetical genius, though even the writer himself, who had recorded this discovery, was at a loss to ascertain the fact! It is amusing to observe honest George Ballard in the same dilemma as honest Andrew Kippis. 'This lady,' he says, 'was not more distinguished for the dignity of her birth, than celebrated for her fine parts and learning; and yet,' he adds, in all the simplicity of his ingenuousness, 'I know so little in relation to the two last accomplishments, that I should not have given her a place in these memoirs had not Mr Evelyn put her in his list of learned women, and Mr Philips (Milton's nephew) introduced her among his modern poetesses.'

'The Lady Arabella,' for by that name she is usually noticed by her contemporaries, rather than by her maiden name of Stuart, or by her married one of Seymour, as she latterly subscribed herself, was, by her affinity with James the First, and our Elizabeth, placed near the throne; too near, it seems, for her happiness and quiet! In their common descent from Margaret, the eldest daughter of Henry VII, she was cousin to the Scottish monarch, but born an English woman, which gave her some advantage in a claim to the throne of England. 'Her double relation to royalty,' says Mr. Lodge, 'was equally obnoxious to the jealousy of Elizabeth, and the timidity of James, and they secretly dreaded the supposed danger of her having a legitimate offspring.' Yet James himself, then unmarried, proposed for the husband of the lady Arabella, one of her cousins, Lord Esme Stuart, whom he had created Duke of Lenox, and designed for his heir. The first thing we hear of 'the Lady Arabella, concerns a marriage: marriages are the incidents of her life, and the fatal event which terminated it was a marriage. Such was the secret spring on which her character and her misfortunes revolved.

This proposed match was desirable to all parties; but there was one greater than them all, who forbade the bans. Elizabeth interposed; she imprisoned the Lady Arabella, and would not deliver her up to the king, of whom she spoke with asperity, and even with contempt.† The greatest infirmity of Elizabeth was her mysterious conduct respecting the succession to the English throne; jealousy of power, her strange unhappiness in the most personal neglect, made her averse to see a successor at her court, or even to hear of a distant one; in a success she could only view a competitor. Camden tells us that she frequently observed, that 'most men neglected the sun,' and this melancholy prementiment of personal neglect this political coquette not only lived to experience, even this circumstance of keeping the succession undisturbedly disturbed the queen on her death-bed. Her ministers, it appears, harassed her when she was least speechless; a remarkable circumstance, which has led to escaped the knowledge of her numerous historians, which I shall take an opportunity of disclosing in this volume.

Elizabeth leaving a point so important always problematical, raised up the very evil she so greatly dreaded, multiplied the aspirants, while every party humoured her by selecting its own claimant, and none more bold than the continental powers. One of the most curious projects of the Pope, who intending to put aside James I, on account of his religion, formed a chimerical scheme of uniting ARABELLA with a prince of the house of Savoy; the pretext, for without a pretext no politician moves, was their descent from a bastard of our Edward IV; the Duke of Parma was, however, married, but the Pope, his infallibility, turned his brother the Cardinal into the Duke's substitute by secularising the churchman. In the case the Cardinal would then become King of England in right of this lady!—provided he obtained the crown!‡

We might conjecture from this circumstance, that Arabella was a catholic, and so Mr Butler has recently said us; but I know of no other authority than Dodd, the Catholic historian, who has inscribed her name among his party. Parsons, the wily jesuit, was so doubtful how the lady, when young, stood disposed towards catholicism that he describes 'her religion to be as tender, green, and flexible, as is her age and sex, and to be wrought hereafter and settled according to future events and times.' Yet in 1611, when she was finally sent into confinement, and well informed of court affairs writes, 'that the Lady Arabella hath not been found inclinable to popery.'§

Even Henry IV of France was not unfriendly to the papistical project of placing an Italian cardinal on the English throne. It had always been the state interest of the French cabinet to favour any scheme which might preserve the realms of England and Scotland as separate kingdoms. The manuscript correspondence of Charles IX with his ambassador at the court of London, which I have seen, tends solely to this great purpose, and perhaps it was her French and Spanish allies, which finally hastened the political martyrdom of the Scottish Mary.

Thus we have discovered two chimerical husbands of the Lady Arabella. The pretensions of this lady to the throne had evidently become an object with speculating politicians; and perhaps it was to withdraw herself from the embarrassments into which she was thrown, that, according to De Thou, she intended to marry a son of the Earl of Northumberland; but to the jealous terror of Elizabeth, an English Earl was not an object of less magnitude than a Scotch Duke. This is the third shadowy husband!

When James I ascended the English throne, there existed an Anti-Scottish party. Hardly had the northern monarch entered into the 'Land of Promise,' when his southern throne was shaken by a foolish plot, which one wiper calls 'a state riddle'; it involved Rawleigh, and unexpectedly the lady Arabella. The Scottish monarch was to be got rid of, and Arabella was to be crowned. Some when our James I was negotiating with the cabinet of Madrid. He complains of Elizabeth's treatment of him; that the queen refused to give him his father's estate in England, nor would deliver up his uncle's daughter, Arabella, to be married to the Duke of Lenox, at which time the queen used palustris asperas y de mucho desprecia contra el dicho Rey de Escocia; she used harsh words, expressing much contempt of the King Winwood's Mem. i. 4

* See a very curious letter, the CCXCIX of Cardinal Deossat, Vol. v. The catholic interest expected to facilitate the conquest of England by joining their armies with those of 'Arabelle,' and the commentator writes that this English lady had a party, consisting of all those English who had been the judges or the avowed enemies of Mary of Scotland, the mother of James the First.

† Winwood's Memorials, III, 281.

* Morant in the Biographia Britannica. This gross blunder has been detected by Mr. Lodge. The other I submit to the reader's judgment. A contemporary letter-writer, alluding to the flight of Arabella and Seymour, which alarmed the Scottish so much more than the English party, tells us, among other reasons of the little danger of the political influence of the parties themselves over the people, that not only their pretensions were far removed, but he adds, 'They were ungraceful both in their persons and their houses.' Morant takes the term ungraceful in its modern acceptation; but in the style of that day, I think, ungraceful is opposed to gracious in the eyes of the people, meaning that their persons and their houses were not considerable to the multitude. Would it not be absurd to apply ungraceful in its modern sense to a family or house? And had any political danger been expected, assuredly it would not have been diminished by the want of personal grace in these lovers. I do not recollect any authority for the sense of ungraceful in opposition to gracious, but a critical and literary antiquary has sanctioned my opinion.

† A circumstance which we discover by a Spanish memorial.

these silly conspirators having written to her requesting letters to be addressed to the King of Spain, she laughed at the letter she received, and sent it to the King. Thus for a second time was Arabella to have been Queen of England. This occurred in 1603, but was followed by no harsh measures from James the First.

In the following year, 1604, I have discovered that for the third time, the lady was offered a crown! 'A great ambassador is coming from the King of Poland, whose chief errand is to demand my Lady Arabella in marriage for his master. So may your princesses of the blood grow a great queen, and then we shall be safe from the danger of misappreciating letters.'⁴ This last passage seems to allude to something. What is meant of 'the danger of misappreciating letters'?

If this royal offer was ever made, it was certainly forbidden. Can we imagine the refusal to have come from the lady, who, we shall see, seven years afterwards, complained that the king had neglected her, in not providing her with a suitable match? It was this very time that one of those butterflies, who quiver on the fair flowers of a court, writes, that 'My Ladye Arabella spends her time in lecture, reading, &c., and she will not hear of marriage. Indirectly there were speeches used in the recommendation of Count Maurice, who pretendeth to be Duke of Gueldres. I dare not attempt her.'⁵ Here we find another princely match proposed. Thus far, to the Lady Arabella, crowns and husbands were like a fairy banquet seen at moonlight, opening on her sight, impalpable and vanishing at the moment of approach.

Arabella, from certain circumstances, was a dependant on the king's bounty, which flowed very unequally; often reduced to great personal distress, we find by her letters, that 'she prayed for present money, though it should not be annually.' I have discovered that James at length granted her a pension. The royal favours, however were probably limited to her good behaviour.⁶

From 1604 to 1606, is a period which forms a blank leaf in the story of Arabella. In this last year this unfortunate lady had again fallen out of favour, and, as usual, the cause was mysterious, and not known even to the writer. Chamberlain, in a letter to Sir Ralph Winwood, mentions 'the Lady Arabella's business, whatsoever it was, is ended, and the restored to her former place and graces. The king gave her a cupboard of plate, better than 200*l.* for a new year's gift, and 1000 marks to pay her debts, besides some yearly addition to her maintenance, want being thought the chiefest cause of her discontentment, though she be not altogether free from suspicion of being collapsed.'⁷ Another mysterious expression which would seem to allude either to politics or religion; but the fact appears by another writer to have been a discovery of a new project of marriage without the king's consent. This person of her choice is not named; and it was to divert her mind from the too constant object of her thoughts, that James, after a severe reprimand, had invited her to partake of the festivities of the court, in that season of revelry and reconciliation.

We now approach that event of the Lady Arabella's life, which reads like a romantic fiction: the catastrophe, so, is formed by the Aristotelian canon; for its misery, its pathos, and its terror, even romantic fiction has not exceeded!

It is probable that the king, from some political motive, had decided that the Lady Arabella should lead a single life; but such wise purposes frequently meet with cross bars; and it happened that no woman was ever more

⁴ This manuscript letter from William, Earl of Pembroke, to Gilbert, Earl of Shrewsbury, is dated from Hampton-Court, Oct. 2, 1603. Sloane's MSS. 4161.

⁵ Lodge's Illustrations of British History, iii, 286. It is curious to observe, that this letter by W. Fowler, is dated on the same day as the manuscript letter I have just quoted, and it is dated to the same Earl of Shrewsbury; so that the Earl has here received, in one day, accounts of two different projects of marriage for his niece! This shows how much Arabella engaged the designs of foreigners and natives. Will. Fowler was a rhyming and fantastical secretary to the queen James the First.

solicited to the conjugal state, or seems to have been as little averse to it. Every noble youth, who sighed for distinction, ambitioned the notice of the Lady Arabella; and she was so frequently contriving a marriage for herself, that a courtier of that day writing to another, observes, 'these affections of marriage in her, do give some advantage to the world of imparting the reputation of her constant and virtuous disposition.'⁸

The revels of Christmas had hardly closed, when the Lady Arabella forgot that she had been forgiven, and again relapsed into her old infirmity. She renewed a connexion, which had commenced in childhood, with Mr William Seymour, the second son of Lord Beauchamp, and grandson of the earl of Hertford. His character has been finely described by Clarendon: 'He loved his studies and his repose; but when the civil wars broke out, he closed his volumes and drew his sword, and was both an active and a skillful general. Charles I created him Marquis of Hertford, and governor of the prince; he lived to the Restoration, and Charles II restored him to the dukedom of Somerset.'

This treaty of marriage was detected in February 1609, and the parties summoned before the privy council. Seymour was particularly censured for daring to ally himself with the royal blood, although that blood was running in his own veins. In a manuscript letter which I have discovered, Seymour addressed the lords of the privy council. The style is humble; the plea to excuse his intended marriage is, that being but 'A young brother, and sensible of mine own good, unknown to the world, of mean estate, not born to challenge any thing by my birthright, and therefore my fortunes to be raised by my own endeavour, and she a lady of great honour and virtue, and, as I thought, of great means, I did plainly and honestly endeavour lawfully to gain her in marriage.' There is nothing romantic in this apology, in which Seymour describes himself as a fortune hunter! which, however, was probably done to cover his undoubted affection for Arabella, whom he had early known. He says, that 'he conceived that this noble lady might, without offence, make the choice of any subject within this kingdom; which conceit was begotten in me upon a general report, after her ladyship's last being called before your lordships, that it might be.' He tells the story of this ardent wooing—'I boldly intruded myself into her ladyship's chamber in the court on Candlemass day last, at what time I imparted my desire unto her, which was entertained, but with this caution on either part, that both of us resolved not to proceed to any final conclusion without his majesty's most gracious favour first obtained. And this was our first meeting! After that we had a second meeting at Brigg's house in Fleet-street, and then a third at Mr Baynton's; at both which we had the like conference and resolution as before.' He assures their lordships that both of them had never intended marriage without his majesty's approbation.⁹

But Love laughs at privy councils, and the grave promises made by two frightened lovers. The parties were secretly married, which was discovered about July in the following year. They were then separately confined, the lady at the house of Sir Thomas Parry at Lambeth, and Seymour in the Tower, for 'his contempt in marrying a lady of the royal family without the king's leave.'

This, their first confinement, was not rigorous; the lady walked in her garden, and the lover was a prisoner at large in the Tower. The writer in the Biographia Britannica, observes, that 'Some intercourse they had by letters, which, after a time, was discovered.' In this history of love these might be precious documents, and in the library at Long-leat these love-epistles, or perhaps this volume, may yet lie unread in a corner. Arabella's epistolary talent was not vulgar, Dr Montford, in a manuscript letter, describes one of those effusions which Arabella addressed to the king. 'This letter was penned by her in the best terms, as she can do right well. It was often read without offence, nay, it was even commended by his highness, with the applause of prince and council.' One of these amatory letters I have recovered. The circumstance is domestic, being nothing more at first than a very pretty letter on Mr Seymour having taken cold, but as every love-letter ought, it is not without a pathetic crescendo; the tearing away of hearts so firmly joined, while, in her solitary imprisonment, the secret thought that he lived and was her own, filled her spirit with that consciousness which triumphed even over that sickly frame so nearly subdued to death. The familiar style of James the First's age may bear comparison with our own. I shall give it entire.

⁸ Winwood's Memorials, Vol. iii, 118.

'Lady Arabella to Mr William Seymour.'

'Sir,

'I am exceeding sorry to hear that you have not been well. I pray you let me know truly how you do, and what was the cause of it. I am not satisfied with the reason Smith gives for it; but if it be a cold, I will impute it to some sympathy betwixt us, having myself gotten a swollen cheek at the same time with a cold. For God's sake, let not your grief of mind work upon your body. You may see by me what inconveniences it will bring one to; and no fortune, I assure you, daunts me so much as that weakness of body I find in myself; for si nous vivons l'age d'un soms, as Marot says, we may, by God's grace, be happier than we look for, in being suffered to enjoy ourself with his majesty's favour. But if we be not able to live to it, I, for my part, shall think myself a pattern of misfortune in enjoying so great a blessing as you, so little awhile. No separation but that deprives me of the comfort of you. For whosoever you be, or in what state so ever you are, it sufficeth me you are mine! Rachel wept and would not be comforted, because her children were no more. And that indeed, is the remediless sorrow, and none else! And therefore God bless us from that, and I will hope well of the rest, though I see no apparent hope. But I am sure God's book mentioneth many of his children in as great distress that have done well after, even in this world! I do assure you nothing the state can do with me can trouble me so much as this news of your being ill doth; and you see when I am troubled, I trouble you too with tedious kindness; for so I think you will account so long a letter, yourself not having written to me this good while so much as how you do. But, sweet sir, I speak not this to trouble you with writing but when you please. Be well, and I shall account myself happy in being

'Your faithfull loving wife,

*'Ann. S.

In examining the manuscripts of this lady, the defect of dates must be supplied by our sagacity. The following 'petition,' as she calls it, addressed to the king in defence of her secret marriage, must have been written at this time. She remonstrates with the king for what she calls his neglect of her; and while she fears to be violently separated from her husband, she asserts her cause with a firm and noble spirit, which was afterwards too severely tried!

'To the King.'

'May it please your most excellent Majesty.

'I do most heartily lament my hard fortune that I should offend your majesty the least especially in that whereby I have long desired to merit of your majesty, as appeared before your majesty was my sovereign. And though your majesty's neglect of me, my good liking of this gentleman that is my husband, and my fortune, drew me to a contract before I acquainted your majesty, I humbly beseech your majesty to consider how impossible it was for me to imagine it could be offensive to your majesty, having few days before given me your royal consent to bestow myself on any subject of your majesty's (which likewise your majesty had done long since.) Besides, never having been either prohibited any, or spoken to for any, in this land, by your majesty: these seven years that I have lived in your majesty's house, I could not conceive that your majesty regarded my marriage at all; whereas if your majesty had vouchsafed to tell me your mind, and accept the free-will offering of my obedience, I would not have offended your majesty, of whose gracious goodness I presume so much, that if it were now as convenient in a worldly respect as malice may make it seem to separate us, whom God hath joined, your majesty would not do evil that good might come thereof, nor make me, that have the honour to be so near your majesty in blood, the first precedent that ever was, though our princes may have left some as little imitable, for so good and gracious a king as your majesty, as David's dealing with Uriah. But I assure myself, if it please your majesty in your own wisdom to consider thoroughly of the cause, there will no solid reason appear to debar me justice and your princely favour, which I will endeavour deserve whilst I breathe.'

It is indorsed, 'A copy of my petition to the King's Majesty.' In another she imports that 'If the success of my state and fortune, together with my weakness, has caused me to do somewhat not pleasing to your majesty, let it all be covered with the shadow of your royal humanity.' Again, in another petition, she writes,

'Touching the offence for which I am now punished, most humbly beseech your majesty, in your most private wisdom and judgment, to consider in what a manner I had been, if I had taken any other course than I did; for my own conscience witnessing before God that I was then the wife of him that now I am, I could not have matched with any other man, but to have lived the days of my life as a harlot, which your majesty will have abhorred in any, especially in one who hath the honour (how otherwise unfortunate soever) to have any of your majesty's blood in them.'

I find a letter of Lady Jane Drummond, in reply to or another petition, which Lady Drummond had sent the queen to present to his majesty. It was to learn the cause of Arabella's confinement. The pithy expression of James the First is characteristic of the monarch; the solemn forebodings of Lady Drummond, who appears to have been a lady of excellent judgment, showed, by the fate of Arabella, how they were true!

'LADY JANE DRUMMOND TO LADY ARABELLA,

Answering her prayer to know the cause of her confinement

'This day her majesty hath seen your ladyship's letter. Her Majesty says, that when she gave your ladyship's petition to his majesty, he did take it well enough, but gave no other answer than that ye had eaten of the forbidden tree. This was all her majesty commanded me to say to your ladyship in this purpose; but whithal did I remember her kindly to your ladyship, and sent you this little token in witness of the continuance of her majesty's favour to your ladyship. Now, where your ladyship desires me to deal openly and freely with you, I protest I can say nothing on knowledge, for I never spoke to any of this purpose but to the queen; but the wisdom of this state will the example how some of your quality in the like case have been used, makes me fear that ye shall not find so easy end to your troubles as ye expect or wish.

In return, Lady Arabella expresses her grateful thanks—presents her majesty with 'this piece of my work, a accept in remembrance of the poor prisoner that wrought them, in hopes her royal hands will vouchsafe to wear them, which till I have the honour to kiss, I shall live in a great deal of sorrow. Her case,' she adds, 'could be compared to no other she ever heard of, resembling a other.' Arabella, like the queen of the Scots, began the hours of imprisonment by works of embroidery; and in sending a present of this kind to Sir Andrew Sinclair to be presented to the queen, she thanks him for 'vouchsafing to descend to these petty offices to take care even of these womanish toys, for her whose serious mind may invent some relaxation.'

The secret correspondence of Arabella and Seymour was discovered, and was followed by a sad scene. I must have been now that the king resolved to commit this unhappy lady to the stricter care of the Bishop of Durham. Lady Arabella was so subdued at this distant separation, that she gave way to all the wildness of despair; she fell suddenly ill, and could not travel but in litter, and with a physician. In her way to Durham, she was so greatly disquieted in the first few miles of her easy and troublesome journey, that they would proceed further than to Highgate. The physician returned to town to report her state, and declared that she was so weak, her pulse dull and melancholy, and very irregular; her countenance very heavy, pale, and was and though free from fever, he declared her in no case for travel. The king observed, 'It is enough to make a sound man sick to be carried in a bed in that manner; it is; much more for her whose impatient and impatient heart upon herself for greater indisposition of body than otherwise she would have.' His resolution, however, was that she should proceed to Durham, if he were king. 'We answered,' replied the doctor, 'that we made doubt of her obedience.' 'Obedience is that required,' replied the king, 'which being performed, I will do more for her than she expected.'*

The king, however, with his usual indulgence, appears to have consented that Lady Arabella should remain for a month at Highgate, in confinement, till she had sufficiently recovered to proceed to Durham, where the bishop posted, unaccompanied by his charge, to await her reception, and to the great relief of the friends of the lady, who hoped she was still within the reach of their cares or of the royal favour.

A second month's delay was granted, in consequence of that letter which we have before noticed as so impressive and so elegant, that it was commended by the king, and applauded by prince Henry and the council.

But the day of her departure hastened, and the Lady Arabella betrayed no symptom of her first despair. She openly declared her resignation to her fate, and showed her obedient willingness, by being even over-careful in little preparations to make easy so long a journey. Such tender grief had won over the heart of her keepers, who could not but sympathize with a princess, whose love, holy and wedded too, was crossed only by the tyranny of statesmen. But Arabella had not within that tranquillity with which she had lulled her keepers. She and Seymour had concerted a flight, as bold in its plot, and as beautifully wild, as any recorded in romantic story. The day preceding her departure, Arabella found it not difficult to persuade a female attendant to consent that she would suffer her to pay a last visit to her husband, and to wait for her return at an appointed hour. More solicitous for the happiness of lovers than for the repose of kings, this attendant, in utter simplicity, or with generous sympathy, assisted the Lady Arabella in dressing her in one of the most elaborate disguises. 'She drew a pair of large French-fashioned hose or trowsers over her petticoats; put on a man's doublet or coat; a peruke, such as men wore, whose long locks covered her own ringlets; a black hat, a black cloak, russet boots with red tops, and a rapier by her side.' Thus accoutred, the Lady Arabella stole out with a gentleman about three o'clock in the afternoon.—She had only proceeded a mile and a half, when they stopped at a poor inn, where one of her confederates was waiting with horses, yet she was so sick and faint, that the ostler, who held her stirrup, observed, that 'the gentleman could hardly hold out to London.' She recruited her spirits by riding; the blood mantled in her face, and at six o'clock our sick lover reached Blackwall, where a boat and servants were waiting. The watermen were at first ordered to Woolwich; there they were desired to push on to Gravesend, then to Tilbury, where, complaining of fatigue, they landed to refresh; but, tempted by their freight, they reached Lee. At the break of morn they discovered a French vessel riding there to receive the lady; but as Seymour had not yet arrived, Arabella was desirous to be at anchor for her lord, conscious that he would not fail to his appointment. If he indeed had been prevented in his escape, she herself cared not to preserve the freedom she now possessed; but her attendants, aware of the danger of being overtaken by a king's ship, overruled her wishes, and hoisted sail, which occasioned so fatal a termination to this romantic adventure. Seymour indeed had escaped from the Tower; he had left his servant watching at his door to warn all visitors not to disturb his master, who lay ill with a raging tooth ache, while Seymour in disguise stole away alone, following a cart which had brought wood to his apartment. He passed the warren; he reached the wharf, and found his confidential man waiting with a boat, and he arrived at Lee. The waves pressed the waves were rising; Arabella was not there; but in the distance he descried a vessel. Hiring a fisherman to take him on board, to his grief, on hailing him, he discovered that it was not the French vessel charged with his Arabella; in despair and confusion he found another ship from Newcastle, which for a good sum altered his course, and landed him in Flanders. In the mean time the escape of Arabella was first known to the government, and the hot alarm which spread may seem ludicrous to us. The political consequences attached to the news and the flight of these two doves from their coles, look with consternation the grey owls of the cabinet, and particularly the Scotch party, who, in their terror, paralleled it with the gunpowder treason, and some political danger must have impended, at least in their imagination, for Prince Henry partook of this cabinet panic.

Confusion and alarm prevailed at court; couriers were despatched swifter than the winds wafted the unhappy Arabella, and all was hurry in the sea ports. They sent to the Tower to warn the lieutenant to be doubly vigilant over Seymour, who, to his surprise, discovered that his prisoner had ceased to be so for several hours.—James at first was for issuing a proclamation in a style so angry and vindictive, that it required the moderation of Cecil to preserve the dignity while he concealed the terror of his majesty. By the admiral's detail of his impetuous movements, he seemed in pursuit of an enemy's fleet; for the courier is urged, and the post-masters are roused by a superscription, which warned them of the eventful despatch: 'Haste, haste, post haste! Haste for your life, your life!*' The family of the Seymours were in a state of distraction; and a letter from Mr Francis Seymour to his grandfather, the Earl of Hertford, residing then at his seat far remote from the capital, to acquaint him of the escape of his brother and the lady, still bears to posterity a remarkable evidence of the trepidations and consternation of the old earl; it arrived in the middle of the night, accompanied by a summons to attend the privy-council. In the perusal of a letter written in a small hand, and filling more than two folio pages, such was his agitation, that in holding the taper he must have burnt what he probably had not read; the letter is scorched, and the flame has perforated it in so critical a part, that the poor old earl journeyed to town in a state of uncertainty and confusion. Nor was his terror so unreasonable as it seems. Treason had been a political calamity with the Seymours. Their progenitor the Duke of Somerset the protector, had found that 'all his honours,' as Frankland strangely expresses it, 'had helped him too forwards to hop headless.' Henry, Elizabeth, and James, says the same writer, considered that it was needful, as indeed in all sovereignties, that those who were near the crown 'should be narrowly looked into for marriage.'

But we have left the lady Arabella alone and mournful on the seas, not praying for favourable gales to convey her away; but still imploring her attendants to linger for her Seymour; still straining her sight to the point of the horizon for some speck which might give a hope of the approach of the boat freighted with all her love. Alas! Never more was Arabella to cast a single look on her lover and her husband! She was overtaken by a pink in the king's service, in Calais roads; and now she declared that she cared not to be brought back again to her imprisonment should Seymour escape, whose safety was dearest to her!

The life of the unhappy, the melancholy, and the distracted Arabella Stuart is now to close in an imprisonment, which lasted only four years; for her constitutional delicacy, her rooted sorrows, and the violence of her feelings, sunk beneath the hopelessness of her situation, and a secret resolution in her mind to refuse the aid of her physicians, and to wear away the faster if she could, the feeble remains of life. But who shall paint the emotions of a mind which so much grief, and so much love, and distraction itself, equally possessed?

What passed in that dreadful imprisonment cannot perhaps be recovered for authentic history; but enough is known; that her mind grew impaired, that she finally lost her reason, and if the duration of her imprisonment was short, it was only terminated by her death. Some loose effusions, often begun and never ended, written and erased, incoherent and rational, yet remain in the fragments of her papers. In a letter she proposed addressing to Viscount Fenton, to implore for her his majesty's favour again, she says, 'Good, my lord, consider the fault cannot be uncommitted; neither can any more be required of any earthly creature but confession and most humble submission.' In a paragraph she had written, and crossed out,

* 'This emphatic injunction,' observes my friend Mr Hamper, 'would be effective when the messenger could read;' but in a letter written by the Earl of Essex about the year 1597, to the Lord High Admiral at Plymouth, I have seen added to the words 'Hast, hast, hast for life!' the expressive symbol of a gallows prepared with a halber, which could not be misinterpreted by the most illiterate of Mercuries, thus it seems that a present of her work had been refused by the king, and that she had no one about her whom she might trust.

'Help will come too late, and be assured that neither physician nor other, but whom I think good, shall come about me while I live, till I have his majesty's favour, without which I desire not to live. And if you remember of old, I dare die, so I be not guilty of my own death, and oppress others with my ruin too, if there be no other way, as God forbid, to whom I commit you; and rest as assuredly as heretofore, if you be the same to me,

'Your lordship's faithful friend,

'A. S.'

That she had frequently meditated on suicide appears by another letter—'I could not be so unchristian as to be the cause of my own death. Consider what the world would conceive if I should be violently enforced to do it.'

One fragment we may save as an evidence of her utter wretchedness.

'In all humility, the most wretched and unfortunate creature that ever lived, prostrates itself at the feet of the most merciful king that ever was, desiring nothing but mercy and favour, not being more afflicted for any thing than for the loss of that which hath binne this long time the only comfort it had in the world, and which, if it were to do again, I would not adventure the losse for any other worldly comfort; mercy it is I desire, and that for God's sake!'

Such is the history of the Lady Arabella, who from some circumstances not sufficiently opened to us, was an important personage, designed by others, at least, to play a high character in the political drama. Thrice selected as a queen; but the consciousness of royalty was only felt in her veins while she lived in the poverty of dependance. Many gallant spirits aspired after her hand, but when her heart secretly selected one beloved, it was for ever deprived of domestic happiness! She is said not to have been beautiful, and to have been beautiful; and her very portrait, ambiguous as her life, is neither the one nor the other. She is said to have been a poetess, and not a single verse substantiates her claim to the laurel. She is said not to have been remarkable for her intellectual accomplishments, yet I have found a Latin letter of her composition in her manuscripts. The materials of her life are so scanty that it cannot be written, and yet we have sufficient reason to believe that it would be as pathetic as it would be extraordinary, could we narrate its involved incidents, and paint forth her delicious feelings. Acquainted rather with her conduct than with her character, for us the Lady Arabella has no historical existence; and we perceive rather her shadow than herself! A writer of romance might render her one of those interesting personages whose griefs have been deepened by their royalty, and whose adventures, touched with the warm hues of love and distraction, closed at the bars of her prison-gate: a sad example of a female victim to the state!

'Through one dim lattice, fringed with ivy round,

Successive runs a languid radiance bright,

To paint how fierce her angry guardian frownd,

To mark how fast her wailing beauty flew!'

Seymour, who was afterwards permitted to return, distinguished himself by his loyalty through three successive reigns, and retained his romantic passion for the lady of his first affections; for he called the daughter he had by his second lady by the ever-beloved name of Arabella Stuart.

DOMESTIC HISTORY OF SIR EDWARD COKE.

Sir Edward Coke—or Cook, as now pronounced, and occasionally so written in his own times—that lord chief-justice whose name the laws of England will preserve—has shared the fate of his great rival the Lord Chancellor Bacon—for no hand worthy of their genius has pursued their story. Bacon, busied with nature, forgot himself; Coke, who was only the greatest of lawyers, reflected with more complacency on himself; for 'among those thirty books which he had written with his own hand, most pleasing to himself, was a manual which he called Vade Mecum, from whence, at one view, he took a prospect of his life past.' This manuscript, which Lloyd notices, was among the fifty which, on his death, were seized on by an order of council, but some years after were returned to his heir, and this precious memorial may still be disinterred.*

* This conjecture may not be vain; since this has been writ-

Coke was 'the oracle of law,' but, like too many great lawyers, he was so completely one, as to have been nothing else; armed with law, he committed acts of injustice, for in how many cases, passion mixing itself with law Summum Jus becomes Summa Injuria. Official violence brutalized, and political ambition extinguished, every spark of nature in this great lawyer, when he struck at his victims, public or domestic. His solitary knowledge, perhaps, had deadened his judgment in other studies; and yet his narrow spirit could shrink with jealousy at the celebrity obtained by more liberal pursuits than his own. The errors of the great are instructive as their virtues, and the secret history of the outrageous lawyer may have, at least, the merit of novelty, although not of paeany.

Coke, already enriched by his first marriage, combined power with added wealth, in his union with the relict of Sir William Hatton, the sister of Thomas, Lord Burleigh. Family alliance was the policy of that prudent age of political interests. Bacon and Cecil married two sisters; Walsingham and Midway two others; Knowles Essex, and Leicester, were linked by family alliances. Elizabeth, who never designed to marry herself, was anxious to intermarry her court dependants, and to dispose of them so as to secure their services by family interests.² Ambition and avarice, which had instigated Coke to form this alliance, punished their creature, by mating him with a spirit haughty and intractable as his own. It is a remarkable fact, connected with the character of Coke, that this great lawyer suffered his second marriage to take place in an illegal manner, and condescended to plead ignorance of the laws! He had been married in a private house, without banns or license, at a moment when the archbishop was vigorously prosecuting informal and irregular marriages. Coke, with his habitual pride, imagined that the rank of the parties concerned would have set him above such restrictions; the laws which he administered he appears to have considered had their indulgent exceptions for the great. But Whitgift was a primitive Christian; and the circumstance involved Coke, and the whole family, in a prosecution in the ecclesiastical court, and nearly in the severest of its penalties. The archbishop appears to have been fully sensible of the overbearing temper of this great lawyer; for when Coke became the attorney-general, we cannot but consider, as an ingenious reprimand, the archbishop's gift of a Greek Testament, with this message, that 'He had studied the common law long enough, and should henceforward study the law of God!'

The atmosphere of a court proved variable, with so stirring a genius; and as a constitutional lawyer, Coke, at times, was the stern assessor of the kingly power, or so intrepid impugner; but his personal dispositions led to predominance, and he too often usurped authority and power with the relish of one who loved them too keenly. 'You make the laws too much lean to your opinion, whereby you show yourself to be a legal tyrant,' said Lord Bacon, in his admonitory letter to Coke.

In 1616, Coke was out of favour for more causes than one, and his great rival Bacon was paramount at the council table.† Perhaps Coke felt more humiliated by appearing before his judges, who were every one inferior to him as lawyers, than by the weak triumph of his enemies, who received him with studied insult. The queen informed the king of the treatment the disgraced lord chief-justice had experienced, and, in an angry letter, James declared, that 'he prosecuted Coke ad correctionem, not destructionem,' and afterwards at the council, spoke of Coke 'with so many good words, as if he meant to hasten, and I have heard that the papers of Sir Edward Coke are all preserved at Holkham, the seat of Mr Coke; and I have also heard of others in the possession of a noble family. Mr Rous whose elegant genius it were desirable should be otherwise directed, is preparing a beautiful embellished catalogue of the Holkham library, in which the taste of the owner will rival his munificence.

A list of those manuscripts to which I allude, may be discovered in the Lambeth MSS, No 943, Art. 369, described in the catalogue as 'A note of such things as were found in a trunk of Sir Edward Coke's by the king's command, 1634,' but more particularly in Art. 371, 'A Catalogue of Sir Edward Coke's papers then seized and brought to Whitehall.'

† Lloyd's State Worthies, art. Sir Nicholas Bacon.
† Miss Alkin's Court of James the First appeared two years after this article was written; it has occasioned no alteration. I refer the reader to her clear narrative, vol. ii. p. 30, and p. 37, but secret history is rarely discovered in printed books.

with a silken halter,' even his rival Bacon made this moribund acknowledgment, in reminding the judges, 'such a man was not every day to be found, nor so made as married.' When his successor was chosen, Lord Chancellor Egerton, in administering the oath, asked Coke 'of many errors and vanities for his ambitious popularity.' Coke, however, lost no friends in this grace, nor relaxed his haughtiness; for when the new justice sent to purchase his Collar of S. S., Coke refused for answer, that 'he would not part with it, but use it to his posterity, that they might one day know they are a chief justice to their ancestor.'

In this temporary alienation of the royal smiles, Coke tempted their renewal by a project which involved a domestic sacrifice. When the king was in Scotland, and Lord Bacon, as lord-keeper, sat at the head of affairs, his ship was on ill terms with Secretary Winwood, whom he easily persuaded to resume a former proposal for marrying his only daughter to the favourite's eldest brother, Sir John Villiers. Coke had formally refused this match from the high demands of these persons. Coke, 'prosperity,' sticking at ten thousand a year, and resolving to give only ten thousand marks, dropped some idle words, that he would not buy the king's favour too dear; it now in his adversity, his ambition proved stronger than avarice, and by this stroke of deep policy, the wily lawyer was converting a mere domestic transaction into an affair of state, which it soon became. As such it was readily perceived by Bacon; he was alarmed at this rejected alliance, in which he foresaw that he should lose his hold of the favourite in the inevitable rise once more of rival Coke. Bacon, the illustrious philosopher, whose mind was only blest in observing nature, and whose mind was only great in recording his own meditations, now sat down to contrive the most subtle suggestions he could put together to prevent this match; but Lord Bacon not only failed in persuading the king to refuse what his majesty much wished, but finally produced the very mischief sought to avert—a rupture with Buckingham himself, and a copious scolding letter from the king, but a very admissible one; and where the lord keeper trembled to find himself called 'Mr Bacon.'

There were, however, other personages, than his majesty and his favourite, more deeply concerned in this business, and who had not hitherto been once consulted—the mother and the daughter! Coke, who, in every day concerns, moved his commands as he would his law-writs, and at times boldly asserted the rights of the subject, had no other personal notion of the duties of a wife and a child than their bedchamber!

Lady Hatton, haughty to insolence, had been often forbidden both the courts of their majesties, where Lady Kempton, the mother of Buckingham, was the object of her ladyship's persevering contempt. She retained her personal influence by the numerous estates which she enjoyed in right of her former husband. When Coke fell into disgrace, his lady abandoned him! and, to avoid her husband, frequently moved her residences in town and country. I trace her with malicious activity disfiguring his name in Holborn, and at Stoke, seizing on all the plate and moveables, and, in fact, leaving the fallen statesman and the late lord chief-justice, empty houses and no comfort! The wars between Lady Hatton and her husband were carried on before the council-board, where her ladyship appeared, accompanied by an imposing train of noble friends. With her accustomed haughty airs, and in an imperial style, Lady Hatton declaimed against her tyrannical husband, so that the letter-writer adds, 'divers said that Burbage could not have acted better.' Burbage's famous character was that of Richard the Third. It is extraordinary that Coke, able to defend any cause, bore himself so simply. It is supposed that he had laid his domestic concerns too open to animadversion in the neglect of his daughter; or that he was aware that he was standing before no friendly bar, at that moment being out of favour; whatever was the cause, our noble virago obtained a signal triumph, and 'the oracle of law,' with all his gravity stood before the council-table hen-pecked. In June, 1616, Sir Edward appears to have yielded at discretion to his lady, for in an unpublished letter I find, that 'his curst heart hath been forced to yield to more than he ever meant; but upon this agreement he flatters himself that also will prove a very good wife.'

In the following year, 1617, these domestic affairs totally changed. The political marriage of his daughter with Villiers being now resolved on, the business was to clip the wings of so fierce a bird as Coke had found in Lady Hatton, which led to an extraordinary contest. The mother and daughter hated the upstart Villiers, and Sir John, indeed, promised to be but a sickly bridegroom. They had contrived to make up a written contract of marriage with Lord Oxford, which they opposed against the proposal, or rather the order, of Coke.

The violence to which the towering spirits of the conflicting parties proceeded is a piece of secret history, of which accident has preserved an able memorial. Coke, armed with law, and, what was at least equally potent, with the king's favour, entered by force the barricaded houses of his lady, took possession of his daughter, on whom he appears never to have cast a thought till she became an instrument for his political purposes, confined her from her mother, and at length got the haughty mother herself imprisoned, and brought her to account for all her past misdoings. Quick was the change of scene, and the contrast was as wonderful. Coke, who, in the preceding year, to the world's surprise, proved so simple an advocate in his own cause in the presence of his wife, now, to employ his own words, 'got upon his wings again,' and went on as Lady Hatton, when safely lodged in prison, describes, with 'his high-handed tyrannical courses,' till the furious lawyer occasioned a fit of sickness to the proud crest-fallen lady. 'Law! Law! Law!' thundered from the lips of its 'oracle'; and Lord Bacon, in his apologetical letter to the king for having opposed his 'riot or violence,' says, 'I disliked it the more, because he justified it to be law, which was his old song.'

The memorial alluded to appears to have been confidentially composed by the legal friend of Lady Hatton, to furnish her ladyship with answers when brought before the council-table. It opens several domestic scenes in the house of that great lord chief-justice; but the forcible simplicity of the style in domestic details will show, what I have often observed, that our language has not advanced in expression since the age of James the First. I have transcribed it from the original, and its interest must plead for its length.

To Lady Hatton.

'MADAM,

10th July, 1617.

'Seeing these people speak no language but thunder and lightning, accounting this their cheapest and best way to work upon you, I would with patience prepare myself to their extremities, and study to defend the breaches by which to their advantage they suppose to come in upon me, and henceforth quit the ways of pacification and composition heretofore, and unseasonably endeavoured, which, in my opinion, lie most open to trouble, scandal and danger; wherefore I will briefly set down their objections, and such answers to them as I conceive proper.

'The first is, you conveyed away your daughter from her father. Answer, I had cause to provide for her quiet. Secretary Winwood threatening that she should be married from me in spite of my teeth, and Sir Edward Cook daily tormenting the girl with discourses tending to bestow her against her liking, which he said she was to submit to; besides, my daughter daily complained, and sought to me for help; whereupon, as heretofore I had accustomed, I bestowed her apart at my cousin-german's house for a few days, for her health and quiet, till my own business for my estate were ended. Sir Edward Coke never asking me where she was no more than at other times, when I my placing she had been a quarter of a year from him, as the year before with my sister Burley.

* These particulars I find in the manuscript letters of J. Chamberlain. Sloane MSS. 4173, (1616). In the quaint style of the times, the common speech run, that Lord Coke had been overthrown by four P's—Pride, Prohibitions, Perjury, and Prevarication. It is only with his moral quality, and not with his legal controversies that his personal character is here concerned.

† In the Lambeth manuscript, 936, is a letter of Lord Bacon to the king, to prevent the match between Sir John Villiers and Mrs. Coke. Art. 68. Another, Art. 69. The spirited and copious letter of James, 'to the Lord Keeper,' is printed in Letters, Speeches, Charges, &c., of Francis Bacon, by Dr Birch, p. 152.

‡ Stoke-Pogles, in Buckinghamshire; the delightful seat of J. Penn, Esq. It was the scene of 'Gray's Long Story,' and the chimneys of the ancient house still remain, to mark the locality; a column, on which is fixed a statue of Coke, erected by Mr Penn, consecrates the former abode of its illustrious inhabitant.

'Secondly. That you endeavoured to bestow her, and to bind her to my Lord of Oxford without her knowledge and consent.

'Upon this subject a lawyer, by way of invective, may open his mouth wide, and anticipate every hearer's judgment by the rights of a father; this, dangerous in the present to others; to which, nevertheless, this answer may be justly returned.

'Answer. My daughter, as aforesaid, terrified with her father's threats and hard usage, and pressing me to find some remedy from this violence intended, I did compassionate her condition, and bethought myself of this contract to my Lord of Oxford, if so she liked, and thereupon I gave it to her to peruse and consider by herself, which she did; she liked it, cheerfully writ it with her own hand, subscribed it, and returned it to me; wherein I did nothing of my own will, but followed her's, after I saw she was so adverse to Sir Thomas Villiers, that she voluntarily and deliberately protested that of all men living she would never have him, nor could ever fancy him for a husband.

'Secondly. By this I put her in no new way, nor into any other that her father had heretofore known and approved; for he saw such letters as my lady of Oxford had writ to me thereabouts; he never forbade it; he never disliked it; only he said they were then too young, and there was time enough for the treaty.

'Thirdly. He always left his daughter to my disposing and my bringing up; knowing that I purposed her my fortune and whole estate, and as upon these reasons he left her to my care, so he eased himself absolutely of her, never meddling with her, neglecting her, and caring nothing for her.

'The third. That you counterfeited a treaty from my Lord of Oxford's to yourself.

'Answer. I know it not counterfeit; but be it so, to whose injury? If to my Lord of Oxford's (for no man else is therein interested,) it must be either in honour or in freehold. Read the treaty; it proves neither! for it is only a complement: it is no engagement presently nor futurely; besides the law shows what forgery is; and to counterfeit a private man's hand, nay a magistrate's, makes not the fault but the cause, wherefore:

'Secondly, the ond justifies, at the least, excuses, the fact; for it was only to hold up my daughter's mind to her own choice and liking: for her eyes only, and for no other's, that she might see some retribution, and thereby with the more constancy endure her imprisonment, having this only antidote to resist the poison of that place, company, and conversation; myself and all her friends barred from her, and no person nor speech admitted to her ear, but such as spoke Sir Thomas Villier's language.

'The fourth. That you plotted to surprise your daughter to take her away by force, to the breach of the king's peace and particular commandment, and for that purpose had assembled a number of desperate fellows, whereof the consequence might have been dangerous; and the affront to the king was the greater that such a thing was offered, the king being forth of the kingdom, which, by example, might have drawn on other assemblies to more dangerous attempts. This field is large for a plentiful babbler.

'Answer. I know no such matter, neither in any place was there such assembly; true it is I spoke to Turner to provide me some tall fellows for the taking a possession for me, in Lincolnshire, of some lands Sir William Mason had lately dis-seized me; but be it they were assembled and convoked to such an end, what was done? was any such thing attempted? were they upon the place? kept they the heath or the highways by ambuscades? or was any place, any day, appointed for a rendezvous? No, no such matter, but something was intended; and I pray you what says the law of such a single intention, which is not within the view or notice of the law? Besides, who intended this—the mother? and wherefore? because she was unnaturally and barbarously secluded from her daughter, and her daughter forced against her will, contrary to her own choice and liking, to the will of him she disliked; nay, the laws of God, of nature, of man, speak for me, and cry out upon them. But they had a warrant from the king's order from the commissioners to keep my daughter in their custody; yet neither this warrant nor the commissioners' did prohibit the mother coming to her, but contrarily allowed her; then by the same authority might she get to her daughter, that Sir Edward Cook had used to keep her from her daughter; the husband having no power, warrant, or permission from God, the king, or the law, to sequester the mother from her own child, she only endeavouring the child's good, with the child's liking, and to keep her firm; and he, his private end against the child's liking, without care of her preferment; which differing respects, they justify the mother in all, so condemn they the father a transgressor of the rules of nature, and as a perverter of his rights, as a father and a husband, to the hurt both of child and wife.

'Lastly, if recrimination could lessen the fault, take this in the worst sense, and naked of all the considerable circumstances it hath, what is this, nay, what had the executing of this intention been comparatively with Sir Edward Cook's most notorious riot, committed at my Lord of Argyll's house, when without constable or warrant, accompanied with a dozen fellows well weaponed, without cause being beforehand offered, to have what he would, he took down the doors of the gate-house and of the house itself, and tore the daughter in that barbarous manner from the mother, and would not suffer the mother to come near her; and when I was before the lords of the council to answer this outrage, I justified it to make it good by law, and that he feared the fall of no greatness; a dangerous word for the encouragement of all notorious and rebellious malefactors; especially from him that had been the chief justice of the law, and of a people reputed the oracle of the law; and a most dangerous bravado cast in the teeth and face of the state in the king's absence; and therefore most considerable for the maintenance of authority and the quiet of the land; if it be lawful for him with a dozen to enter any man's house thus outrageously for any right to which he pretends, it is lawful for any man with one hundred, nay, with five hundred, and consequently with as many as he can draw together, to do the same, which may endanger the safety of the king's person, and the peace of the kingdom.

'The fifth, that you having certified the king you had received an engagement from my Lord of Oxford, and the king commanding you, upon your allegiance, to come and bring it to him, or to send it him; or not having it, to signify his name to who brought it, and where he was; you refused all, by which you doubled and trebled a high contempt to his majesty.

'Answer. I was so sick on the week before, for the most part I kept my bed, and even that instant I was so weak as I was not able to rise from it without help, nor to endure the air; which indisposition and weakness my physicians, Sir William Paddy and Dr Atkins, can assure true; which so being, I hope his majesty will graciously excuse the necessity, and not impose a fault, whereof I am not guilty; and for the sending it, I protest to God I had it not; and for telling the parties, and where he is, most humbly beseech his sacred majesty, in his great wisdom and honour, to consider how unworthy a part it were in me to bring any man into trouble, from which I am so far from redeeming him as I can no way relieve myself, and therefore humbly crave his majesty, in his private consideration of my distressed condition, to forgive me this reservedness, proceeding from that just sense, and rather, for that the law of the land in civil causes, as I am informed, no way tieth me thereunto.

Among other papers it appears that Coke accused the lady of having 'embellished all his gilt and silver plate and vessel, (he having little in any house of mine but that, by marriage with me brought him) and instead thereof furnished in alms of the same sorte, fashion, and use, with the illusion to have cheated him of the other.' Coke insists on the inventory by the schedule! Her ladyship says, 'I made such plate for matter and form for my own use at Purbeck, that serving well enough in the country; and I will loth to trust such a substance in a place so remote, and in the guard of few; but for the plate and vessel he saith in wanting, they are every once within one of my three houses.' She complains that Sir Edward Coke and his son Clement had threatened her servants so grievously, that the poor men run away to hide themselves from his fury, and dare not appear abroad. 'Sir Edward broke into Hutton House, seized upon my coach and coach horses, nay, my apparel, which he detains; thrust all my servants out of doors without wages; sent down his men to Corle to inventory, seize, ship, and carry away all the goods, which being refused him by the castle keeper, he threatened to bring your lordship's warrant for the performance thereof. But your lordship established that he should have the use only of the goods during his life, in such houses as the same appertained, without meaning, I hope, of depriving me of such use, being goods bought at my marriage, or with the money I spared from my allowances. Then, his high tyrannical courses; for I have suffered beyond the measure of any wife, mother, nay, of any fiery woman in this kingdom, without respect to my sex, my birth, my fortunes, with which I have so highly been blessed."

What availed the vexation of this sick, mortified, and sad woman, or the more tender feelings of the daughter, this forced marriage to satisfy the political ambition of a father? When Lord Bacon wrote to the king respecting the strange behaviour of Coke, the king vindicated it, for the purpose of obtaining his daughter, blaming Lord Bacon for some expressions he had used; and Bacon, in the servility of the courtier, when he found the wind in his teeth, tacked round, and promised Buckingham to remove the match he so much abhorred.* Villiers was married to the daughter of Coke at Hampton-Court, on Michaelmas Day, 1617—Coke was re-admitted to the council-table—Lady Hatton was reconciled to Lady Somerset and the queen, and gave a grand entertainment on the occasion, to which, however, 'the good man of the house was neither invited nor spoken of; he dined that day at the Temple; she is still bent to pull down her husband,' said my informant. The moral close remains to be told. Lady Villiers looked on her husband as the hateful object of a forced union, and nearly drove him mad; while she disgraced herself by such loose conduct as to be condemned to stand in a white sheet, and I believe at length obtained a divorce. Thus a marriage projected by ambition, and prosecuted by violent means, closed with that misery to the parties with which it had commenced; and for our present purpose has served to show, at when a lawyer, like Coke, holds his high handed tyrannical courses, the law of nature, as well as the law of which he is 'the oracle,' will be alike violated under his roof. Wife and daughter were plaintiffs or defendants on whom this lord chief-justice closed his ear: he had blocked up the avenues to his heart with 'Law! Law! Law!' 'old song!'

At his eightieth year, in the last parliament of Charles II, the extraordinary vigour of Coke's intellect shone clear under the snows of age. No reconciliation took place between the parties. On a strong report of his death, her ladyship accompanied by her brother Lord Wimbledon, posted down to Stoke-Poys to take possession of his mansion; but beyond Colebrook, they with one of his physicians coming from him with the dying intelligence of Sir Edward's amendment, on which they returned at their leisure. This happened in 1684, and on the following September the venerable was no more!

OF COKE'S STYLE, AND HIS CONDUCT.

This great lawyer perhaps set the example of that style railing and invective at our bar, which the egotism and insolence of some of our lawyers include in their tenure at the bar. It may be useful to bring to recollection Coke's vituperative style in the following dialogue, so painful in its contrast, with that of the great victim before him! The attorney-general had not sufficient evidence to bring the obscure conspiracy home to Rawleigh, with which, I believe, however, he had cautiously tampered. But Coke well knew that James the First had reason to dislike the hero of his age, who was early engaged against the Scottish interests, and betrayed by the ambidextrous policy of Cecil. Coke struck at Rawleigh as a sacrifice to his own political ambition, as we have seen he afterwards immolated his daughter; but his personal hatred was now sharpened by the fine genius and elegant literature of the man; faculties and acquisitions the lawyer so heartily contemned! Coke had observed, 'I know with whom I deal—for we have to deal to-day with a man of wit.'

Coke. Thou art the most vile and execrable traitor that ever lived.

Rawleigh. You speak indiscreetly, barbarously, and unbecomingly.

Coke. I want words sufficient to express thy viperous treason.

Rawleigh. I think you want words indeed, for you have spoken one thing half a dozen times.

Coke. Thou art an odious fellow; thy name is hateful to all the realm of England for thy pride.

Rawleigh. It will go near to prove a measuring cast between you and me, Mr Attorney.

Coke. Well, I will now make it appear to the world, that there never lived a viler viper upon the face of the earth than thou. Thou art a monster; thou hast an English face, but a Spanish heart. Thou viper! for I show thee, thou traitor! Have I angered you?

Rawleigh replied, what his dauntless conduct proved—'I am in no case to be angry.'

Coke had used the same style with the unhappy favourite of Elizabeth, the Earl of Essex. It was usual with him; the bitterness was in his own heart, as much as in his words; and Lord Bacon has left among his memorandums one entitled, 'Of the abuse I received of Mr Attorney-General publicly in the Exchequer.' A specimen will complete our model of his forensic oratory. Coke exclaimed, 'Mr Bacon, if you have any tooth against me, pluck it out; for it will do you more hurt than all the teeth in your head will do you good.' Bacon replied, 'The less you speak of your own greatness, the more I will think of it.' Coke replied, 'I think scorn to stand upon terms of greatness towards you, who are less than little, less than the least.' Coke was exhibited on the stage, for his ill usage of Rawleigh, as was suggested by Theobald in a note on Twelfth Night. This style of railing was long the privilege of the lawyers; it was revived by Judge Jeffreys; but the bench of judges in the reign of William and Anne taught a due respect even to criminals, who were not supposed to be guilty till they were convicted.

When Coke once was himself in disgrace, his high spirit sunk without a particle of magnanimity to dignify the fall; his big words, and his 'tyrannical courses,' when he could no longer exult that 'he was upon his wings again,' sunk with him as he presented himself on his knees to the council-table. Among other assumptions, he had styled himself 'Lord chief-justice of England,' when it was declared that this title was his own invention, since he was no more than of the King's Bench. His disgrace was a thunderbolt, which overthrew the haughty lawyer to the roots. When the supercandela was carried to him by Sir George Coppin, that gentleman was surprised on presenting it, to see that lofty 'spirit shrunk into a very narrow room, for Coke received it with dejection and tears.' The writer from whose letter I have copied these words adds, O tremor at suppiria non cadunt in fortem et constantem. The same writer encloses a punning distich: the name of our lord chief-justice was in his day very provocative of the pun both in Latin and English; Cicero indeed had pre-occupied the miserable trifle.

Non potuit; potuit condere jura Cocus.*

Six years afterwards Coke was sent to the Tower, and then they punned against him in English. An unpublished letter of the day has this curious anecdote: The room in which he was lodged in the Tower had formerly been a kitchen; on his entrance the lord chief-justice read upon the door, 'This room wants a Cook.' They twitched the lion in the toils which held him. Shenstone had some reason in thanking Heaven that his name was not susceptible of a pun. This time, however, Coke was 'on his wings'; for when Lord Arundel was sent by the king to the prisoner to inform him that he would be allowed 'Eight of the best learned in the law to advise him for his cause,' our great lawyer thanked the king, 'but he knew himself to be accounted to have as much skill in the law as any man in England, and therefore needed no such help, nor feared to be judged by the law.'

SECRET HISTORY OF AUTHORS WHO HAVE RUINED THEIR BOOKSELLERS.

Aulus Gellius desired to live no longer than he was able to exercise the faculty of writing; he might have decently added,—and find readers! This would be a fatal wish for that writer who should spread the infection of weariness, without himself partaking of the epidemic. The mere act and habit of writing, without probably even a remote view of publication, has produced an agreeable delirium; and perhaps some have escaped from a gentle confinement by having cautiously concealed those voluminous reveries which remained to startle their heirs; while others again have left a whole library of manuscripts, out of the mere ardour of transcription, collecting and copying with pecular rapture. I discovered that one of these inscribed this diction on his manuscript collection :

*Plura voluminibus jungenda volumina nostris,
Nec mihi scribendi terminus ullus erit :*

which, not to compose better verses than our original, may be translated,

More volumes, with our volumes still shall blend ;
And to our writing there shall be no end !

But even great authors have sometimes so much indulged in the seduction of the pen, that they appear to have found no substitute for the flow of their ink, and the delight of stamping blank paper with their hints, sketches, ideas, the shadows of their mind ! Petrarch exhibits no solitary instance of this passion of the pen. 'I read and I write night and day ; it is my only consolation. My eyes are heavy with watching, my hand is weary with writing. On the table where I dine, and by the side of my bed, I have all the materials for writing ; and when I awake in the dark, I write, although I am unable to read the next morning what I have written.' Petrarch was not always in his perfect senses.

The copiousness and the multiplicity of the writings of many authors, have shown that too many find a pleasure in the act of composition, which they do not communicate to others. Great erudition and every-day application is the calamity of that voluminous author, who, without good sense, and what is more rare, without that exquisite judgment which we call good taste, is always prepared to write on any subject, but at the same time on no one reasonably. We are astonished at the fertility and the size of our own writers of the seventeenth century, when the theological war of words raged, spoiling so many pages and brains. They produced folio after folio, like almanacks ; and Dr Owen and Baxter wrote more than sixty to seventy volumes, most of them of the most formidable size. The truth is, however, that it was then easier to write up to a folio, than in our days to write down to an octavo ; for correction, selection, and rejection, were arts as yet unpractised. They went on with their work, sharply or bluntly, like witless mowers, without stopping to whet their scythes. They were inspired by the scribbling demon of that Rabbini, who, in his oriental style and mania of volume, exclaimed, that were 'the heavens formed of paper, and were the trees of the earth pens, and if the entire sea run ink, these only could suffice' for the monstrous genius he was about to discharge on the world. The Spanish Tostatus wrote three times as many leaves as the number of days he had lived ; and of Lope de Vega it is said this calculation came rather short. We hear of another who was unhappy that his lady had produced twins, from the circumstance that hitherto he had contrived to pair his labours with her own, but that now he was a book behind-hand.

I fix on four celebrated Scribblers to give their secret history ; our Prynn, Gaspar Barthius, the Abbé de Marolles, and the Jesuit Theophilus Raynaud, who will all show that a book might be written on 'authors whose works have ruined their booksellers.'

Prynn seldom dined : every three or four hours he munched a manchet, and refreshed his exhausted spirits with ale brought to him by his servant ; and when 'he was put into this road of writing,' as crabbed Anthony telleth, he fixed on 'a long quilted cap, which came an inch over his eyes, serving as an umbrella to defend them from too much light ;' and then, hunger nor thirst did he experience, save that of his voluminous pages. Prynn 'as written a library, amounting, I think, to nearly two hundred books. Our unlucky author whose life was involved in authorship, and his happiness, no doubt, in the habitual exuberance of his pen, seems to have considered the being debarr'd from pen, ink, and books, during his imprisonment, as an act more barbarous than the loss of his ears. The extraordinary perseverance of Prynn in this fever of the pen appears in the following title of one of his extraordinary volumes. 'Comfortable Cordials against discomfortable Fears of Imprisonment ; containing some Latin Verses, Sentences, and Texts of Scripture, written by Mr Wm. Prynn on his Chamber Walls, in the Tower of London, during his imprisonment there ; translated by him into English Verse, 1641.' Prynn literally verified Pope's description :

'Is there, who, locked from ink and paper crawls
With desperate charcoal round his darkened walls.'

We have also a catalogue of printed books, written Wm. Prynn, Esq., of Lincoln's Inn, in these classes, with this motto 'Jucundi acti labores,' 1643. The sad history of this voluminous author concludes with a characteristic event : a contemporary who saw Prynn in a pillory at Chesapeake, informs us that while he stood there they 'burnt his huge volumes under his nose, which almost suffocated him.' Yet such was the spirit of pen that a puritanic sister bequeathed a legacy to purchase the works of Prynn for Sion College, where many a repose ; for by an odd fatality, in the fire which burnt the library these volumes were saved, from the idea that they were the most valuable !

The pleasure which authors of this stamp experience of a nature which, whenever certain unlucky circumstances combine, positively debarring them from publication, will not abate their ardour one jot ; and their pen still luxuriates in the forbidden page which even bookellers refuse to publish. Many instances might be recorded, but a very striking one is the case of Gaspar Barthius whose 'Adversaria,' in two volumes folio, are in the collections of the curious.

Barthius was born to literature, for Baillet has placed him among his 'Enfance celebre.' At nine years of age he recited by heart all the comedies of Terence, without missing a line. The learned admired the puerile prodigy while the prodigy was writing books before he had a boy. He became, unquestionably, a student of very extensive literature, modern as well as ancient. Such was his devotion to a literary life, that he retreated from the busy world. It appears that his early productions were composed more carefully and judiciously than his later ones when the passion for voluminous writing broke out, which showed itself by the usual prognostic of this dangerous disease—extreme facility of composition, and a pride of exultation in this unhappy faculty. He studied with using collections or references, trusting to his memory which was probably an extraordinary one, though it necessarily led him into many errors in that delicate task of maverdving on other authors. Writing a very neat hand, his first copy required no transcript ; and he boasts that he rarely made a correction : every thing was sent to the press in its first state. He laughed at Statius, who congratulated himself that he employed only two days in composing the epithalamium upon Stella, containing two hundred and seventy-eight hexameters. 'This,' says Barthius 'did not quite lay him open to Horace's censure of a man who made two hundred verses in an hour, "Stipede in uno." 'Not,' adds Barthius, 'but that I do not censure of Horace too hyperbolic, for I am not ignorant what it is to make a great number of verses in a short time, and in three days I translated into Latin the first books of the Iliad, which amount to above two thousand verses.' Thus rapidity and volume were the great enjoyments of this learned man's pen, and now we look to the fruits.

Barthius, on the system he had adopted, seems to have written a whole library ; a circumstance which we discover by the continual references he makes in his printed works to his manuscript productions. In the Index authorum to his Statius, he inserts his own name, to which is appended a long list of unprinted works, which Bayle thinks by their titles and extracts, conveys a very advantageous notion of them. All these, and many such as these, he generously offered the world, would any bookseller be so trepid or courteous enough to usher them from his press ; but their cowardice or incivility were intractable. The truth is now to be revealed, and seems not to have been known to Bayle : the booksellers had been formerly so enticed and complimented by our learned author, and had heard so much of the celebrated Barthius, that they had caught at the bait, and the two folio volumes of the much-referred-to 'Adversaria' of Barthius had thus been published—but from that day no bookseller ever offered himself to publish again !

The 'Adversaria' is a collection of critical notes and quotations from ancient authors, with illustrations of their manners, customs, laws, and ceremonies ; all these were to be classed into one hundred and eighty books ; sixty of which we possess in two volumes folio, with eleven inness. The plan is vast, as the rapidity with which it is pursued: Bayle finely characterizes it by a single stroke—'Its immensity tires even the imagination.' But the truth is, this mighty labour turned out to be a complete failure: there was neither order nor judgment in these masses of learning; crude, obscure, and contradictory; such as we might expect from a man who trusted to his memory, and would not throw away his time on any correction. His contradictions are flagrant; but one of his modes would apologize for these by telling us that 'He wrote every thing which offered itself to his imagination; day one thing, to-morrow another, in order that when he should revise it again, this contrariety of opinion might force him to examine the subject more accurately.' The names of the friends of authors are as extravagant as those of their enemies. Barthius evidently wrote so much, that often he forgot what he had written, as happened to another great book-man, one Didymus, of whom Quintilian records, that on hearing a certain history, he treated as utterly unworthy of credit: on which the teller called it one of Didymus's own books, and showed where he might read it at full length! That the work failed, we see the evidence of Clement in his 'Bibliothèque curieuse et Livres difficiles à trouver,' under the article Barthius, where we discover the winding up of the history of this work. Clement mentions more than one edition of the dyersaria; but on a more careful inspection he detected at the old title pages had been removed for others of a later date; the booksellers not being able to sell the book without this deception. It availed little; they remained in their unsold edition of the two first volumes of the Adversaria, and the author with three thousand folio sheets in manuscript—while both parties complained together, and each party could acquire nothing from the works of an author of whom Bayle says that 'his writings rise to such a odious bulk, that one can scarce conceive a single man could be capable of executing so great a variety; perhaps an copying clerk, who lived to grow old amidst the dust of an office, ever transcribed as much as this author has written.' This was the memorable fate of one of that race of writers who imagine that their capacity extends with their fame. Their land seems covered fertility, but in shaking their wheat no ears fall.

Another memorable brother of this family of the Scribblers is the Abbé De Marolles, who with great ardour as a man of letters, and in the enjoyment of the leisure and opulence so necessary to carry on his pursuits, from an entire absence of judgment, closed his life with the bitter regrets of a voluminous author; and yet it cannot be denied that he has contributed one precious volume to the public stock of literature; a compliment which cannot be paid to some who have enjoyed a higher reputation than our author. He has left us his very curious 'Memoirs.' A poor writer indeed, but the frankness and intrepidity of his character abate him, while he is painting himself, to paint man. He was struck by the honesty of his pen, for he says his life, 'The dulness of Michael de Marolles and Anthony Wood* acquire some value from the faithful representation of men and manners.'

I have elsewhere shortly noticed the Abbé De Marolles in the character of a 'literary sinner'; but the extent his sins never struck me so forcibly as when I observed his delinquencies counted up in chronological order in l'abbé's 'Hommes illustres.' It is extremely amusing to detect the swarming fecundity of his pen; from year to year, with author after author, was this translator wearying others, but remained himself unwearied. Sometimes one or three classical victims in a season were dragged to his slaughter-house. Of about seventy works, fifty are versions of the classical writers of antiquity, accompanied with notes. But some odd circumstances happened to our extraordinary translator in the course of his life. L'Étange, a critic of that day, in his 'Règles de bien dire,' drew all his examples of bad translation from our book, who was more angry than usual, and among his criticisms the cries of our Marolles resounded. De L'Étange, who does this not out of malice, but from urgent necessity illustrate his principles, seemed very sorry, and was

I cannot subscribe to the opinion that Anthony Wood was all man, although he had no particular liking for works of classical; and need ordinary poets scurvy! An author's great character is often confounded with the nature of his life. Anthony has sallies at times to which a dull man could not be subject; without the ardour of this hermit of literature, we would be our literary history?

desirous of appeasing the angered translator. One day in Easter, finding the abbé in church at prayers, the critic fell on his knees by the side of the translator: it was an extraordinary moment, and a singular situation to terminate a literary quarrel. 'You are angry with me,' said L'Étange, 'and I think you have reason; but this is a season of mercy, and I now ask your pardon.'—'In the manner,' replied the abbé, 'which you have chosen, I can no longer defend myself. Go, sir! I pardon you.' Some days after the abbé again meeting L'Étange, reproached him with duping him out of a pardon which he had no desire to have bestowed on him. The last reply of the critic was caustic: 'Do not be so difficult; when one stands in need of a general pardon, one ought surely to grant a particular one.' De Marolles was subject to encounter critics who were never so kind as to kneel by him on Easter Sunday. Besides these fifty translations, of which the notes are often curious, and even the sense may be useful to consult, his love of writing produced many odd works. His volumes were richly bound, and freely distributed, for they found no readers! In a 'Discours pour servir de Préface sur les Poëtes traduits par Michel de Marolles,' he has given an imposing list of illustrious persons and contemporary authors who were his friends, and has preserved many singular facts concerning them. He was, indeed, for so long a time convinced that he had struck off the true spirit of his fine originals, that I find he at several times printed some critical treatise to back his last, or usher in his new version; giving the world reasons why the versions which had been given of that particular author, 'Soit en prose, soit en vers ont été si peu approuvées jusqu'ici.' Among these numerous translations he was the first who ventured on the Deiponosophists of Athenæus, which still bears an excessive price. He entitles his work, 'Les quinze Livres de Deiponosophistes d'Athènes, Ouvrage délicieux, agreablement diversifié et rempli de Narrations egayantes sur toutes Sortes de Matières et de Sujets.' He has prefixed various preliminary dissertations: yet not satisfied with having performed this great labour, it was followed by a small quarto of forty pages, which might now be considered curious; 'Analyse, en Description succincte des Choses contenues dans les quinze Livres de Deiponosophistes.' He wrote, 'Quatrains sur les Personnes de la Cour et les Gens de Lettres,' which the curious would now be glad to find. After having plundered the classical geniuses of antiquity by his barbarous style, when he had nothing more left to do, he committed sacrilege in translating the Bible; but, in the midst of printing, he was suddenly stopped by authority, for having inserted in his notes the reverses of the Pre-Adamite Isaac Peyrere. He had already revelled on the New Testament, to his version of which he had prefixed so sensible an introduction, that it was afterwards translated into Latin. Translation was the mania of the Abbé de Marolles. I doubt whether he ever fairly awoke out of the heavy dream of the felicity of his translations; for late in life I find him observing, 'I have employed much time in study, and I have translated many books; considering this rather as an innocent amusement which I have chosen for my private life, than as things very necessary, although they are not entirely useless. Some have valued them, and others have cared little about them; but however it may be, I see nothing which obliges me to believe that they contain not at least as much good as bad, both for their own matter and the form which I have given to them.' The notion he entertained of his translations was their closeness; he was not aware of his own spiritless style; and he imagined that poetry only consisted in the thoughts, not in the grace and harmony of verse. He insisted that by giving the public his numerous translations, he was not vainly multiplying books, because he neither diminished nor increased their ideas in his faithful versions. He had a curious notion that some were more scrupulous than they ought to be respecting translations of authors who, living so many ages past, are rarely read from the difficulty of understanding them; and why should they imagine that a translation is injurious to them, or would occasion the utter neglect of the originals? 'We do not think so highly of our own works,' says the indefatigable and modest Abbé; 'but neither do I despair that they may be useful even to these scrupulous persons. I will not suppress the truth, while I am noticing these ungrateful labours; if they have given me much pain by my assiduity, they have repaid me by the fine things they have taught me, and by the opinion which I have conceived that posterity, more just than the present times, will award a more favourable judgment.' Thus a miserable translator terminates his long labours, by drawing his bill of fame on posterity which his contemporaries will not pay; but a these cases, as the bill is certainly lost before it reaches acceptance, why should we deprive the drawers of pleasing themselves with the ideal capital?

Let us not, however, imagine, that the Abbé De Morales was nothing but the man he appears in the character of a voluminous translator; though occupied all his life on these miserable labours, he was evidently an ingenious and nobly-minded man, whose days were consecrated to literary pursuits, and who was among the primitive collectors in Europe of fine and curious prints. One of his works is a 'Catalogue des Livres d'Estampes et de Figures en Taille-douce.' Paris, 1686, in 8vo. In the preface our author declares, that he had collected one hundred and twenty-three thousand four hundred prints of six thousand masters, in four hundred large volumes, and one hundred and twenty small ones. This magnificent collection, formed by so much care and skill, he presented to the king; whether gratuitously given, or otherwise, it was an acquisition which a monarch might have thankfully accepted. Such was the habitual ardour of our author, that afterwards he set about forming another collection, of which he has also given a catalogue, in 1672, in 12mo. Both these catalogues of prints are of extreme rarity, and are yet so highly valued by the connoisseurs, that when in France I could never obtain a copy. A long life may be passed without a even sight of the 'Catalogue des Livres d'Estampes de l'Abbé de Morales.'

Such are the lessons drawn from this secret history of voluminous writers. We see one venting his mania in scrawling on his prison-walls; another persisting in writing folios, while the booksellers, who were once caught like Reynard who had lost his tail, and whom no arts could any longer practise on, turn away from the new trap; and a third, who can acquire no readers but by giving his books away, growing gray in scourging the sacred genius of antiquity by his meagre versions, and dying without having made up his mind, whether he were as woful a translator as some of his contemporaries had assured him.

Among these worthies of the Scribleri we may rank the Jesuit Theophilus Raynaud, once a celebrated name, eulogised by Bayle and Patin. His collected works fill twenty folios; an edition, indeed, which finally sent the bookseller to the poor-house. This enterprising bibliopoli-ist had heard much of the prodigious erudition of the writer; but he had not the sagacity to discover that other literary qualities were also required to make twenty folios at all saleable. Of these 'Opera omnia' perhaps not a single copy can be found in England; but they may be a pennyworth on the continent. Raynaud's works are theological; but a system of grace maintained by one work, and pulled down by another, has ceased to interest mankind: the literature of the divine is of a less perishable nature. Reading and writing through a life of eighty years, and giving only a quarter of an hour to his dinner, with a vigorous memory, and a whimsical taste for some singular subjects, he could not fail to accumulate a mass of knowledge which may still be useful for the curious; and, besides, Raynaud had the Ritschian characteristic. He was one of those who, exemplary in their own conduct, with a bitter zeal condemn whatever does not agree with their notions; and however gentle in their nature, yet will set no limits to the ferocity of their pen. Raynaud was often in trouble with the censors of his books, and much more with his adversaries; so that he frequently had recourse to publishing under a fictitious name. A remarkable evidence of this is the entire twentieth volume of his works. It consists of the numerous writings published anonymously, or to which were prefixed noms de guerre. This volume is described by the whimsical title of Apopompeus; explained to us as the name given by the Jews to the scape-goat, which, when loaded with all their maledictions on its head, was driven away into the desert. These contain all Raynaud's numerous diatribes; for

* These two catalogues have always been of extreme rarity and price. Dr. Lister, when at Paris, 1686, notices this circumstance. I have since met with them in the very curious collections of my friend Mr. Douce, who has unlikes, as well as rarities. The monographs of our old masters in one of these catalogues are more correct than in some latter publications: and the whole plan and arrangement of these catalogues of prints are peculiar and interesting.

whenever he was refuted, he was always refuting; he did not spare his best friends. The title of a work against Arnould will show how he treated his adversaries. 'Arnouldus redivivus natus Brixie seculo xii. renatus in Galia nostra.' He dexterously applies the name of Arnould, by comparing him with one of the same name, the twelfth century, a scholar of Abelard's and a turbid enthusiast, say the Romish writers, who was burnt alive for having written against the luxury and the power of priesthood, and for having raised a rebellion against the pope. When the learned De Launoi had successfully attacked the legends of saints, and was called Dénicheur de Saints,—the 'Unicher of Saints,' every parish priest trembled for his favourite. Raynaud exacted a libel on this new Iconoclast, 'Hercules Commodus Joannes Launois repulsus,' &c: he compares Launois the Emperor Commodus, who, though the most coward of men, conceived himself formidable when he dressed himself as Hercules. Another of these maledictions is tract against Calvinism, described as 'Religio bestiarum a religio de bestia, because the Calvinists deny freedom but as he always fired with a double-barrelled gun, and the cloak of attacking Calvinism, he aimed a deadly blow at the Thomists, and particularly at a Dominican friar whom he considered as bad as Calvin. Raynaud exults he had driven one of his adversaries to take flight to Scotland, ad pulvis Scotias transgressus; to a Scotch stage; an expression which Saint Jerome used in spirit of Pelagius. He always rendered an adversary odious, coupling him with some odious name. On one of the controversial books where Casalas refuted Raynaud Monnoye wrote, 'Raynaudus et Casalas inepti; Raynaud tamen Casalas ineptior.' The usual termination, what then passed for sense, and now is the reverse!

I will not quit Raynaud without pointing out some of his more remarkable treatises, as so many curiosities in literature.

In a treatise on the attributes of Christ, he entitles chapter, Christus bonus, bona, bonum: in another on the seven-branched candlestick in the Jewish temple, by allegorical interpretation, he explains the eucharist; he adds an alphabetical list of names and epithets which have been given to this mystery.

The seventh volume bears the general title of Mariologia; all the treatises have for their theme the perfections of the worship of the Virgin. Many extraordinary things are here. One is a dictionary of names given to the Virgin with observations on these names. Another on the devotion of the ascapulary, and its wonderful effects, written against De Launoi, and for which the order of the Carmel when he died bestowed a solemn service and obsequy on him. Another of these 'Mariologia' is mentioned in Gallois in the Journal des Savans, 1667, as a proof of fertility: having to preach on the seven solemn feasts which the church sings before Christmas, and which begun by an O! he made this letter only the subject of 17 sermons, and barren as the letter appears, he has strewn out 'a multitude of beautiful particulars.' This treatise folly invites our curiosity.

In the eighth volume is a table of saints, classed by station, condition, employment, and trades; a list of titles and prerogatives, which the councils and the fathers have attributed to the sovereign pontiff.

The thirteenth volume has a subject which seems new in the taste of the sermons on the letter O! it is entitled Laus Brevitatis! in praise of brevity. The maxim is brief, but the commentary long. One of the natural subjects treated on is that of Noses: he reviews a great number of noses, and, as usual, does not forget the Virgin's. According to Raynaud, the nose of the Virgin Mary was long and aquiline, the mark of goodness and dignity; and as Jesus perfectly resembled his mother, he infers that he must have had such a nose.

A treatise entitled Heteroclitia spiritualia et omnia Pietatis Celestium, Terrestrium, et Infernorum, contains many singular practices introduced into devotion, with superstition, ignorance, and remissness have made a part of religion.

A treatise directed against the new custom of sitting chairs in churches, and being seated during the sacrifice of the mass. Another on the Cæsarean operation, which he stigmatises as an act against nature. Another on eunuchs. Another entitled Hipparchus de Religione Agotatore, is an attack on those of his own company: it turned merchant; the jesuits were then accused of commercial traffic with the revenues of their establishment. The rector of a college at Avignon, who thought was portrayed in this honest work, confined Raynaud prison for five months.

The most curious work of Raynaud, connected with nature, I possess; it is entitled Erotemata de Malis ac Libris. deus justa aut injusta eorumdem confessione. Lyons, 1653, 4to, with necessary indexes. One of his works having been condemned at Rome, he drew up these queries concerning good and bad books, addressed to the bad inquisitor. He divides his treatise into 'bad and good books; bad books, but not nocent; books not bad, but nocent; books neither bad nor nocent.' His immense learning appears here to advantage, and his Ritschianian literature is prominent; for he asserts, that when writing pious heretics, all mordacity is innoxious; and an alphabetical list of abusive names, which the fathers have given the heterodox, is entitled Alphabetum bestialitatis hereticæ, et potius symbolis.

After all, Raynaud was a man of vast acquirement, with a great flow of ideas, but tasteless, and void of all judgment. An anecdote may be recorded of him, which throws in a clear light the state of these literary men. Raynaud was one day pressing hard a reluctant bookseller to publish one of his works, who replied, 'Write a book like le baron Barri's, and I shall be glad to print it.' It happened that the work of Barri was pillaged from Raynaud, and was much liked, while the original lay on the shelf. However, this only served to provoke a fresh attack from a redoubtable hero, who vindicated his rights, and emptied his quiver on him who had been ploughing with his life.

Such are the writers who, enjoying all the pleasures about the pains of composition, have often apologized for their repeated productions, by declaring that they write only for their own amusement; but such private excuses should not be brought on the public stage. M. Catherinet, all his life was printing a countless number of feuilles volantes in history and on antiquities; each consisting of about three or four leaves in quarto: Lenglet Freyssi calls him 'Grand auteur des petits livres.' His gentleman liked to live among antiquaries and historians; but with a crooked head-piece, stuck with whims, and hard with knotty combinations, all overloaded with pedantic erudition, he could not ease it at a less rate than by an occasional dissertation of three or four quarto leaves. He appears to have published about two hundred pieces of this sort, much sought after by the curious for their rarity: Brunet complains he could never discover a complete collection. But Catherinet may escape 'the pains and penalties' of our voluminous writers, for De la Harpe thinks he generously printed them to distribute among his friends. Such endless writers, provided they do not print themselves into an almshouse, may be allowed to print themselves out; and we would accept the apology which Monsieur Catherinet has framed for himself, which I find preserved in Beyeri Memoria Librorum. 'I must be allowed my freedom in my studies, for I substitute my writings for a game at the tennis-table, or a club at the tavern; I never counted among my honours these opuscula of mine, but merely as harmless amusements. It is my partridge, as with St John a Evangelist; my cat, as with Pope St Gregory; my dog, as with St Dominick; my lamb, as with St Isidore; my great black mastiff, as with Cornelius Agrippa; and my tame hare, as with Justus Lipsius.' I have discovered in Nicéron that this Catherinet could not get a printer, and was rather compelled to study money in his two hundred quartos of four or eight pages; paper was of inferior quality; and when he could not fit his dissertations into his proscribed number of pages, he used to promise the end at another time, which did not always happen. But his greatest anxiety was to publish his works; in despair he adopted an odd expedient. Whenever Monsieur Catherinet came to Paris, he used to hunt the quacks whose books are sold, and while appeared to be looking over them, he adroitly slipped out of his own dissertations among these old books. He pursued this mode of publication early, and continued it to the last day. He died with a perfect conviction that he secured his immortality; and in this manner has died of more than one edition of his unsaleable works.

Nicéron has given the titles of 118 of his things, which he had looked over.

LOCAL DESCRIPTIONS.

Nothing is more idle, and what is less to be forgiven in a writer, more tedious, than minute and lengthened descriptions of localities; where it is very doubtful whether the writers themselves had formed any tolerable notion of the place they describe,—it is certain their readers never can! These descriptive passages, in which writers of imagination so frequently indulge, are usually a glittering confusion of unconnected things; circumstances recollected from others, or observed by themselves at different times; the finest are thrust in together. If a scene from nature, it is possible that all the seasons of the year may be jumbled together; or if a castle or an apartment, its magnitude or its minuteness may equally bewilder. Yet we find, even in works of celebrity, whole pages of these general or these particular descriptive sketches, which leave nothing behind, but noun substantives propped up by random epithets. The old writers were quite delighted to fill up their voluminous pages with what was a great saving of sense and thinking. In the Alaric of Scudery sixteen pages, containing nearly five hundred verses, describe a palace, commencing at the facade, and at length finishing with the garden; but his description, we may say, was much better described by Boileau, whose good taste felt the absurdity of this 'abundance sterile,' in overloading a work with useless details,

Un Auteur quelquefois trop plein de son objet
Jamais sans l'épuiser n'abandonne un sujet.
S'il reconte un palais il m'en peint la face
Il me promène après de terrasses en terrasses.
Ici s'offre un perron, là règne un corridor;
Là ce balcon s'enferme en un balustrade d'or;
Il compte les plafonds, les ronds, et les ovales—
Je saute vingt feuillets pour en trouver la fin;
Et je me salue à peine au travers du jardin!

And then he adds so excellent a canon of criticism, that we must not neglect it:

Tout ce qu'on dit de trop est fade et rebutant;
L'Esprit rassemblé le rejette à l'instant,
Qui ne sait se borner, ne sut jamais écrire.

We have a memorable instance of the inefficiency of local descriptions, in a very remarkable one by a writer of fine genius, composing with an extreme fondness of his subject, and curiously anxious to send down to posterity the most elaborate display of his own villa—this was the Laurentinum of PLINY. We cannot read his letter to Gallus, which the English reader may in Melmoth's elegant version,* without participating somewhat in the delight of the writer in many of its details; but we cannot with the writer form the slightest conception of his villa, while he is leading us over from apartment to apartment, and pointing to us the opposite view, with a 'beyond this,' and a 'not far from thence,' and 'to this apartment another of the same sort,' &c. Yet, still, as we were in great want of a correct knowledge of a Roman villa, and as this must be the most so possible, architects have frequently studied, and the learned translated with extraordinary care, PLINY's description of his Laurentinum. It became so favourite an object, that eminent architects have attempted to raise up this edifice once more, by giving its plan and elevation; and this extraordinary fact is the result—that not one of them but has given a representation different from the other! Montfaucon, a more faithful antiquary, in his close translation of the description of this villa, in comparing it with Felibien's plan of the villa itself, observes, 'that the architect accommodated his edifice to his translation, but that their notions are not the same; unquestionably,' he adds, 'if ten skillful translators were to perform their task separately, there would not be one who agreed with another!'

If, then, on this subject of local descriptions, we find that it is impossible to convey exact notions of a real existing scene, what must we think of those which, in truth, describe scenes which have no other existence than the confused makings-up of an author's invention; where the more he details the more he confuses; and where the more particular he wishes to be, the more indistinct the whole appears?

Local descriptions, after a few striking circumstances have been selected, admit of no further detail. It is not their length, but their happiness, which enter into our comprehension : the imagination can only take in and keep together a very few parts of a picture. The pen must not intrude on the province of the pencil, any more than the pencil must attempt to perform what cannot in any shape be submitted to the eye, though fully to the mind.

The great art, perhaps, of local description, is rather a general than a particular view ; the details must be left to the imagination ; it is suggestion rather than description. There is an old Italian sonnet of this kind which I have often read with delight ; and though I may not communicate the same pleasure to the reader, yet the story of the writer is most interesting, and the lady (for such she was) has the highest claim to be ranked, like the lady of Evelyn, among literary wives.

Francesca Turina Bufalini di Città di Castello, of noble extraction, and devoted to literature, had a collection of her poems published in 1628 : she frequently interspersed little domestic incidents of her female friend—her husband—her son—her grand-children ; and in one of these sonnets she has delineated her palace of San Guistino, whose localities she appears to have enjoyed with intense delight in the company of 'her lord,' whom she tenderly associates with the scene. There is a freshness and simplicity in the description, which will perhaps convey a clearer notion of the spot than ever Pliny could do in the voluminous description of his villa. She tells us what she found when brought to the house of her husband.

Di Marmo fatte, dà scalpel non vile.
Nobil giardin con un perpetuo Aprile
Di varij fior, di frutti, e di verdure,
Ombre soavi, acque a temprar l'arsura
E strade di beltà non dissimile ;
E non men forte ostel, che per fortezza
Ha il ponte, e i fianchi, e lo circonda intorno
Fresco profondo e di real larghezza
Qui fel col mio Signore dolce soggiorno
Con santo amor, con somma contentezza
Onde ne benedico il mese e il giorno !

Wide halls, wide galleries, and an ample court,
Chambers adorn'd by picture's soothing charm,
I found together blest ; noble sculpture
In marble, polished by no chisel vile ;
A noble garden, where a lasting April
All various flowers, and fruits, and verdure showers ;
Soft shades, and waters tempering the hot air ;
And undulating paths, in equal beauty !
Nor less, the castled glory stands in force,
And bridged and flanked. And round its circuit winds
The deepened moat showing a regal size.
Here with my lord I cast my sweetest sojourn,
With holy love, and with supreme content ;
And hence I bless the month, and bless the day !

MASQUES.

It sometimes happens in the history of national amusements, that a name survives, while the thing itself is forgotten. This has been remarkably the case with our Court Masques, respecting which our most eminent writers long ventured on so many false opinions, with a perfect ignorance of the nature of these compositions, which combined all that was exquisite in the imitative arts of poetry, painting, music, song, dancing, and machinery, at a period when our public theatre was in its rude infancy. Convinced of the miserable state of our represented drama, and not then possessing that more curious knowledge of their domestic history, which we delight to explore, they were led into erroneous notions of one of the most gorgeous, the most fascinating, and the most poetical of dramatic amusements. Our present theatrical exhibitions are indeed on a scale to which the two-penny audiences of the barn-pyouths of Shakespeare could never have strained their sight ; and our picturesque and learned costume, with the brilliant changes of our scenery, would have maddened the 'property-men' and the 'tire-women' of the Globe or the Red Bull. Shakespeare himself never beheld the true magical illusions of his own drama, with 'Enter the Red Coat,' and 'Exit Hat and Cloak,' helped out with 'painted cloths ;' or, as a bard of Charles the Second's time chants,—

But while the public theatre continued long in this contracted state, without scenes, without dresses, without orchestra, the court displayed scenical and dramatic exhibitions, with such costly magnificence, such invest fancy, and such miraculous art, that we may doubt if combined genius of Ben Jonson, Inigo Jones, and Laurence Ferroboscio, at an era most favourable to the arts of imagination, has been equalled by the modern spectacle of Opera.*

But this circumstance had entirely escaped the knowledge of our critics. The critic of a Masque must not only have read it, but he must also have heard, and viewed it. The only witnesses in this case are those later-writers of the day, who were then accustomed to communicate such domestic intelligence to their absent friends from such ample correspondence I have often drawn so curious and sometimes important information. It is amazing to notice the opinions of some great critics, how far an original mis-statement they have drawn an illegitimate opinion, and how one inherits from the other, the error which he propagates. Warburton said of Masques that 'Shakespeare was an enemy to these fooleries, and appears by his writing none.' This opinion was among many which that singular critic threw out as they met at the moment ; for Warburton forgot that Shakespeare characteristically introduces one in the Tempest's fanciful scene. Granger, who had not much time to see the manners of the age whose personages he was so acquainted with, in a note on Milton's Masque, said : 'These compositions were trifling and perplexed affairs ; the persons of which are fantastical to the last degree.' Ben Jonson, in his 'Masque of Christmas,' introduced 'Minned Pye' and 'Babbie Cake,' who were their parts in the drama. But the most wretched personages of this kind could please by the help of music, machinery, and dancing.' Granger blunders, describing two farcical characters, a species of composition of which farce was not the characteristic ; such personages as notices would enter into the Anti-Masque, which was a humorous parody of the more solemn Masque, and sometimes relieved it. Malone, whose fancy was not so condemn Masques and the age of Masques, in which says, echoing Granger's epithet, 'the wretched taste of the times found amusement.' And lastly comes Mr. T. whom the splendid fragment of the 'Arcades,' and the entire Masque which we have by heart, could not while his neutralising, criticism fixes him at the fixed point of the thermometer. 'This dramatic entertainment performed not without prodigious expense in machinery, decoration, to which humour we certainly owe the entertainment of 'Arcades,' and the inimitable 'Mask of mus.' Comus, however, is only a fine dramatic poem retaining scarcely any features of the Masque. The modern critic who had written with some research and departed elegance of the English drama was Warton, whose fancy responded to the fascination of the fairy magnificence and lyrical spirit of the Masque. Warton, the taste to give a specimen from 'the Inner Temple Mask' by William Browne, the pastoral poet, whose address Sleep, he observed, 'reminds us of some favourite tone in Milton's Comus, to which it perhaps gave birth.' Even Warton was deficient in that sort of research which only can discover the true nature of these singular dramas.

Such was the state in which some years ago I found our knowledge of this once favourite amusement of our court, our nobility, and our learned bodies of the four in of court. Some extensive researches, pursued among our temporary manuscripts, cast a new light over the obscure child of fancy and magnificence. I could not think light of what Ben Jonson has called 'The eloquence of masques ;'—entertainments on which three to five thousand pounds were expended, and on more public occasions to and twenty thousand. To the aid of the poetry, composed by the finest poets, came the most skilful musicians, the most elaborate mechanists ; Ben Jonson and Inigo Jones and Lawes, blended into one piece their respective genius ; and Lord Bacon and Whitelocke and Seiden, all sat in committees for the last great Masque presented, Charles the First, invented the devices ; composed the procession of the Masquers and the Anti-Masquers ; while one took the care of the dancing or the brawlers, and White the music;—the sage Whitelocke; who has chronicled his self-complacency on this occasion, by claiming the nation of a Coranto, which for thirty years afterwards is the delight of the nation, and was blessed by the name 'Whitelocke's Coranto,' and which was always called 'two or three times over,' whenever that great statesman 'came to see a play!'¹ So much personal honour is considered to be involved in the conduct of a Masque, at even this community of illustrious men was on the inst of being broken up by too serious a discussion concerning precedence; and the Masque had nearly not taken place, till they hit on the expedient of throwing dice to decide on their rank in the procession! On this jealousy of ours in the composition of a Mask, I discovered, what thereto had escaped the knowledge, although not the curiosity, of literary inquirers;—the occasion of the memoranda enmity between Ben Jonson and Inigo Jones, who had thereto acted together with brotherly affection, 'a circumstance,' says Mr Gifford, to whom I communicated it, 'is a little important in the history of our culminated art.' The trivial cause, but not so in its consequences, as the poet prefixing his own name before that of the architect, on the title-page of a Masque, which hitherto had only been annexed; so jealous was the great architect of his part of the Masque, and so predominant his power at name at court, that he considered his rights invaded by the inferior claims of the poet! Jonson has poured out a whole bitterness of his soul, in two short satires; still we are unfortunately for the subject of these satires, they evoked Inigo to sharpen his pen on rhyme; but it is needless, and the blunt composition still lies in its manuscript state.

While these researches had engaged my attention, appeared Mr Gifford's Memoirs of Ben Jonson. The characteristics of masques are there, for the first time, elaborately opened with the clear and penetrating spirit of that best of our dramatic critics. I feel it like presumption to add to what has received the finishing hand of a master; but his jewel is locked up in a chest, which I fear is too heavily opened, and he will allow me to borrow something from its splendour. 'The Masque, as it attained its highest degree of excellence, admitted of dialogue, singing, and dancing; these were not independent of one another, but combined, by the introduction of some ingenious fable, into a harmonious whole. When the plan was formed, the Masque of the sister arts was called in; for the essence of the Masque was pomp and glory. Moveable scenery of the best costly and splendid kind was lavished on the masque; the most celebrated masters were employed on the songs and dances; and all that the kingdom afforded of vocal and instrumental excellence was employed to embellish the exhibition. Thus magnificently constructed, the masques were not committed to ordinary performers. It was considered as Lord Bacon says, for princes and by princes it was played. Of these masques, the skill with which their elements were designed, and the inexpressible grace with which they were executed, appear to have left a vivid impression on the mind of Jonson. His genius awakes at this, and all his faculties assume to sprightliness and pleasure. He makes his appearance, like his own Delight, accompanied with Grace, Love, Harmony, Revel, Sport, and Laughter.'

'In curious knot and masques ec
The spring at first was taught to go;
And Zephyr, when he came to woo
His Flora had his motions too;
And thus did Venus learn to lead
The Italian brawls, and so to tread
As if the wind, not she, did walk,
Nor press'd a flower, nor bow'd a stalk.

And in what was the taste of the times wreathed? concludes Mr Gifford, in reply to Messieurs Malone, and the others, who had never cast even an imperfect glance on what was the completest gentlemen of that age has called, 'the courtly recreations of gallant gentlemen and ladies dancing, striving to exceed one the other in their measure and changes, and in their repast of wit, which have no beyond the power of Envy to disgrace.' But in what was 'the taste of the times wreathed? In poetry, painting, architecture, they have not since been equalled: The music of Whitelocke's Coranto is preserved in 'Hawthorne's History of Music,' might it be restored for the ladies as a

and it ill becomes us to arraign the taste of a period which possessed a cluster of writers of whom the meanest would now be esteemed a prodigy.' I have been carried farther in this extract than I intended, by the force of the current, which hurries Malone down from our sight, who, fortunately for his sake, did not live to read this denouncement for his objection against masques, as 'bungling shows,' and which Warburton treats as 'fooleries.' Granger as wretched performances; while Mr Todd regards them merely as 'the humour of the times!'

Masques were often the private theatricals of the families of our nobility, performed by the ladies and gentlemen at their seats; and were splendidly got up on certain occasions; such as the celebration of a nuptial, or in compliment to some great visiter. The Mask of Comus was composed by Milton to celebrate the creation of Charles the First as Prince of Wales; a scene in this Mask presented both the castle and the town of Ludlow, which proves, that although our small public theatres had not yet displayed any of the scenical illusions which long afterwards Davenant introduced, these scenical effects existed in great perfection in the Masques. The minute description introduced by Thomas Campion in his 'Memorable Mask,' as it is called, will convince us that the scenery must have been exquisite and fanciful, and that the poet was always a watchful and anxious partner with the machinist; with whom sometimes, however, he had a quarrel.

The subject of this very rare mask was 'The Night and the Hours.' It would be tedious to describe the first scene with the fondness with which the poet has dwelt on it. It was a double valley; one side, with dark clouds hanging before it; on the other, a green vale, with trees, and nine golden ones of fifteen feet high; from which grove, towards 'the State,' or the seat of the king, was a broad descent to the dancing place: the bower of Flora was on the right, the house of Night on the left; between them a hill hanging like a cliff over the grove. The bower of Flora was spacious, garnished with flowers, and flowery branches, with lights among them; the house of Night ample and stately, with black columns studded with golden stars; within, nothing but clouds and twinkling stars; while about it were placed, on wire, artificial bats and owls, continually moving. As soon as the king entered the great hall, the hautboys, out of the wood on the top of the hill, entertained the time, till Flora and Zephyr were seen busily gathering flowers from the bower, throwing them into baskets which two silvans held, attired in changeable taffety. The song is light as their fingers, but the burden is charming:

Now hath Flora robb'd her bowers
To befriend this place with flowers;
Strow about! strow about!
Divers, divers flowers affect
For some private dear respect;
Strow about! strow about!
But he's none of Flora's friend
That will not the rose commend;
Strow about! strow about!

I cannot quit this masque, of which collectors know the rarity, without preserving one of those Doric delicacies, of which, perhaps, we have outlived the taste! It is a playful dialogue between a Silvan and an Hour, while Night appears in her house, with her long black hair spangled with gold, amidst her Hours; their faces black, and each bearing a lighted black torch.

SILVAN. Tell me, gentle Hour of Night,
Wherein dost thou most delight?

HOURL. Not in sleep!

SILVAN. Wherein then?

HOURL. In the frolic view of men!

SILVAN. Lov'st thou music?

HOURL. Oh! 'tis sweet!

SILVAN. What's dancing?

HOURL. E'en the mirth of feet.

SILVAN. Joy you in fairs and in elves?

HOURL. We are of that sort ourselves!

But, Silvan! say, why do you love

Only to frequent the grove?

SILVAN. Life is fullest of content

When delight is innocent.

HOURL. Pleasure must vary, not be long;

Come then, let's close, and end the song

That the moveable scenery of these masques formed as perfect a scenical illusion as any that our own age, with all the figures and actions of dancers in masques were called to perfection of decoration, has attained to, will not be denied by those who have read the few masques which have been printed. They usually contrived a double division of the scene; one part was for some time concealed from the spectator, which produced surprise and variety. Thus, in the Lord's Mask at the marriage of the Palatine, the scene was divided into two parts from the roof to the floor; the lower part being first discovered, there appeared a wood in perspective, the innermost part being of 'relievo or whole round,' the rest painted. On the left a cave, and on the right a thicket, from which issued Orpheus. At the back part of the scene, at the sudden fall of a curtain, the upper part broke on the spectators, a heaven of clouds of all hues; the stars suddenly vanished, the clouds dispersed; an element of artificial fire played about the house of Prometheus—a bright and transparent cloud, reaching from the heavens to the earth, whence the eight maskers descending with the music of a full song; and at the end of their descent the cloud broke in twain, and one part of it, as with a wind, was blown athwart the scene.

While this cloud was vanishing, the wood, being the under part of the scene, was incessantly changing: a perspective view opened, with porticoes on each side, and female statues of silver, accompanied with ornaments of architecture, filling the end of the house of Prometheus, and seemed all of goldsmiths' work. The women of Prometheus descended from their niches, till the anger of Jupiter turned them again into statues. It is evident, too, that the size of the proscenium, or stage, accorded with the magnificence of the scene; for I find chorusses described, 'and changeable conveyances of the song,' in manner of an echo, performed by more than forty different voices and instruments in various parts of the scene. The architectural decorations were the pride of Inigo Jones; such could not be trivial.

'I suppose, says the writer of this mask, 'few have ever seen more neat artifice than Master Inigo Jones showed in contriving their motion; who, as all the rest of the workmanship which belonged to the whole invention, showed extraordinary industry and skill, which if it be not as lively expressed in writing as it appeared in view, rob not him of his due, but lay the blame on my want of right apprehending his instructions, for the adoring of his art.' Whether this strong expression should be only adoring does not appear in any errata; but the feeling of admiration was fervent among the spectators of that day, who were at least as much astonished as they were delighted. Ben Jonson's prose descriptions of scenes in his own exquisite masques, as Mr. Gifford observes, are singularly bold and beautiful.' In a letter, which I discovered, the writer of which had been present at one of these masques, and which Mr. Gifford had preserved,* the reader may see the great poet anxiously united with Inigo Jones in working the machinery. Jonson, before 'a sacrifice could be performed, turned the globe of the earth, standing behind the altar.' In this globe, 'the sea was expressed heightened with silver waves, which stood, or rather hung, (for no axle was seen to support it), and turning softly, discovered the first masque,'† &c. This 'turning softly' producing a very magical effect, the great poet would trust to no other hand but his own!

It seems, however, that as no masque-writer equalled Jonson, so no machinist rivalled Inigo Jones. I have sometimes caught a groan from some unfortunate poet, whose beautiful fancies were spoilt by the bungling machinist. One says, 'The order of this scene was carefully and ingeniously disposed, and as happily put in act (for the motions) by the king's master carpenter;' but he adds, 'the painters, I must needs say (not to belie them,) lent small colour to any, to attribute much of the spirit of these things to their pencil.' Poor Campion, in one of his masques, describing where the trees were gently to sink, &c, by an engine placed under the stage, and in sinking were to open, and the masquers appear out at their tops, &c, adds this vindictive marginal note: 'Either by the simplicity, negligence, or conspiracy of the painter, the passing away of the trees was somewhat hazarded, though the same day they had been shown with much admiration, and were left together to the same night; that is, they were worked right at the rehearsal, and failed in the representation, which must have perplexed the nine masquers on the tops of these nine trees. But such accidents were only vexations crossing the fancies of the poet: they did not essentially injure the magnificence, the pomp, and the world opened to the spectators. So little was the character of these masques known, that all our critics seem to have fallen into repeated blunders, and used the name as Campion suspected his painters to have done, 'and by simplicity, negligence, or conspiracy.' Hurd, a systematic critic, thought he might safely prefer the name in the Tempest, as 'putting to shame all the masques Jonson, not only in its construction, but in the splendour of its show;'—which, adds Mr. Gifford, 'was danced and sung by the ordinary performers to a couple of fiddlers perhaps in the balcony of the stage.' Such is the faint criticism without knowledge! And now, to class of masques, let me apply the forcible style of Ben Jonson himself: 'The glory of all these solemnities had perished like a blaze, and gone out in the beholder's eyes; and all lived are the bodies of all things in comparison of the soul.'

OF DES MAIZEAUX, AND THE SECRET HISTORY OF ANTHONY COLLINS'S MANUSCRIPTS.

Des Maizeaux was an active literary man of his age, whose connexions with Bayle, St Evremont, Leche, &c, Toland, with his name set off by an F. R. S. have occasioned the dictionary-biographers to place him prominent among their 'hommes illustres.' Of his private history nothing seems known. Having something important to communicate respecting one of his friends, a far greater character, with whose fate he stands connected, even Des Maizeaux becomes an object of our inquiry.

He was one of those French refugees, whose political madness, or despair of intolerance, had driven to foreign shores. The prescription of Louis XIV, which supplied us with our skillful workers in silk, also produced a mass of the unemployed, who proved not to be as exquisite at handicraft of book-making; such were Motteux, La Cour, Ozell, Durand, and others. Our author had come out at that tender state of youth, just in time to become half-Englishman; and he was so ambidextrous in the languages of the two great literary nations of Europe, that whenever he took up his pen, it is evident, by his manuscripts, which I have examined, that it was mere accident which determined him to write in French or in English. Composing without genius, or even taste, without vivacity or force, the simplicity and fluency of his style were sufficient for the purposes of a ready dealer in all the minutiae literariæ; literary anecdotes, curious quotations, notices, obscure books, and all that appelles which must enter into the history of literature, without forming a history. The little things, which did so well of themselves, without connexion with any thing else, became trivial when he assumed the form of voluminous minuteness; and Des Maizeaux at length imagined that nothing but anecdotes were necessary to compose the lives of men of genius. With this sort of talent he produced a copious life of Bayle in which he told every thing he possibly could; and as nothing can be more tedious, and more curious: for though it be a grievous fault to omit nothing, and marks the way to be deficient in the development of character, and the sympathy which throws inspiration over the vivid part of biography, yet, to admit every thing has this merit, that we are sure to find what we want! Warburton indignantly describes our Des Maizeaux, in one of those letters to Dr Birch, which he wrote in the fervid age of study and with the impatient vivacity of his genius. 'Almost all the life-writers we have had before Toland and Des Maizeaux are indeed strange, insipid creatures; and yet I rather read the worst of them, than be obliged to go through with this of Milton's, or the other's life of Boileau; where there is such a dull, heavy succession of long quotations, uninteresting passages, that it makes their method quite nauseous. But the verbose, tasteless Frenchman, seems to lay it down as a principle, that every life must be a book—and, what is worse, it seems a book without a life; what do we know of Boileau, after all his tedious stuff?

Des Maizeaux was much in the employ of the Dutch booksellers, then the great monopolizers in the literary mart of Europe. He supplied their 'nouvelles littéraires' from England; but the work-sheet price was very small in those days. I have seen annual accounts of Des Maizeaux settled to a line, for four or five pounds; and yet he sent the 'Novelties' as fresh as the post could carry them. He held a confidential correspondence with these great Dutch booksellers, who consulted him in their distresses.

and he seems rather to have relieved them than himself. But if he got only a few florins at Rotterdam, the same nouvelles littéraires sometimes secured him valuable heads at London; for in those days, which perhaps are turning on us, an English author would often appeal to a foreign journal for the commendation he might find in obtaining at home; and I have discovered, in more cases than one, that, like other smuggled commodities, the foreign article was often of home manufacture!

I give one of these curious bibliopolical distresses. Bauzet, a bookseller at Rotterdam, who judged too critically for the repose of his authors, seems to have been always fond of projecting a new 'Journal,' tormented by the ideal excellence which he had conceived of such a work, it vexed him that he could never find the workmen! Once disappointed of the assistance he expected from a writer of talents, he was fain to put up with one he was ashamed of; but warily stipulated on very singular terms. He confided this precious literary secret to Des Maizeaux. I translate from his manuscript letter.

'I send you, my dear Sir, four sheets of the continuation of my journal, and I hope this second part will turn out better than the former. The author thinks himself a very able person; but I must tell you frankly, that he is a man without erudition, and without any critical discrimination; he writes pretty well, and turns passably what he says; but that is all! Monsieur Van Effen having failed in his promises to realize my hopes on this occasion, necessity compelled me to have recourse to him; but for six months only, and on condition that he should not, on any account whatever, allow any one to know that he is the author of the journal; for his name alone would be sufficient to make even a passable book discreditable. As you are among my friends, I will confide to you in secrecy the name of this author; it is Monsieur De Limiers.* You see how much my interest is concerned that the author should not be known? This anecdote is gratuitously presented to the editors of certain reviews, as a serviceable hint to enter into the same engagement with some of their own writers; for it is usually the De Limiers who expend their last puff in blowing their own name about the town.

In England, Des Maizeaux, as a literary man, made himself very useful to other men of letters, and particularly to persons of rank; and he found patronage and a pension,—like his talents, very moderate! A friend to literary men, he lived amongst them, from 'Orator' Henry, up to Addison, Lord Halifax, and Anthony Collins. I find a curious character of our Des Maizeaux in the end-writing of Edward, Earl of Oxford, to whose father (Pope's Earl of Oxford) and himself, the nation owes the Farneian treasures. His lordship is a critic with high Principles, and high-church notions. 'This Des Maizeaux is a great man with those who are pleased to be called Free-thinkers, particularly with Mr Anthony Collins, collects passages out of books for their writings. His life of Chillingworth is wrote to please that set of men.' The secret history I am to unfold relates to Anthony Collins and Des Maizeaux. Some curious book-lovers will be interested in the personal history of an author they are well acquainted with, yet which has hitherto remained unknown. He tells his own story in a sort of epistolary poem, he addressed to a noble friend characteristic of an author, who cannot be deemed unpatronized, yet whose name, after all his painful labours, might be inserted in by 'Calamities of Authors.'

In this letter he announces his intention of publishing a Dictionary like Bayle; having written the life of Bayle, the next step was to become himself a Bayle; so short is the passage of literary delusion! He had published, as a specimen, the lives of Hales and Chillingworth. He complains that his circumstances have not allowed him to

* Van Effen was a Dutch writer of some merit, and one of a very knot of ingenious men, consisting of Salengre, St Hyacinthe, Prosper Marchand, &c, who carried on a smart review three days, published at the Hague under the title of 'Journal Littéraire.' They all composed in French; and Van Effen was the first translations of our Guardian, Robinson Crusoe, of the Tale of a Tub, &c. He did something more, but not for; he attempted to imitate the Spectator, in his 'Le Milieu,' 1734, which exhibits a picture of the uninteresting manners of a nation, whom he could not make very lively. Des Limiers has had his name slipped into our biographical libraries. An author cannot escape the fatality of the alphabet; the numerous misdeeds are registered. It is said, that if he had not been so hungry, he would have given proofs of forward that work, nor digest the materials he had collected.

A work of that nature requires a steady application, free from the cares and avocations incident to all persons obliged to seek for their maintenance. I have had the misfortune to be in the case of those persons, and am now reduced to a pension on the Irish establishment, which, deducting the tax of four shillings in the pound, and other charges, brings me in about 40*l.* a year of our English money.* This pension was granted to me in 1710, and I owe it chiefly to the friendship of Mr Addison, who was then secretary to the Earl of Wharton, lord lieutenant of Ireland. In 1711, 12, and 14, I was appointed one of the commissioners of the lottery by the interest of Lord Halifax.

And this is all I ever received from the government, though I had some claim to the royal favour; for in 1710, when the enemies to our constitution were contriving its ruin, I wrote a pamphlet entitled 'Leithe,' which was published in Holland, and afterwards translated into English, and twice printed in London; and being reprinted at Dublin, proved so offensive to the ministry in Ireland, that it was burnt by the hands of the hangman. But so it is, that after having showed on all occasions my zeal for the royal family, and endeavoured to make myself serviceable to the public by several books published; after forty years' stay in England, and in an advanced age, I find myself and family destitute of a sufficient livelihood, and suffering from complaints in the head and impaired sight by constant application to my studies.

I am confident, my lord,' he adds, 'that if the queen, to whom I was made known on occasion of Thuanus's French translation, were acquainted with my present distress, she would be pleased to afford me some relief.†

Among the confidential literary friends of Des Maizeaux he had the honor of ranking Anthony Collins, a great lover of literature, and a man of fine genius; and who in a continued correspondence with our Des Maizeaux treated him as his friend, and employed him as his agent in his literary concerns. These in the formation of an extensive library, were in a state of perpetual activity, and Collins was such a true lover of his books, that he drew up the catalogue with his own pen.‡ Anthony Collins wrote several well-known works without prefixing his name; but having pushed too far his curious inquiries on some obscure and polemical points, he incurred the odium of a free-thinker, a term which then began to be in vogue, and which the French adopted by translating it in their way, a strong thinker, or esprit fort. Whatever tendency to 'liberalise' the mind from dogmas and creeds prevails in these works, the talents and learning of Collins were of the first class. His morals were immaculate, and his personal character independent; but the odium theologicum of those days contrived every means to stab in the dark, till the taste became hereditary with some. I shall mention a fact of this cruel bigotry which occurred within my own observation on one of the most polished men of the age. The late Mr. Cumberland, in the romance entitled his 'Life,' gave this extraordinary fact, that Dr Bentley, who so ably replied by his 'Remarks,' under the name of Phileleutherus Lipsianensis, to Collins's 'Discourse on Free-thinking,' when many years after he discovered him fallen into great distress, conceiving that by having ruined Collins's character as a writer for ever, he had been the occasion of his personal misery, he liberally contributed to his maintenance. In vain I mentioned to that elegant writer, who was not curious about facts, that this person could never have been Anthony Collins, who had always a plentiful fortune; and when it was suggested to him that this 'A. Collins,' as he printed it, must have been Arthur Collins the historical compiler, who was often in pecuniary difficulties, still he persisted in sending the lie down to posterity, scilicet

* I find that the nominal pension was 2*l.* 6*d.* per diem on the Irish civil list, which amounts to above 63*l.* per annum. If pension be granted for reward, it seems a mockery that the income should be so grievously reduced, which cruel custom still prevails.

† This letter, or petition, was written in 1732. In 1745 he procured his pension to be placed on his wife's life, and he died in 1745.

verbia, without alteration in his second edition, observing to a friend of mine, that 'the story, while it told well, might serve as a striking instance of his great relative's generosity; and that it should stand, because it could do no harm to any but Anthony Collins, whom he considered as little short of an atheist.' So much for this pious fraud! but be it recollected that this Anthony Collins was the confidential friend of Locke, of whom Locke said, on his dying bed, that 'Collins was a man whom he valued in the first rank of those that he left behind him.' And the last words of Collins on his own death-bed were, that 'he was persuaded he was going to that place which God had designed for them that love him.' The cause of true religion will never be assisted by using such leaky vessels as Cumberland's wilful calumnies, which in the end must run out, and be found, like the present, mere empty fictions!

An extraordinary circumstance occurred on the death of Anthony Collins. He left behind him a considerable number of his own manuscripts, and there was one collection formed into eight octavo volumes; but that they might be secured from the common fate of manuscripts, he bequeathed them all, and confided them to the care of our Des Maizeux. The choice of Collins reflects honour on the character of Des Maizeux; yet he proved unworthy of it! He suffered himself to betray his trust, practised on by the earnest desire of the widow, and perhaps by the arts of a Mr Tomlinson, who appears to have been introduced into the family by the recommendation of Dean Sykes, whom at length he supplanted, and whom the widow to save her reputation, was afterwards obliged to discard.* In an unguarded moment he relinquished this precious legacy of the manuscripts, and accepted fifty guineas as a present. But if Des Maizeux lost his honour in this transaction, he was at heart an honest man, who had swerved for a single moment; his conscience was soon awakened, and he experienced the most violent compunctions. It was in a paroxysm of this nature that he addressed the following letter to a mutual friend of the late Anthony Collins and himself.

January 6, 1730.

I am very glad to hear you are come to town, and as you are my best friend, now I have lost Mr Collins, give me leave to open my heart to you, and to beg your assistance in an affair which highly concerns both Mr Collins's (your friend) and my own honour and reputation. The case, in few words, stands thus: Mr Collins by his last will and testament left me his manuscripts. Mr Tomlinson, who first acquainted me with it, told me that Mrs Collins should be glad to have them, and I made them over to her; whereupon she was pleased to present me with fifty guineas. I desired her at the same time to take care they should be kept safe and unhurt, which she promised to do. This was done the 25th of last month. Mr Tomlinson, who managed all this affair, was present.

Now, having further considered that matter, I find that I have done a most wicked thing. I am persuaded that I have betrayed the trust of a person who for 26 years has given me continual instances of his friendship and confidence. I am convinced that I have acted contrary to the will and intention of my dear deceased friend; showed a disregard to the particular mark of esteem he gave me on that occasion; in short, that I have forfeited what is dearer to me than my own life—honour and reputation.

These melancholy thoughts have made so great an impression upon me, that I protest to you I can enjoy no rest; they haunt me every where, day and night. I earnestly beseech you, Sir, to represent my unhappy case to Mrs Collins. I acted with all the simplicity and uprightness of my heart; I considered that the MSS would be as safe in Mrs Collins's hands as in mine; that she was no less obliged to preserve them than myself; and that, as the library was left to her, they might naturally go along with it. Besides, I thought I could not too much comply with the desire of a lady to whom I have so many obligations. But I see now clearly that this is not fulfilling Mr Collins's will, and that the duties of our conscience are superior to all other regards. But it is in her power to forgive and mend what I have done imprudently, but with a good intention. Her high sense of virtue and generosity will not, I am sure, let her take any advantage of my weakness; and the tender regard she has for the memory of the best of men, and the tenderest of husbands, will not suffer that his intentions should be frustrated, and that she should be the instrument of violating what is most sacred. If our late friend designed that his MSS should remain in her hands, would certainly have left them to her by his last will and testament; his acting otherwise is an evident proof that was not his intention.

All this I proposed to represent to her in the most respectful manner; but you will do it infinitely better than I can in this present distraction of mind; and I flatter myself that the mutual esteem and friendship which has continued so many years between Mr Collins and you, will make you readily embrace whatever tends to honour memory.

I send you the fifty guineas I received, which I do not look upon as the wages of iniquity; and I desire you to turn them to Mrs Collins, who, as I hope it of her justice and equity and regard to Mr Collins's intentions, will be pleased to cancel my paper.

I am, &c,

P. DES MAIZEUX

The manuscripts were never returned to Des Maizeux for seven years afterwards Mrs Collins, who appears to have been a very spirited lady, addressed to him the following letter on the subject of a report, that she had permitted transcripts of these very manuscripts to go abroad. This occasioned an animated correspondence from both sides.

March 10, 1732.

I have thus long waited in expectation that you would ere this have called on Dean Sykes, as Sir R. L. has said you intended, that I might have had some satisfaction in relation to a very unjust reproach, viz., that I, or somebody that I had trusted, had betrayed some of the transcripts or MSS, of Mr Collins into the Bishop of London's hands. I cannot therefore, since you have not been with the Dean as was desired, but call on you in this manner, to know what authority you had for such a reflection; or on what grounds you went on for saying that these transcripts were in the Bishop of London's hands. I am determined to trace out the grounds of such a report; and you can be my friend of mine, no friend of Mr Collins, no friend to common justice, if you refuse to acquaint me what foundation you had for such a charge. I desire a very speedy answer to this, who am, Sir,

Your servant,

ELIZ. COLLINS.

To Mr Des Maizeux, at his lodgings next door to the Quaker's burying-ground, Hanover-street, out of Long Acre.

To Mrs Collins.

March 14, 1732.

I had the honour of your letter of the 10th, and as I find that something has been misapprehended, I beg leave to set this matter right.

Being lately with some honourable persons, I told them it had been reported that some of Mr C's MSS were fallen into the hands of strangers, and that I should be glad to receive from you such information as might enable me to disprove that report. What occasioned this surmise, or what particular MSS were meant, I was not able to discover; so I was left to my own conjectures, which upon serious consideration, induced me to believe that it might relate to the MSS in eight volumes in 8vo, of which they is a transcript. But as the original and the transcript are in your possession, if you please, madam, to compare them together, you may easily see whether they be both entire and perfect, or whether there be any thing wanting in either of them. By this means you will assure yourself, and satisfy your friends, that several important pieces are safe in your hands, and that the report is false and groundless. All this I take the liberty to offer out of the singular respect I always professed for you, and for the memory of Mr Collins, to whom I have endeavoured to do justice on all occasions, and particularly in the memoirs that have been made use of in the General Dictionary; and I hope my tender concern for his reputation will further appear when I publish his life.

April 6, 1737.

My ill state of health has hindered me from acknowledging sooner the receipt of yours, from which I hoped for some satisfaction in relation to your charge; in which I cannot but think myself very deeply concerned. You tell me now, that you were left to your own conjectures but particular MSS were reported to have fallen into the hands of strangers, and that upon a serious consideration it was induced to believe that it might relate to the MSS (eight vols. 8vo, of which there was a transcript.

I must beg of you to satisfy me very explicitly who were persons that reported this to you, and from whom did you receive this information? You know that Mr Collins & several MSS behind him; what grounds had you for your conjecture that it related to the MSS in eight vols. other than to any other MSS of which there was a transcript? I beg that you will be very plain, and tell me what strangers were named to you? and why you said the bishop of London, if your informer, said stranger to you? am so much concerned in this, that I must repeat it, if you have the singular respect for Mr Collins which you profess, that you would help me to trace out this reproach, which is so abusive to,

Sir,
Your Servant,
ELIZ. COLLINS.

To Mrs Collins.

I flattered myself that my last letter would have satisfied you, but I have the mortification to see that my hopes were vain. Therefore I beg leave once more to do this matter right. When I told you what had been reported, I acted, as I thought, the part of a true friend, by acquainting you that some of your MSS had been purchased, in order that you might examine a fact which to me appeared of the last consequence; and I verily believe that every body in my case would have expected thanks for such a friendly information. But instead of that, I find myself represented as an enemy, and challenged to produce proofs and witnesses of a thing dropt in conversation, I hear-ay, as if in those cases people kept a register of what they hear, and entered the names of the persons who spoke, the time, place, &c. and had with them persons ready to witness the whole, &c. I did own I never thought of such a thing, and whenever I happened to hear that some of your friends had some loss, I thought it my duty to acquaint them with such report, that they might inquire into the matter, and see whether there was any ground for it. But I never troubled myself with the names of the persons who spoke, as being a thing entirely needless and unprofitable.

Give me leave farther to observe, that you are in no way concerned in the matter, as you seem to be apprehensive you are. Suppose some MSS have been taken out of your library, who will say you ought to bear the guilt of it? What man in his senses, who has the honour to know you, will say you gave your consent to such thing—that you was privy to it? How can you then take upon yourself an action to which you was neither privy and consenting? Do not such things happen every day, and do the wiser think themselves injured or abused when they are talked of? Is it impossible to be betrayed by a person we confided in?

You call what I told you was a report, a surmise; you call it, I say, an information, and speak of informers as if there was a plot laid, wherein I received the information: I thought I had the honour to be better known to you. Mr Collins loved me and esteemed me for my integrity and sincerity, of which he had several proofs; how I have been drawn in to injure him, to forfeit the good opinion he had of me, and which, were he now alive, would deservedly expose me to his utmost contempt, is a plot which I shall carry to the grave. It would be a sort of comfort to me, if those who have consented I should be drawn in were in some measure sensible of the guilt towards so good, kind, and generous a man.

Thus we find that seven years after Des Maizeaux had inconsiderately betrayed his sacred trust, his remorse was still awake; and the sincerity of his grief is attested by the affecting style which describes it: the spirit of his departed friend seemed to be hovering about him, and, in his imagination, would haunt him to the grave.

The nature of these manuscripts; the cause of the warm desire of retaining them by the widow; the evident misfidence of her conduct to Des Maizeaux; and whether these manuscripts, consisting of eight octavo volumes with their transcripts, were destroyed, or are still existing, in all circumstances, which my researches have hitherto ascertained.

HISTORY OF NEW WORDS.

Neology, or the novelty of words and phrases, is an innovation, which, with the opulence of our present language, the English philologist is most jealous to a low; but we have puritans or precisians of English, superstitiously nice! The fantastic coinage of affectation or caprice will cease to circulate from its own alloy; but shall we reject the ore of fine workmanship and solid weight? There is no government mint of words, and it is no statutable offence to invent a felicitous or daring expression unauthorized by Mr Todd! When a man of genius, in the heat of his pursuits or his feelings, has thrown out a peculiar word, it probably conveyed more precision or energy than any other established word, otherwise he is but an ignorant pretender!

Julius Cæsar, who, unlike other great captains, is authority in words as well as about blows, wrote a large treatise on 'Analogy,' in which that fine genius counselled to 'avoid every unusual word as a rock!'" The cautious Quintilian, as might be expected, opposes all innovation in language. 'If the new word is well received, small is the glory; if rejected, it raises laughter.' This only marks the penury of his feelings in this species of adventure! The great legislator of words, who lived when his own language was at its acme, seems undecided, yet pleaded for this liberty. 'Shall that which the Romans allowed to Cæcilius and to Plautus be refused to Virgil and Varius?' The answer to the question might not be favourable to the inquirer. While a language is forming, writers are applauded for extending its limits; when established, for restricting themselves to them. But this is to imagine that a perfect language can exist! The good sense and observation of Horace perceived that there may be occasions where necessity must become the mother of invented words:

— Il forte necesse est
Indicis monstrare recentibus abdita rerum.

If you write of things abstruse or new,
Some of your own inventing may be used,
So it be seldom and discreetly done.

ROSCOMMON.

But Horace's canon for deciding on the legality of the new invention, or the standard by which it is to be tried, will not serve to assist the inventor of words:

— Ilcui, semperque licet,
Signatum præsentis nota procedere nummum.†

— an undisputed power
Of coining money from the rugged ore,
Nor less of coining words is still confess,
If with a legal public stamp impress.

FRANCIS.

This præsentis nota, or public stamp, can never be affixed to any new coining of words; for many received at a season have perished with it. The privilege of stamping words is reserved for their greatest enemy—Time itself! and the inventor of a new word must never flatter himself that he has secured the public adoption, for he must lie in his grave before he can enter the dictionary.

In Wille's address to the reader, prefixed to the collection of voyages published in 1677, he finds fault with Eden's translation from Peter Martyr, for using words that smelt too much of the Latine. 'We should scarcely have expected to find among them ponderouse, portentouse, despicable, obsequious, homicide, imbibed, destructive, prodigious. The only words he quotes, not thoroughly naturalized, are dominators, dictionaries, (subjects), sollicitude, (careful).

The Tattler, No. 230, introduces several poltrooneries introduced by military narrations, 'which, (he says,) if they attack us too frequently, we shall certainly put them to flight, and cut off the rear;' every one of them still keep their ground.

Half the French words used affectively by Melanctha, in Dryden's Marriage à-la-mode, as innovations in our language, are now in common use, naiveté, foible, chagrin, grimace, embarras, double entendre, équivoque, éclaircissement, ridicule, all these words which she learns by heart to use occasionally, are now in common use. A Dr Russell called Psalm-singers Ballad-singers, having found the song of Solomon in an old translation, the Ballad of Ballads, for which he is reproached by his antagonist for not knowing that the signification of words alters with time; should I call him knave, he ought not to be concerned at

* Aulus Gellius, lib. i. c. 10.

† Inst. lib. i. c. 8.

† This verse was corrected by Bentley procedere nummum, instead of procedere nomen, which the critics agree is one of his happy conjectures.

is, for the Apostle Paul is also called a knave of Jesus Christ.

Unquestionably, NEOLOGY opens a wide door to innovation; scarcely has a century passed since our language was patched up with gallic idioms, as in the preceding century it was piebald with Spanish, and with Italian, and even with Dutch. The political intercourse of islanders with their neighbours has ever influenced their language. In Elizabeth's reign Italian phrases and Netherland words were imported; in James and Charles the Spanish framed the style of courtesy; in Charles the Second the nation and the language were equally Frenchified. Yet such are the sources whence we have often derived some of the wealth of our language!

There are three foul corrupters of a language; caprice, affectation, and ignorance! Such fashionable cant terms as 'theatricals,' and 'musicals,' invented by the flippant Topham, still survive among his confraternity of frivolity. A lady eminent for the elegance of her taste, and of whom one of the best judges, the celebrated Miss Edgeworth, observed to me that she spoke the purest and most idiomatic English she had ever heard, threw out an observation which might be extended to a great deal of our present fashionable vocabulary. She is now old enough, she said, to have lived to hear the vulgarisms of her youth adopted in drawing-room circles. To hunch, now so familiar from the flarest lips, in her youth was only known in the servants' hall. An expression very ripe of late among our young ladies, a nice man, whatever it may mean, whether the man resemble a pudding, or something more nice, conveys the offensive notion that they are ready to eat him up! When I was a boy, it was an age of Bon ton; this good tone mysteriously conveyed a sublime idea of fashion; in the time imported late in the eighteenth century, closed with it. Thwaddle for awhile succeeded bore; but bore has recovered the supremacy. We want another Swift to give a new edition of his 'Polite Conversation.' A dictionary of barbarisms too might be collected from some wretched neologists; whose pens are now at work! Lord Chesterfield, in his exhortations to conform to Johnson's Dictionary, was desirous, however, that the great lexicographer should add as an appendix 'A neological Dictionary, containing those polite, though perhaps not strictly grammatical, words and phrases commonly used, and sometimes understood by the beau monde.' This last phrase was doubtless a contribution! Such a dictionary had already appeared in the French language, drawn up by two caustic critics, who in the Dictionnaire neologique a l'usage des beaux Esprits du Siècle, collected together the numerous unlucky inventions of affectation, with their modern authorities! A collection of the fine words and phrases culled from some very modern poetry, might show the real amount of the favours bestowed on us.

The attempts of neologists are, however, not necessarily to be condemned; and we may join with the commentators of Aulus Gellius, who have lamented the loss of a chapter, of which the title only has descended to us. That chapter would have demonstrated what happens to all languages, that some neologisms, which at first are considered forced or inelegant, become sanctioned by use, and in time are quoted as authority in the very language which, in their early stage, they were imagined to have defaced.

The true history of men's minds is found in their actions; their wants are indicated by their contrivances; and certain it is that in highly cultivated ages we discover the most refined intellects attempting neologisms. It would be a subject of great curiosity to trace the origin of many happy expressions, when, and by whom created. Plato substituted the term Providence for fate; and a new system of human affairs arose from a single word. Cicero invented several; to this philosopher we owe the term of moral philosophy, which before his time was called the philosophy of manners. But on this subject we are perhaps more interested by the modern than by the ancient languages. Richardson, the painter of the human heart has coined some expressions to indicate its little secret movements which are admirable: that great genius merited a higher education and more literary leisure than the life of a printer could afford. Montaigne created some bold expressions, many of which have not survived him; incertain so opposite to curiosity, well describes that state of negligence where we will not learn that of which we are ignorant. With us the word incertain was described by Heylin, in 1656, as an unusual word; it has been appropriately adopted by our best writers; although we still want incertainly. Charron invented étrange unsuccessfully, but which, says a French critic, would be the true substantive of the word strange; our Locke is the solitary instance produced for 'foreignness' for 'remoteness or want of relation to something.' Malherbe borrowed from the Latin insidiusus, secretly, which have been received; but a bolder word dévoûtor, by which he proposed to express cesser de vouloir, has not. A term, however, expressive and precise. Corneille happily introduced incertain in a verse in the Cid, Vous êtes incertain, mais non pas incertainable.

Yet this created word by their great poet has not mentioned this fine description among the French, for we are told that it is almost a solitary instance. Balzac was a great inventor of neologisms. Urbanité and félicité were struck in his mind. 'Si le mot félicité n'est pas Français il le sera l'année qui vient,' so confidently proud was the neologist, and it prospered as well as urbanité, of which he says, 'Quand l'usage aura mûri parmi nous un mot de si mauvais goût, et corrigé l'amertume de la nouveauté qui s'y peut trouver, nous nous y accoutumerons comme aux autres que nous avons emprunté de la même langue.' Balzac was, however, too sanguine in some other words; for his delecter, his serénité, &c., still retain their 'bitterness of novelty.'

Menage invented a term of which an equivalent is wanting in our language: 'J'ai fait proseateur à l'imitation de l'Italien proseatore, pour dire un homme qui écrit en prose.' To distinguish a prose from a verse writer we once had a 'proer.' Drayton uses it; but this useful distinction has unluckily degenerated, and the current sense is so daily urgent, that the purer sense is irrecoverable.

When D'Ablancourt was translating Lucian, he invented in French the words indolence and indolent; to describe a momentary languor, rather than that habitual indolence, in which sense they are now accepted; and in translating Tacitus, he created the word turbulentement, but it did not prosper, any more than that of temporisme. Scarron invented the word imparadonable, which, after having been rejected, was revived, and is equivalent to our expressive unpardonable. Moliere ridiculed some neologisms of the Précieuses of his day; but we are too apt to ridicule that which is new and which we often adopt when it becomes old. Moliere laughed at the term s'encanailleur, to describe one who assumed the manners of a blackguard; the expressive word has remained in the language.

There are two remarkable French words created by the Abbé de Saint Pierre, who passed his meritorious life in the contemplation of political morality and universal benevolence—bienfaisance and gloïrie. He invented gloïrie as a contemptuous diminutive of gloire; to describe that vanity of some egotists, so proud of the small talents which they may have received from nature or from accident. Bienfaisance first appeared in this sentence: 'L'Esprit de la vraie religion et la principale but de l'évangile cest la bienfaisance, c'est-à-dire la pratique de la charité envers le prochain.' This word was so new, that in the moment of its creation this good man explained its necessity and origin. Complaining that 'the word "charity" is abused by all sorts of Christians in the persecution of their enemies, and even heretics affirm that they are practising Christian charity in persecuting other heretics, I have sought for a term which might convey to us a precise idea of doing good to our neighbours, and I can form none more proper to make myself understood than the term of bienfaisance, good-doing. Let those who like, use it; I would only be understood, and it is not equivocal.' The happy word was at first criticised, but at length every kind heart found it responded to its own feeling. Some verses from Voltaire, alluding to the political reveries of the good abbé, noted the critical opposition; yet the new word answered to the great rule of Horace.

'Certain législateur, dont la plume faconde
Fit tant de vains projets pour le bien du monde,
Et qui depuis trente ans écrit pour des ingrats,
Viens de créer un mot qui manque à l'anglais:
Ce mot est Bienfaisance, il me plaît, il rassemble
Si le cœur en est cru, bien des vertus ensemble.
Petits grammairiens, grands précepteurs de sages,
Qui pesez la parole et mesurez les mots,
Pareille expression vous semble hasardeuse,
Mais l'univers entier doit en chérir l'idée.'

a French revolutionists, in their rage for innovation, barbarized the pure French of the Augustan age; literature, as they did many things which never occurred; and sometimes experienced feelings as they as they were strange. Their nomenclature was so; but the revolutionary jargon often shows the force and the necessity of neologisms. They form an index to the Academy Dictionary. Our plain English served to enrich this odd mixture of philology and co; Club, clubiste, comitè, juré, juge de pais, blend their terrorisme, lanterne, a verb active, lece en, ayoyades, and the other verb active Seppembrièr. The barbarous term demoralisation is said to have been the invention of the horrid capuchin Chabot; and remarkable expression of arrière-pensée belonged expressly in its birth to the jesuitic astuteness of the Abbé de, that political actor who, in changing sides, never tired prompting in his new part!

A new word, the result of much consideration with its use, or a term which, though unknown to the language, says a collective assemblage of ideas by a fortunate guess, is a precious contribution of genius; new words should convey new ideas. Swift, living amidst a war of pamphlets, when certain writers were regularly employed by one party to draw up replies to the other, used a term not to be found in our dictionaries, but which, by a single stroke, characterizes these hirelings; called them assumer-jobbers. We have not dropped the same expression from any want of its use, but of perfection in our lexicographers. The celebrated Marquis Lansdowne introduced a useful word, which has been warmly adopted in France as well as in England—liberal; the noun has been drawn out of the verb—in the marquis's time, that was only an abstract notion which is now a sect; and to liberalise was theologically introduced before the liberals arose.* It is curious to observe that as an adjective it had formerly in our language a very opposite meaning to its recent one. It is synonymous with 'libertine or licentious,' we have 'a bad villain' and 'a most profane and liberal counsellor,' find one declaring 'I have spoken too liberally.' This unlucky for the liberals, who will not—

'Give allowance to our liberal jests
Upon their persons—'

BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER.

A learned friend Archdeacon Nares in his valuable library has supplied a variety of instances.

Dr Priestley employed a forcible, but not an elegant way, to mark the general information which had begun in a day; this he frequently calls 'the spread of knowledge.' He attempted to brand with a new name that set of pretent, sophistical sciolists, whose philosophy, the sect, since their revolutionary period, have distinguished as philosophism, and the philosophers themselves as philosophists. He would have designated them as literati, but few exotic words will circulate; new words are not the coinage of our own language to blend with its vernacular idiom. Many new words are still wanted. We have no word by which we could translate the otium of the Latins, the diletante of the Italians, the alambiqué of the French, as an epithet to describe that sublimated poverty which exhausts the mind, till, like the fusion of a diamond, the intellect itself disappears. A philosopher, in an extensive view of a subject in all its bearings, may arrive to the result of his last considerations, by the usage of a novel and significant expression as this of Professor Dugald Stewart—political religionism. Let me claim the honour of one pure neologism. I ventured to introduce the term of father-land to describe our natalie them; I have lived to see it adopted by Lord Byron and by Mr Southey. This energetic expression may therefore be considered as authenticated; and patriotism may jump it with its glory and its affection. Father-land is congenial with the language in which we find that other expression of mother-tongue. The patriotic neologism originated with me in Holland, when, in early life, it was my daily pursuit to turn over the glorious history of its independence under the title of Vaderlandsche Historie—the history of fatherland!

If we acknowledge that the creation of some neologisms may sometimes produce the beautiful, the revival of the dead is the more authentic miracle; for a new word must long remain doubtful, but an ancient word happily recovered, rests on a basis of permanent strength—it has both novelty and authority! A collection of picturesque words, found among our ancient writers, would constitute a precious supplement to the history of our language. Far more expressive than our term of asceticism is their solemn one of the deathman; than our vagabond their acattering; than our idiot or lunatic their moonling; a word which Mr Gifford observes should not have been suffered to grow obsolete. Herrick finely describes by the term pittinger the peculiar shrill and short cry of the grasshopper.* Bary 'dusking the lustre' of genius, is a verb lost for us, but which gives a more precise expression to the feeling than any other words which we could use.

The late Dr Boucher, of whose projected Thesaurus of our ancient English language we only possess the first letter of the alphabet, while the great and precious portion is suffered to moulder away among his family, in the prospectus of that work, did me the honour, then a young writer, to quote an opinion I had formed early in life of the purest source of neology—which is in the revival of old words.

'Words, that wise Bacon or brave Rawleigh spake!'

We have lost many exquisite and picturesque expressions through the dulness of our lexicographers, or by that deficiency in that profounder study of our writers which their labours require far more than they themselves know. The natural graces of our language have been impoverished! The genius that throws its prophetic eye over the language, and the taste that must come from Heaven, no lexicographer imagines are required to accompany him amidst a library of old books!

THE PHILOSOPHY OF PROVERBS.

In antique furniture we sometimes discover a convenience which long disuse had made us unacquainted with, and are surprised by the aptness which we did not suspect was concealed in its solid forms. We have found the labour of the workman to have been as admirable as the material itself, which is still resisting the mouldering touch of Time among those modern inventions, elegant and unsubstantial, which, often put together with unseasoned wood, are apt to warp and fly into pieces when brought into use. We have found how strength consists in the selection of materials, and that, whenever the substitute is not better than the original, we are losing something in that test of experience, which all things derive from duration.

Be this as it may! I shall not unreasonably await for the artists of our novelties to retrograde into massive greatness, although I cannot avoid reminding them how often they revive the forgotten things of past times! It is well known that many of our novelties were in use by our ancestors! In the history of the human mind there is, indeed, a sort of antique furniture which I collect, not merely from their antiquity, but for the sound condition in which I still find them, and the compactness which they still show. Centuries have not worm-eaten their solidity, and the utility and delightfulness which they still afford make them look as fresh and as ingenious as any of our patient inventions.

By the title of the present article the reader has anticipated the nature of the old furniture to which I allude. I propose to give what, in the style of our times, may be called the philosophy of PROVERBS—a topic which seems virgin. The art of reading proverbs has not, indeed, always been acquired even by some of their admirers; but my observations, like their subject, must be versatile and unconnected; and I must bespeak indulgence for an attempt to illustrate a very curious branch of literature, rather not understood than quite forgotten.

PROVERBS have long been in disuse. 'A man of fashion,' observes Lord Chesterfield, 'never has recourse to proverbs and vulgar aphorisms; and since the time his lordship so solemnly interdicted their use, they appear to have withered away under the ban of his anathema. His lordship was little conversant with the history of proverbs, and would unquestionably have smiled on those "men of fashion" of another stamp, who, in the days of Elizabeth, James, and Charles, were great collectors of them; would appeal to them in their conversations, and enforce them in their learned or their state-squibish correspondence. Few, perhaps, are now suspect, that these neglected fragments of wisdom, which exist among all nations, still offer many interesting objects for the studies of the philosopher and the historian; and for men of the world still open an extensive school of human life and manners.

The home-spun adages, and the rusty 'sawed saws' which remain in the mouths of the people, are adapted to their capacities and their humours; easily remembered, and readily applied; these are the philosophy of the vulgar, and often more sound than that of their masters! Whoever would learn what the people think, and how they feel, must not reject even these as insignificant. The proverbs of the street and of the market, true to nature, and lasting only because they are true, are records how the populace at Athens and at Rome were the same people as at Paris and at London, and as they had before been in the city of Jerusalem!

Proverbs existed before books. The Spaniards date the origin of their refranes que dicen las viejas tras el fuego, 'sayings of old wives by their firesides,' before the existence of any writings in their language, from the circumstance that these are in the old romance or rudest vulgar idiom. The most ancient poem in the Edda, 'the sublime speech of Odin,' abounds with ancient proverbs, strikingly descriptive of the ancient Scandinavians. Undoubtedly proverbs in the earliest ages long served as the unwritten language of morality, and even of the useful arts; like the oral traditions of the Jews, they floated down from age to age on the lips of successive generations. The name of the first sage who sanctioned the saying would in time be forgotten, while the opinion, the metaphor, or the expression, remained consecrated into a proverb! Such was the origin of those memorable sentences by which men learnt to think and to speak appositely; they were precepts which no man could contradict at a time when authority was valued more than opinion, and experience preferred to novelty. The proverbs of a father became the inheritance of a son; the mistress of a family perpetuated hers through her household; the workman condensed some traditional secret of his craft into a proverbial expression. When countries are not yet populous, and property has not yet produced great inequalities in its ranks, every day will show them how 'the drunkard and the glutton come to poverty, and drowsiness clothes a man with rage.' At such a period he who gave counsel gave wealth.

It might therefore have been decided, a priori, that the most homely proverbs would abound in the most ancient writers—and such we find in Hesiod; a poet whose learning was not drawn from books. It could only have been in the agricultural state that this venerable bard could have indicated a state of repose by this rustic proverb.

'Hang your plough-beam o'er the hearth!'

The envy of rival workmen is as justly described by a reference to the humble manufacturers of earthen-ware as by the elevated jealousies of the literati and the artists of a more polished age. The famous proverbial verse of Hesiod's Works and Days,

Καὶ κεραμεὺς κεραμῆν ἐχέει,

is literally, 'The potter is hostile to the potter!'

The admonition of the poet to his brother, to prefer a friendly accommodation to a litigious law-suit, has fixed a paradoxical proverb often applied, ἅλον ἥμισυ παντός.

'The half is better than the whole!'

In the progress of time, the stock of popular proverbs received accessions from the highest sources of human intelligence; as the philosophers of antiquity formed their collections, they increased in weight and number. Erasmus has pointed out some of these sources, in the responses of oracles; the allegorical symbols of Pythagoras; the verses of the poets; allusions to historical incident; mythology and apologue; and other recondite origins: such dissimilar matters coming from all quarters, were melted down into this vast body of aphoristic knowledge. Those 'words of the wise, and their dark sayings,' as they are distinguished in that large collection which bears the name of the great Hebrew monarch, at length seem to have required commentaries; for what else can we infer of the enigmatic wisdom of the sages, when the royal paræmiographer classes among their studies, that of 'understanding a proverb and the interpretation?' This elevated notion of 'the dark sayings of the wise' accords with the bold conjecture of their origin, which the Saggiatori has thrown out, who considered them as the wrecks of an ancient philosophy which had been lost to mankind by the fatal revolutions of all human things, and that those had been saved from the general ruin by their pithy elegance, and their diminutive form; like those marine shells found on the tops of mountains, the relics of the Deluge! Even at a later period, the sage of Chersonæ prized them among the most solemn mysteries; and Plutarch has described them in a manner which proverbs may even still merit: 'Under the veil of these curious sentences are hid those germs of morals which the masters of philosophy have afterwards developed into so many volumes.'

At the highest period of Grecian genius, the tragic and the comic poets introduced into their dramas the proverbial style. St Paul quotes a line which still remains among the first exercises of our school-pens:

'Evil communications corrupt good manners.'

It is a verse found in a fragment of Menander, the comic poet:

φθίρεισθαι ᾗθ' ἡρώδ' ἐκίλει κακὰ.

As this verse is a proverb, and the apostle, and indeed the highest authority, Jesus himself, consecrates the use of proverbs by their occasional application, it is uncertain whether St Paul quotes the Grecian poet, or only repeats some popular adage. Proverbs were bright shafts in the Greek and Latin quivers; and when Bentley, by a league of superficial wits, was accused of pedantry for his use of some ancient proverbs, the sturdy critic vindicated his taste, by showing that Cicero constantly introduced Greek proverbs into his writings—that Scaliger and Erasmus loved them, and had formed collections drawn from the stores of antiquity.

Some difficulty has occurred in the definition. Proverbs must be distinguished from proverbial phrases, and from sententious maxims; but as proverbs have many faces, from their miscellaneous nature, the class itself scarcely admits of any definition. When Johnson defined a proverb to be 'a short sentence frequently repeated by the people,' this definition would not include the most curious ones, which have not always circulated among the populace, nor even belong to them; nor does it designate the vital qualities of a proverb. The pithy quaintness of old Howel has admirably described the ingredients of an exquisite proverb to be sense, shortness, and salt. A proverb is distinguished from a maxim or an apophthegm, by that brevity which condenses a thought or a metaphor, where one thing is said and another is to be applied; this often produces wit; and that quick pungency which excites surprise, but strikes with conviction; this gives it an epigrammatic turn. George Herbert entitled the small collection which he formed 'Jacula Prudentum,' Darts or Javelins! something hurled and striking deeply; a characteristic of a proverb which possibly Herbert may have borrowed from a remarkable passage in Plato's dialogue of 'Protagoras, or the Sophists.'

The influence of proverbs over the minds and conversations of a whole people is strikingly illustrated by this philosopher's explanation of the term to laconize; the mode of speech peculiar to the Lacedæmonians. This people affected to appear unlearned, and seemed only emulous to excel the rest of the Greeks in fortitude and in military skill. According to Plato's notion, this was really a political artifice, with a view to conceal their pre-eminent wisdom. With the jealousy of a petty state they attempted to confine their renowned sagacity within themselves, and under their military to hide their contemplative character! The philosopher assures those who in other cities imagined they laconized, merely by imitating the severe exercises, and the other warlike manners of the Lacedæmonians, that they were grossly deceived; and thus curiously describes the sort of wisdom which this singular people practised.

'If any one wishes to converse with the meanest of the Lacedæmonians, he will at first find him for the most part, apparently, despicable in conversation; but afterwards, when a proper opportunity presents itself, the same mean person, like a skillful juggler, will hurl a sentence worthy of attention short and contented; so that he who converses with him will appear to be in no respect superior to a boy! That to laconize, therefore, consists much more in philosophising than in the love of exercise is understood by some of the present age, and was known to the ancients, they being persuaded that the ability of uttering such sentences as these is the province of a man perfectly learned. The seven sages were emulators, lovers, and disciples of the Lacedæmonian erudition. Their wisdom was a thing of this kind; viz., short sentences uttered by each, and worthy to be remembered. These men, assembling together, consecrated to Apollo the first fruits of their wisdom; writing in the temple of Apollo, at Delphi, those sentences which are celebrated by all men, viz., Know Thyself! and Nothing too much! But on what account do I mention these things?—to show that the mode of philosophy among the ancients was a certain laconic dialect.*

The 'laconisms' of the Lacedæmonians evidently partook of the proverbial style: they were, no doubt, often proverbs themselves. The very instances which Plato supplies of this 'laconising' are two most venerable proverbs.

All this elevates the science of proverbs, and indicates that these abridgments of knowledge convey great results with a parsimony of words prodigal of sense. They have, therefore, preserved many a short sentence, not repeated by the people.†

It is evident, however, that the earliest writings of every people are marked by their most homely, or domestic proverbs; for these were more directly addressed to their wants. Franklin, who may be considered as the founder of a people, who were suddenly placed in a stage of civil society which as yet could afford no literature, discovered the philosophical cast of his genius, when he filled his almanacks with proverbs, by the ingenious contrivance of framing them into a connected discourse, delivered by an old man attending an auction. 'These proverbs,' he tells us, 'which contained the wisdom of many ages and nations, when their scattered counsels were brought together, made a great impression. They were reprinted in Britain, in a large sheet of paper, and stuck up in houses; and were twice translated in France, and distributed among their poor parishioners.' The same occurrence had happened with us ere we became a reading people. Much later even than the reign of Elizabeth our ancestors had proverbs always before them, on every thing which had room for a piece of advice on it; they had them painted in their tapestries, stamped on the most ordinary utensils, on the blades of their knives, the borders of their plates,† and 'conned them out of Goldsmith's rings.' The treasure, in Robert Green's 'Groat's worth of Wit,' compressed all his philosophy into the circle of his ring, having learnt sufficient Latin to understand the proverbial motto of 'Tu tibi cura!' The husband was reminded of his lordly authority when he only looked into his trencher, one of its learned aphorisms having descended to us,—

'The calmest husbands make the stormyest wives.'

The English proverbs of the populace, most of which are still in circulation, were collected by old John Heywood.‡ They are arranged by Tusser for 'the parlour—the guest's chamber—the hall—the table-lessons,' &c. Not a small portion of our ancient proverbs were adapted to rural life, when our ancestors lived more than ourselves amidst the works of God, and less among those of men. At this time, one of our old statesmen, in commending the art of compressing a tedious discourse into a few significant phrases, suggested the use of proverbs in diplomatic intercourse, convinced of the great benefit which would result to the negotiators themselves, as well as to others! I give a literary curiosity of this kind. A member of the House of Commons, in the reign of Elizabeth, made a speech entirely composed of the most homely proverbs. The subject was a bill against double-payments of book-debts. Knarish tradesmen were then in the habit of swelling out their book-debts with those who took credit, particularly to their younger customers. One of the members who began to speak 'for very fear shook,' and stood silent. The nervous orator was followed by a blunt and true re-representative of the famed governor of Baritaria, delivering himself thus—'It is now my chance to speak something, and that without humming or hawing.' I think this law is a good law. Even reckoning makes long friends. As far goes the penny as the penny's master. Vigilantibus non dormientibus jura subveniunt. Pay the reckoning overnight, and you shall not be troubled in the morning. If ready money be memora publica, let every one cut his coat according to his cloth. When his old suit is in the wane, let him stay till that his money bring a new suit in the increase.*

Another instance of the use of proverbs among our statesmen occurs in a manuscript letter of Sir Dudley Carlton, written in 1632 on the impeachment of Lord Middlesex, who, he says, is 'this day to plead his own cause in the exchequer-chamber, about an account of fourscore thousand pounds laid to his charge. How his lordships sped I know not, but do remember well the French proverb, Qui mange de l'oye du Roy chiera une plume quarante ans apres. 'Who eats of the king's goose, will void a feather forty years after!'

This was the era of proverbs with us; for then they were spoken by all ranks of society. The free use of trivial proverbs got them into disrepute; and as the abuse of a thing raises a just opposition to its practice, a slender wit affecting 'a cross humour,' published a little volume of 'Crossing of Proverbs, Cross-answers, and Cross-humours.' He pretends to contradict the most popular ones; but he has not always the genius to strike at amusing paradoxes.†

Proverbs were long the favourites of our neighbours: in the splendid and refined court of Louis XIV. they gave rise to an odd invention. They plotted comedies and even fantastical ballets, from their subjects. In these Curiosities of Literature I cannot pass by such eccentric inventions unnoticed.

A Comedy of proverbs is described by the Duke de la Valliere, which was performed in 1634, with prodigious success. He considers that this comedy ought to be ranked among farces; but it is gay, well-written, and curious for containing the best proverbs, which are happily introduced in the dialogue.

A more extraordinary attempt was A Ballet of proverbs. Before the opera was established in France, the ancient ballets formed the chief amusement of the court, and Louis XIV himself joined with the performers. The singular attempt of forming a pantomimical dance out of proverbs is quite French; we have a 'ballet des proverbes, dancé par le Roi, in 1654.' At every proverb the scene changed, and adapted itself to the subject. I shall give two or three of the entrées that we may form some notion of these capricious.

The proverb was

Tu menaces qui a grand peur.

'He threatens who is afraid'

The scene was composed of swaggering scaramouches and some honest citizens, who at length beat them off.

At another entrée the proverb was L'occasion fait le larron.

'Opportunity makes the thief.'

Opportunity was acted by le Sieur Beaubrun, but it is difficult to conceive how the real could personify the abstract personage. The thieves were the Duke d'Amville and Monsieur de la Chesnaye.

Another entrée was the proverb of Ce qui vient de la flûte s'en va au tambour.

'What comes by the pipe goes by the tabor.'

A loose dissipated officer was performed by le Sieur l'Anglois; the pipe by St Aignan, and the tabor by le Sieur le Comte! In this manner every proverb was spoken in

† It was published in 1616: the writer only catches at some verbal expressions—as, for instance,

The vulgar proverb runs, 'The more the merrier.'

The cross,—'Not so! one hand is enough in a purse!'

The proverb, 'It is a great way to the bottom of the sea.'

The cross,—'Not so! it is but a stone's cast.'

The proverb, 'The pride of the rich makes the labours of the of the rich.'

The proverb, 'He runs far who never turns.'

action, the whole connected by dialogue: more must have depended on the acts than the poet.*

The French long retained this fondness for proverbs; for they still have dramatic compositions entitled proverbes, on a more refined plan. Their invention is so recent, that the term is not in their great dictionary of Trouvoux. These proverbes are dramas of a single act, invented by Marmontel, who possessed a peculiar vein of humour, but who designed them only for private theatricals. Each proverb furnished a subject for a few scenes, and created a situation powerfully comic: it is a dramatic amusement which does not appear to have reached us, but one which the celebrated Catharine of Russia delighted to compose for her own society.

Among the middle classes of society to this day, we may observe that certain family proverbs are traditionally preserved: the favourite saying of a father is repeated by the sons; and frequently the conduct of a whole generation has been influenced by such domestic proverbs. This may be perceived in many of the mottoes of our old nobility, which seem to have originated in some habitual proverb of the founder of the family. In ages when proverbs were most prevalent, such pithy sentences would admirably serve in the ordinary business of life, and lead on to decision, even in its greater exigencies. Orators, by some lucky proverb, without wearying their auditors, would bring conviction home to their bosoms; and great characters would appeal to a proverb, or deliver that, which, in time, by its aptitude, became one. When Nero was reproached for the ardour with which he gave himself up to the study of music, he replied to his censurers by the Greek proverb, 'An artist lives every where.' The emperor answered in the spirit of Rousseau's system, that every child should be taught some trade. When Cæsar, after anxious deliberation, decided on the passage of the Rubicon (which very event has given rise to a proverb), rousing himself with a start of courage, he committed himself to Fortune, with that proverbial expression on his lips, used by gamblers in desperate play: having passed the Rubicon, he exclaimed 'The die is cast.' The answer of Paulus Æmilius to the relations of his wife, who had remonstrated with him on his determination to separate himself from her against whom no fault could be alleged, has become one of our most familiar proverbs. This hero acknowledged the excellencies of his lady; but, requesting them to look on his shoe, which appeared to be well made, he observed, 'None of you know where the shoe pinches!' He either used a proverbial phrase, or by its aptness it has become one of the most popular.

There are, indeed, proverbs connected with the characters of eminent men; they were either their favourite ones, or have originated with themselves: such a collection would form an historical curiosity. To the celebrated Bayard are the French indebted for a military proverb, which some of them still repeat. Ce que le gantelet gagne le gorgerin le mange, 'What the gauntlet gets, the gorget consumes.' That reflecting soldier well calculated the profits of a military life, which consumes, in the pomp and waste which are necessary for its maintenance, the slender pay it receives, and even what its rapacity sometimes acquires. The favourite proverb of Erasmus was Pectus lente! 'Hasten slowly!' He wished it to be inscribed wherever it could meet our eyes; on public buildings, and on our rings and seals. One of our own statesmen used a favourite sentence, which has enlarged our stock of national proverbs. Sir Amias Pawlet, when he perceived too much hurry in any business, was accustomed to say, 'Stay awhile, to make an end the sooner.' Oliver Cromwell's coarse, but descriptive proverb, conveys the contempt he felt for some of his mean and troublesome condottors: 'Nits will be lice.' The Italians have a proverb, which has been occasionally applied to certain political personages:—

*Etti e quello che Dio vuole;
E sarà quello che Dio vorrà!*
He is what God pleases;
He shall be what God wills!

Ere this was a proverb, it had served as an embroidered motto on the mystical mantle of Castruccio Castracani. That military genius, who sought to revolutionize Italy,

* It has been suggested that this whimsical amusement has been lately revived, to a certain degree, in the acting of Chatterboxes among juvenile parties.

and aspired to its sovereignty, lived long enough to see the wild romantic ambition which provoked all his confederate against him; the mysterious motto he assumed entered into the proverbs of his country: 'Border proverb of the Douglasses, 'It were better let the lark sing than the mouse cheep,' was adopted every border chief, to express, as Sir Walter Scott serves, what the great Bruce had pointed out, that woods and hills of their country were their safest works, instead of the fortified places, which the King surprised their neighbours in the arts of assaulting and defending. These illustrations indicate one of the uses of proverbs; they have often resulted from the spontaneous emotions or the profound reflections of some extraordinary individual, whose energetic expression was caught by a faithful ear, never to perish!

The poets have been very busy with proverbs in all languages of Europe: some appear to have been the favourite lines of some ancient poem: even in more recent times, many of the pointed verses of Boileau and Pope have become proverbial. Many trivial and lacious verbs bear the jingle of alliteration or rhyme, which assisted their circulation, and were probably struck off tempore; a manner which Swift practiced, who was ready coiner of such rhyming and ludicrous proverbs: lighting to startle a collector by his facetious or sardonic humour, in the shape of an 'old saying and true.' Some of these rhyming proverbs are, however, terse and gant: we have

'Little strokes
Fell great oaks.'

The Italian—

Chi duo lepri caccia, Uno perde, e l'altro lascia.

'Who hunts two hares, loses one and leaves the other.'

The haughty Spaniard—

*El dar es honor,
Y el pedir dolor.*

'To give is honour, to ask is grief.'

And the French—

*Ainsi de table
Est variable.*

'The friend of the table
Is very variable.'

The composers of these short proverbs were a numerous race of poets, who, probably, among the dreams of their immortality never suspected that they were to descend to posterity, themselves and their works unknown, while their extempore thoughts would be repeated by their own nation.

Proverbs were at length consigned to the people, when books were addressed to scholars; but the people did not find themselves so destitute of practical wisdom, by preserving their national proverbs, as some of those closet students who had ceased to repeat them. The various humours of mankind, in the mutability of human affairs, had given birth to every species; and men were wise, or merry, or satirical, and mourned or rejoiced in proverbs. Nations held an universal intercourse of proverbs, from the eastern to the western world; for we discover among those which appear strictly national many which are common to them all. Of our own familiar ones several may be tracked among the mounds of the Latins and the Greeks, and have sometimes been drawn from 'The Mines of the East' like decayed families which remain in obscurity, they may boast of a high lineal descent whenever they recover their lost title-deeds. The vulgar proverb, 'To carry coals to Newcastle,' local and idiomatic as it appears, however, has been borrowed and applied by ourselves; it may be found among the Persians; in the 'Bustan' of Sadi we have Infersa piper in Hindostan; 'To carry pepper to Hindostan,' among the Hebrews, 'To carry oil to a city of Olives'; a similar proverb occurs in Greek; and in Galland's 'Maxims of the East' we may discover how many of the most common proverbs among us, as well as some of Joe Miller's jests, are of oriental origin.

The resemblance of certain proverbs in different nations must, however, be often ascribed to the identity of human nature; similar situations and similar objects have unquestionably made men think and act and express themselves

the. All nations are parallels of each other! Hence all paremiographers, or collectors of proverbs, complain of the difficulty of separating their own national proverbs from those which had crept into the language from others, particularly when nations have held much intercourse together. We have a copious collection of Scottish proverbs by Kelly, but this learned man was mortified at discovering that many which he had long believed to have been genuine Scottish were not only English, but French, Italian, Spanish, Latin, and Greek ones; many of his Scottish proverbs are almost literally expressed among the fragments of remote antiquity. It would have surprised him further had he been aware that his Greek originals were themselves but copies, and might have been found in D'Herbelot, Erpenius, and Golius, and in many Asiatic works, which have been more recently introduced to the enlarged knowledge of the European student, who hitherto found his most extended researches limited by Hellenistic lore.

Perhaps it was owing to an accidental circumstance that the proverbs of the European nations have been preserved in the permanent form of volumes. Erasmus is usually considered as the first modern collector, but he appears to have been preceded by Polydore Vergil, who bitterly reproaches Erasmus with envy and plagiarism, for passing by his collection without even a poor compliment for the aviator! Polydore was a vain, superficial writer, who ridged himself in leading the way on more topics than the wisest. Erasmus, with his usual pleasantry, provokingly excuses himself, by acknowledging that he had forgotten his friend's book! Few sympathize with the quarrels of authors; and since Erasmus has written a far better book than Polydore Vergil's, the original 'Adagia' is left only to be commemorated in literary history as one of its curiosities.*

The 'Adagia' of Erasmus contains a collection of about five thousand proverbs, gradually gathered from a constant study of the ancients. Erasmus, blest with the genius which could enliven a folio, delighted himself and all Europe by the continued accessions he made to a volume which even now may be the companion of literary men for its winter day's fire-side. The successful example of Erasmus commanded the imitation of the learned in Europe, and drew their attention to their own national proverbs. Some of the most learned men, and some not sufficiently so, were now occupied in this new study.†

* At the Royal Institution there is a fine copy of Polydore Vergil's 'Adagia,' with his other work, curious in its day, De Inventoribus Rerum, printed by Frobenius, in 1521. The wood-cuts of the edition seem to be executed with inimitable efficacy, resembling a pencilling which Raphael might have avied.

† In Spain, Fernandez Nunes, a Greek professor, and the Marquis of Santellana, a graduate, published collections of their Refrains, or Proverbs, a term derived a referendo, because it is often repeated. The 'Refranes o Proverbios Castellanos,' by Cesar Oudin, 1624, translated into French, is a valuable compilation. In Cervantes and Quevedo, the best practical illustrators, they are sown with no sparing hand. There is an ample collection of Italian proverbs, by Florio, who was an Englishman, of Italian origin, and who published 'Il Giardino di Ricreatione' at London, so early as in 1591, exceeding six thousand proverbs; but they are unexplained, and are often obscure. Another Italian in England, Torriano, in 1649, published an interesting collection in the diminutive form of a twenty-four. It was subsequent to these publications in England, that in Italy Angelus Monosini, in 1604, published his collection; and Julius Varini, in 1642, produced his Scuola del Voler. In France, Oudin, after others had preceded him, published a collection of French proverbs, under the title of 'Jeux-Verbaux.' Fleury de Bellingen's Explication de Proverbes Francois, on comparing it with Les Illustres Proverbes Historiques, a subsequent publication, I discovered to be the same work. It is the first attempt to render the study of proverbs somewhat amusing. The plan consists of a dialogue between a philosopher and a Sancho Panza, who blurs out the proverbs with more delight than understanding. The philosopher takes that opportunity of explaining them by the words in which they originated, which, however, are not always to be depended on. A work of high merit on French proverbs is the unfinished one of the Abbé Tuet, sensible and learned. A collection of Danish proverbs, accompanied by a French translation, was printed at Copenhagen, in a quarto volume, 1761. England may boast of no inferior paremiographers. The grave and judicious Camden, the religious Heret, the entertaining Howel, the facetious Fuller, and the laconic Ray, with others, have preserved our national sayings. The Scottish have been largely collected and explained by learned Kelly. An excellent anonymous collection, not un-

The interest we may derive from the study of proverbs is not confined to their universal truths, nor to their poignant pleasantry; a philosophical mind will discover in proverbs a great variety of the most curious knowledge. The manners of a people are painted after life in their domestic proverbs; and it would not be advancing too much to assert, that the genius of the age might be often detected in its prevalent ones. The learned Selden tells us, that the proverbs of several nations were much studied by Bishop Andrews; the reason assigned was, because 'by them he knew the minds of several nations, which,' said he, 'is a brave thing, as we count him wise who knows the minds and the insides of men, which is done by knowing what is habitual to them.' Lord Bacon condensed a wide circuit of philosophical thought, when he observed that 'the genius, wit, and spirit of a nation are discovered by their proverbs.'

Proverbs peculiarly national, while they convey to us the modes of thinking, will consequently indicate the modes of acting among a people. The Romans had a proverbial expression for their last stake in play, Rem ad trarios venire, 'the reserve are engaged!' a proverbial expression, from which the military habits of the people might be inferred; the trarii being their reserve. A proverb has preserved a curious custom of ancient coxcombry which originally came from the Greeks. To men of effeminate manners in their dress, they applied the proverb of Unico digito sculpti caput. Scratching the head with a single finger was, it seems, done by the critically nice youths in Rome, that they might not discompose the economy of their hair. The Arab, whose unsettled existence makes him miserable and interested, says, 'Vinegar given is better than honey bought.' Every thing of high esteem with him who is so often parched in the desert is described as milk—'How large his flow of milk!' is a proverbial expression with the Arab, to distinguish the most copious eloquence. To express a state of perfect repose, the Arabian proverb is, 'I throw the rein over my back,' an allusion to the loosening of the cords of the camels which are thrown over their backs when they are sent to pasture. We discover the rustic manners of our ancient Britons in the Cambrian proverbs; many relate to the hedge. 'The cleanly Briton is seen in the hedge: the horse looks not on the hedge but the corn: the bad husband's hedge is full of gaps.' The state of an agricultural people appears in such proverbs as, 'You must not count your yearlings till May day;' and their proverbial sentence for old age is, 'An old man's end is to keep sheep!' Turn from the vagrant Arab and the agricultural Briton to a nation existing in a high state of artificial civilization; the Chinese proverbs frequently allude to magnificent buildings. Affecting a more solemn exterior than all other nations, a favourite proverb with them is, 'A grave and majestic outside is, as it were, the palace of the soul.' Their notion of government is quite architectural. They say, 'A sovereign may be compared to a hall; his officers to the steps that lead to it; the people to the ground on which they stand.' What should we think of a people who had a proverb, that 'He who gives blows is a master, he who gives none is a dog?' We should instantly decide on the mean and servile spirit of those who could repeat it; and such we find to have been that of the Bengalese, to whom the degrading proverb belongs, derived from the treatment they were used to receive from their Mogul rulers, who answered the claims of their creditors by a vigorous application of the whip! In some of the Hebrew proverbs we are struck by the frequent allusions of that fugitive people to their own history. The cruel oppression exercised by the ruling power, and the confidence in their hope of change in the day of retribution, was delivered in this Hebrew proverb—'When the tale of bricks is doubled, Moses comes.' The fond idolatry of their devotion to their ceremonial law, and to every thing connected with their sublime Theocracy, in their magnificent Temple, is finely expressed by this proverb—'None ever took a stone out of the Temple, but the dust did fly into his eyes.' The Hebrew proverb that 'A fast for a dream, is as fire for stubble,' which 'it kindles, could only have been invented by a people whose superstitions atcommon, in various languages, 1707; the collector and translator was Dr J. Mapleton. It must be acknowledged that although no nation exceeds our own in sterling sense, we rarely rival the delicacy, the wit, and the felicity of expression of the Spanish and Italian, and the poignancy of some of the French proverbs.

tached a holy mystery to fables and dreams. They imagined that a religious fast was propitious to a religious dream; or to obtain the interpretation of one which had troubled their imagination. Peyssonel, who long resided among the Turks, observes, that their proverbs are full of sense, ingenuity, and elegance, the surest test of the intellectual abilities of any nation. He said this to correct the volatile opinion of De Tott, who, to convey an idea of their stupid pride, quotes one of their favourite adages, of which the truth and candour are admirable; 'Riches in the Indies, wit in Europe, and pomp among the Ottomans.'

The Spaniards may appeal to their proverbs to show that they were a high-minded and independent race. A Whiggish jealousy of the monarchical power stamped itself on this ancient one, Va el rey hasta do puede, y no hasta do quiere: 'The king goes as far as he is able, not as far as he desires.' It must have been at a later period, when the national genius became more subdued, and every Spaniard dreaded to find under his own roof a spy or an informer, that another proverb arose, Con el rey y la inquisición, chiton! 'With the king and the inquisition, hush!' The gravity and taciturnity of the nation have been ascribed to the effects of this proverb. Their popular but suppressed feelings on taxation, and on a variety of dues exacted by their clergy, were murmured in proverb—Lo que no lleva Christo lleva el fisco! 'What Christ takes not, the exchequer carries away!' They have a number of sarcastic proverbs on the tenacious gripe of the 'abad avariento,' the avaricious priest, who, 'having eaten the olio offered, claims the dish!' A striking mixture of chivalric habits, domestic decency, and epicurean comfort, appears in the Spanish proverb, La mujer y la salsa a la mano de la lanca: 'The wife and the sauce by the hand of the lance'; to honour the dame, and to have the sauce near.

The Italian proverbs have taken a tinge from their deep and politic genius, and their wisdom seems wholly concentrated in their personal interests. I think every tenth proverb, in an Italian collection, is some cynical or some selfish maxim: a 'book of the world for worldlings!' The Venetian proverb Pria Veneziani, poi Christiane: 'First Venetian, and then Christian!' condenses the whole spirit of their ancient Republic into the smallest space possible. Their political proverbs, no doubt, arose from the extraordinary state of a people, sometimes distracted among republics, and sometimes servile in petty courts. The Italian says, I popoli s'amazzano, ed i principi s'abbracciano: 'The people murder one another, and princes embrace one another.' Chi pratica co' grandi, l'ultimo è tavola, el primo è strappazzi: 'Who dangles after the great is the last at table, and the first at blows.' Chi non sa adulare, non sa regnare: 'Who knows not to flatter, knows not to reign.' Chi serve in corte muore sul pagliato: 'Who serves at court dies on straw.' Wary cunning in domestic life is perpetually impressed. An Italian proverb, which is immortalized in our language, for it enters into the history of Milton, was that by which the elegant Wotton counselled the young poetic traveller to have—Il viso sciolto, ed i pensieri stretti. 'An open countenance, but close thoughts.' In the same spirit, Chi parla semina, chi tace raccoglie: 'The talker sows, the silent reaps'; as well as, Fatti di miele, e ti mangieran le mosche; 'Make yourself all honey, and the flies will devour you.' There are some which display a deep knowledge of human nature: A Lucca ti vidi, à Pisa ti conobbi! 'I saw you at Lucca, I knew you at Pisa.' Guardati d'aceto, di vin dolce: 'Beware of vinegar made of sweet wine,' provoke not the rage of a patient man!

Among a people who had often witnessed their fine country devastated by petty warfare, their notion of the military character was not usually heroic. Il soldato per far male è ben pagato: 'The soldier is well paid for doing mischief.' Soldato, acqua, e fuoco, presto in san luoco: 'A soldier, fire, and water, soon make room for themselves.' But in a poetical people, endowed with great sensibility, their proverbs would sometimes be tender and fanciful. They paint the activity of friendship, Chi ha l'amor nel petto, ha lo sprone a i fianchi: 'Who feels love in the breast, feels a spur in his limbs'; or its generous passion, Chi amici laguna la borsa con un filo di ragnatelo: 'Friends tie their purse with a cobweb's thread.' They characterized the universal lover by an elegant proverb—Appicare il Mais ad ogn'uoco: 'To hang every door with May,' alluding to the bough which in the nights of May the country-people are accustomed to plant before the door of their mistress. If we turn to the French, we discover that the military genius of France dictated the proverb, Maille à maille se fait le haubergeon: 'Link by link is made the coat of mail'; and Tel coup de langue est pire qu'un coup de lance: 'The tongue strikes deeper than the lance'; and Ce qui vient du tambour s'en retourne à la suite: 'What comes by the tabor goes back with the pipe.' Point d'argent point de Suisse has become proverbial, observes an Edinburgh Reviewer; a striking expression, which, while French or Austrian gold predominated, was justly used to characterize the illiberal and selfish policy of the cantonal and federal governments of Switzerland, when it began to degenerate from its moral patriotism. The ancient, perhaps the extinct, spirit of Englishmen, was once expressed by our proverb, 'Better be the head of a dog than the tail of a lion'; i. e. the first of the yeomanry rather than the last of the gentry. A foreign philosopher might have discovered our own ancient skill in archery among our proverbs; for none but true toxophilites could have such a proverb as, 'I will either make a shaft or a bolt of it!' signifying, says the author of Iranhos, a determination to make one use or other of the thing spoken of: the bolt was the arrow peculiarly fitted to the cross-bow, as that of the long-bow was called a shaft. Those instances sufficiently demonstrate that the characteristic circumstances and feelings of a people are discovered in their popular notions, and stamped on their familiar proverbs.

It is also evident that the peculiar, and often idiomatic, humour of a people is best preserved in their proverbs. There is a shrewdness, although deficient in dexterity, in the Scottish proverbs; they are idiomatic, facetious, and strike home. Kelly, who has collected three thousand, informs us, that, in 1725, the Scotch were a great proverbial nation; for that few among the better sort will converse any considerable time, but will confirm every assertion and observation with a Scottish proverb. The speculative Scotch of our own times have probably degenerated in prudential lore, and deem themselves much wiser than their proverbs. They may reply by a Scotch proverb as proverbs, made by a great man in Scotland, who, having given a splendid entertainment, was harshly told, that 'Fools make feasts, and wise men eat them'; but he readily answered, 'Wise men make proverbs, and fools repeat them!'

National humour, frequently local and idiomatic, depends on the artificial habits of mankind, so opposite to each other; but there is a natural vein, which the populace, always true to nature, preserve even among the gravest people. The Arabian proverb, 'The barber learns his art on the orphan's face'; the Chinese, 'In a field of melons do not pull up your shoe; under a plum-tree do not adjust your cap';—to impress caution in our conduct under circumstances of suspicion;—and the Hebrew one, 'He that hath had one of his family hanged may not say to his neighbor, hang up this fish!' are all instances of this sort of humour. The Spaniards are a grave people, but no nation has equalled them in their peculiar humour. The genius of Cervantes partook largely of that of his country; that mantle of gravity, which almost conceals under it a latent facetiousness, and with which he has imbued his style and manner with such untranslatable idiomatic raciness, may be traced to the proverbial erudition of his nation. 'To steal a sheep, and give away the trotters for God's sake!' is Cervantic nature! To one who is seeking an opportunity to quarrel with another, their proverb runs, Si quieres dar palos a su mujer pidele al sol a beber, 'Hast thou a mind to quarrel with thy wife, bid her bring water to thee in the sun-shine!'—a very fair quarrel may be picked up about the motes in the clearest water! On the judges in Galicia, who, like our former justices of peace, 'for half a dozen chickens would dispense with a dozen of penal statutes,' 'A juezes Gallicianos, con los pies en los manos'; 'To the judges of Galicia go with feet in hand'; a droll allusion to a present of poultry, usually held by the legs. To describe persons who live high without visible means, Los que cabritos venden, y cabras no tienen, dedonde les vienen? 'They that sell kids and have no goats, how came they by them?' El vino no trae bragas, 'Wine wears no breeches'; for men in wine expose their most secret thoughts. Vino di un orejo, 'Wine of one ear'; 'Is good wine; for at bad, shaking our heads, both our ears are visible; but at good, the Spaniard, by a natural gulation lowering one side, shows a single ear.'

Proverbs abounding in sarcastic humour, and satiric

among every people, are those which are pointed at rival countries. They expose some prevalent folly, or allude to some disgrace which the natives have incurred. In France, the Burgundians have a proverb Mieux vaut bon repas que bel habit; 'Better a good dinner than a fine coat.' These poor people are great gormandizers, but shabby dressers; they are commonly said to have 'bowels of silk and velvet'; but is, all their silk and velvet goes for their bowels! Thus 'hardy is famous for 'hot heads,' and the Norman for un dit et son dedit, 'his saying and his unsaying!' In Italy the numerous rival cities pelt one another with proverbs: Chi ha fare con Teoco non conviene esser loco, 'He who deals with a Tuscan must not have his eyes shut.' A' Venetia chi si nasce, mai vi si pace, 'Whom Venice breeds, he poorly feeds.'—Among ourselves, hardly has a county escaped from some popular quip; even neighbouring ones have their sarcasms, usually pickled in some unlucky hymn. The egotism of man eagerly seizes on whatever serves to depreciate or to ridicule his neighbour: nations savor each other; counties flout counties; obscure ones sharpen their wits on towns as obscure as themselves—the same evil principle lurking in poor human nature, if it cannot always assume predominance, will meanly gratify itself by insult or contempt.

There is another source of national characteristics, frequently producing strange or whimsical combinations; a people, from a very natural circumstance, have drawn their proverbs from local objects, or from allusions to peculiar customs. The influence of manners and customs over the ideas and language of a people would form a subject of extensive and curious research. There is a Japanese proverb, that 'A fog cannot be dispelled with a fan!' Had we not known the origin of this proverb, it would be evident that it could only have occurred to a people who had constantly before them fogs and fans; and the fact appears that fogs are frequent on the coast of Japan; and but from the age of five years both sexes of the Japanese carry fans. The Spaniards have an odd proverb to describe those who tease and vex a person before they do him the very benefit which they are about to confer—acting kindly, but speaking roughly; Mostrar primero la horca deegar, 'To show the gallows before they show the town'; a circumstance alluding to their small towns, which have a gallows placed on an eminence so that the gallows breaks on the eye of the traveller before he gets a view of the town itself.

The Cheshire proverb on marriage, 'Better wed over he mison than over the moor,' that is, at home or in its vicinity; mison alludes to the dung, &c. in the farm-yard, while the road from Chester to London is over the moor-land in Staffordshire; this local proverb is a curious instance of provincial pride, perhaps of wisdom, to induce the gentry of that county to form intermarriages; to preserve their own ancient families, and perpetuate ancient friendships between them.

In the Isle of Man a proverbial expression forcibly indicates the object constantly occupying the minds of the inhabitants. The two Deemsters or judges, when appointed to the chair of judgment, declare they will render justice between man and man 'as equally as the herring once lies between the two sides: an image which could not have occurred to any people unaccustomed to herring-metery. There is a Cornish proverb, 'Those who will not be ruled by the rudder must be ruled by the rock'—the straits of Cornwall, so often covered with wrecks, would not fail to impress on the imaginations of its inhabitants the two objects from whence they drew this salutary proverb, against obstinate wrong-heads.

When Scotland, in the last century, felt its allegiance to England doubtful, and when the French sent an expedition to the land of cakes, a local proverb was revived, to show the identity of interests which affected both nations.

'If Skiddaw hath a cap
Scruell wots full well of that.'

These are two high hills, one in Scotland and one in England; so near, that what happens to the one will not long ere it reach the other. If a fog lodges on the one, it is sure to rain on the other; the mutual sympathies of the two countries were hence deduced in a copious dissertation, by Oswald Dyke, on what was called 'The Union-proverb,' which local proverbs of our country, Fuller has interspersed in his 'Worthies,' and Ray and Grose have selected separately.

I was amused lately by a curious financial revelation which I found in an opposition paper, where it appears that 'Ministers pretend to make their load of taxes more portable, by shifting the burden, or altering the pressure, without however, diminishing the weight; according to the Italian proverb, Accommodare le bisaccie nella strada, 'To fit the load on the journey'—it is taken from a custom of the mule-drivers, who placing their packages at first but awkwardly on the backs of their poor beasts, and seeing them ready to sink, cry out, 'Never mind! we must fit them better on the road!' I was gratified to discover, by the present and some other modern instances, that the taste for proverbs was reviving, and that we were returning to those sober times, when the aptitude of a simple proverb would be preferred to the verbosity of politicians, Tories, Whigs, or Radicals!

There are domestic proverbs which originate in incidents known only to the natives of their province. Italian literature is particularly rich in these stores. The lively proverbial taste of that vivacious people was transferred to their own authors; and when these allusions were obscured by time, learned Italians, in their zeal for their national literature, and in their national love of story-telling, have written grave commentaries even on ludicrous, but popular tales, in which the proverbs are said to have originated. They resemble the old facetious contes, whose simplicity and humour still live in the pages of Boccaccio, and are not forgotten in those of the Queen of Navarre.

The Italians apply a proverb to a person who while he is beaten, takes the blows quietly:—

Per beato ch' elle non furon peache!

'Luckyly they were not peaches'

And to threaten to give a man—

Una peaca in un occhio,

'A peach in the eye'

means to give him a thrashing. This proverb, it is said, originated in the close of a certain droll adventure. The community of the Castle Poggibonsi, probably from some jocular tenure observed on St Bernard's day, pay a tribute of peaches to the court of Tuscany, which are usually shared among the ladies in waiting, and the pages of the court. It happened one season, in a great scarcity of peaches, that the good people at Poggibonsi, finding them rather dear, sent, instead of the customary tribute, a quantity of fine juicy figs, which was so much disapproved of by the pages, that as soon as they got hold of them, they began in rage to empty the baskets on the heads of the ambassadors of the Poggibonsi, who, in attempting to fly as well as they could from the pulpy shower, half-blinded, and recollecting that peaches would have had stones in them, cried out—

Per beato ch' elle non furon peache!

Luckyly they were not peaches!

Fare le scale di Sant' Ambrogio; 'To mount the stairs of Saint Ambrose,' a proverb allusive to the business of the school of scandal. Varchi explains it by a circumstance so common in provincial cities. On summer evenings, for fresh air and gossip, the loungers met on the steps and landing places of the church of St Ambrose; whoever left the party, 'they read in his book,' as our commentator expresses it; and not a leaf was passed over! All liked to join a party so well informed of one another's concerns, and every one tried to be the very last to quit it,—not to leave his character behind! It became a proverbial phrase with those who left a company, and were too tender of their backs, to request they would not 'mount the stairs of St Ambrose.' Jonson has well described such a company:

'You are so truly fear'd, but not beloved
One of another, as no one dares break
Company from the rest, lest they should fall
Upon him absent.'

There are legends and histories which belong to proverbs; and some of the most ancient refer to incidents which have not always been commemorated. Two Greek proverbs have accidentally been explained by Pausanias: 'He is a man of Tenedos' to describe a person of unquestionable veracity; and 'To cut with the Tenedian axe,' to express an absolute and irrevocable refusal. The first originated in a king of Tenedos, who decreed that there should always stand behind the judge a man holding an axe, ready to execute justice on any one convicted of falsehood. The other arose from the same king, whose father having reached his island, to supplicate the son's forgiveness for the injury inflicted on him by the arts of a step-mother, was preparing to land; already the ship was fastened by its cable to a rock; when the son came down and sternly cutting the cable with an axe, sent the ship adrift to the mercy of the waves: hence, 'to cut with the Tenedean axe,' became proverbial to express an absolute refusal. 'Business to-morrow!' is another Greek proverb, applied to a person ruined by his own neglect. The fate of an eminent person perpetuated the expression which he casually employed on the occasion. One of the Theban polemarchs, in the midst of a convivial party, received despatches relating a conspiracy: flushed with wine, although pressed by the courier to open them immediately, he smiled, and in gaiety laying the letter under the pillow of his couch, observed, 'Business to-morrow!' Plutarch records that he fell a victim to the twenty-four hours he had lost, and became the author of a proverb which was still circulated among the Greeks.

The philosophical antiquary may often discover how many a proverb commemorates an event which has escaped from the more solemn monuments of history, and is often the solitary authority of its existence. A national event in Spanish history is preserved by a proverb. Y vengar quinientos sueldos; 'And revenge five hundred pounds!' An odd expression to denote a person being a gentleman! But the proverb is historical. The Spaniards of Old Castile were compelled to pay an annual tribute of five hundred maidens to their masters, the Moors; after several battles, the Spaniards succeeded in compromising the shameful tribute, by as many pieces of coin; at length the day arrived when they entirely emancipated themselves from this odious imposition. The heroic action was performed by men of distinction, and the event perpetuated in the recollections of the Spaniards, by this singular expression, which alludes to the dishonourable tribute, was applied to characterize all men of high honour, and devoted lovers of their country.

Paquier, in his Recherches sur la France, reviewing the periodical changes of ancient families in feudal times, observes, that a proverb among the common people conveys the result of all his inquiries; for those noble houses, which in a single age declined from nobility and wealth to poverty and meanness, gave rise to the proverb, Cent ans bannieres et cent ans civieres! 'One hundred years a banner, and one hundred years a barrow!' The Italian proverb, Con l' Evangelio si diventa heretico, 'With the gospel we become heretics,'—reflects the policy of the court of Rome; and must be dated at the time of the Reformation, when a translation of the Scriptures into the vulgar tongue encountered such an invincible opposition. The Scotch proverb, He that invented the maiden first hanelled it; that is, got the first of it! The maiden is that well-known beheading engine, revived by the French surgeon Guillotine. This proverb may be applied to one who falls a victim to his own ingenuity; the artificer of his own destruction! The inventor was James, Earl of Morton, who for some years governed Scotland, and afterwards, it is said, very unjustly suffered by his own invention. It is a striking coincidence, that the same fate was shared by the French reviver; both alike sad examples of disturbed times! Among our own proverbs a remarkable incident has been commemorated. Hand over head, as men took the Covenant! This preserves the manner in which the Scotch covenant, so famous in our history, was violently taken by above sixty thousand persons about Edinburgh, in 1638; a circumstance at that time novel in our own revolutionary history, and afterwards paralleled by the French in voting by 'acclamation.' An ancient English proverb preserves a curious fact concerning our coinage. Testers are gone to Oxford, to study at Brasen-nose. When Henry the Eighth debased the silver coin, called testers, from their having a head stamped on each side; the brass, breaking out in red pimples on their silver faces, provoked the ill humour of the people to vent itself in this punning proverb, which has preserved for the historical antiquary, the popular feeling which lasted about fifty years, till Elizabeth reformed the state of the coinage. A northern proverb among us has preserved the remarkable idea which seems to have once been prevalent; that the metropolis of England was to be the city of York: Lincoln was, London is, York shall be! Whether at the time of the union of the crowns, under James the First, when England and Scotland became Great Britain, this city, from its centrical situation, was considered as the best adapted for the seat of government, or from some other cause which I have not discovered, this notion must have been prevalent to have entered into a proverb. The chief magistrate of York is the only provincial one who is allowed the title of Lord Mayor; a circumstance which seems connected with this proverb.

The Italian history of its own small principalities, whose well-being so much depended on their prudence and sagacity, affords many instances of the timely use of a proverb. Many an intricate negotiation has been contracted through a good-humoured proverb,—many a sarcastic one has silenced an adversary; and sometimes they have been applied on more solemn, and even tragical occasions. When Rinaldo degli Albizzi was banished by the vigorous conduct of Cosmo de' Medici, Machiavel, tells us, the expelled man sent Cosmo a menace, in a proverb, La gallina covava: 'The hen is brooding,' said of one meditating vengeance. The undaunted Cosmo replied by another, that 'There was no brooding out of the nest.'

I give an example of peculiar interest; for it is perpetuated by Dante, and is connected with the character of Milton.

When the families of the Amadei and the Uberti felt their honour wounded in the affront the younger Buonelmonte had put upon them, in breaking off his match with a young lady of their family, by marrying another, a council was held, and the death of the young cavalier was proposed as the sole atonement for their injured honour. But the consequences which they anticipated, and which afterwards proved so fatal to the Florentines, long suspended their decision. At length Mosca Lambertini suddenly rising, exclaimed, in two proverbs, 'That those who considered every thing would never conclude on any thing,' closing with an ancient proverbial saying—cosa fatta capo ha! 'a deed done has an end!' This proverb sealed the fatal determination, and was long held in mournful remembrance by the Tuscans; for, according to Villani, it was the cause and beginning of the accursed factions of the Guelphs and the Ghibellines. Dante has thus immortalized the energetic expression in a scene of the 'Inferno.'

Ed un ch'avea l'unna e l'altra man mozza
 Levando i moncherin per l'aura fosca;
 Sì che 'l sangue sicca la faccia sozza
 Grido:—Ricordarsi ancor del Mosca
 Che disse, lasso capo a, cosa fatta;
 Che fu! mal seme, della gente Tosca.'

Then one
 Maim'd of each hand, uplifted in the gloom
 The bleeding stumps, that they with gory spots
 Sull'd his face, and cried—'Remember thee
 Of Mosca too—I who, alas! exclaim'd,
 "The deed once done, there is an end"—that proved
 A seed of sorrow to the Tuscan race.'

Carly's Dante.

This Italian proverb was adopted by Milton; for when deeply engaged in writing 'the Defence of the People,' and warned that it might terminate in his blindness, he resolutely concluded his work, exclaiming with great magnanimity although the fatal prognostication had been accompanied, cosa fatta capo ha! Did this proverb also influence his awful decision on that great national event, when the most honest-minded fluctuated between doubts and fears?

Of a person treacherously used, the Italian proverb says that he has eaten of Le frutte di fratre Albergo.

The fruit of brother Alberigo.

Landino, on the following passage of Dante, unscatters the tragic story:

———Io son fratre Albergo,
 Io son quel dalle frutte del mal orto
 Che qui rependo, &c.

Canto xxxiii.

'The friar Albergo,' answered he,
 'Am I not from the evil garden-pluck'd
 In its fruitage, and am here repaid the date
 More luscious for my fig.'

Carly's Dante.

This was Manfred, of Fuenza, who, after many cruelties, turned friar. Reconciling himself to those whom he had so often opposed, to celebrate the renewal of their friendship, he invited them to a magnificent entertainment.

At the end of the dinner the horn blew to announce the dessert—but it was the signal of this dissimulating conspirator!—and the fruits which that day were served to his guests were armed men, who, rushing in, immolated their victims.

Among these historical proverbs none are more interesting than those which perpetuate national events, connected with those of another people. When a Frenchman would let us understand that he has settled with his creditors, the proverb is, Je ai payé tous mes Anglais: 'I have paid all my English.' This proverb originated when John, the French king, was taken prisoner by our Black Prince. Levies of money were made for the king's ransom, and for many French lords; and the French people have thus perpetuated the military glory of our nation, and their own idea of it, by making the English and their creditors synonymous terms. Another relates to the same event—Or le Pape est devenu François, et Jésus Christ Anglais: 'Now the Pope is become French and Jesus Christ English,' a proverb which arose when the Pope, exiled from Rome, held his court at Avignon in France; and the English prospered so well, that they possessed more than half the kingdom. The Spanish proverb concerning England is well known—

Con todo el mundo guerra, Y paz con Inglaterra!

'War with the world,
And peace with England'

Whether this proverb was one of the results of their memorable armada, and was only coined after their conviction of the splendid folly which they had committed, I cannot ascertain. England must always have been a desirable ally to Spain against her potent rival and neighbour. The Italians have a proverb, which formerly, at least, was strongly indicative of the travelled Englishman in their country, Inglese Italianato è un diavolo incarnato; 'The Italianized Englishman is a devil incarnate.' Formerly there existed a closer intercourse between our country and Italy than with France. Before and during the reigns of Elizabeth and James the First, that land of the elegant arts modelled our taste and manners; and more Italians travelled into England, and were more constant residents, from commercial concerns, than afterwards when France assumed a higher rank in Europe by her political superiority. This cause will sufficiently account for the number of Italian proverbs relating to England, which show an intimacy with our manners which could not else have occurred. It was probably some sarcastic Italian, and, perhaps, horologer, who, to describe the disagreement of persons, proverbised our nation—'They agree like the clocks of London.' We were once better famed for merry Christmases and their pies; and it must have been Italians who had been domiciliated with us who gave currency to the proverb Ha più da fare che i forni di natale in Inghilterra; 'He has more business than English ovens at Christmas.' Our pie-loving gentry were notorious, and Shakespeare's folio was usually laid open in the great halls of our nobility to entertain their attendants, who devoured at once Shakespeare and their pastry. Some of these volumes have come down to us, not only with the stains, but enclosing even the identical pie-crusts of the Elizabethan age.

I have thus attempted to develop the art of reading proverbs; but have done little more than indicate the theory, and must leave the skilful student to the delicacy of the practice. I am anxious to rescue from prevailing prejudices these neglected stores of curious amusement, and of deep insight into the ways of man, and to point out the bold and concealed truths which are scattered in these collections. There seems to be no occurrence in human affairs to which some proverb may not be applied. All knowledge was long apophoristical and traditional, pithily contracting the discoveries which were to be instantly comprehended, and easily retained. Whatever be the revolutionary state of man, similar principles and like occurrences are returning on us; and antiquity, whenever it is justly applicable to our times, loses its denomination, and becomes the truth of our own age. A proverb will often cut the knot which others in vain are attempting to untie. Johnson, palled with the redundant elegancies of modern composition, once said, 'I fancy mankind may come in time to write all apophoristically, except in narrative; grow weary of preparation, and connection, and illustration, and all those arts by which a big book is made.' Many a volume indeed has often been written to demonstrate what a lover of proverbs could show had long been ascertained by a single one in his favourite collections.

An insurmountable difficulty which every parameiographer has encountered, is that of forming an apt, a ready, and a systematic classification: the moral Linnaeus of such a 'systema nature', has not yet appeared. Each discovered his predecessor's mode imperfect, but each was doomed to meet the same fate. The arrangement of proverbs has baffled the ingenuity of every one of their collectors. Our Ray, after long premeditation, has chosen a system with the appearance of an alphabetical order; but, as it turns out, his system is no system, and his alphabet is no alphabet. After ten years' labour, the good man could only arrange his proverbs by common-places—by complete sentences—by phrases or forms of speech—by proverbial similes—and so on. All these are pursued in alphabetical order, 'by the first letter of the most "material word," or, if there be more words "equally material," by that which usually stands foremost.' The most patient examiner will usually find that he wants the sagacity of the collector to discover that word which is 'the most material,' or 'the words equally material.' We have to search through all that multiplicity of divisions, or conjuring-boxes, in which this juggler of proverbs pretends to hide the ball.

A still more formidable objection against a collection of proverbs, for the impatient reader, is their unreadableness. Taking in succession a multitude of insulated proverbs, their slippery nature resists all hope of retaining one in a hundred; the study of proverbs must be a frequent recurrence to a gradual collection of favourite ones, which we ourselves must form. The experience of life will throw a perpetual freshness over these short and simple texts; every day may furnish a new commentary; and we may grow old, and find novelty in proverbs by their perpetual application.

There are, perhaps, about twenty thousand proverbs among the nations of Europe: many of these have appeared in their common intercourse; many are borrowed from the ancients, chiefly the Greeks, who themselves largely took from the Eastern nations. Our own proverbs are too often deficient in that elegance and ingenuity which are often found in the Spanish and the Italian. Proverbs frequently enliven conversation, or enter into the business of life in those countries, without any feeling of vulgarity being associated with them; they are too numerous, too witty, and too wise, to cease to please by their poignancy and their aptitude. I have heard them fall from the lips of men of letters and of statesmen. When recently the disorderly state of the manufacturers of Manchester menaced an insurrection, a profound Italian politician observed to me, that it was not of a nature to alarm a great nation; for that the remedy was at hand, in the proverb of the Lazzaroni of Naples, Meta consiglio, meta esempio, meta denaro: 'Half advice, half example, half money.' The result confirmed the truth of the proverb, which, had it been known at the time, might have quieted the honest fears of a great part of the nation.

Proverbs have ceased to be studied, or employed in conversation, since the time we have derived our knowledge from books; but in a philosophical age they appear to offer infinite subjects for speculative curiosity: originating in various eras, these memorials of manners, of events, and of modes of thinking, for historical as well as for moral purposes, still retain a strong hold on our attention. The collected knowledge of successive ages, and of different people, must always enter into some part of our own! Truth and nature can never be obsolete.

Proverbs embrace the wide sphere of human existence, they take all the colours of life, they are often exquisite strokes of genius, they delight by their airy sarcasm or their caustic satire, the luxuriance of their humour, the playfulness of their turn, and even by the elegance of their imagery, and the tenderness of their sentiment. They give a deep insight into domestic life, and open for us the heart of man, in all the various states which he may occupy—a frequent review of proverbs should enter into our readings: and although they are no longer the ornaments of conversation, they have not ceased to be the treasures of Thought!

CONFUSION OF WORDS.

'There is nothing more common,' says the lively Voltaire, 'than to read and to converse to no purpose. In history, in morals, in law, in physic, and in divinity, be careful of equivocal terms. One of the ancients wrote a book to prove that there was no word which did not convey an ambiguous and uncertain meaning. If we possessed this lost book, our ingenious dictionaries of 'synonyms' would not probably prove its uselessness. When-ever the same word is associated by the parties with different names, they may converse, or contravert, till 'the crack of doom.' This, with a little obstinacy and some agility in shifting his ground, makes the fortune of an opponent. While one party is worried in disentangling a meaning, and the other is winding and unwinding about him with another, a word of the kind we have mentioned, carelessly or perversely slipped into an argument, may prolong it for a century or two—as it has happened! Vaugelas, who passed his whole life in the study of words, would not allow that the sense was to determine the meaning of words, for, says he, it is the business of words to explain the sense. Kant for a long while discovered in this way a facility of arguing without end, as, at this moment do our political economists. 'I beseech you,' exclaims a poetical critic, in the agony of a 'confusion of words,' 'not to ask whether I mean this or that.' Our critic, convinced that he has made himself understood, grows immortal by obscurity! for he shows how a few simple words, not intelligible, may admit of volumes of vindication. 'Throw out a word, capable of fifty senses, and you raise fifty parties! Should some friend of peace enable the fifty to repose on one sense, that innocent word, no longer ringing the tocsin of a party, would lie in forgetfulness in the Dictionary. Still more provoking when an identity of meaning is only disguised by different modes of expression, and when the term has been closely sifted, to their mutual astonishment, both parties discover the same thing lying under the bran and chaff after this heated operation. Plato and Aristotle probably agreed much better than the opposite parties they raised up imagined; their difference was in the manner of expression, rather than in the points discussed. The Nominalists and the Realists, who once filled the world with their brawls, and who from irregular words came to regular blows, could never comprehend their alternate nonsense; though the Nominalists only denied what no one in his senses would affirm; and the Realists only contended for what no one in his senses would deny; a hair's breadth might have joined what the spirit of party had sundered!

Do we flatter ourselves that the Logomachies of the Nominalists and the Realists terminated with these scolding schoolmen? Modern nonsense, weighed against the obsolete, may make the scales tremble for awhile, but it will lose its agreeable quality of freshness, and subside into an equipoise. We find their spirit still lurking among our own metaphysicians. 'Lo! the Nominalists and the Realists again!' exclaimed my learned friend, Sharon Turner, alluding to our modern doctrines on abstract ideas, on which there is still a doubt, whether they are any thing more than generalising terms.* Leibnitz confused his philosophy by the term sufficient reason: for every existence, for every event, and for every truth, there must be a sufficient reason. This vagueness of language produced a perpetual misconception, and Leibnitz was proud of his equivocal triumphs in always affording a new interpretation! It is conjectured that he only employed his term of sufficient reason, for the plain simple word of cause. Even Locke, who has himself so admirably noticed the 'abuse of words,' has been charged with using vague and indefinite ones; he has sometimes employed the words reflection, mind, and spirit, in so indefinite a way, that they have confused his philosophy; thus by some ambiguous expressions, our great metaphysician has been made to establish doctrines fatal to the immutability of moral distinctions. Even the eagle-eye of the intellectual Newton grew dim in the obscurity of the language of Locke. We are astonished to discover that two such intellects should not comprehend the same ideas; for Newton wrote to Locke, 'I beg your pardon for representing that you struck at the root of morality in a principle laid down in your book of Ideas—and that I took you for a Hobbit!†' The difference of opinion between Locke and Reid is in consequence of an ambiguity in the word principle, as employed by Reid. The removal of a solitary word may cast a luminous ray over a whole body of philosophy: 'If we had called the infinite the indefinite,' says Condillac, in his Traité des Sensations, 'by this small change of a word we should have avoided the error of imagining that we have a positive idea of infinity, from whence so many false reasonings have been carried on, not only by metaphysicians, but even by geometricians.' The word reason has been used with different meanings by different writers; reasoning and reason have been often confounded; a man may have an endless capacity for reasoning, without being much influenced by reason, and to be reasonable, perhaps differs from both! So Molière tells us,

Raisonneur est l'emploi de toute maison;
Et le raisonnement en bannit la raison!

In this research on 'confusion of words,' might enter the voluminous history of the founders of sects, who have usually employed terms which had no meaning attached to them, or were so ambiguous that their real notions have never been comprehended; hence the most chimerical opinions have been imputed to founders of sects. We may instance that of the Antinomians, whose remarkable denomination explains their doctrine, expressing that they were 'against law.' Their founder was John Agricola, a follower of Luther, who, while he lived, had kept Agricola's follies from exploding, which they did when he asserted that there was no such thing as sin, our salvation depending on faith, and not on works; and when he declaimed against the Law of God. To what lengths some of his sect pushed this verbal doctrine is known; but the real notions of this Agricola probably never will be! Bayle considered him as a harmless dreamer in theology, who had confused his head by Paul's controversies with the Jews; but Mosheim, who bestows on this early reformer the epithets of ventosus and veripellus, windy and crafty! or, as his translator has it, charges him with 'vanity, presumption, and artifice,' tells us by the term 'law,' Agricola only meant the ten commandments of Moses, which he considered were abrogated by the Gospel, being designed for the Jews and not for the Christians. Agricola then, by the words the 'Law of God,' and 'that there was no such thing as sin,' must have said one thing and meant another! This appears to have been the case with most of the divines of the sixteenth century; for even Mosheim complains of 'their want of precision and consistency in expressing their sentiments, hence their real sentiments have been misunderstood.' There evidently prevailed a great 'confusion of words' among them! The grace sufficient, and the grace efficacious of the Jansenists and the Jesuits, show the shifts and stratagems by which nonsense may be dignified. 'Whether all men received from God sufficient grace for their conversion' was an inquiry some unhappy metaphysical theologian set afoot: the Jesuits according to their worldly system of making men's consciences easy, affirmed it; but the Jansenists insisted, that this sufficient grace would never be efficacious, unless accompanied by special grace. 'Then the sufficient grace, which is not efficacious, is a contradiction in terms, and worse, a heresy!' triumphantly cried the Jesuits, exulting over their adversaries. This 'confusion of words' thickened, till the Jesuits introduced in this logomachy with the Jansenists, papal bulls, royal edicts, and a regiment of dragons! The Jansenists, in despair, appealed to miracles and prodigies, which they got up for public representation; but, above all, to their Pascal, whose immortal satire the Jesuits really felt was at once 'sufficient and efficacious,' thought the dragons, in settling a 'confusion of words,' did not boast of inferior success to Pascal's. Former ages had, indeed, witnessed even a more melancholy logomachy, in the Homocousion and the Homocousion! An event which Boileau has immortalized by some fine verses, which, in his famous satire on L'Équivoque, for reasons best known to the Sorbonne, were struck out of the text.

D'une syllabe le pieux saint mot augmenté
Remplissait les esprits d'aigneours, si mortueries—
Tu fus dans une guerre et si triste et si longue
Perir tant de Chrétiens, Martyrs d'une diphongue

Whether the Son was similar to the substance of the Father, or of the same substance, depended on the diphthong oi, which was alternately rejected and received. Had they earlier discovered what at length they agreed on, that the words denoted what was incomprehensible, it would have saved thousands, as a witness describes, 'from

* Turner's Hist of England, i, 514.

† We owe this curious unpublished letter to the zeal and care of Professor Dugald Stewart, in his excellent Dissertation.

ving one another to pieces.' The great controversy between Abelard and Saint Bernard, when the saint accused the scholastic of maintaining heretical notions of the Trinity, long agitated the world—yet, now that these confusers of words can no longer inflame our passions, we wonder how these parties could themselves differ about words to which we can attach no meaning whatever. There have been few councils, or synods, where the omission or addition of a word or a phrase might not have terminated an interminable logomachy! at the council of Basle, for the convenience of the disputants, John de Secubia drew up a treatise of undeclined words, chiefly to determine the signification of the particles from, by, but, and except, which it seems were perpetually occasioning fresh disputes among the Hussites and the Bohemians. Had Jerome of Prague known, like our Shakspeare, the virtue of an it, or agreed with Hobbes, that he should not have been so positive in the use of the verb is—he might have been spared from the flames. The philosopher of Malmesbury has declared, that 'Perhaps Judgment was nothing else but the composition or joining of two names of things, or modes, by the verb is.' In modern times the popes have more skillfully freed the church from this 'confusion of words.' His holiness, on one occasion, standing in equal terror of the seat of France, who protected the Jesuits, and of the seat of Spain, who maintained the cause of the Dominicans, contrived a phrase, where a comma or a full stop placed at the beginning or the end purported that his holiness tolerated the opinions which he condemned; and when the rival parties despatched deputations to the court of Rome to plead for the period, or advocate the comma; his holiness, in this 'confusion of words,' flung an unpunctuated copy to the parties; nor was it his fault, but that of the spirit of party, if the rage of the one could not subside into a comma, nor that of the other close by a full period!

In jurisprudence much confusion has occurred in the use of the term Rights: yet the social union and human happiness are involved in the precision of the expression. When Montesquieu laid down as the active principle of a republic virtue, it seemed to infer that a republic was the best of governments. In the defence of this great work he was obliged to define the term, and it seems that by virtue, he only meant political virtue, the love of the country. In politics, what evils have resulted from abstract terms to which no ideas are affixed! Such as 'The Equality of Man—the Sovereignty or the Majesty of the People—Levity—Reform—even Liberty herself—Public opinion—Public interest'—and other abstract notions, which have excited the hatred or the ridicule of the vulgar. Abstract ideas, as sounds, have been used as watchwords; the combatants will be usually found willing to fight for words to which, perhaps, not one of them have attached any settled signification. This is admirably touched on by Locke, in his chapter of 'Abuse of Words.' 'Wisdom, Glory, Grace, &c., are words frequent enough in every man's mouth; but if a great many of those who use them should be asked what they mean by them, they would be at a stand, and know not what to answer—a plain proof that though they have learned those sounds, and have them ready at their tongue's end, yet there are no determined ideas laid up in their minds which are to be expressed to others by them.'

When the American exclaimed that he was not represented in the House of Commons, because he was not an elector, he was told that a very small part of the people of England were electors. As they could not call this an actual representation, they invented a new name for it, and called it a virtual one. It imposed on the English nation, who could not object that others should be taxed rather than themselves; but with the Americans it was a sophism! And this virtual representation instead of an actual one, emanated in our separation; 'which,' says Mr Flood, at the time appeared to have swept away most of our law and our territory; forty thousand lives, and one hundred millions of treasure!

That fatal expression which Rousseau had introduced, 'Égalité des hommes,' which finally involved the happiness of a whole people; had he lived, he had probably known how ill his country had understood. He could only have referred in his mind to political equality, but not an equality of possessions, of property, of authority, destructive of social order and of moral duties, which must exist among every people. 'Liberty,' 'Equality,' and 'Reason,' innocent words! sadly ferment the brains of those who cannot affix any definite notions to them; they are like those chimerical fictions in law, which declare 'the sovereign immortal; proclaim his ubiquity in various places; and irritate the feelings of the populace, by assuming that 'the king can never do wrong.' In the time of James II., 'it is curious,' says Lord Russel, 'to read the conference between the Houses on the meaning of the words "deserted" and "abdicated," and the debates in the Lords, whether or no there is an original contract between king and people.'

The people would necessarily decide that 'kings derived their power from them; but kings were once maintained by a 'right divine,'—a 'confusion of words,' derived from two opposite theories! and both only relatively true. When we listen so frequently to such abstract terms as 'the majesty of the people'—the sovereignty of the people!—whence the inference that 'all power is derived from the people,' we can form no definite notions: it is 'a confusion of words,' contradicting all the political experience which our studies or our observations furnish; for sovereignty is established to rule, to conduct, and to settle the vacillations and quick passions of the multitude. Public opinion expresses too often the ideas of one party in place, and public interest those of another party out! Political axioms, from the circumstance of having the notions attached to them unsettled, are applied to the most opposite ends! 'In the time of the French Directory,' observes an Italian philosopher of profound views, in the revolution of Naples, the democratic faction pronounced that "Every act of a tyrannical government is in its origin illegal;" a proposition which at first sight seems self-evident, but which went to render all existing laws impracticable. The doctrine of the illegality of the acts of a tyrant was proclaimed by Brutus and Cicero, in the name of the Senate, against the populace, who had favoured Caesar's perpetual dictatorship; and the populace of Paris availed themselves of it, against the National Assembly.'

This 'confusion of words,' in time-serving politics, has too often confounded right and wrong; and artful men, driven into a corner, and intent only on its possession, have found no difficulty in solving doubts, and reconciling contradictions. Our own history, in revolutionary times, abounds with dangerous examples from all parties; of specious hypotheses for compliance with the government of the day, or the passions of parliament. Here is an instance in which the subtle confuser of words, pretended to substitute two consciences, by utterly depriving a man of any! When the unhappy Charles the First pleaded, that to pass the bill of attainder against the Earl of Strafford was against his conscience, that remarkable character of 'boldness and impiety, as Clarendon characterizes Williams, Archbishop of York, on this argument of conscience (a simple word enough,) demonstrated 'that there were two sorts of conscience, public and private; that his public conscience as a king might dispense with his private conscience as a man!' Such was the ignominious argument which decided the fate of that great victim of state! It was an impudent 'confusion of words,' when Prynne (in order to quiet the consciences of those who were uneasy at warring with the king) observed, that the statute of 25th Edward III, ran in the singular number—'If a man shall levy war against the king,' and, therefore, could not be extended to the houses, who were many and public persons. Later, we find Sherlock blest with the spirit of Williams, the Archbishop of York, whom we have just left. When some did not know how to charge and discharge themselves of the oaths to James the Second and to William the Third, this confounder of words discovered that there were two rights, as the other had that there were two consciences; one was a providential right, and the other a legal right; one person might very righteously claim and take a thing, and another as righteously hold and keep it; but that whoever got the better had the providential right by possession; and since all authority comes from God, the people were obliged to transfer their allegiance to him as a king of God's making; so that he who had the providential right necessarily had the legal one! a very simple discovery, which must, however, have cost him some pains; for this confounder of words was himself, confounded by twelve answers by non-jurors!

A French politician of this stamp, recently was suspended from his lectureship, for asserting that the possession of the soil was a right; by which principle, any king reigning over a country, whether by treachery, crime, and usurpation, was a legitimate sovereign. For this convenient principle the lecturer was tried, and declared not guilty—by persons who have lately found their advantage in a confusion of words. In treaties between nations, a 'confusion of words' has been more particularly studied; and that negotiator has conceived himself most dexterous who, by this abuse of words, has retained an arrêpensee which may fasten or loosen the ambiguous expression he had so cautiously and so finely inlaid in his mosaic of treachery. A scene of this nature I draw out of 'Messager's Negotiation with the Court of England.' When that secret agent of Louis XIV was negotiating a peace, an insuperable difficulty arose respecting the acknowledgment of the Hanoverian succession. It was absolutely necessary on this delicate point, to quiet the anxiety of the English public, and our allies; but though the French king was willing to recognize Anne's title to the throne, yet the settlement in the house of Hanover was incompatible with French interests and French honour.

Messager told Lord Bolingbroke that 'the king, his master, would consent to any such article, looking the other way, as might disengage him from the obligation of that agreement, as the occasion should present.' This ambiguous language was probably understood by Lord Bolingbroke: at the next conference his Lordship informed the secret agent, 'that the queen could not admit of any explanacons, whatever her intentions might be; that the succession was settled by act of parliament; that as to the private sentiments of the queen, or of any about her, he could say nothing.' All this was said with such an air, as to let me understand that he gave a secret assent to what I had proposed, &c; but he desired me to drop the discourse.' Thus two great negotiators, both equally urgent to conclude the treaty, found an insuperable obstacle occur, viz. 'neither could control. Two honest men would have parted; but the skillful confounder of words,' the French diplomatist, hit on an expedient; he wrote the words which afterwards appeared in the preliminaries, 'that Louis XIV will acknowledge the queen of Great Britain in that quality, as also the succession of the crown according to the present settlement.' 'The English agent,' adds the Frenchman, would have had me add—on the house of Hanover, but this I entreated him not to desire of me.' The term present settlement, then was that article which was looking the other way, to disengage his master from the obligation of that agreement as occasion should present! that is, that Louis XIV chose to understand by the present settlement, the old one by which the British crown was to be restored to the Pretender! Anne and the English nation were to understand it in their own sense—as the new one, which transferred it to the house of Hanover!

When politicians cannot rely upon each other's interpretation of one of the commonest words in our language, how can they possibly act together? The Bishop of Winchester has proved this observation, by the remarkable anecdote of the Duke of Portland and Mr Pitt, who, with the view to unite parties, were to hold a conference on fair and equal terms. His grace did not object to the word fair, but the word equal was more specific and limited; and, for a necessary preliminary, he requested Mr Pitt to inform him what he understood by the word equal? Whether Pitt was puzzled by the question, or would not deliver up an arrêpensee, he put off the explanation to the conference. But the Duke would not meet Mr Pitt till the word was explained; and that important negotiation was broken off, by not explaining a simple word which appeared to require none!

There is nothing more fatal in language than to wander from the popular acceptance of words; and yet this popular sense cannot always accord with precision of ideas, for it is itself subject to great changes.

Another source, therefore, of the abuse of words, is that mutability to which, in the course of time, the verbal edifice, as well as more substantial ones, is doomed. A familiar instance presents itself in the titles of tyrant, parasite, and sophist, originally honourable distinctions. The abuses of dominion made the appropriated title of kings; odious; the title of a magistrate, who had the care of the public granaries of corn, at length was applied to a wretched flatterer for a dinner; and absurd philosophers occasioned a more denominization: to become a by-name. To employ such terms in their primitive sense would now confuse all ideas; yet there is an affectation of erudition which has frequently revived terms sanctioned by antiquity. Bishop Watson entitled his vindication of the Bible 'an Apology'; this word, in its primitive sense, had long been lost for the multitude, whom he particularly addressed in this work, and who could only understand it in the sense they are accustomed to. Unquestionably, many of its readers have imagined that the bishop was offering an excuse for a belief in the Bible, instead of a vindication of its truth. The word impertinent by the ancient juriconsults, or law-counsellors, who gave their opinions on cases, was used merely in opposition to pertinent—ratio pertinet is a pertinent reason, that is, a reason pertaining to the cause in question; and a ratio impertinet an impertinent reason, is an argument not pertaining to the subject.* Impertinent then originally meant neither absurdity, nor rude intrusion, as it does in our present popular sense. The learned Arnauld having characterized a reply of one of his adversaries by the epithet impertinent, when blamed for the freedom of his language, explained his meaning by giving this history of the word which applies to our own language. Thus also with us, the word indifferent has entirely changed: an historian, whose work was indifferently written, would formerly have claimed our attention. In the Liturgy it is prayed that 'magistrates may indifferently minister justice.' Indifferently originally meant impartially. The word extravagant, in its primitive signification, only signified to digress from the subject. The Decretals, or those letters from the popes deciding on points of ecclesiastical discipline, were at length incorporated with the canon law, and were called extravagant by wandering out of the body of the canon law, being confusedly dispersed through that collection.

When Luther had the Decretals publicly burnt at Wittenburgh, the insult was designed for the pope, rather than as a condemnation of the canon law itself. Suppose in the present case, two persons of opposite opinions. The catholic, who had said that the decretals were extravagant, might not have intended to depreciate them, or make any concession to the Lutheran. What confusion of words has the common sense of the Scotch metaphysicians introduced into philosophy! There are no words, perhaps in the language, which may be so differently interpreted and Professor Dugald Stewart has collected, in a curious note, in the second volume of his 'Philosophy of the Human Mind,' a singular variety of its opposite significances. The Latin phrase, 'sensus communis,' may, in various passages of Cicero, be translated by our phrase 'common sense;' but, on other occasions, it means something different; the 'sensus communis of the schoolmen is quite another thing, and is synonymous with conception, and referred to the seat of intellect; with Sir John Davies, in his curious metaphysical poem, 'common sense is used as imagination. It created a controversy with Beattie and Reid; and Reid, who introduced this vague ambiguous phrase in philosophical language, often understood the term in its ordinary acceptance. This change of the meaning of the words, which is constantly recurring in metaphysical disputes, has made that curious but obscure science liable to this objection of Hobbes, 'with many words making nothing understood!'

Controversers have been keenly agitated about the principles of morals, which resolve entirely into verbal disputes, or at most into questions of arrangement and classification of little comparative moment to the points at issue. This observation of Mr Dugald Stewart's might be illustrated by the fate of the numerous inventors of systems of thinking or morals, who have only employed very different and even opposite terms in appearance, to express the same thing. Some, by their mode of philosophizing, have strangely unsettled the words self-interest and self-love; and their misconceptions have sadly misled the varieties of these systems of morals; as others also, by sad vague terms as 'utility, fitness, &c.'

* It is still a Chancery word. An answer in Chancery, is referred for impertinence, reported impertinent—and the impertinence ordered to be struck out, meaning only what is immaterial or superfluous tending to unnecessary expense. I am indebted for this explanation to my friend, Mr Maitland; and to another learned friend, formerly in that court who describes its meaning as 'an excess of words or sense in the pleadings,' and who has received many an official fee for 'expurgating impertinence,' leaving, however, he acknowledges, a sufficient quantity to make the lawyers ashamed of their verbosity.

When Epicurus asserted that the sovereign good consisted in pleasure, opposing the unfeeling austerity of the stoics by the softness of pleasurable emotions, his principle was soon disregarded; while his word, perhaps chosen in the spirit of paradox, was warmly adopted by the sensualist. Epicurus, of whom Seneca has drawn so beautiful a domestic scene, in whose garden a loaf, a Cyptheridean cheese, and a draught which did not inflame thirst,* was the sole banquet, would have started indignantly at

Such are the facts which illustrate that principle in 'the abuse of words,' which Locke calls 'an affected obscurity arising from applying old words to new, or unusual significations.'

It was the same 'confusion of words' which gave rise to the famous sect of the Sadducees. The master of its leader Sadoc, in his moral purity was desirous of a disinterested worship of the Deity; he would not have men like slaves, obedient from the hope of reward, or the fear of punishment. Sadoc drew a quite contrary inference from the intention of his master, concluding that there were neither rewards nor punishments in a future state. The result is a parallel to the fate of Epicurus. The morality of the master of Sadoc was of the most pure and elevated kind, but in the 'confusion of words,' the libertines adopted them for their own purposes—and having once assumed that neither rewards nor punishments existed in the after-state, they proceeded to the erroneous consequence that man perished with his own dust!

The plainest words by accidental associations, may suggest the most erroneous conceptions, and have been productive of the greatest errors. In the famous Bangorian controversy, one of the writers excites a smile by a complaint, arising from his views of the signification of a plain word, whose meaning, he thinks had been changed by the contending parties. He says, 'the word country, like a great many others, such as church and kingdom, is, by the Bishop of Bangor's leave, become to signify a collection of ideas very different from its original meaning; with some it implies party, with others private opinion, and with most interest, and, perhaps, in time, may signify some other country. When this good innocent word has been tossed backwards and forwards a little longer, some new reformer of language may arise to reduce it to its primitive signification—the real interest of Great Britain! The antagonist of this controversialist probably retorted on him his own term of the real interest, which might be a very opposite one, according to their notions! It has been said, with what truth I know not, that it was by a mere confusion of words that Burke was enabled to alarm the great Whig families, by showing them their fate in that of the French noblesse; they were misled by the similitude of names. The French noblesse had as little resemblance with our nobility, as they have to the Mandarins of China. However it may be in this case, certain it is, that the same terms misapplied, have often raised those delusive notions termed false analogies. It was long imagined in this country, that the parliaments of France were somewhat akin to our own; but these assemblies were very differently constituted, consisting only of lawyers in courts of law. A misnomer confuses all argument. There is a trick which consists in bestowing good names on bad things. Vices, thus veiled, are introduced to us as virtues, according to an old poet,

As drunkenness, good-fellowship we call!

SIR THOMAS WIAT.

Or the reverse, when loyalty may be ridiculed as

'The right divine of kings—to govern wrong!'

The most innocent recreations, such as the drama, dancing, dress, have been anathematised by puritans, while philosophers have written elaborate treatises in their defence—the enigma is solved, when we discover that these words suggested a set of opposite notions to each.

But the nominalists and the realists, and the doctors fundamentalissimi, resolutissimi, refulgentes, profundi, and extatici, have left this heir-loom of logomachy to a race as subtle and irrefragable! An extraordinary scene has recently been performed by a new company of actors, in the modern comedy of Political Economy; and the whole dialogue has been carried on in an inimitable 'confusion of words.' This reasoning, and unreasoning fraternity never use a term, as a term, but for an explanation, and which employed by them all, signifies opposite things, but never the plainest! Is it not, therefore, strange, that they cannot yet tell us what are riches? what is rent? what is value? Monsieur Say, the most sparkling of them all, assures us that the English writers are obscure, by their confounding, like Smith, the denomination of labour. The vivacious Gaul cries out to the grave Briton, Mr Malthus, 'If I consent to employ your word labour, you must understand me,' so and so! Mr Malthus says, 'Commodities are not exchanged for commodities only; they are also exchanged for labour; and when the hypochondriac Englishman with dismay, foresees 'the glut of markets,' and concludes that we may produce more than we can consume, the paradoxical Monsieur Say discovers, that 'commodities' is a wrong word, for it gives a wrong idea; it should be productions!' for his axiom is, that 'productions can only be purchased with productions.' Money, it seems, according to dictionary ideas, has no existence in his vocabulary; for Monsieur Say has formed a sort of Berkleian conception of wealth, being immaterial, while we confine our views to its materiality. Hence ensues from this 'confusion of words,' this most brilliant paradox; that 'a glutted market is not a proof that we produce too much, but that we produce too little! for in that case there is not enough produced to exchange with, what is produced!' As Frenchmen excel in politeness and impudence, Monsieur Say adds, 'I revere Adam Smith; he is my master; but this first of political economists did not understand all the phenomena of production and consumption;' this I leave to the ablest judge, Mr Ricardo, to decide in a commentary on Adam Smith, if he will devote his patriotism and his genius to so excellent a labour.* We, who remain uninitiated in this mystery of explaining the operations of trade by metaphysical ideas, and raising up theories to conduct those who never theorise, can only start at the 'confusion of words,' and leave this blessed inheritance to our sons, if ever the science survives the logomachy.

Caramuel, a famous Spanish bishop, was a grand architect of words. Ingenious in theory, his errors were confined to his practice: he said a great deal and meant nothing; and by an exact dimension of his intellect, taken at the time, it appeared that he had genius in the eighth degree, eloquence in the fifth, but judgment only in the second! This great man would not read the ancients; for he had a notion that the moderns must have acquired all they possessed, with a good deal of their own 'into the bargain.' Two hundred and sixty-two works, differing in breadth and length, besides his manuscript, attest, that if the world would read his writings, they could need no other; for which purpose his last work always referred to the preceding ones, and could never be comprehended till his readers possessed those which were to follow. As he had the good sense to perceive that metaphysicians abound in obscure and equivocal terms, to avoid this 'confusion of words,' he invented a jargon of his own; and to make 'confusion worse confounded,' projected grammars and vocabularies by which we were to learn it; but it is supposed that he was the only man who understood him. He put every author in despair by the works which he announced. This famous architect of words, however, built more labyrinths than he could always get out of, notwithstanding his 'æsthetic grammar,' and his 'caudacious grammar.'† Yet this great Caramuel, the critics have agreed, was nothing but a puffy giant, with legs too weak for his bulk, and only to be accounted as a hero amidst a 'confusion of words.'

Let us dread the fate of Caramuel! and before we enter into discussion with the metaphysician, first settle what he means by the nature of ideas; with the politician, his notion of liberty and equality; with the divine, what he deems orthodox; with the political economist, what he considers to be value and rent! By this means we may avoid what is perpetually recurring; that extreme laxity or vagueness of words, which makes every writer or speaker, complain of his predecessor, and attempt, sometimes not

* Since the first edition of this work, the lamented death of Mr Ricardo has occurred—and we have lost the labours of a mind of great simplicity and native power, at, perhaps, the hour of its maturity. (English Editor.)

in the best temper, to define and to settle the signification of what the witty South calls 'those rabble-charming words, which carry so much wild-fire wrapt up in them.'

POLITICAL NICK-NAMES.

Political calumny is said to have been reduced into an art, like that of logic, by the Jesuits. This itself may be a political calumny! A powerful body, who themselves had practised the practices of calumniators, may in their turn, often have been calumniated. The passage in question was drawn out of one of the classical authors used in their colleges. Busembaum, a German Jesuit, had composed, in duodecimo, a 'Medulla Theologicæ moralis,' where, among other casuistical propositions, there was found lurking in this old jesuit's 'marrow' one which favoured regicide and assassination! Fifty editions of the book had passed unnoticed; till a new one appearing at the critical moment of Damien's attempt, the duodecimo of the old Scholastic Jesuit which had now been amplified by its commentators into two folios, was considered not merely ridiculous, but as dangerous. It was burnt at Toulouse, in 1757, by order of the parliament, and condemned at Paris. An Italian Jesuit published an 'apology' for this theory of assassination, and the same flames devoured it! Whether Busembaum deserved the honour bestowed on his ingenuity, the reader may judge by the passage itself.

'Whoever would ruin a person, or a government, must begin this operation by spreading calumnies, to defame the person or the government; for unquestionably the calumniator will always find a great number of persons inclined to believe him, or to side with him; it therefore follows, that whenever the object of such calumnies is once lowered in credit by such means, he will soon lose the reputation and power founded on that credit, and sink under the permanent and vindictive attacks of the calumniator.' This is the politics of Satan—the evil principle which regulates so many things in this world. The enemies of the Jesuits have formed a list of great names who had become the victims of such atrocious Machiavellism.*

This has been one of the arts practised by all political parties. Their first weak invention is to attach to a new faction a contemptible or an opprobrious nick-name. In the history of the revolutions of Europe, whenever a new party has at length established its independence, the original denomination which had been fixed on them, marked by the passions of the party which bestowed it, strangely contrasts with the name finally established!

The first revolutionists of Holland incurred the contemptuous name of 'Les Gueux,' or the Beggars. The Dukes of Parma inquiring about them, the Count of Barlemont scornfully described them to be of this class; and it was flattery of the Great which gave the name currency. The Hollanders accepted the name as much in defiance as with indignation, and acted up to it. Instead of branches in their hats, they wore little wooden platters, such as beggars used, and foxes' tails instead of feathers. On the targets of some of these Gueux they inscribed, 'Rather Turkish than Popish!' and had the print of a cock crowing, out of whose mouth was a label Vive les Gueux par tout le monde! which was every where set up, and was the favourite sign of their inns. The Protestants in France, after a variety of nick-names to render them contemptible, such as Christodins, because they would only talk about Christ, similar to our Puritans; and Parpallots, or Parpilles, a small base coin, which was odiously applied to them; at length settled in the well-known term of Huguenots, which probably was derived, as the Dictionnaire de Trevoux suggests, from their hiding themselves in secret places, and appearing at night, like king Hugon, the great hobgoblin of France. It appears that the term has been preserved by an earthen vessel without feet, used in cookery, which served the Huguenots on meagre days to dress their meat, and to avoid observation; a curious instance, where a thing still in use proves the obscure circumstance of its origin.

The atrocious insurrection, called La Jacquerie, was a term which originated in cruel derision. When John of France was a prisoner in England, his kingdom appears to have been decimated by its wretched nobles, who, in the indulgence of their passions, set no limits to their luxury and their extortion. They despoiled their peasantry without mercy, and when these complained, and even reproached this tyrannical nobility with having forsaken their serrein, they were told that Jacque bon homme must pay for all. But Jack good-man came forward in person—a leader appeared under this fatal name, and the peasants revelling in madness, and being joined by all the cut-throats and thieves of Paris, at once pronounced condemnation on every gentleman in France! Froissart has the horrid narrative; twelve thousand of these Jacques bon hommes executed their crimes; but the Jacquérie, who had received their first appellation in derision, assumed it as their name de guerre.

In the spirited Memoirs of the Duke of Guise, written by himself, of his enterprise against the kingdom of Naples, we find a curious account of this political art of marking people by odious nick-names. 'Genaro and Viceroy,' says the duke, 'cherished under-hand, that aversion the rascality had for the better sort of citizens and civiler people, who, by the insolences they suffered from these, not unjustly hated them. The better class inhabiting the suburbs of the Virgin were called black cloaks, and the ordinary sort of people took the name of lasars,' both in French and English an old word for a leprous beggar, and hence the lasaroni of Naples. We can easily conceive the evil eye of a lasar when he encountered a black cloak. The Duke adds—'Just as at the beginning of the revolution, the revolvers in Flanders formerly took that of beggars; those of Guienne, that of cofers; those of Normandy, that of bare-feet; and of Beauvais and Soulogne, of woollen-pattens.' In the late French revolution, we observed the extremes indulged by both parties chiefly concerned in revolution—the wealthy and the poor! The rich, who, in derision, called their humble fellow-citizens by this contemptuous term of sans-culottes, provoked a racing injustice from the populace, who, as a dreadful return for only a slight, rendered the innocent term of aristocrate, a signal for plunder or slaughter!

It is a curious fact that the French verb fronder, as well as the noun frondeur, are used to describe those who condemn the measures of government; and more extensively, designates any hyperbolic and malignant criticism, or any sort of condemnation. These words have been only introduced into the language since the intrigues of Cardinal de Retz succeeded in raising a faction against Cardinal Mazarine, known in French history by the nick-name of the Frondeurs, or the Slingers. It originated a peasantry, although it became the pass-word for insurrection in France, and the odious name of a faction. A wit observed, that the parliament were like those school-boys, who sling their stones in the pits of Paris, and as soon as they see the Lieutenant Civil, run away; but are soon to collect again directly he disappears. The comparison was lively, and formed the burthen of songs; and afterwards, when affairs were settled between the king and the parliament, it was more particularly applied to the faction of Cardinal de Retz, who still held out. 'We encouraged the application,' says De Retz; for we observed that the distinction of a name heated the minds of people; and one evening we resolved to wear hat-strings in the form of slings. A batter, who might be trusted with the secret, made a great number as a new fashion, and which were worn by many who did not understand the joke; we ourselves were the last to adopt them, that the invention might not appear to have come from us. The effect of this trifle was immense; every fashionable article was now to assume the shape of a sling; bread, hats, gloves, handkerchiefs, fans, &c., and we ourselves became more in fashion by this folly, than by what was essential. The revolutionary term was never forgotten by the French, a circumstance which might have been considered as propitious of that after-revolution, which De Retz had the imagination to project, but not the daring to establish. We see, however, this great politician, confessing the advantages his party derived by encouraging the application of a by-name, which served 'to heat the minds of people.'

It is a curious circumstance that I should have to recount in this chapter on 'Political Nick-names' a familiar term with all lovers of art, that of Silhouette! This is well understood as a black profile, but it is more extraordinary that a term so universally adopted should not be found in any dictionary, either in that of L'Academie, or in Todd's, and has not even been preserved, where it is quite indispensable, in Millia's Dictionnaire des Beaux-Arts! It is little suspected that this innocent term originated in a political nick-name! Silhouette was minister of state in France in 1759; that period was a critical one; the treasury was in an exhausted condition, and Silhouette, a very

t man, who would hold no intercourse with financiers, a-mongers, could contrive no other expedient to prevent national bankruptcy, than excessive economy, and a notable reform! Paris was not the metropolis, any more than London, where a Plato or a Zeno could long minister of state, without incurring all the ridicule of wretched wits! At first they pretended to take his ad-miration to laugh at him!—they cut their coats shorter, wore those without sleeves; they turned their gold boxes into rough wouden ones; and the new-fash-ed portraits were now only profiles of a face, traced by ick pencil on the shadow cast by a candle on white w! All the fashions assumed an air of niggardly ousy, till poor Silhouette was driven into retirement, all his projects of savings and reforms; but he left name to describe the most economical sort of portrait, one as melancholy as his own fate!

his political artifice of appropriating cant terms, or od-nick-names, could not fail to flourish among a people uly partially divided by contending interests as ourselves; y party with us have had their watch-word, which has ed either to congregate themselves, or to set on the -dags of one faction to worry and tear those of another. y practised it early, and we find it still prospering! The izes of Elizabeth's reign survives to this hour; the mg difficulties which that wise sovereign had to over- ne in settling the national religion, found no sympathy ither of the great divisions of her people; she retained much of the catholic rites as might be decorous in the w religion, and sought to unite, and not to separate, her idden. John Knox, in the spirit of charity, declared, at 'she was neither gude protestant, nor yet resolute pa- triot; let the world judge quik is the third.

A jealous party arose, who were for reforming the refor-mation. In their attempt at more than human purity, they raised the nick-name of Puritans; and from their fasti-ciousness about very small matters, Presbiterians; these Dray-m characterized as persons that for a painted glass win-dow would pull down the whole church. At that early eriod these nick-names were soon used in an odious sense; r Warner, a poet in the reign of Elizabeth, says,—

If hypocrites, why puritaines we term be asked, in breefe, I'm but an ironised-terme; good-fellow so spels theefo!

Honest Fuller, who knew that many good men were among these Puritans, wished to decline the term alto-gether, under the less offensive one of Non-conformists. But the fierce and the fiery of this party, in Charles the First's time, had been too obtrusive not to fully merit the ironical appellation; and the peaceful expedient of our Moderator dropped away with the page in which it was written. The people have frequently expressed their own notions of different parliaments by some apt nick-name. In Richard the Second's time, to express their dislike of the extraordinary and irregular proceedings of the lords against the sovereign, as well as their sanguinary mea-sures, they called it 'The wonder-working and the sum-mer-siful parliament.' In Edward the Third's reign, when the Black Prince was yet living, the parliament, for having pursued with severity the party of the duke of Lancaster, was so popular, that the people distinguished it as the good parliament. In Henry the Third's time, the parliament opposing the king, was called 'Parliamentum inaneum,' the mad parliament, because the lords came armed to in-terfere in the confirmation of the great charter. A Scottish parliament, from its perpetual shiftings from place to place, was ludicrously nick-named the wandering parliament; in the same spirit we had our long parliament. The nick-name of Pensioner parliament stuck to the House of Commons which sat forty years without dissolution, under Charles the Second; and others have borne satirical or laudatory epithets. So true it is, as old Holingshead observed, 'The common people will manie times give such be names as are worth best liking to themselves.' It would be a curious speculation to discover the sources of the popular feeling; influenced by delusion, or impelled by good sense!

The exterminating political nick-name of malignant infected the nation through the civil wars: it was a pro-position—and a list of good and bad lords was read by the orders of the first tumults. Of all these inventions, this obnoxious one was most adapted to exasperate the animos-ity of the people, so often duped by names. I have never noticed the active man of faction who first hit on this odi-ous brand for persons, but the period when the world changed its ordinary meaning was early; Charles, in 1642, retorts on the parliamentarians the opprobrious distinction, as 'The true malignant party which has contrived and countenanced those barbarous tumults.' And the royalists pleaded for themselves, that the hateful designation was ill applied to them: for by malignity you denote, said they, activity in doing evil, whereas we have always been on the suffering side in our persons, credits, and estates; but the parliamentarians, 'grinning a ghastly smile,' would reply, that 'the royalists would have been malignant had they proved successful.' The truth is, that malignancy meant with both parties any opposition of opinion. At the same period the offensive distinctions of round-heads and cavaliers supplied the people with party-names, who were al-ready provided with so many religious as well as civil causes of quarrel; the cropt heads of the sullen sectaries and the people, were the origin of the derisory nick-name; the splendid elegance and the romantic spirit of the royalists long awed the rabble, who in their mockery could brand them by no other appellation than one in which their bear-ers gloried. In these distracted times of early revolution, any nick-name, however vague, will fully answer a pur-pose, although neither those who are blackened by the odium nor those who cast it, can define the hateful appella-tive. When the term of delinquents came into vogue, it expressed a degree and species of guilt, says Hume, not exactly known or ascertained. It served however the end of those revolutionists, who had coined it, by involving any person in, or colouring any action by, delinquency; and many of the nobility and gentry were, without any ques-tions being asked, suddenly discovered to have committed the crime of delinquency! Whether honest Fuller be fa-cetious or grave on this period of nick-naming parties I will not decide; but, when he tells us that there was another word which was introduced into our nation at this time, I think at least that the whole passage is an admir-able commentary on this party vocabulary. 'Contem-porary with malignants is the word plunder, which some make of Latin original, from plandum dare, to level, to plene all to nothing! Others of Dutch extraction, as if it were to plume, or pluck the feathers of a bird to the bare skin.* Sure I am we first heard of it in the Swedish wars; and if the name and thing be sent back from whence it came, few English eyes would weep thereat.' All England had wept at the introduction of the word. The rump was the filthy nick-name of an odious faction—the history of this famous appellation, which was at first one of horror, till it afterwards became one of derision and contempt, must be referred to another place. The rump became a perpetual whetstone for the loyal wits, till at length its former ad-mirers, the rabble themselves, in town and country vied with each other in 'burning rumps' of beef which were hung by chains on a gallows with a bonfire underneath, and proved how the people, like children, come at length to make a play-thing of that which was once their bugbear.

Charles II during the short holiday of the restoration—all holidays seem short!—and when he and the people were in good humour, granted any thing to every one,—the mode of 'Petitions' got at length very inconvenient, and the king in council declared, that this petitioning was 'A method set on foot by ill men to promote discontents among the people,' and enjoined his loving subjects not to subscribe them. The petitioners however persisted—when a new party rose to express their abhorrence of peti-tioning; both parties nick-named each other the peti-tioners and the abhorrens! Their day was short, but fierce; the petitioners, however weak in their cognomen, were far the bolder of the two, for the commons were with them, and the abhorrens had expressed by their term rather the strength of their inclinations, than of their numbers. Charles II said to a petitioner from Taunton, 'How dare you deliver me such a paper?' 'Sir,' replied the peti-titioner from Taunton, 'My name is DANE.' A saucy reply, for which he was tried, fined, and imprisoned: when lo! the commons petitioned again to release the petitioner! 'The very name,' says Hume, 'by which each party de-nominated its antagonists discover the virulence and ran-cour which prevailed; for besides petitioner and abhorrer, this year is remarkable for being the epoch of the well-known epithets of Whig and Tory.' These silly terms of reproach are still preserved among us, as if the palladium of British liberty was guarded by these exotic names; for they are not English which the parties so invidiously bestow on each other. They are ludicrous enough in their origin; the friends of the court and the advocates of lineal succession, were by the republican party branded with the title of Tories, which was the name of certain Irish robbers: while the court party in return could find no other revenge than by appropriating to the covenanters and the republicans of that class, the name of the Scotch beverage of sour milk, whose virtue they considered so expressive of their dispositions, and which is called whigg. So ridiculous in their origin were these pernicious nick-names, which long excited feuds and quarrels in domestic life, and may still be said to divide into two great parties this land of political freedom. But nothing becomes obsolete in political factions, and the meaner and more scandalous the name affixed by one party to another, the more it becomes not only their rallying cry or their pass word, but even constitutes their glory. Thus the Hollanders long prided themselves on the humiliating nickname of 'les gueux,' the Protestants of France on the scornful one of the Huguenots; the non-conformists in England on the mockery of the peritians; and all parties have perpetuated their anger by their inglorious names. Swift was well aware of this truth in political history: 'each party,' says that sagacious observer, 'grows proud of that appellation which their adversaries at first intended as a reproach; of this sort were the Guelphs and the Ghibellines, Huguenots and Cavaliers.'

Nor has it been only by nick-naming each other by derogatory or opprobrious terms that parties have been marked, but they have also worn a livery, and practised distinctive manners. What sufferings did not Italy endure for a long series of years, under those fatal party-names of the Guelphs and the Ghibellines; alternately the victors and the vanquished, the beautiful land of Italy drank the blood of her children. Italy, like Greece, opens a moving picture of the hatreds and jealousies of small republics: her Bianca and her Nera, her Guelphs and her Ghibellines! In Bologna, two great families once shook that city with their divisions; the Pepoli adopted the French interests; the Malvezzi the Spanish. It was incurring some danger to walk the streets of Bologna, for the Pepoli wore their feathers on the right side of their caps, and the Malvezzi on the left. Such was the party-hatred of the two great Italian factions, that they carried their rancour even into their domestic habits; at table the Guelphs placed their knives and spoons longwise, and the Ghibellines across; the one cut their bread across, the other longwise. Even in cutting an orange they could not agree; for the Guelph cut his orange horizontally, and the Ghibelline downwards. Children were taught these artifices of faction—their hatreds became traditional, and thus the Italians perpetuated the full benefits of their party-epirit, from generation to generation.*

Men in private life go down to their graves with some unlucky name, not received in baptism, but more descriptive and picturesque; and even ministers of state have winced at a political christening. Malagrida the Jesuit and Jemmy Twitcher were nick-names, which made one of our ministers odious, and another contemptible. The Earl of Godolphin caught such fire at that of Volpene, that it drove him into the opposite party for the vindictive purpose of obtaining the impolitical prosecution of Sacheverell, who in his famous sermon had first applied it to the earl, and unluckily it had stuck to him.

'Faction,' says Lord Orford, 'is as capricious as fortune; wrongs, oppression, the zeal of real patriots, or the genius of false ones, may sometimes be employed for years in kindling substantial opposition to authority; in other seasons the impulse of a moment, a ballad, a nick-name, a fashion, can throw a city into a tumult, and shake the foundations of a state.'

Such is a slight history of the human passions in politics! We might despair in thus discovering that wisdom and patriotism so frequently originate in this turbid source of party; but we are consoled when we reflect that the most important political principles are immutable; and that they are those, which even the spark of party must learn to reverence.

THE DOMESTIC LIFE OF A POET.—SHENSTONE VINDICATED.

THE dogmatism of Johnson, and the fastidiousness of

* These curious particulars I found in a Manuscript.

Gray, the critic who passed his days amidst 'the hum of men,' and the poet who mused in cloistered solitude, have fatally injured a fine natural genius in Shenstone. Mr Campbell, with a brother's feeling, has (and the present article was composed) sympathized with the endowments and the pursuits of this poet; but the facts had collected seem to me to open a more important view. I am aware how lightly the poetical character of Shenstone is held by some great contemporaries—although the very poet has left us at least one poem of unrivalled originality. Mr Campbell has regretted that Shenstone was only 'affected that arcanism,' which 'gives a certain air of masquerade in his pastoral character' adopted by our earlier poets, but also has 'rather incongruously blended together the rural swain with the disciple of Verulam.' All this requires some explanation. It is not only as a poet, possessing the characteristics of poetry, but as a creature in another way, for which I claim the attention of the reader. I have formed a picture of the domestic life of a poet, and the pursuits of a votary of taste, both equally contracted in their endeavours, from the habits, the emotions, and the events which occurred to Shenstone.

Four material circumstances influenced his character, and were productive of all his unhappiness. The neglect he incurred in those poetical studies to which he had devoted his hopes; his secret sorrows in not having formed a domestic union, from prudential motives, with one whom he loved; the ruinous state of his domestic affairs, arising from a seducing passion for creating a new taste in landscape-gardening and an ornamented farm; and finally, the disappointment of that promised patronage, which might have induced him to have become a political writer; for which his inclinations, and, it is said, his talents in early life, were alike adapted: with these points in view, we may trace the different states of his mind, show what he did, and what he was earnestly intent to have done.

Why have the 'Elegies' of SHENSTONE, which forty years ago formed for many of us the favourite poems of our youth, ceased to delight us in mature life? It is perhaps that these Elegies, planned with peculiar felicity, have little in their execution. They form a series of poetical truths, but without poetical expression; truths, notwithstanding the pastoral romance in which the poet has enveloped himself, the subjects are real, and the feelings could not, therefore, be fictitious.

In a Preface, remarkable for its graceful simplicity, our poet tells us, that 'He entered on his subjects occasionally, particular incidents in life suggested, or dispositions of mind recommended them to his choice.' He shows that 'He drew his pictures from the spot, and he felt very sensibly the affections he communicates.' He avers that all those attendants on rural scenery, and all those allusions to rural life, were not the counterfeited scenes of a town-poet, any more than the sentiments, which were inspired by Nature. 'Shenstone's friend, Graves, who knew him early in life, and to his last days, informs us, that these Elegies were written when he had taken the Leasowes into his own hands; and though his serme cruds engaged his thoughts, he occasionally wrote them, 'partly,' said Shenstone, 'to divert my present impatience, and partly, as it will be a picture of most that passes in my own mind; a portrait which friends may value.' This, then, is the secret charm which acts so forcibly on the first emotions of our youth, at a moment when not too difficult to be pleased, the reflected delineations of the habits and the affections, the hopes and the delights, with all the domestic associations of this poet, always true to Nature, reflect back that picture of ourselves we instantly recognize. It is only as we advance in life that we lose the relish of our early simplicity, and that we discover that Shenstone was not endowed with high imagination.

These Elegies, with some other poems, may be read with a new interest, when we discover them to form the true Memoirs of Shenstone. Records of querulous, but delightful feelings; whose subjects spontaneously offered themselves from passing incidents; they still perpetuate emotions, which will interest the young poet, and the young lover of taste.

Elegy IV, the first which Shenstone composed, is entitled 'Ophelia's Urn,' and it was no unreal one! It was erected by Graves in Mickleton Church, to the memory of an extraordinary young woman, Ureacia Smith the literary daughter of a learned, but poor, clergyman. Ureacia had formed so fine a taste for literature, and composed with such elegance in verse and prose, that an explent judge declared, that 'he did not like to form his opinion of any author till he previously knew her.' Graves had been long attached to her, but from motives of prudence broke off an intercourse with this interesting roman, who sunk under this severe disappointment.—When her prudent lover, Graves, inscribed the urn, her friend Shenstone, perhaps more feelingly commemorated her virtues and her tastes. Such, indeed, was the friendly intercourse between Shenstone and Utrecia, that in Elegy XVIII, written long after her death, she still lingered in his reminiscences. Composing this Elegy on the calamitous close of Somerville's life, a brother bard, and victim's narrow circumstances, and which he probably contemplated as an image of his own, Shenstone tenderly recollects that he used to read Somerville's poems to Utrecia—

Oh, lost Ophelia! smoothly flow'd the day
To feel his music with my flames agree;
To taste the beauties of his melting lay,
To taste, and fancy it was dear to Thee!

How true is the feeling! how mean the poetical expression!

The Seventh Elegy describes a vision, where the shadow of Wolsey breaks upon the author:

'A graceful form appear'd,
White were his locks, with awful scarlet crown'd.'

Even this fanciful subject was not chosen capriciously, but sprung from an incident. Once, on his way to Cheltenham, Shenstone missed his road, and wandered till late at night among the Cotswold Hills; on this occasion he appears to have made a moral reflection, which we find in his 'Essays.' 'How melancholy is it to travel late upon my ambitious project on a winter's night, and observe the light of cottages, where all the unambitious people are warm and happy, or at rest in their beds.' While the benighted poet, lost among the lonely hills, was meditating on 'ambitious projects,' the character of Wolsey arose before him; the visionary cardinal crossed his path, and misled his imagination. 'Thou,' exclaims the poet,

'Like a meteor's fire,
Sho'st blazing forth, disdaining dull degrees.'

ELEGY VII.

And the bard, after discovering all the miseries of unhappy grandeur, and murmuring at this delay to the house of his friend, exclaims,

'On if these ills the price of power advance,
Check not my speed where social joys invite!'

The silent departure of the poetical sceptre is fine:

'The troubled vision cast a mournful glance,
And sighing, vanished in the shades of night.'

And to prove that the subject of this Elegy thus arose to the poet's fancy, he has himself commemorated the incident but gave occasion to it, in the opening:

'On distant heaths, beneath autumnal skies,
Fervid I saw the circling shades descend;
Weary and faint, I heard the storm arise,
While the sun vanish'd like a faithless friend.'

ELEGY VII.

The Fifteenth Elegy, composed 'in memory of a private family in Worcestershire,' is on the extinction of the ancient fam^y of the Penns in the male line.* Shenstone's mother was a Penn; and the poet was now the inhabitant of their ancient mansion, an old timber-built house of the age of Elizabeth. The local description was 'real scene'—the shaded pool,—the group of ancient trees,—the flocking rooks, and the picture of the simple manners of his own ancestors, were realities, the emotions they excited were therefore genuine, and not one of those 'mockeries' of amplification from the crowd of versifiers.

The tenth Elegy, 'To Fortune, suggesting his Motive in repining at her Dispensations,' with his celebrated Pastoral Ballad, in four parts, were alike produced by that one of the great minstrels of our own times has so fully indicated when he sung

'The secret woes the world has never known;
While on the weary night dawn'd wearier day,
And bitterer was the grief devour'd alone.'

In this Elegy, SHENSTONE repines at the dispensations Fortune, not for having denied him her higher gifts, nor as she compels him to 'Check the fond love of Art that fir'd my veins,'

* This we learn from Dr Nash's History of Worcestershire.

nor that some 'dull dotard with boundless wealth,' finds his 'grating reed' preferred to the bard's, but that the 'tawdry shepherdess' of this dull dotard, by her 'pride,' makes 'the rural thane,' despise the poet's Delia.

'Must Delia's softness, elegance, and ease,
Subtlety to Marian's dress? to Marian's gold?
Must Marian's robe from distant India please?
The simple fleece my Delia's limbs unfold!

Ah! what is native worth esteemed of clowns?
'Tis thy false glare, O Fortune! thine they see;
'Tis for my Delia's sake I dread thy frowns,
And my last gasp shall curses breathe on thee!

The Delia of our poet was not an 'Iris en air.' SHENSTONE was early in life captivated by a young lady, whom Graves describes with all those mild and serene graces of pensive melancholy, touched by plaintive love-songs and elegies of woe, adapted not only to be the muse, but the mistress of a poet. The sensibility of this passion took entire possession of his heart for some years, and it was in parting from her that he first sketched his exquisite 'Pastoral Ballad.' As he retreated more and more into solitude, his passion felt no diminution. Dr Nash informs us, that Shenstone acknowledged that it was his own fault that he did not accept the hand of the lady whom he so tenderly loved; but his spirit could not endure to be a perpetual witness of her degradation in the rank of society, by an inconsiderate union with poetry and poverty. That such was his motive, we may infer from a passage in one of his letters. 'Love' as it regularly tends to matrimony, requires certain favours from fortune and circumstances to render it proper to be indulged in. There are perpetual allusions to these 'secret woes' in his correspondence; for, although he had the fortitude to refuse marriage, he had not the stoicism to contract his own heart, in cold and sullen celibacy. He thus alludes to this subject, which so often excited far other emotions than those of humour—'It is long since I have considered myself as undone. The world will not, perhaps, consider me in that light entirely till I have married my maid!'

It is probable that our poet had an intention of marrying his maid. I discovered a pleasing anecdote among the late Mr Bindley's collections, which I transcribed from the original. On the back of a picture of Shenstone himself, of which Doddsley published a print in 1780, the following energetic inscription was written by the poet on his new year's gift.

'This picture belongs to Mary Cutler, given her by her master, William Shenstone, January 1st, 1764, in acknowledgment of her native genius, her magnanimity, her tenderness, and her fidelity. W. S.'

'The Progress of Taste; or the fate of Delicacy,' is a poem on the temper and studies of the author; and 'Economy; a Rhapsody, addressed to young Poets,' abounds with self-touches. If Shenstone created little from the imagination, he was at least perpetually under the influence of real emotions. This is the reason why his truths so strongly operate on the juvenile mind, not yet matured; and thus we have sufficiently ascertained the fact, as the poet himself has expressed it, that he drew his pictures from the spot, and he felt very sensibly the affections he communicates.

All the anxieties of a poetical life were early experienced by Shenstone. He first published some juvenile productions, under a very odd title, indicative of modesty, perhaps too of pride.* And his motto of Contentus paucis lectoribus, even Horace himself might have smiled at, for it only conceals the desire of every poet, who pants to deserve many! But when he tried at a more elaborate poetical labour, 'The judgment of Hercules,' it failed to attract notice. He hastened to town, and he beat about literary coffee-houses; and returned to the country, from the chase of Fame, wearied without having started it.

* While at college he printed, without his name, a small volume of verses, with this title, 'Poems upon various Occasions, written for the Entertainment of the Author, and printed for the Amusement of a few Friends, prejudiced in his Favour.' Oxford, 1737. 12 mo.—Nash's History of Worcestershire, Vol. I, p. 528.

I find this notice of it in W. Lowndes's Catalogue; 442 Shenstone (W.) Poems, 3/, 13s. 6d.—(Shenstone took an common pains to suppress this book, by collecting and destroying copies wherever he met with them.)—In Longman's Bibliotheca Anglo-Poetica. It is valued at 15s. Oxf. 1737! Mr Harris informs me, that about the year 1770, Fletcher, the bookseller, at Oxford, had many copies of this first edition, which he sold at Eighteen pence each. The prices are amusing. The prices of books are connected with their history

'A breath revived him—but a breath o'withrew.'

Even the 'judgment of Hercules' between Indolence and Industry, or Pleasure and Virtue, was a picture of his own feelings; an argument drawn from his own reasonings; indicating the uncertainty of the poet's dubious disposition: who finally, by siding with Indolence, lost that triumph by which his hero obtained a directly opposite course.

In the following year begins that melancholy strain in his correspondence, which marks the disappointment of the man who had staked too great a quantity of his happiness on the poetical die. This was the critical moment of life when our character is formed by habit, and our fate is decided by choice. Was Shenstone to become an active, or contemplative being? He yielded to Nature!¹⁸

It was now that he entered into another species of poetry, working with too costly materials, in the magical composition of plants, water, and earth; with these he created those emotions, which his more strictly poetical ones failed to excite. He planned a paradise amidst his solitude.

When we consider that Shenstone, in developing his fine pastoral ideas in the Leasowes, educated the nation into that taste for landscape-gardening, which has become the model of all Europe, this itself constitutes a claim on the gratitude of posterity. Thus the private pleasures of a man of genius may become at length those of a whole people. The creator of this new taste appears to have received far less notice than he merited. The name of Shenstone does not appear in the Essay on Gardening, by Lord Orford; even the supercilious Gray only bestowed a ludicrous image on these pastoral scenes, which, however, his friend Mason has celebrated; and the genius of Johnson, incapacitated by nature to touch on objects of rural fancy, after describing some of the offices of the landscape designer, adds, that 'he will not inquire whether they demand any great powers of mind.' Johnson, however, conveys to us his own feelings, when he immediately expresses them under the character of 'a sullen and surly speculator.' The anxious life of Shenstone would indeed have been remunerated, could he have read the enchanting eulogium of Wheatley on the Leasowes; which, said he, 'is a perfect picture of his mind—simple, elegant and amiable; and will always suggest a doubt whether the spot inspired his verse, or whether in the scenes which he formed, he only realized the pastoral images which abound in his songs.' Yes! Shenstone had been delighted could he have heard that Montesquieu, on his return home, adorned his 'Chateau Gothique, mais orné de bois charmans, dont j'ai pris l'idée en Angleterre;' and Shenstone, even with his modest and timid nature, had been proud to have witnessed a noble foreigner, amidst memorials dedicated to Theocritus and Virgil, to Thomson and Gessner, raising in his grounds an inscription, in bad English, but in pure taste, to Shenstone himself; for having displayed in his writings 'a mind natural,' and in his Leasowes 'laid Arcadian groves rural; and recently Pindemonte has traced the taste of English gardening to Shenstone. A man of genius sometimes receives from foreigners, who are placed out of the prejudices of his compatriots, the tribute of posterity!

Amidst these rural elegancies which Shenstone was raising about him, his muse has pathetically sung his melancholy feelings—

But did the Muses haunt his cell,
Or in his dome did Venus dwell?
When all the structures shone complete
Ah me! 'twas Damon's own confession,
Came Poverty and took possession.

THE PROGRESS OF TASTE.

The poet observes that the wants of philosophy are contracted, satisfied with 'cheap contentment,' but 'Taste alone requires

Entire profusion! days and nights, and hours
Thy voice, hydropic Fancy! calls aloud
For costly draughts——'

ECONOMY.

An original image illustrates that fatal want of economy

* On this subject Graves makes a very useful observation. 'In this decision the happiness of Mr Shenstone was materially concerned. Whether he determined wisely or not, people of taste and people of worldly prudence will probably be of very different opinions. I somewhat suspect, that "people of worldly prudence" are not half the fools that "people of taste" instant they are.'

which conceals itself amidst the beautiful appearance taste:

'Some graceless mark,
Some symptom ill-conceal'd, shall soon or late
Burn like a pimple from the virtuous tide
Of acid blood, proclaiming want's disease
Amidst the bloom of show.'

ECONOMY.

He paints himself:

'Observe Florio's mien;
Why treads my friend with melancholy step
That beamless brow? Why pensive strays his eye
O'er statues, groves, urns, by critic art
Proportion'd fair? or from his lofty dome
Returns his eye unpleas'd discontented?'
The cause is 'criminal expense,' and he exclaims,

'Sweet interchange
Of river, valley, mountain, woods, and plains,
How gladsome once he rang'd your native turf;
Your simple scenes how raptur'd! ere express
Had lavish'd thousand ornaments, and taught Convenience to perplex him, Art to pall,
Pomp to deject, and Beauty to displease.

ECONOMY.

While Shenstone was rearing hazels and hawthorn opening vistas, and winding waters;

'And having shown them where to stray,
Threw little pebbles in their way'

while he was pulling down hovels and cow-houses, to set pose mottoes and inscriptions for garden-seats and all while he had so finely obscured with a tender gloom grove of Virgil, and thrown over, 'in the midst of a pla-tation of yew, a bridge of one arch, built of a dusky loured stone, and simple even to rudeness,'¹⁹ and in Oberon in some Arcadian scene;

'Where in cool grove and mossy cell
The tripping fawns and fairies dwell';

the solitary magician, who had raised all these wastes was, in reality, an unfortunate poet, the tenant of a distated farm-house, where the winds passed through, & the rains lodged, often taking refuge in his own kitchen.

Far from all resort of mirth,
Save the cricket on the hearth!

In a letter of the disconsolate founder of landscape gardening, our author paints his situation with all its miserable—lamenting that his house is not fit to receive 'poet friends, were they so disposed;' and resolved to banish others, he proceeds:

'But I make it a certain rule, "arcere profusum u-gas." Persons who will despise you for the want of good set of chairs, or an uncouth fire-shovel, at the same time that they can't taste any excellence in a mind that overlooks those things; with whom it is in vain that you mind is furnished, if the walls are naked; indeed one is much of one's acquisitions in virtue by an hours conversation with such as judge of merit by money—yet I am now so then impelled by the social passion to sit half an hour my kitchen.'

But the solicitude of friends and the fate of Somers-ville a neighbour and a poet, often compelled Shenstone to sit amidst his reveries; and thus he has preserved his feelings and his irresolutions. Reflecting on the death Somerville, he writes,

'To be forced to drink himself into pains of the head in order to get rid of the pains of the mind, is a misfortune which I can well conceive, because I may, without ven-ty, esteem myself his equal in point of economy, and so consequently ought to have an eye on his misfortunes—you kindly hinted to me about twelve o'clock, at the P^r there.—I should retrench—I will—but you shall not me—I will not let you know that I took it in good part—will do it at solitary times as I may.'

Such were the calamities of 'great taste' with 'his fortune'; but in the case of Shenstone, these were combined with the other calamity of 'mediocrity of genius.'

Here, then, at the Leasowes, with occasional trips town in pursuit of fame, which perpetually eluded grasp; in the correspondence of a few delicate mis-whose admiration was substituted for more genuine cobrity; composing distiches against economy and all while his income was diminishing every year; our selected author grew daily more indolent and sedentary,²⁰ withdrawing himself entirely into his own hermitage, moaned and depaired in an Arcadian solitude.* The cries and the 'secret sorrows' of Shenstone have come down to us—those of his brothers have not always! And shall dull men, because they have minds cold and obscure, like a Lapland year which has no summer, be permitted to exult over this class of men of sensibility and taste, but of moderate genius and without fortune? The passions and emotions of the heart are facts and dates, only to those who possess them.

To what a melancholy state was our author reduced, when he thus addressed his friend:

'I suppose you have been informed that my fever was in a great measure hypochondriacal, and left my nerves so extremely sensible, that even on my very interesting subject, I could readily think myself into a vertigo; I had almost said an epilepsy for surely I was oftentimes near it.'

The features of this sad portrait are more particularly made out in another place.

'Now I am come home from a visit, very little uneasiness is sufficient to introduce my whole train of melancholy considerations, and to make me utterly dissatisfied with the life I now lead, and the life which I foresee I shall lead. I am angry and envious, and dejected and frantic, and disregard all present things, just as becomes a mad-man to do. I am infinitely pleased (though it is a gloomy joy) with the application of Dr Swift's complaint 'that he is forced to die in a rage, like a poisoned rat in a hole.' My soul is no more fitted to the figure I make, than a cable rope to a cambric needle; I cannot bear to see the advantages alienated, which I think I could deserve and relish so much more than those that have them.'

There are other testimonies in his entire correspondence. Whenever forsaken by his company he describes the horrors around him, delivered up 'to winter, silence, and reflection;' ever foreseeing himself 'returning to the same series of melancholy hours.' His frame shattered by the whole train of hypochondriacal symptoms, there was nothing to cheer the querulous author, who with half the consciousness of genius, lived neglected and unpatronised.—His elegant mind had not the force, by his productions, to draw the celebrity he sighed after, to his hermitage.

Shenstone was so anxious for his literary character, that he contemplated on the posthumous fame which he might derive from the publication of his Letters: see Letter LXXIX, on hearing his letters to Mr Whistler were destroyed. The act of a merchant, his brother, who being a very sensible man, as Graves describes, yet with the stupidity of a Goth, destroyed the whole correspondence of Shenstone, for 'its sentimental intercourse.'—Shenstone bitterly regrets the loss, and says, 'I would have given more money for the letters than it is allowable for me to mention with decency. I look upon my letters as some of my chief treasures—they are the history of my mind for these twenty years past.' This, with the loss of Cowley's correspondence, should have been preserved in the article 'of suppressors and dilapidators of manuscripts.'

Towards the close of life, when his spirits were exhausted, and 'the silly clue of hopes and expectations,' as he termed them, was undone, the notice of some persons of rank began to reach him. Shenstone, however, deeply colours the variable state of his own mind.—'Recovering from a nervous fever, as I have since discovered by many concurrent symptoms, I seem to anticipate a little of that "vernal delight" which Milton mentions and thinks

"———able to chase

All sadness, but despair!"

at least I begin to resume my silly clue of hopes and expectations.'

In a former letter he had, however, given them up; 'I begin to wean myself from all hopes and expectations whatever. I feed my wild-ducks, and I water my carnations. Happy enough if I could extinguish my ambition quite, to indulge the desire of being something more bene-

* Graves was supposed to have glanced at his friend Shenstone in his novel of 'Columella; or the Distressed Anchorite. The aim of this work is to convey all the moral instruction I could wish to offer here to youthful genius. ficial in my sphere.—Perhaps some few other circumstances would want also to be adjusted.'

What were these 'hopes and expectations,' from which sometimes he weans himself, and which are perpetually revived, and are attributed to 'an ambition he cannot extinguish?' This article has been written in vain, if the reader has not already perceived, that they had haunted him in early life; sickening his spirit after the possession of a poetical celebrity, unattainable by his genius; some expectations too he might have cherished from the talent he possessed for political studies, in which Graves confidently says, that 'he would have made no inconsiderable figure, if he had had a sufficient motive for applying his mind to them.' Shenstone has left several proofs of this talent.* But his master-passion for literary fame had produced little more than anxieties and disappointments; and when he indulged his pastoral fancy in a beautiful creation on his grounds, it consumed the estate which it adorned. Johnson forcibly expressed his situation: 'His death was probably hastened by his anxieties. He was a lamp that spent its oil in blazing. It is said, that if he had lived a little longer, he would have been assisted by a pension.'

SECRET HISTORY OF THE BUILDING OF BLEUHEIM.

The secret history of this national edifice derives importance from its nature, and the remarkable characters involved in the unparalleled transaction. The great architect when obstructed in the progress of his work, by the irregular payments of the workmen appears to have practised one of his own comic plots to put the debts on the hero himself; while the duke who had it much at heart to inhabit the palace of his fame, but tutored into wariness under the vigilant and fierce eye of Atossa, would neither approve nor disapprove, silently looked on in hope and in grief, from year to year, as the work proceeded, or as it was left at a stand. At length we find this comedie larmoyante wound up by the duchess herself, in an attempt utterly to ruin the enraged and insulted architect: †

Perhaps this was the first time that it had ever been resolved in parliament to raise a public monument of glory and gratitude—to an individual! The novelty of the attempt may serve as the only excuse for the loose arrangements which followed after parliament had approved of the design, without voting any specific supply for the purpose! The queen always issued the orders at her own expense, and commanded expedition; and while Anne lived, the expenses of the building were included in her majesty's debts, as belonging to the civil list sanctioned by parliament.

When George the First came to the throne, the parliament declared the debt to be the debt of the queen, and the king granted a privy seal as for other debts. The crown and the parliament had hitherto proceeded in perfect union respecting this national edifice. However, I find that the workmen were greatly in arrears; for when George the First ascended the throne, they gladly accepted a third part of their several debts!

The great architect found himself amidst inextricable difficulties. With the fertile invention which amuses in his comedies, he contrived an extraordinary scheme, by which he proposed to make the duke himself responsible for the building of Blenheim!

However much the duke longed to see the magnificent edifice concluded, he showed the same calm intrepidity in the building of Blenheim as he had in its field of action. Aware that if he himself gave any order, or suggested any alteration, he might be involved in the expense of the building, he was never to be circumvented,—never to be surprised into a spontaneous emotion of pleasure or disapprobation; on no occasion, he declares, had he even entered into conversation with the architect (though his friend) or with any one acting under his orders,—about Blenheim House! Such impenetrable prudence on all sides had often blunted the subdulous ingenuity of the architect and plotter of comedies!

In the absence of the duke, when abroad in 1708, Sir John contrived to obtain from Lord Godolphin the friend

* See his Letters XL, and XLI, and more particularly XLII, and XLIII, with a new theory of political principles.

† I draw the materials of this secret history from an unpublished 'Case of the Duke of Marlborough and Sir John Vanbrugh, as also from some confidential correspondence of Vanbrugh with Jacob Tonson, his friend and publisher.

and relative of the duke of Marlborough, and probably his agent in some of his concerns, a warrant, constituting Vanbrugh surveyor, with power of contracting on the behalf of the Duke of Marlborough. How he prevailed on Lord Godolphin to get this appointment does not appear—his lordship probably conceived it was useful, and might assist in expediting the great work, the favourite object of the hero. This warrant, however, Vanbrugh kept entirely to himself; he never mentioned to the duke that he was in the possession of any such power; nor on his return, did he claim to have it renewed.

The building proceeded with the same delays, and the payments with the same irregularity; the veteran now foresaw what happened, that he should never be the inhabitant of his own house! The public money issued from the Treasury was never to be depended on; and after 1712, the duke took the building upon himself, for the purpose of accommodating the workmen. They had hitherto received what was called 'crown pay,' which was high wages and uncertain payment—and they now gladly abated a third of their prices. But though the duke had undertaken to pay the workmen, this could make no alteration in the claims on the Treasury. Blenheim was to be built for Marlborough, not by him; it was a monument raised by the nation to their hero, not a palace to be built by their mutual contributions.

Whether Marlborough found that his own million might be slowly injured while the Treasury remained still obdurate, or that the architect was still more and more involved, I cannot tell; but in 1715, the workmen appear to have struck, and the old delays and stand-still again renewed. It was then Sir John, for the first time, produced the warrant he had extracted from Lord Godolphin, to lay before the Treasury; adding, however, a memorandum, to prevent any misconception, that the duke was to be considered as the paymaster, the debts incurred devolving on the crown. This part of our secret history requires more development than I am enabled to afford: as my information is drawn from 'the Case' of the duke of Marlborough in reply to Sir John's depositions, it is possible Vanbrugh may suffer more than he ought in this narration; which, however, incidentally notices his own statements.

A new scene opens! Vanbrugh not obtaining his claims from the Treasury, and the workmen becoming more clamorous, the architect suddenly turns round on the duke, at once to charge him with the whole debt.

The pitiable history of this magnificent monument of public gratitude, from its beginnings, is given by Vanbrugh in his deposition. The great architect represents himself as being comptroller of her majesty's works; and as such was appointed to prepare a model, which model of Blenheim House her majesty kept in her palace, and gave her commands to issue money according to the direction of Mr Travers, the queen's surveyor-general; that the lord treasurer appointed her majesty's own officers to supervise these works; that it was upon defect of money from the Treasury that the workmen grew uneasy; that the work was stopped, till further orders of money from the Treasury; that the queen then ordered enough to secure it from winter weather; that afterwards she ordered more for payment of the workmen; that they were paid in part; and upon Sir John's telling them the queen's resolution to grant them a further supply, (after a stop put to it by the duchess's order) they went on and incurred the present debt; that this was afterwards brought into the house of commons as the debt of the crown, not owing from the queen to the Duke of Marlborough, but to the workmen, and this by the queen's officers.

During the uncertain progress of the building, and while the workmen were often in deep arrears, it would seem that the architect often designed to involve the Marlboroughs in its fate and his own; he probably thought that some of their round million might bear to be chipped, to finish his great work, with which, too, their glory was so intimately connected. The famous duchess had evidently put the duke on the defensive; but once, perhaps, was the duke on the point of indulging some generous architectural fancy, when lo! Atossa stepped forwards and 'put a stop to the building.'

When Vanbrugh at length produced the warrant of Lord Godolphin, empowering him to contract for the duke, this instrument was utterly disclaimed by Marlborough; the duke declares it existed without his knowledge; and that if such an instrument for a moment was to be held valid, no man would be safe, but might be ruined by the act of another!

Vanbrugh seems to have involved the intricacy of his plot, till it fell into some contradictions. The queen he had not found difficult to manage; but after her death, when the Treasury failed in its golden source, he seems to have sat down to contrive how to make the duke the great debtor. Vanbrugh swears that 'He himself looked upon the crown, as engaged to the Duke of Marlborough for the expense; but that he believes the workmen always looked upon the duke as their paymaster.' He advances so far, as to swear that he made a contract with particular workmen, which contract was not unknown to the duke. This was not denied; but the duke in his reply observes, that 'he knew' not that the workmen were employed for his account, or by his own agent;—never having heard till Sir John produced the warrant from Lord Godolphin, that Sir John was 'his surveyor!' which he disclaims.

Our architect, however opposite his depositions appear, contrived to become a witness to such facts as tended to conclude the duke to be the debtor for the building; and 'in his depositions has taken as much care to have the guilt of perjury without the punishment of it, as any man could do.' He so managed; though he has not sworn to contradictions, that the natural tendency of one part of his evidence presses one way, and the natural tendency of another part presses the direct contrary way. In his former memorial, the main design was to disengage the duke from the debt; in his depositions, the main design was to charge the duke with the debt. Vanbrugh, it must be confessed, exerted not less of his dramatic than his architectural genius in the building of Blenheim!

'The Case' concludes with an eloquent reflection, where Vanbrugh is distinguished as the man of genius, though not, in this predicament, the man of honour. 'It is at last the charge run into by order of the crown must be upon the duke, yet the infamy of it must go upon another, who was perhaps the only Architect in the world capable of building such a house; and the only friend in the world capable of contriving to lay the debt upon one to whom he was so highly obliged.'

There is a curious fact in the depositions of Vanbrugh, by which we might infer that the idea of Blenheim House might have originated with the duke himself; he swears that in 1704, the duke met him, and told him he designed to build a house, and must consult him about a model, &c; but it was the queen who ordered the present house to be built with all expedition.

The whole conduct of this national edifice was unworthy of the nation, if in truth the nation ever entered heartily into it. No specific sum had been voted in parliament for so great an undertaking; which afterwards was the occasion of involving all the parties concerned in trouble and litigation, threatened the ruin of the architect; and I think we shall see, by Vanbrugh's letters, was finished at the sole charge, and even under the superintendence, of the duchess herself! It may be a question, whether this magnificent monument of glory did not rather originate in the spirit of party, in the urgent desire of the queen to allay the pride and jealousies of the Marlboroughs. From the circumstance to which Vanbrugh has sworn, that the duke had designed to have a house built by Vanbrugh, before Blenheim had been resolved on, we may suppose that this intention of the duke's afforded the queen a suggestion of a national edifice.

Archdeacon Coxe, in his life of Marlborough, has obscurely alluded to the circumstances attending the building of Blenheim. 'The illness of the duke, and the tedious litigation which ensued, caused such delays, that little progress was made in the work at the time of his decease. In the interim, a serious misunderstanding arose between the duchess and the architect, which forms the subject of a voluminous correspondence. Vanbrugh was in consequence removed, and the direction of the building confided to other hands, under her own immediate superintendence.'

This 'voluminous correspondence' would probably afford 'words that burn' of the lofty insolence of Atossa, and 'thoughts that breathe' of the comic wit; it might too relate, in many curious points, to the stupendous fabric itself. If her grace condescended to criticise its parts with the frank roughness she is known to have done to the architect himself, his own defence and explanations might to let us into the bewildering fancies of his magical lecture. Of that self-creation for which he was so abused in his own day as to have lost his real vocation as an architect, and stand condemned for posterity as a volatile bitterness of Lord Orford, nothing is left for us our own convictions—to behold, and to be for ever ashamed! But 'this voluminous correspondence?' Alas! historian of war and politics overlooks with contempt little secret histories of art, and of human nature!—'a voluminous correspondence' which indicates so, and on which not a solitary idea is bestowed, has served to petrify our curiosity!

This quarrel between the famous duchess and Vanbrugh I have only recovered several vivacious extracts from confidential letters of Vanbrugh's to Jacob Tonson. It was an equality of the genius of invention, as well as of wit, in her grace and the wit: whether Atossa, Vanbrugh, could have had the patience to have composed a comedy of five acts I will not determine; but unquestionably she could have dictated many scenes with a spirit. We have seen Vanbrugh attempting to turn debts incurred by the building of Blenheim on the Duke; we now learn, for the first time, that the duchess, of equal aptitude, contrived a counter-plot to turn the Duke on Vanbrugh!

I have the misfortune of losing, for I now see little of ever getting it, nearly 200*l.* due to me for many years' service, plague, and trouble, at Blenheim, which wicked woman of 'Marlborough' is so far from paying me, that the Duke being sued by some of the workmen who work done there, she has tried to turn the debt due to me upon me, for which I think she ought to be hanged.' In 1722, on occasion of the Duke's death, Vanbrugh gives account to Tonson of the great wealth of the Marlboroughs, with a caustic touch at his illustrious victims.

The Duke of Marlborough's treasure exceeds the most extravagant guess. The grand settlement, which it was pected her grace had broken to pieces, stands good, and hands an immense wealth to Lord Godolphin and his successors. A round million has been moving about in as on the land-tax, &c. This the Treasury knew before he died, and this was exclusive of his 'land'; his 30*l.* a year upon the post-office; his mortgages upon a distressed estate; his South Sea stock; his annuities, and which were not subscribed in, and besides what is in sign banks; and yet this man could neither pay his men their bills, nor his architect his salary.

'He has given his widow (may a Scottish ensign get it!) 10,000*l.* a year to spoil Blenheim her own way; 2,000*l.* a year to keep herself clean and go to law; 2,000*l.* a year to Lord Riakon for present maintenance; and Lord Godolphin only 5,000*l.* a year jointure, if he outlives his lady; this last is a wretched article. The rest of the 30*l.* ap, for these are but snippings, goes to Lord Godolphin, and so on. She will have 40,000*l.* a year in present.'

Atossa, as the quarrel heated and the plot thickened, with the maliciousness of Puck, and the haughtiness of an oppressor of Blenheim, invented the most cruel insult that an architect endured!—one perfectly characteristic of an extraordinary woman. Vanbrugh went to Blenheim with his lady, in a company from Castle Howard, another magnificent monument of his singular genius.

'We staid two nights in Woodstock; but there was an order to the servants, under her grace's own hand, not to let me enter Blenheim! and lest that should not mortify me enough, she having somehow learned that my wife was of my company, sent an express the night before we came there, with orders that if she came with the Castle Howard ladies, the servants should not suffer her to see either house, garden, or even to enter the park: so she was forced to it all day long and keep me company at the inn!'

This was a coup de theatre in this joint comedy of Atossa and Vanbrugh! The architect of Blenheim, lifting his eyes towards his own massive grandeur, exiled to a dull inn, and imprisoned with one who required rather to be humiliated, than capable of consoling the enraged architect!

In 1725, Atossa still pursuing her hunted prey, had driven it to a spot which she flattered herself would endow it with the security of a preservative. This produced the following explosion!

'I have been forced into chancery by that B. B. the Duchess of Marlborough, where she has got an injunction upon me by her friend the late good chancellor (Earl of Macclesfield,) who declared that I was never employed by the Duke, and therefore had no demand upon his estate for my services at Blenheim. Since my hands were thus tied up from trying by law to recover my arrears, I have prevailed with Sir Robert Walpole to help me in a scheme which I proposed to him, by which I got my money in spite of the hussy's teeth. My carrying this point enrages her much, and the more because it is of considerable weight in my small fortune, which she has heartily endeavoured so to destroy as to throw me into an English bastille, there to finish my days, as I began them, in a French one.'

Plot for plot! and the superior claims of one of practised invention are vindicated! The writer, long accustomed to comedy-writing, has exhaled the self-taught genius of Atossa. The 'scheme' by which Vanbrugh's fertile invention, aided by Sir Robert Walpole, finally circumvented the avaricious, the haughty, and the capricious Atossa, remains untold, unless it is alluded to by the passage in Lord Orford's 'Anecdotes of Painting,' where he informs us that the 'duchess quarrelled with Sir John and went to law with him; but though he proved to be in the right, or rather because he proved to be in the right, she employed Sir Christopher Wren to build the house in St. James's Park.'

I have to add a curious discovery respecting Vanbrugh himself, which explains a circumstance in his life not hitherto understood.

In all the biographies of Vanbrugh, from the time of Gibber's Lives of the Poets, the early part of the life of this man of genius remains unknown. It is said he descended from an ancient family in Cheshire, which came originally from France, though by the name, which properly written would be Van Brugh, he would appear to be of Dutch extraction. A tale is universally repeated that Sir John once visiting France in the prosecution of his architectural studies, while taking a survey of some fortifications, excited alarm, and was carried to the Bastille; where, to deepen the interests of the story, he sketched a variety of comedies, which he must have communicated to the governor, who, whispering it doubtless as an affair of state to several of the noblesse, these admirers of 'sketches of comedies'—English ones no doubt—procured the release of this English Moliere. This tale is farther confirmed by a very odd circumstance. Sir John built at Greenwich, on the spot still called 'Vanbrugh's Fields,' two whimsical houses; one on the side of Greenwich Park is still called 'the Bastille-House,' built on its model, to commemorate this imprisonment.

Not a word of this detailed story is probably true! that the Bastille was an object which sometimes occupied the imagination of our architect, is probable; for, by the letter we have just quoted, we discover from himself the singular incident of Vanbrugh's having been born in the Bastille.

Desirous probably of concealing his alien origin, this circumstance cast his early days into obscurity. He felt that he was a Briton in all respects but that of his singular birth. The ancestors of Vanbrugh, who was of Cheshire, said to be of French extraction, though with a Dutch name, married Sir Dudley Carleton's daughter. We are told he had 'political connexions;' and one of his 'political' tours had probably occasioned his confinement in that state-dungeon, where his lady was delivered of her burden of love. The odd fancy of building a 'Bastille-House' at Greenwich, a fortified prison! suggested to his first life-writer the fine romance; which must now be thrown aside among those literary fictions the French distinguish by the softening and yet impudent term of 'Anecdotes hasardées?' with which formerly Varillas and his imitators furnished their pages; lies which looked like facts!

SECRET HISTORY OF SIR WALTER RAWLEIGH.*

Rawleigh exercised in perfection incompatible talents, and his character connects the opposite extremes of our nature! His 'book of life,' with its incidents of prosperity and adversity, of glory and humiliation, was as chequered as the novelist would desire for a tale of fiction. Yet in this mighty genius there lies an unsuspected disposition, which requires to be demonstrated, before it is possible to conceive its reality. From his earliest days he betrayed the genius of an adventurer, which prevailed in his character to the latest; and it often involved him in the practice of mean artifices and petty deceptions; which appear like folly in the wisdom of a sage; like ineptitude in the profound views of a politician; like cowardice in the magnanimity of a hero; and degrade by their littleness the grandeur of a character which was closed by a splendid death, worthy the life of the wisest and the greatest of mankind!

* Rawleigh, as was practised to a much later period, wrote his name various ways. In the former series of this work I have discovered at least how it was pronounced in his time—thus, Rawley. See in First Series, art. 'Orthography of Proper Names.'

The sunshine of his days was in the reign of Elizabeth. From a boy, always dreaming of romantic conquests, for he was born in an age of heroism; and formed by nature for the chivalric gallantry of the court of a maiden queen, from the moment he with such infinite art cast his rich mantle over the miry spot, his life was a progress of glory. All about Rawleigh was splendid as the dress he wore: his female sovereign, whose eyes loved to dwell on men who might have been fit subjects for 'the Faerie Queen' of Spenser, penurious of reward, only recompensed her favourites by suffering them to make their own fortunes on sea and land; and Elizabeth listened to the glowing projects of her hero, indulging that spirit which could have conquered the world, to have laid the toy at the feet of the sovereign!

This man, this extraordinary being, who was prodigal of his life and fortune on the Spanish main, in the idleness of peace could equally direct his invention to supply the domestic wants of every-day life, in his project of 'an office for address.' Nothing was too high for his ambition, nor too humble for his genius. Pre-eminent as a military and a naval commander, as a statesman and a student, Rawleigh was as intent on forming the character of Prince Henry, as that prince was studious of moulding his own aspiring qualities by the genius of the friend whom he contemplated. Yet the active life of Rawleigh is not more remarkable than his contemplative one. He may well rank among the founders of our literature: for composing on a subject exciting little interest, his fine genius has sealed his unfinished volume with immortality. For magnificence of eloquence, and massiveness of thought, we must still dwell on his pages.* Such was the man, who was the adored patron of Spenser; whom Ben Jonson, proud of calling other favourites 'his sons,' honoured by the title of his 'father;' and who left political instructions which Milton deigned to edit.

But how has it happened, that of so elevated a character, Gibbon has pronounced that it was 'ambiguous,' while it is described by Hume as 'a great but ill-regulated mind'?

There was a peculiarity in the character of this eminent man: he practised the cunning of an adventurer; a cunning, most humiliating in the narrative! The great difficulty to overcome in this discovery is, how to account for a sage and a hero acting fully and cowardice, and attempting to obtain by circuitous deception, what it may be supposed so magnanimous a spirit would not only deny to possess himself of by direct and open methods.

Since the present article was written, a letter, hitherto unpublished, appears in the recent edition of Shakespeare, which curiously and minutely records one of those artifices of the kind which I am about to narrate at length. When under Elizabeth, Rawleigh was once in confinement, and it appears, that seeing the queen passing by, he was suddenly seized with a strange resolution of combating with the governor and his people; declaring that the mere sight of the queen had made him desperate, as a confined lover would a fool at the sight of his mistress. The letter gives a minute narrative of Sir Walter's astonishing conduct, and carefully repeats the warm romantic style in which he talked of his royal mistress, and his formal resolution to die rather than exist out of her presence. This extravagant scene, with all its colouring, has been most elaborately penned by the ingenious letter-writer with a hint to the person whom he addresses, to suffer it to meet the eye of their royal mistresses, who could not fail of admiring our new 'Orlando Furioso,' and soon after released this tender prisoner! To me it is evident that the whole scene was got up and concerted for the occasion, and was the invention of Rawleigh himself; the romantic incident he well knew was perfectly adapted to the queen's taste. Another similar incident, in which I have been anticipated in the disclosure of the fact, though not of its nature, was what Sir Toby Matthews obscurely alludes to his letters of 'the guilty blow he gave him in the Tower;' a passage which had long excited my attention, till I discovered the curious incident in some manuscript letters of Lord Cecil. Rawleigh was then confined in the Tower for the Cobham conspiracy; a plot, absurd and obscure, that one historian has called a 'state-riddle,' but for which, so many years after, Raleigh so cruelly lost his life.

Lord Cecil gives an account of the examination of the prisoners involved in this conspiracy. 'One attempt whilst diverse of us were in the Tower examining some of these prisoners, Sir Walter attempted to murder him, whereof when we were advertised, we came to him, found him in some agony to be unable to endure his misfortunes, and protesting innocence, with carmen's life; and in that humour he had wounded himself under right pap, but so very mortally, being in truth rather a than a stab, and now very well cured both in body and mind.' This feeble attempt at suicide, this 'cut rather than stab,' I must place among those scenes in the life of Rawleigh, so mean and incomprehensible with the genius of the man. If it were nothing but one of those we must now open another of the

'Follies of the Wise!'

Rawleigh returned from the wild and desperate voyage of Guiana, with misery in every shape about him.* I soon had perished; his devoted Keymis would not mend his reproach; and Rawleigh, without fortune and with hope, in sickness and in sorrow, brooded over the thought, that in the hatred of the Spaniard, and in the political pusillanimity of James, he was arriving only to an inevitable death. With this presentiment, he had wished to give up his ship to the crew, had they consented to land him in France; but he was probably irresolute this decision at sea, as he was afterwards at land, when he wished to escape, and refused to fly: the clearest intellect was darkened, and magnanimity itself became tainted, floating between the sense of honour and of life.

Rawleigh landed in his native county of Devon: his arrival was the common topic of conversation, and he was the object of censure or of commiseration: but his person was not molested, till the fears of James became more urgent than his pity.

The Cervantic Gondomar, whose 'quips and quips' had concealed the cares of state, one day rushed into the presence of James, breathlessly calling out for audience, and compressing his 'ear-piercing' message into 'laconic abruptness of piratas! piratas! piratas!' The was agony as well as politics in this cry of Gondomar, whose brother, the Spanish governor, had been massacred in this predatory expedition. The timid monarch, terrified at this tragical appearance of his factious first saw at once the demands of the whole Spanish cabinet, and vented his palliative in a gentle proclamation. Rawleigh having settled his affairs in the West, set off for London to appear before the king, in consequence of the proclamation. A few miles from Plymouth, he was met by Lewis Stucley, vice-admiral of Devon, a kinsman and friend, who, in communication with government, had accepted a sort of surveillance over Sir Walter. It is so (and will be credited, when we hear the story of Stucley that he had set his heart on the ship, as a probable purchase; and on the person, against whom, to colour natural treachery, he professed an old hatred. He seized on Rawleigh more like the kinsman than the vice-admiral, and proposed travelling together to London, halting at the houses of the friends of Rawleigh. The warrant which Stucley in the meanwhile had desired was instantly despatched, and the bearer was one Mianoury French empiric, who was evidently sent to act the part did,—a part played at all times, and the last time in French politics, that so often had recourse to this instrument state, is a Mouton!

Rawleigh still, however was not placed under any restraint: his confidential associate, Captain King, accompanied him; and it is probable, that if Rawleigh had effectuated his escape, he would have conferred a great favour on the government.

They could not save him at London. It is certain that he might have escaped; for Captain King had hired a vessel, and Rawleigh had stolen out by night, and might have reached it, but irresolutely returned home; another night, the same vessel was ready, but Rawleigh never came! The loss of his honour appeared the greater calamity.

As he advanced in this eventful journey, every thing assumed a more formidable aspect. His friends communicated fearful advices; a pursuivant, or king's messenger, gave a more menacing appearance; and suggestions arose in his own mind, that he was reserved to become a victim of state. When letters of commission from the Privy council were brought to Sir Lewis Stucley, Rawleigh was observed to change countenance, exclaiming with an oath, 'Is it possible my fortune should return upon me thus again?' He lamented before Captain King, that he had neglected the opportunity of escape; and which, every day he advanced inland, removed him the more from any chance.

Rawleigh at first suspected that Manoury was one of those instruments of state, who are sometimes employed when open measures are not to be pursued, or when the cabinet have not yet determined on the fate of a person implicated in a state crime; in a word, Rawleigh thought that Manoury was a spy over him, and probably over Stucley too. The first impression in these matters is usually the right one; but when Rawleigh found himself caught in the toils, he imagined that such corrupt agents were to be corrupted. The French empiric was sounded, and found very compliant; Rawleigh was desirous by his aid to counterfeit sickness, and for this purpose invented a series of the most humiliating stratagems. He imagined that a constant appearance of sickness might produce delay, and procrastination, in the chapter of accidents, might end in pardon. He procured vomits from the Frenchman, and whenever he chose, produced every appearance of sickness; with dimness of sight, dizziness in his head, he reeled about, and once struck himself with such violence against a pillar in the gallery, that there was no doubt of his malady. Rawleigh's servant one morning entered Stucley's chamber, declared that his master was out of his senses, for that he had just left him in his shirt upon all fours, gnawing the rushes upon the floor. On Stucley's entrance, Rawleigh was raving, and reeling in strong convulsions. Stucley ordered him to be chafed and fomented, and Rawleigh afterwards laughed at this scene with Manoury, observing that he had made Stucley a perfect physician.

But Rawleigh found it required some more visible and alarming disease than such ridiculous scenes had exhibited. The vomits worked so slowly, that Manoury was fearful to repeat the doses. Rawleigh inquired, whether the empiric knew of any preparations which could make him look ghastly, without injuring his health. The Frenchman offered a harmless ointment to act on the surface of the skin, which would give him the appearance of a leper. 'That will do!' said Rawleigh, 'for the lords will be afraid to approach me, and besides it will move their pity.' Applying the ointment to his brows, his arms, and his breast, the blisters rose, the skin inflamed, and was covered with purple spots. Stucley concluded that Rawleigh had the plague. Physicians were now to be called in; Rawleigh took the black silk ribbon from his poniard, and Manoury tightened it strongly about his arm, to disorder his pulse; but his pulse beat too strong and regular. He appeared to take no food, while Manoury secretly provided him. To perplex the learned doctors still more, Rawleigh had the urinal coloured by a drug of a strong scent. The physicians pronounced the disease mortal, and that the patient could not be removed into the air without immediate danger. 'While after, being in his bed-chamber undressed, and no one present but Manoury, Sir Walter held a looking-glass in his hand, to admire his spotted face,* and observed in merriment to his new confidant, how they should one day laugh for having thus cosened—the king, council physicians, Spaniards and all. The excuse Rawleigh offered for this course of poor stratagems, so unworthy of his genius, was to obtain time and seclusion for writing his apology, or vindication of his voyage, which has come down to us in his 'Remains.' 'The prophet David did make himself a fool, and suffered spittle to fall upon his beard, to escape from the hands of his enemies,' said Rawleigh in his last speech. Brutus, too, was another example. But his discernment often prevailed over this mockery of his spirit. The king licensed him to reside at his own house on his arrival in London; on which Manoury observed, that the king showed by this indulgence, that his majesty was favourably inclined towards him; but Rawleigh replied, 'They used all these kinds of flatteries to the Duke of Byron, to draw him fairly into prison, and then they cut off his head. I know they have concluded among them, that it is expedient that a man should die, to re-assure the traffic which I have broke with Spain.' And Manoury adds, from whose narrative we have all these particulars, that Sir Walter broke out in this rant: 'If he could but save himself for this time, he would plot such plots, as should make the king think himself happy to send for him again, and restore him to his estate, and would force the king of Spain to write into England in his favour.'

Rawleigh at length proposed a flight to France with Manoury, who declares that it was then he revealed to Stucley what he had hitherto concealed, that Stucley might double his vigilance. Rawleigh now perceived that he had two rogues to bribe instead of one, and that they were playing into one another's hands. Proposals are now made to Stucley through Manoury, who is as compliant as his brother-knave. Rawleigh presented Stucley with 'a jewel made in the fashion of hail powdered with diamonds, with a ruby in the midst.' But Stucley observing to his kinsman and friend, that he must lose his office of Vice-admiral, which had cost him six hundred pounds, in case he suffered Rawleigh to escape; Rawleigh solemnly assured him that he should be no loser, and that his lady should give him one thousand pounds when they got into France or Holland. About this time the French quack took his leave; the part he had to act was performed; the juggle was complete: and two wretches had triumphed over the sagacity and magnanimity of a sage and a hero, whom misfortune had levelled to folly; and who, in violating the dignity of his own character, had only equalled himself with vulgar knaves; men who exulted that the circumventer was circumvented; or, as they expressed it, 'the great cosener was cosened.' But our story does not here conclude, for the treacheries of Stucley were more intricate. This perfect villain had obtained a warrant of indemnity, to authorize his compliance with any offer to assist Rawleigh in his escape; this wretch was the confidant and the executioner of Rawleigh; he carried about him a license to betray him, and was making his profit of the victim before he delivered him to the sacrifice. Rawleigh was still plotting his escape: at Salisbury he had despatched his confidential friend Captain King to London, to secure a boat at Tilbury; he had also a secret interview with the French agent. Rawleigh's servant mentioned to Captain King, that his boatswain had a ketch of his own, and was ready at his service for 'thirty pieces of silver;' the boatswain and Rawleigh's servant acted Judas, and betrayed the plot to Mr William Herbert, cousin to Stucley, and thus the treachery was kept among themselves as a family concern. The night for flight was now fixed, but he could not part without his friend Stucley, who had promised never to quit him; and who, indeed, informed by his cousin Herbert, had suddenly surprised Rawleigh putting on a false beard. The party met at the appointed place; Sir Lewis Stucley with his son, and Rawleigh disguised. Stucley in saluting King, asked whether he had not shown himself an honest man? King hoped he would continue so. They had not rowed twenty strokes, before the watermen observed, that Mr. Herbert had lately taken boat, and made towards the bridge, but had returned down the river after them. Rawleigh instantly expressed his apprehensions, and wished to return home; he consulted King—the watermen took flight—Stucley acted his part well; damning his ill-fortune to have a friend whom he would save, so full of doubts and fears, and threatening to pistol the watermen if they did not proceed. Even King was overcome by the earnest conduct of Stucley, and a new spirit was infused into the rowers. As they drew near Greenwich, a wherry crossed them. Rawleigh declared it came to discover them. King tried to allay his fears, and assured him that if once they reached Gravesend, he would hazard his life to get to Tilbury. But in these delays and discussions, the tide was failing; the watermen declared they could not reach Gravesend before morning; Rawleigh would have landed at Purfleet, and the boatswain encouraged him; for there it was thought he could procure horses for Tilbury. Sir Lewis Stucley too was zealous; and declared he was content to carry the cloak-bag on his own shoulders, for half a mile, but King declared that it was useless, they could not at that hour get horses, to go by land.

They rowed a mile beyond Woolwich, approaching two or three ketches, when the boatswain doubted whether any of these were the one he had provided to furnish them. 'We are betrayed!' cried Rawleigh, and ordered the watermen to row back: he strictly examined the boatswain, alas! his ingenuity was baffled by a shuffling villain, whose real answer appeared when a wherry hailed the boat: Rawleigh observed that it contained Herbert's crew. He saw that all was now discovered. He took Stucley aside; his ingenious mind still suggesting projects for himself to return home in safety, or how Stucley might plead that he had only pretended to go with Rawleigh, to seize on his private papers. They whispered together, and Rawleigh took some things from his pocket, and handed them to Stucley; probably more 'rubies powdered with diamonds.'—Some effect was instantaneously produced; for the tender heart of his friend Stucley relented, and he not only repeatedly embraced him with extraordinary warmth of affection, but was voluble in effusions of friendship and fidelity. Stucley persuaded Rawleigh to land at Gravesend, the strange wherry which had dogged them landing at the same time; these were people belonging to Mr Herbert and Sir William St John, who, it seems, had formerly shared in the spoils of this unhappy hero. On Greenwich bridge, Stucley advised Captain King that it would be advantageous to Sir Walter, that King should confess that he had joined with Stucley to betray his master; and Rawleigh lent himself to the suggestion of Stucley, of whose treachery he might still be uncertain; but King, a rough and honest seaman, declared that he would not share in the odium. At the moment he refused, Stucley arrested the captain in the king's name, committing him to the charge of Herbert's men. They then proceeded to a tavern, but Rawleigh, who now viewed the monster in his true shape, observed, 'Sir Lewis, these actions will not turn out to your credit; and on the following day, when they passed through the Tower-gate, Rawleigh turning to King, observed, 'Stucley and my servant Otterell have betrayed me. You need be in no fear of danger, but as for me, it is I who am the mark that is shot at.' Thus concludes the narrative of Captain King. The fate of Rawleigh soon verified the prediction.

This long narrative of treachery will not, however, be complete, unless we wind it up with the fate of the infamous Stucley. Fiction gives perfection to its narratives, by the privilege it enjoys of disposing of its criminals in the most exemplary manner; but the labours of the historian are not always refreshed by this moral pleasure. Retribution is not always discovered in the present stage of human existence, yet history is perhaps equally delightful as fiction, whenever its perfect catastrophes resemble those of romantic invention. The present is a splendid example.

I have discovered the secret history of Sir Lewis Stucley, in several manuscript letters of the times.

Rawleigh, in his admirable address from the scaffold, where he seemed to be rather one of the spectators than the sufferer, declared he forgave Sir Lewis, for he had forgiven all men; but he was bound in charity to caution all men against him, and such as he is! Rawleigh's last and solemn notice of the treachery of his 'kinsman and friend' was irrevocably fatal to this wretch. The hearts of the people were open to the deepest impressions of sympathy, melting into tears at the pathetic address of the magnanimous spirit who had touched them: in one moment Sir Lewis Stucley became an object of execration throughout the nation; he soon obtained a new title, that of 'Sir Judas,' and was shunned by every man. To remove the Cain-like mark, which God and men had fixed on him, he published an apology for his conduct; a performance which, at least, for its ability, might raise him in our consideration; but I have since discovered, in one of the manuscript letter-writers, that it was written by Dr Sharpe, who had been a chaplain to Henry Prince of Wales. The writer pleads in Stucley's justification, that he was a state agent; that it was lawful to lie for the discovery of treason; that he had a personal hatred towards Rawleigh, for having abridged his father of his share of some prize-money; and then enters more into Rawleigh's character, who 'being desperate of any fortune here, agreeable to the height of his mind, would have made up his fortune elsewhere, upon any terms against his sovereign and his country. Is it not marvel,' continues the personifier of Stucley, 'that he was angry with me at his death for bringing him back? Besides, being a man of so great a wit, it was no small grief, that a man of mean wit as I, should be thought to go beyond him. No? Sic ars delictor arte. Neque enim levius illis est quam necis arte, arte perire sua. (This apt latinity betrays Dr Sharpe.) But why did you not execute your commission bravely (openly)?—Why? My commission was to the contrary, to discover his pretensions, and to seize his secret papers, &c.*

But the doctor, though no unskilful writer, here wrote in vain; for what ingenuity can veil the turpitude of lying and practised treachery? To keep up appearances, Sir Judas resorted more than usually to court; where, however, he was perpetually enduring rebuffs, or avoided, as one infected with the plague of treachery. He offered the king, in his own justification, to take the sacrament, that whatever he had laid to Rawleigh's charge was true, and would produce two unexceptionable witnesses to do the like. 'Why, then,' replied his majesty, 'the more malicious was Sir Walter to utter these speeches at his death.' Sir Thomas Badger, who stood by, observed, 'Let the king take off Stucley's head, as Stucley has done Sir Walter's, and let him at his death take the sacrament and his oath upon it, and I'll believe him; but till Stucley loses his head, I shall credit Sir Walter Rawleigh's bare affirmance before a thousand of Stucley's oaths. When Stucley, on pretence of giving an account of his office, placed himself in the audience chamber of the lord admiral, and his lordship passed him without any notice, Sir Judas attempted to address the earl; but with a bitter look his lordship exclaimed, 'Base fellow! darrest thou, who art the scorn and contempt of men, offer thyself in my presence? Were it not in my own house, I would cudgel thee with my staff for presuming on this sauciness.' This annihilating affront Stucley hastened to convey to the king; his majesty answered him, 'What wouldst thou have me do? Wouldst thou have me hang him? Of my soul, if I should hang all that speak ill of thee, all the trees of the country would not suffice, so great is the number!'

One of the frequent crimes of that age, ere the forgery of bank-notes existed, was the clipping of gold; and this was one of the private amusements suitable to the character of our Sir Judas. Treachery and forgery are the same crime in a different form. Stucley received out of the exchequer five hundred pounds, as the reward of his espionage and perfidy. It was the price of blood, and was hardly in his hands ere it was turned into the fraudulent coin of 'the Cheater.' He was seized in the palace of Whitehall, for diminishing the gold coin. 'The manner of the discovery,' says the manuscript-writer, 'was strange if my occasions would suffer me to relate the particular.' On his examination he attempted to shift the crime to his own son, who had fled, and on his man, who being taken, in the words of the letter-writer, was 'willing to set the saddle upon the right horse, and accused his master.' Manoury too, the French empiric, was arrested at Plymouth for the same crime, and accused his worthy friend. But such was the interest of Stucley with government, bought probably with his last shilling, and, as one says, with his last shirt, that he obtained his own, and his son's pardon, for a crime that ought to have finally concluded the history of this blessed family.† A more solemn and

† The anecdotes respecting Stucley I have derived from manuscript letters, and they were considered to be of so dangerous a nature, that the writer recommends secrecy, and requests after reading that 'they may be burnt.' With such injunctions I have generally found that the letters were the more carefully preserved.

tragical catastrophe was reserved for the perfidious Stucley. He was deprived of his place of vice-admiral, and left destitute in the world. Abandoned by all human beings, and most probably, by the son whom he had tutored in the arts of villany, he appears to have wandered about an infatuated and distracted beggar. It is possible that even so scared a conscience may have retained some remaining touch of sensibility.

—All are men,
Condemned alike to groan;
The tender for another's pain,
The unfeeling for his own.

And Camden has recorded, among his historical notes on James I, that in August, 1620, 'Lewis Stucley, who betrayed Sir Walter Rawleigh, died in a manner mad.' Such is the catastrophe of one of the most perfect domestic tales; an historical example not easily paralleled of moral retribution.

The secret practices of the 'Sir Judas' of the court of James I, which I have discovered, throw light on an old tradition which still exists in the neighbourhood of Affton, once the residence of this wretched man. The country people have long entertained a notion that a hidden treasure lies at the bottom of a well in his grounds, guarded by some supernatural power; a tradition no doubt originating in this man's history, and an obscure allusion to the gold which Stucley received for his bribe, or the other gold which he clipped, and might have there concealed. This is a striking instance of the many historical facts which, though entirely unknown or forgotten, may be often discovered to lie hid, or disguised, in popular traditions.

AN AUTHENTIC NARRATIVE OF THE LAST HOURS OF SIR WALTER RAWLEIGH.

The close of the life of Sir Walter Rawleigh was as extraordinary as many parts of his varied history: the promptitude and sprightliness of his genius, his carelessness of life, and the equanimity of that great spirit in quitting the world, can only be paralleled by a few other heroes and sages:—Rawleigh was both! But it is not simply his dignified yet active conduct on the scaffold, nor his admirable speech on that occasion, circumstances by which many great men are judged, when their energies are excited for a moment to act so great a part, before the eyes of the world assembled at their feet; it is not these only which claim our notice.

We may pause with admiration on the real grandeur of Rawleigh's character; not from a single circumstance, however great, but from a tissue of continued little incidents, which occurred from the moment of his condemnation till he lay his head on the block. Rawleigh was a man of such mark, that he deeply engaged the attention of his contemporaries; and to this we owe the preservation of several interesting particulars of what he did and what he said, which have entered, into his life; but all has not been told in the published narratives. Contemporary writers in their letters have set down every fresh incident, and eagerly caught up his sense, his wit, and what is more delightful, those marks of the natural cheerfulness of his invariable presence of mind: nor could these have arisen from any affectation or parade, for we shall see that they served him even in his last tender farewell to his lady, and on many unprepared occasions.

I have drawn together in a short compass all the facts which my researches have furnished, not omitting those which are known, concerning the feelings and conduct of Rawleigh at these solemn moments of his life; to have preserved only the new would have been to mutilate the statue, and to injure the whole by an imperfect view.

Rawleigh one morning was taken out of his bed in a fit of fever, and unexpectedly hurried, not to his trial, but to a sentence of death. The story is well known.—Yet pleading with 'a voice grown weak by sickness and an ague he had at that instant on him,' he used every means to avert his fate: he did, therefore value the life he could so easily part with. His judges there at least, respected their state criminal, and they addressed him in a tone far different from that which he had fifteen years before listened to from Coke. Yelverton, the attorney-general, said, 'Sir Walter Rawleigh hath been as a star as which the world have gazed; but stars may fall, nay, they must fall, when they trouble the sphere where they abide.' And the lord chief-justice noticed Rawleigh's great work;—'I know that you have been valiant and wise, and I doubt not but you retain both these virtues, for now you shall have occasion to use them. Your book is an admirable work; I would give you counsel, but I know you can apply unto yourself far better than I am able to give you.' But the judge ended with saying, 'execution is granted.' It was stifling Rawleigh with roses! the heroic sage felt as if listening to fame from the voice of death.

He declared, that now being old, sickly, and in disgrace, and 'certain were he allowed to live, to go to it again, life was wearisome to him, and all he entreated was to have leave to speak freely at his farewell, to satisfy the world that he was ever loyal to the king, and a true lover of the commonwealth; for this he would seal with his blood.'

Rawleigh, on his return to his prison, while some were deploring his fate, observed, that 'the world itself is but a larger prison, out of which some are daily selected for execution.'

That last night of his existence was occupied by writing what the letter-writer calls 'a remembrancer to be left with his lady,' to acquaint the world with his sentiments, should he be denied their delivery from the scaffold as he had been at the bar of the King's Bench. His lady visited him that night, and amidst her tears acquainted him, that she had obtained the favour of disposing of his body; to which he answered smiling, 'It is well Bess, that thou mayest dispose of that, dead, thou hadst not always the disposing of when it was alive.' At midnight he entreated her to leave him. It must have been then, that, with unshaken fortitude, Rawleigh sat down to compose those verses on his death, which being short, the most appropriate may be repeated.

'Even such is Time, that takes on trust,
Our youth, our joys, or all we have,
And pays us but with age and dust;
Who in the dark and silent grave,
When we have wandered all our ways,
Shuts up the story of our days!'

He has added two other lines expressive of his trust in his resurrection. Their authenticity is confirmed by the writer of the present letter, as well as another writer, enclosing 'half a dozen verses, which Sir Walter made the night before his death, to take his farewell of poetry, wherein he had been a scribbler even from his youth.' The enclosure is not now with the letter. Chamberlain, the writer, was an intelligent man of the world, but not imbued with any deep tincture of literature. On the same night Rawleigh wrote this distich on the candle burning dimly:

'Cowards fear to die; but courage stout,
Rather than live in snuff, will be put out.'

At this solemn moment, before he lay down to rest, and at the instant of parting from his lady, with all his domestic affections still warm, to express his feelings in verse was with him a natural effusion, and one to which he had long been used. It is peculiar in the fate of Rawleigh, that having before suffered a long imprisonment with an expectation of a public death, his mind had been accustomed to its contemplation, and had often dwelt on the event which was now passing. The soul, in its sudden departure, and its future state, is often the subject of his few poems; that most original one of 'the Farewell,

Go, soul, the body's guest,
Upon a thankless errand, &c.

is attributed to Rawleigh, though on uncertain evidence. But another, entitled 'the Pilgrimage,' has this beautiful passage:

'Give me my scallop-shell of gleet.
My staff of truth to walk upon,
My scrip of joy immortal diet;
My bottle of salvation.
My gown of glory, Hope's true gage,
And thus I'll take my pilgrimage—
Whilst my soul, like a quiet Palmer,
Travels towards the land of Heaven—'

Rawleigh's cheerfulness was so remarkable, and his fearlessness of death so marked, that the Dean of Westminster, who attended him, at first wondering at the hero, reprehended the lightness of his manner; but Rawleigh gave God thanks that he had never feared death, for it was but an opinion and an imagination; and as for the manner of death, he would rather die so than of a burning fever; and that some might have made shows outwardly; but he felt the joys within. The Dean says, that he made no more of his death than if he had been to take a journey; 'Not,' said he, 'but that I am a great sinner, for I have been a soldier, a seaman, and a courtier.' The writer of a manuscript letter tells us, that the Dean declared he died not only religiously, but he found him to be a man as ready and as able to give, as to take instruction.

On the morning of his death he smoked, as usual, his favourite tobacco, and when they brought him a cup of excellent sack, being asked how he liked it, Rawleigh answered, 'As the fellow, that, drinking of St Giles's bowl, as he went to Tyburn, said, "that was good drink if a man might tarry by it."' The day before, in passing from Westminster-hall to the Gate-house, his eye had caught Sir Hugh Beeston in the throng, and calling on him, Rawleigh requested that he would see him die to-morrow. Sir Hugh, to secure himself a seat on the scaffold, had provided himself with a letter to the sheriff, which was not read at the time, and Sir Walter found his friend thrust by, lamenting that he could not get there. 'Farewell!' exclaimed Rawleigh, 'I know not what shift you will make, but I am sure to have a place.' In going from the prison to the scaffold, among others who were pressing hard to see him, one old man, whose head was bald, came very forward, inasmuch that Rawleigh noticed him, and asked, 'whether he would have ought of him?' The old man answered, 'Nothing but to see him, and to pray God for him.' Rawleigh replied, 'I thank thee, good friend, and I am sorry I have no better thing to return thee for thy good will.' Observing his bald head, he continued, 'but take this night-cap, (which was a very rich wrought one that he wore) for thou hast more need of it now than I.'

His dress, as was usual with him, was elegant, if not rich. Oldys describes it, but mentions, that 'he had a wrought night-cap under his hat,' this we have otherwise disposed of; he wore a ruff-band, a black wrought velvet night-gown over a hair-coloured satin doublet, and a black wrought waistcoat; black cut taffety breeches, and ash-coloured silk stockings.

He ascended the scaffold with the same cheerfulness as he had passed to it; and observing the lords seated at a distance, some at windows, he requested they would approach him, as he wished that they should all witness what he had to say. The request was complied with by several. His speech is well known; but some copies contain matters not in others. When he finished, he requested Lord Arundel that the king would not suffer any libels to defame him after death.—And now I have a long journey to go, and must take my leave.' 'He embraced all the lords and other friends with such courtly compliments, as if he had met them at some feast,' says a letter-writer. Having taken off his gown, he called to the headsmen to show him the axe, which not being instantly done, he repeated, 'I pray thee let me see it. Dost thou think that I am afraid of it?' He passed the edge lightly over his finger, and smiling, observed to the sheriff, 'This is a sharp medicine, but a sound cure for all diseases,' and kissing it, laid it down. Another writer has, 'This is that, which will cure all sorrows.' After this he went to three several corners of the scaffold, and kneeling down, desired all the people to pray for him, and recited a long prayer to himself. When he began to fit himself for the block, he first laid himself down to try how the block fitted him; after rising up, the executioner knelt down to ask his forgiveness, which Rawleigh with an embrace gave, but entreated him not to strike till he gave a token by lifting up his hand, 'and then, fear not, but strike home.' When he laid his head down to receive the stroke, the executioner desired him to lay his face towards the east. 'It was no great matter which way a man's head stood, so the heart lay right,' said Rawleigh; but these were not his last words. He was once more to speak in this world with the same intrepidity he had lived in it—for, having lain some minutes on the block in prayer, he gave the signal; but the executioner, either unmindful, or in fear, failed to strike, and Rawleigh, after once or twice putting forth his hands, was compelled to ask him, 'Why dost thou not strike? Strike! man.' In two blows he was beheaded; but from the first, his body never shrunk from the spot, by any discomposure of his posture, which, like his mind, was immovable.

In all the time he was upon the scaffold, and before, says one of the manuscript letter-writers, 'there appeared not the least alteration in him, either in his voice or countenance; but he seemed as free from all manner of apprehension as if he had been come thither rather to be a spectator than a sufferer; nay, the beholders seemed much more sensible than did he, so that he hath purchased here in the opinion of men such honour and reputation, as it is thought his greatest enemies are they that are most sorrowful for his death, which they see is like to turn as much to his advantage.'

The people were deeply affected at the sight, and so much, that one said, that 'we had not such another head to cut off,' and another 'wished the head and brains to be upon Secretary Naunton's shoulders.' The observer suffered for this; he was a wealthy citizen, and great news-monger, and one who haunted Paul's Walk. Complaint was made, and the citizen summoned to the privy-council. He pleaded that he intended no disrespect to Mr Secretary; but only spoke in reference to the old proverb, that 'two heads were better than one.' His excuse was allowed at the moment; but when afterwards called on for a contribution to St Paul's cathedral, and having subscribed a hundred pounds, the Secretary observed to him, that 'two were better than one, Mr Wiemark' either from fear, or charity, the witty citizen doubled his subscription.

Thus died this glorious and gallant cavalier, of whom Osborne says, 'His death was managed by him with so high and religious a resolution, as if a Roman had acted a Christian, or rather a Christian a Roman.'

After having read the preceding article, we are astonished at the greatness, and the variable nature of this extraordinary man, and this happy genius. With Gibbon, who once meditated to write his life, we may pause, and pronounce 'his character is ambiguous'; but we shall not hesitate to decide, that Rawleigh knew better how to die than to live. 'His glorious hours,' says a contemporary, 'were his arraignment and execution;—but never will be forgotten the intermediate years of his lettered imprisonment!'

LITERARY UNIONS.

SECRET HISTORY OF RAWLEIGH'S HISTORY OF THE WORLD, AND VASARI'S LIVES.

An union of talents, differing in their qualities, might carry some important works to a more extended perfection. In a work of great enterprise, the aid of a friendly hand may be absolutely necessary to complete the labours of the projector, who may have neither the courage, the leisure, nor all acquisitions necessary for performing the favourite task which he has otherwise matured. Many great works, commenced by a master genius have remained unfinished, or have been deficient for want of this friendly succour. The public had been grateful to Johnson, had he united in his dictionary the labours of some learned etymologist. Speed's Chronicle owes most of its value, as it does its ornaments, to the hand of Sir Robert Cotton, and other curious researchers, who contributed entire portions. Gogue's esteemed work of the 'Origin of the Arts and Sciences' was greatly indebted to the fraternal zeal of a devoted friend. The still valued books of the Port-royal Society were all formed by this happy union. The secret history of many eminent works would show the advantages which may be derived from this combination of talents, differing in their nature. Cumberland's masterly versions of the fragments of the Greek dramatic poets had never been given to the poetical world, had he not accidentally possessed the manuscript notes of his relative, the learned Bentley. This treasure supplied that research in the most obscure works, which the volatile studies of Cumberland could never have explored; a circumstance which he concealed from the world, proud of the Greek erudition which he thus cheaply possessed. Yet by this literary union, Bentley's vast erudition made those researches which Cumberland could not; and Cumberland gave the nation a copy of the domestic drama of Greece, of which Bentley was incapable.

There is a large work, which is still celebrated, of which the composition has excited the astonishment even of the philosophic Hume, but whose secret history remains yet to be disclosed. This extraordinary volume is 'The History of the World, by Rawleigh.' I shall transcribe Hume's observation that the reader may observe the literary phenomenon. 'They were struck with the extensive nius of the man, who being educated amidst naval and military enterprises, had surpassed in the pursuits of literature, even those of the most recluse and sedentary lives; and we admired his unbroken magnanimity, which at his age, and under his circumstances, could engage him to undertake and execute so great a work, as his History of the World.^{*} Now when the truth is known, the wonderful in his literary mystery will disappear, except in the eloquent, the grand, and the pathetic passages interspersed in that venerable volume. We may, indeed, pardon the astonishment of our calm philosopher, when we consider the reconcilement contained in this work, and recollect the little time which this adventurous spirit, whose life was passed in fabricating his own fortune, and in perpetual enterprise, could allow to such erudite pursuits. Where could Rawleigh obtain that familiar acquaintance with the rabbins, of whose language he was probably entirely ignorant? His numerous publications, the effusions of the most active mind, though excellent in their kind, were evidently composed by one who was not attracted in curious and remote inquiries, but full of the daily business and the wisdom of human life. His confinement in the tower, which lasted several years, was indeed sufficient for the composition of this folio volume, and of a second which appears to have occupied him. But in that imprisonment it singularly happened that he lived among literary characters, with the most intimate friendship. There he joined the Earl of Northumberland, the patron of the philosophers of his age, and with whom Rawleigh pursued his chemical studies; and Serjeant Hoskins, a poet and a wit, and he poetical 'father' of Ben Jonson, who acknowledged that 'it was Hoskins who had polished him;' and that Rawleigh often consulted Hoskins on his literary works, I learn from a manuscript. But however literary the atmosphere of the Tower proved to Rawleigh, no particle of Hebrew, and perhaps little of Grecian lore, floated from a chemist and a poet. The truth is, that the collection of the materials of this history was the labour of several persons, who have not all been discovered. It has been ascertained, that Ben Jonson was a considerable contributor; and there was an English philosopher from whom Descartes, it is said, even by his own countrymen, borrowed largely—Thomas Hariot, whom Anthony Wood charges with infusing into Rawleigh's volume philosophical notions, while Rawleigh was composing his History of the World. But if Rawleigh's pursuits surpassed even those of the most recluse and sedentary lives, as Hume observed, we must attribute this to a Dr Robert Burrel, lecturer of Northwold, in the county of Norfolk, who was a great favourite of Sir Walter Rawleigh, and had been his chaplain. All, or the greatest part of the drudgery of Sir Walter's history for Criticisms, Chronology, and reading Greek and Hebrew authors were performed by him, for Sir Walter.* Thus a simple fact, when discovered, clears up the whole mystery; and we learn how that knowledge was acquired, which as Hume sagaciously detected, required 'a recluse and sedentary life,' such as the studies and the habits would be of a country clergyman in learned age.

The secret history of another work, still more celebrated than the History of the World, by Sir Walter Rawleigh, will doubtless surprise its numerous admirers.

* I draw my information from a very singular manuscript in the Lansdowne collection, which I think has been mistaken for a boy's ciphering book, of which it has much the appearance, No. 741, fo. 57, as it stands in the auctioneer's catalogue. It appears to be a collection closely written, extracted out of Anthony Wood's papers; and as I have discovered in the manuscript, numerous notices not elsewhere preserved, I am inclined to think, that the transcriber copied them from that mass of Anthony Wood's papers, of which more than one sack full was burnt at his desire before him, when dying. If he so, this MS. is the only register of many curious facts.

Ben Jonson has been too freely censured for his own free measures, and particularly for one he made on Sir Walter Rawleigh, who, he told Drummond, 'esteemed more fame than conscience. The best wits in England were employed in making his history: Ben himself had written a piece to him of the Punic war, which he altered and set in his book.' Jonson's powerful advocate Mr Gifford has not alleged a word in his defence of our great Bard's free conversational strictures; he secret history of Rawleigh's great work had never been discovered, on this occasion, however, Jonson only spoke that he knew to be true—and there may have been other wits, in those conversations which were set down at random by Drummond, who may have chiefly collected the satirical notices.

Without the aid of a friendly hand, we should probably have been deprived of the delightful history of Ariosto by Vasari: although a mere painter and goldsmith, and not a literary man, Vasari was blessed with the nice discernment of one deeply conversant with art, and saw rightly what was to be done, when the idea of the work was suggested by the celebrated Paulus Jovius as a supplement to his own work of the 'Eulogiums, of illustrious men.' Vasari approved of the project; but on that occasion judiciously observed, not blinded by the celebrity of the literary man who projected it, that 'it would require the assistance of an artist to collect the materials, and arrange them in their proper order; for although Jovius displayed great knowledge in his observations, yet he had not been equally accurate in the arrangement of his facts in his book of Eulogiums.' Afterwards, when Vasari began to collect his information, and consulted Paulus Jovius on the plan, although that author highly approved of what he saw, he alleged his own want of leisure and ability to complete such an enterprise; and this was fortunate: we should otherwise have had, instead of the rambling spirit which charms us in the volumes of Vasari, the verbose babble of a declaimer. Vasari, however, looked round for the assistance he wanted; a circumstance which Tiraboschi has not noticed; like Hogarth, he required a literary man for his scribe. I have discovered the name of the chief writer of the Lives of the Painters, who wrote under the direction of Vasari, and probably often used his own natural style, and conveyed to us those reflections which surely come from their source. I shall give the passage, as a curious instance where the secret history of books is often detected in the most obscure corners of research. Who could have imagined that in a collection of the lives de' Santi e Beati dell' ordine de' Predicatori, we are to look for the writer of Vasari's lives? Don Serafini Razzi, the author of this ecclesiastical biography, has this reference: 'Who would see more of this may turn to the lives of the painters, sculptors and architects, written for the greater part by Don Silvano Razzi, my brother, for the Signor Cavaliere M. Giorgio Vasari, his great friend.*'

The discovery that Vasari's volumes were not entirely written by himself, though probably under his dictation, and, unquestionably, with his communications; as we know that Dr Morrell wrote the 'Analysis of Beauty' for Hogarth, will perhaps serve to clear up some unaccountable mistakes or omissions which appear in that series of volumes, written at long intervals, and by different hands. Mr Fuseli has alluded to them in utter astonishment; and cannot account for Vasari's 'incredible dereliction of reminiscence, which prompted him to transfer what he had rightly ascribed to Giorgione in one edition to the elder Parma in the subsequent ones.' Again: Vasari's memory was either so treacherous, or his rapidity in writing so inconsiderate, that his account of the Capella Sistina and the stanza of Raffaello, is a mere heap of errors and unpardonable confusion.' Even Bottari, his learned editor, is at a loss to account for his mistakes. Mr Fuseli finely observes, 'He has been called the Herodotus of our art; and if the main simplicity of his narrative, and the desire of heaping anecdote on anecdote, entitle him in some degree to that appellation, we ought not to forget that the information of every day adds something to the authenticity of the Greek historian, whilst every day furnishes matter to question the credibility of the Tuscan.' All this strongly confirms the suspicion that Vasari employed different hands at different times to write out his work. Such mistakes would occur to a new writer, not always conversant with the subject he was composing on, and the disjointed materials of which were often found in a disordered state. It is, however, strange that neither Bottari nor Tiraboschi appear to have been aware that Vasari employed others to write for him; we see that from the first suggestion of the work he had originally proposed that Paulus Jovius should hold the pen for him.

The principle illustrated in this article might be pursued; but the secret history of two great works so well known are as sufficient as twenty others of writings less celebrated. The literary phenomenon which had puzzled the calm inquiring Hume to cry out 'a miracle!' has been

* I find this quotation in a sort of polemical work of natural philosophy, entitled 'Saggio di Storia Letteraria Fiorentina del Secolo XVII. da Giovanni Clemente Nelli, Lucca, 1760,' p. 28. Nelli also refers to what he had said on this subject in his Plante ad alzati di S. M. del Fiore, p. vii. vii. a work on architecture. See Brunet; and Haym, Bib. Ital. de libris rar.

polished by the discovery of a little fact on literary unions, which derives importance from this circumstance.

OF A BIOGRAPHY PAINTED.

There are objects connected with literary curiosity, which, though they may never gratify our sight, yet whose very history is literary; and the originality of their invention, should they excite imitation, may serve to constitute a class. I notice a book-curiosity of this nature.

This extraordinary volume may be said to have contained the travels and adventures of Charles Magius, a noble Venetian; and this volume, so precious, consisted only of eighteen pages, composed of a series of highly-finished miniature paintings on vellum, some executed by the hand of Paul Veronese. Each page, however, may be said to contain many chapters; for, generally, it is composed of a large centre-piece, surrounded by ten small ones, with many apt inscriptions, allegories, and allusions; the whole exhibiting romantic incidents in the life of this Venetian nobleman. But it is not merely as a beautiful production of art that we are to consider it; it becomes associated with a more elevated feeling in the occasion which produced it. The author, who is himself the hero, after having been long calumniated, resolved to set before the eyes of his accusers the sufferings and adventures he could perhaps have but indifferently described: and instead of composing a tedious volume for his justification, invented this new species of pictorial biography. The author minutely described the remarkable situations in which fortune had placed him; and the artists, in embellishing the facts he furnished them with to record, emulated each other in giving life to their truth, and putting into action, before the spectator, incidents which the pen had less impressively exhibited. This unique production may be considered as a model, to represent the actions of those who may succeed more fortunately by this new mode of perpetuating their history; discovering, by the aid of the pencil, rather than by their pen, the forms and colours of an extraordinary life.

It was when the Ottomans (about 1571) attacked the Isle of Cyprus, that this Venetian nobleman was charged by his republic to review and repair the fortifications. He was afterwards sent to the Pope to negotiate an alliance: he returned to the senate, to give an account of his commission. Invested with the chief command, at the head of his troops, Magius threw himself into the island of Cyprus, and after a skilful defence, which could not prevent its fall, at Famagusta, he was taken prisoner by the Turks, and made a slave. His age and infirmities induced his master, at length, to sell him to some Christian merchants; and after an absence of several years from his beloved Venice, he suddenly appeared, to the astonishment and mortification of a party who had never ceased to calumniate him; whilst his own noble family were compelled to preserve an indignant silence, having had no communications with their lost and enslaved relative. Magius now returned to vindicate his honour, to reinstate himself in the favour of the senate, and to be restored to a venerable parent amidst his family: to whom he introduced a fresh branch, in a youth of seven years old, the child of his misfortunes, who, born in trouble, and a stranger to domestic endearments, was at one moment united to a beloved circle of relations.

I shall give a rapid view of some of the pictures of this Venetian nobleman's life. The whole series has been elaborately drawn up by the Duke de la Valliere, the celebrated book-collector, who dwells on the detail with the curiosity of an amateur.*

In a rich frontispiece, a Christ is expiring on the cross Religion, leaning on a column, contemplates the Divinity, and Hope is not distant from her. The genealogical tree of the house of Magius, with an allegorical representation of Venice, its nobility, power, and riches: the arms of Magius, in which is inserted a view of the holy sepulchre of Jerusalem, of which he was made a knight; his portrait, with a Latin inscription; 'I have passed through arms and the enemy, amidst fire and water, and the Lord

* The duke's description is not to be found, as might be expected, in his own valued catalogue, but was a contribution to Ugna's II, 16, where it occupies fourteen pages. This singular work sold at Galignani's sale for 802 livres. It was then the golden age of literary curiosity, when the rarest things were not ruinous; and that price was even then considered extraordinary though the work was an unique. It must consist of about 180 subjects, by Italian artists conducted me to a safe asylum, in the year of grace 1581. The portrait of his son, aged seven years, finished with the greatest beauty, and supposed to have come from the hand of Paul Veronese; it bears this inscription: 'Once come by violence and artifice, almost dead before his life, his mother was at length delivered of him, full of life, and all the loveliness of infancy; under the divine protection his birth was happy, and his life with greater happiness shall be closed with good fortune.'

A plan of the isle of Cyprus, where Magius commanded, and his first misfortune happened, his slavery by the Turks—The painter has expressed this by an emblem of a tree shaken by the winds and scathed by the lightning, but from the trunk issues a beautiful green branch standing in a brilliant sun, with this device—'From this fallen tree springs a branch full of vigour.'

The missions of Magius to raise troops in the province of la Puglia—In one of these Magius is seen returning to Venice; his final departure,—a thunderbolt is viewed falling on his vessel—his passage by Corfu and Zante, and his arrival at Candia.

His travels to Egypt—The centre figure represents the province raising its right hand extended towards a palm-tree, and the left leaning on a pyramid, inscribed 'Celebrated throughout the world for her wonders.' The small pictures are the entrance of Magius into the port of Alexandria; Rosetta, with a caravan of Turks and different nations; the city of Grand Cairo, exterior and interior, with views of other places; and finally, his return to Venice.

His journey to Rome—the centre figure an armed Phœbus seated on trophies, the Tyber beneath her feet, a globe in her hands, inscribed Quod rerum victrix es domas. 'Because she is the Conquerress and Mistress of the World.' The ten small pictures are views of the cities of the Pope's dominion. His first audience at the conclave forms a pleasing and fine composition.

His travels into Syria—the principal figure is a female emblematical of that fine country; she is seated in the midst of a gay orchard, and embraces a bundle of roses, inscribed Mundi delicia. 'The delight of the universe.' The small compartments are views of towns and ports, and the spot where Magius collected his fleet.

His pilgrimage to Jerusalem, where he was made a knight of the holy sepulchre—the principal figure represents Devotion, inscribed Ducit. 'It is she who conducts me.' The compartments exhibit a variety of objects, with a correctness of drawing, which are described as belonging to the class and partaking of the charms, of the pencil of Claude Lorraine. His vessel is first viewed in the roadstead at Venice beat by a storm; arrives at Zante to refresh; enters the port of Simio; there having landed, he and his companions are proceeding to the town on asses, for Christians were not permitted to travel in Turkey on horses.—In the church at Jerusalem the bishop, in his pontifical habit, receives him as a knight of the holy sepulchre, arraying him in the armour of Godfrey of Bosham, and placing his sword in the hands of Magius. His arrival at Bethlehem, to see the cradle of the Lord—and his return by Jaffa with his companions, in the dress of pilgrims; the groups are finely contrasted with the Turks mingling amongst them.

The taking of the city of Famagusta, and his slavery.—The middle figure, with a dog at its feet, represents Fidelity, the character of Magius who ever preferred it to his life or his freedom, inscribed Cæpit. 'She reduced me to slavery.' Six smaller pictures exhibit the different points of the island of Cyprus, where the Turks effected their descents. Magius retreating to Famagusta, which he long defended, and where his cousin, a skilful engineer, was killed. The Turks compelled to raise the siege, but return with greater forces—the sacking of the town and the palace, where Magius was taken.—One picture exhibits him brought before a bashaw, who has him stripped, to judge of his strength and fix his price, when after examination he is sent among other slaves.—He is seen bound and tied up among his companions in misfortune—again he is forced to labour, and carries a cask of water on his shoulders.—In another picture, his master, finding him weak of body, conducts him to a slave merchant to sell him. In another we see him leading as a slave loaded with packages; his new master, finding him loitering on his way, showers his blows on him, whilst a soldier is seen purloining one of the packages from the man. Another exhibits Magius making with fatigue on the sands, while his master would raise him up by an ungenerous use of the bastinado. The varied details of these little paintings are pleasingly executed.

The close of his slavery.—The middle figure kneeling to Heaven, and a light breaking from it, inscribed 'He breaks my chains,' to express the confidence of Magius. The Turks are seen landing with their pillage and their slaves. In one of the pictures are seen two ships on fire; a young lady of Cyprus preferring death to the loss of her honour and the miseries of slavery, determined to set fire to the vessel in which she was carried; she succeeded, and the flames communicated to another.

His return to Venice.—The painter for his principal figure has chosen a Pallas, with a helmet on her head, the eagle on one arm, and her lance in the other, to describe the courage with which Magius had supported his misfortunes, inscribed Reducit—'She brings me back.' In the last of the compartments he is seen at the custom-house at Venice; he enters the house of his father; the old man hastens to meet him, and embraces him.

One page is filled by a single picture, which represents the senate of Venice, with the Duke on his throne; Magius presents an account of his different employments, and holds in his hand a scroll, on which is written, Quod commissi perfecti; quod restat agendum, pars fide complectatur—'I have done what you committed to my care; and I will perform with the same fidelity what remains to be done.' He is received by the senate with the most distinguished honours, and is not only justified, but praised and honoured.

The most magnificent of these paintings is the one attributed to Paul Veronese. It is described by the Duke de la Valliere as almost unparalleled for its richness, its elegance, and its brilliancy. It is inscribed Pater meus et fratres mei dereliquerunt me; Domine autem assumptus me!—My father and my brothers abandoned me; but the Lord took me under his protection.' This is an allusion to the accusation raised against him in the open senate, when the Turks took the island of Cyprus, and his family wanted either the confidence or the courage to defend Magius. In the front of this large picture, Magius leading his son by the hand, conducts him to be reconciled with his brothers and sisters-in-law, who are on the opposite side; his hand holds this scroll, Vos cogitatis de me malum; sed Deus convertit illud in bonum—You thought ill of me; but the Lord has turned it to good.' In this he alludes to the satisfaction he had given the senate, and to the honours they had decreed him. Another scene is introduced, where Magius appears in a magnificent hall at table in the midst of all his family, with whom a general reconciliation has taken place: on his left hand are gardens opening with an enchanting effect, and magnificently ornamented, with the villa of his father, on which flowers and wreaths seem dropping on the roof, as if from heaven. In the perspective the landscape probably represents the rural neighbourhood of Magius's early days.

Such are the most interesting incidents which I have selected from the copious description of the Duke de la Valliere. The idea is new of this production, an autobiography in a series of remarkable scenes, painted under the eye of the describer of them, in which too he has preserved all the fulness of his feelings and his minutest recollections; but the novelty becomes interesting from the character of the noble Magius, and the romantic fancy which inspired this elaborate and costly curiosity. It was not indeed without some trouble that I have drawn up this little account; but while thus employed, I seemed to be composing a very uncommon romance.

CAUSE AND PRETEXT.

It is an important principle in morals and in politics, not to mistake the cause for the pretext, nor the pretext for the cause, and by this means to distinguish between the concealed and the ostensible, motive. On this principle history might be recomposed in a new manner; it would not then describe circumstances and characters as they usually appear. When we mistake the characters of men, we mistake the nature of their actions, and we shall find in the study of secret history, that some of the most important events in human history were produced from very different motives than their ostensible ones. Polybius, the most philosophical writer of the ancients, has marked out this useful distinction of cause and pretext, and aptly illustrates the observation by the facts which he explains.

Amilcar, for instance, was the first author and contriver of the second Punic war, though he died ten years before the commencement of it. 'A statesman,' says the wise and grave historian, 'who knows not how to trace the origin of events, and discern the different sources from whence they take their rise, may be compared to a physician, who neglects to inform himself of the causes of those distempers which he is called in to cure. Our pains can never be better employed than in searching out the causes of events; for the most trifling incidents give birth to matters of the greatest moment and importance.' The latter part of this remark of Polybius points out another principle which has been often verified by history, and which furnished the materials of the little book of 'Grands Evenemens par les petites Causes.'

Our present inquiry concerns 'cause and pretext.'

Leo X projected an alliance of the sovereigns of Christendom against the Turks. The avowed object was to oppose the progress of the Ottomans against the Mamelukes of Egypt, who were more friendly to the Christians; but the concealed motive with his holiness was to enrich himself and his family with the spoils of Christendom, and to aggrandise the papal throne by war; and such indeed, the policy of those pontiffs had always been in those mad crusades which they excited against the East.

The Reformation, excellent as its results have proved in the cause of genuine freedom, originated in no purer source than human passion and selfish motives: it was the progeny of avarice in Germany, of novelty in France, and of love in England. The latter is elegantly alluded to by Gray,

'And gospel-light first beam'd from Bullen's eyes.'

The Reformation is considered by the Duke of Nevers in a work printed in 1590, as it had been by Francis I in his apology in 1537, as a coup d'état of Charles V, towards universal monarchy. The duke says, that the Emperor silently permitted Luther to establish his principles in Germany, that they might split the confederacy of the elective princes, and by this division facilitate their more easy conquest, and play them off one against another, and by these means to secure the imperial crown, hereditary in the house of Austria. Had Charles V not been the mere creature of his politics, and had he felt any zeal for the Catholic cause, which he pretended to fight for, never would he have allowed the new doctrines to spread for more than twenty years without the least opposition.

The famous league in France was raised for 'religion and the relief of public grievances'; such was the pretext! After the princes and the people had alike become its victims, this 'league' was discovered to have been formed by the pride and the ambition of the Guises, aided by the machinations of the Jesuits against the attempts of the Prince of Condé to dislodge them from their seat of power.' While the Huguenots pillaged, burnt, and massacred, declaring in their manifestoes, that they were only fighting to release the king, whom they asserted was a prisoner of the Guises; the catholics repaid them with the same persecution and the same manifestoes, declaring that they only wish'd to liberate the Prince of Condé, who was the prisoner of the Huguenots. The people were led on by the cry of 'religion'; but this civil war was not in reality so much Catholic against Huguenot, as Guise against Condé. A parallel event occurred between our Charles I and the Scotch Covenanters; and the king expressly declared, in 'a large declaration, concerning the late tumults in Scotland,' that religion is only pretended, and used by them as a cloak to palliate their intended rebellion,' which he demonstrated by the facts he alleged. There was a revolutionary party in France, which, taking the name of Frondeurs, shook that kingdom under the administration of Cardinal Mazarine, and held out for their pretext the public freedom. But that faction, composed of some of the discontented French princes and the mob, was entirely organised by Cardinal De Retz, who held them in hand, to check or to spur them as the occasion required, from a mere personal pique against Mazarine, who had not treated that viracious genius with all the deference he exacted. This appears from his own memoirs.

We have smelt at James I threatening the states-general by the English ambassador, about Vorstius, a Dutch professor, who had espoused the doctrines of Arminius against those of the contra-remonstrants, or Calvinists; the ostensible subject was religious, or rather metaphysical-religious doctrines, but the concealed one was struggle for predominance between the Pensionary Barneveldt, assisted by the French interest, and the Prince of Orange, supported by the English. 'These were the real sources,' says Lord Hardwicke, a statesman and a man of letters, deeply conversant with secret and public history, and a far more able judge than Diodati the Swiss Divine, and Brandt the ecclesiastical historian, who in the synod of Dort could see nothing but what appeared in it; and gravely narrate the idle squabbles on phrases concerning predestination or grace. Hales, of Eaton, who was secretary to the English ambassador at this synod, perfectly accords with the account of Lord Hardwicke. 'Our synod,' writes that judicious observer, 'goes on like a watch; the main wheels upon which the whole business turns are least in sight; for all things of moment are acted in private sessions; what is done in public is only for show and entertainment.'

The cause of the persecution of the Jansenists was the jealousy of the Jesuits; the pretext was la grace efficace. The learned La Croze observes, that the same circumstance occurred in the affair of Nestorius and the church of Alexandria; the pretext was orthodoxy, the cause was the jealousy of the church of Alexandria; or rather the fiery and turbulent Cyril, who personally hated Nestorius. The opinions of Nestorius, and the council which condemned them, were the same in effect. I only produce this remote fact to prove that ancient times do not alter the truth of our principle.

When James II was so strenuous an advocate for liberation and liberty of conscience in removing the test act, this enlightened principle of government was only a pretext with that monk-ridden monarch; it is well known that the cause was to introduce and make the catholics predominant in his councils and government. The result, which that eager and blind politician hurried on too fast, and which therefore did not take place, would have been, that 'liberty of conscience' would soon have become an 'overt act of treason,' before an inquisition of his Jesuits!

In all political affairs drop the pretexts and strike at the causes; we may thus understand what the heads of parties may choose to conceal.

POLITICAL FORGERIES AND FICTIONS.

A writer whose learning gives value to his eloquence, in his Bampton Lectures has censured, with that liberal spirit so friendly to the cause of truth, the calumnies and rumours of parties, which are still industriously retailed, though they have been often confuted. Forged documents are still referred to, or tales unsupported by evidence are confidently quoted. Mr Heber's subject confined his inquiries to theological history; he has told us that 'Augustine is not ashamed, in his dispute with Faustus, to take advantage of the popular slanders against the followers of Manes, though his own experience, for he had himself been of that sect, was sufficient to detect this falsehood.' The Romanists, in spite of satisfactory answers, have continued to urge against the English protestant the romance of Parker's consecration; while the protestant persists in falsely imputing to the catholic public formularies, the systematic omission of the second commandment. 'The calumnies of Rimius and Sinestra against the Moravian brethren are cases in point,' continues Mr Heber. 'No one now believes them, yet they once could deceive even Warburton!' We may also add the obsolete calumny of Jews crucifying boys—of which a monument raised to Hugh of Lincoln perpetuates the memory, and which a modern historian records without any scruple of doubt; several authorities, which are cited on this occasion, amount only to the single one of Matthew Paris, who gives it as a popular rumour. Such accusations usually happened when the Jews were too rich and the king was too poor!

The falsehoods and forgeries raised by parties are overwhelming! It startles a philosopher, in the calm of his study, when he discovers how writers, who, we may presume, are searchers after truth, should, in fact, turn out to be searchers after the grossest fictions. This alters the habits of the literary man: it is an unnatural depravity of his pursuits—and it proves that the personal is too apt to predominate over the literary character.

I have already touched on the main point of the present article in the one on 'Political Nick-names.' I have there shown how political calumny appears to have been reduced into an art; one of its branches would be that of converting forgeries and fictions into historical authorities.

When one nation is at war with another, there is no doubt that the two governments connive at, and often encourage the most atrocious libels on each other, to excite the people to preserve their independence, and contribute cheerfully to the expenses of the war. France and England formerly complained of Holland—the Athenians employed the same policy against the Macedonians and Persians. Such is the origin of a vast number of supposititious papers and volumes, which sometimes, at a remote date, confound the labours of the honest historian, and too often serve the purposes of the dishonest, with whom they become authorities. The crude and suspicious libels which were drawn out of their obscurity at Cromwell's time against James the First have ever loaded the character of that monarch, yet are now eagerly referred to by party writers, though in their own days they were obsolete and doubtful. During the civil wars of Charles the First, such spurious documents exist in the form of speeches which were never spoken; of letters never written by the names subscribed; printed declarations never declared; battles never fought, and victories never obtained! Such is the language of Rushworth, who complains of this evil spirit of party-forgeries, while he is himself suspected of having rescinded or suppressed whatever was not agreeable to his patron Cromwell. A curious, and, perhaps, a necessary list might be drawn up of political forgeries of our own, which have been sometimes referred to as genuine, but which are the inventions of wits and satirists! Bayle ingeniously observes, that at the close of every century such productions should be branded by a skilful discriminator, to save the future inquirer from errors he can hardly avoid. 'How many are still kept in error by the satires of the sixteenth century! Those of the present age will be no less active in future ages, for they will still be preserved in public libraries.'

The art and skill with which some have fabricated a forged narrative, render its detection almost hopeless. When young Maitland, the brother to the secretary, in order to palliate the crime of the assassination of the Regent Murray, was employed to draw up a pretended conference between him, Knox, and others, to stigmatize them by the odium of advising to dethrone the young monarch, and to substitute the regent for their sovereign, Maitland produced so dramatic a performance, by giving to each person his peculiar mode of expression, that this circumstance long baffled the incredulity of those who could not in consequence deny the truth of a narrative apparently so correct in its particulars! 'The fiction of the warming-pan, enclosing the young Pretender, brought more adherents to the cause of the Whigs than the Bill of Rights,' observes Lord John Russell.

Among such party narratives, the horrid tale of the bloody Colonel Kirk, has been worked up by Hume with all his eloquence and pathos; and, from its interest no suspicion has arisen of its truth. Yet, so far as it concerns Kirk, or the reign of James the Second, or even English history, it is, as Ritson too honestly expresses it, 'an impudent and barefaced lie!' The simple fact is told by Kennet in a few words: he probably was aware of the nature of this political fiction. Hume was not, indeed, himself the fabricator of the tale; but he had not any historical authority. The origin of this fable was probably a pious fraud of the Whig party, to whom Kirk had rendered himself odious; at that moment stories still more terrifying were greedily swallowed, and which, Ritson insinuates, have become a part of the history of England. The original story, related more circumstantially, though not more affectingly, nor perhaps more truly, may be found in Wanley's 'Wonders of the Little World,'² which I give, relieving it from the tediousness of old Wanley.

A governor of Zealand, under the bold Duke of Burgundy, had in vain sought to seduce the affections of the beautiful wife of a citizen. The governor imprisons the husband on an accusation of treason; and when the wife appeared as the suppliant, the governor, after no brief eloquence, succeeded as a lover, on the plea that her husband's life could only be spared by her compliance. The woman, in tears and in aversion, and not without a hope of vengeance only delayed, lost her honour! Pointing to the prison, the governor told her 'If you seek your husband, enter there, and take him along with year 19 The wife, in the bitterness of her thoughts, yet not without the consolation that she had snatched her husband from the grave, passed into the prison; there in a cell, to her astonishment and horror, she beheld the corpse of her husband laid out in a coffin, ready for burial! Mourning over it, she at length returned to the governor, fiercely exclaiming, 'You have kept your word! you have restored to me my husband! and be assured the favour shall be repaid!' The inhuman villain, terrified in the presence of his intrepid victim, attempted to appease her vengeance, and more, to win her to his wishes. Returning home, she assembled her friends, revealed her whole story, and under their protection, she appealed to Charles the Bold, a strict lover of justice, and who now awarded a singular but an exemplary catastrophe. The duke first commanded that the criminal governor should instantly marry the woman whom he had made a widow, and at the same time sign his will, with a clause impeding, that should he die before his lady he constituted her his heiress. All this was concealed from both sides, rather to satisfy the duke than the parties themselves. This done, the unhappy woman was dismissed alone! The governor was conducted to the prison to suffer the same death he had inflicted on the husband of his wife; and when this lady was desired once more to enter the prison, she beheld her second husband headless in his coffin as she had her first! Such extraordinary incidents in so short a period overpowered the feeble frame of the sufferer; she died—leaving a son, who inherited the rich accession of fortune so fatally obtained by his injured and suffering mother.

Such is the tale of which the party story of Kirk appeared to Ritson to have been a refracimento; but it is rather the foundation than the superstructure. This critic was right in the main, but not by the by; in the general, not in the particular. It was not necessary to point out the present source, when so many others of a parallel nature exist. This tale, universally told, Mr Douce considers as the origin of 'Measure for Measure,' and was probably some traditional event; for it appears sometimes with a change of names and places, without any of incident. It always turns on a soldier, a brother, or a husband executed; and a wife, or sister, a deceived victim, to save them from death. It was, therefore, easily transferred to Kirk, and Pomefret's poem of 'Cruelty and Lust' long made the story popular. It could only have been in this form that it reached the historian, who, it must be observed, introduces it as a 'story commonly told of him;' but popular tragic romances should not enter into the dusty documents of a history of England, and much less be particularly specified in the index! Belleforest, in his old version of the tale, has given the circumstance of 'the Captain, who having seduced the wife under the promise to save her husband's life, exhibited him soon afterwards through the window of her apartment suspended on a gibbet.' This forms the horrid incident in the history of 'the bloody Colonel,' and served the purpose of a party, who wished to bury him in odium. Kirk was a soldier of fortune, and a lone liver, and a great blusterer, who would sometimes threaten to decimate his own regiment: but is said to have forgotten the menace the next day. Hatred as such military men will always be, in the present instance Colonel Kirk has been shamefully calumniated by poets and historians, who suffer themselves to be duped by the forgeries of political parties!

While we are detecting a source of error into which the party feelings of modern historians may lead them, let us confess that they are far more valuable than the ancient; for to us, at least, the ancients have written history without producing authorities! Modern historians must furnish their readers with the truest means to become their critics, by providing them with their authorities; and it is only by judiciously appreciating these that we may confidently accept their discoveries. Unquestionably the ancients have often introduced into their histories many tales similar to the story of Kirk—popular or party forgeries! The mellifluous copiousness of Livy conceals many a tale of wonder; the graver of Tacitus etches many a fatal stroke; and the secret history of Suetonius too often raises a suspicion of those whispers, Quid res in eorum regibus dicunt, quid Juvio fabulata sit cum Jove. It is certain that Plutarch has often told, and varied too in the telling, the same story, which he has applied to different persons. A critic in the Ritsonian style has said of the grave Plutarch, Mendax ille Plutarchus qui vitas oratorum, delis et erroribus constat, olim conscribisse.^{*} 'That lying Plutarch, who formerly scribbled the lives of the orators, made up of falsities and blunders! There is in Italian a scarce book, of a better design than execution, of the Abbate Lancelotti, Farfaleni degli antichi storici.—'Flim-flams of the ancients.' Modern historians have to dispute their passage to immortality step by step; and however forcible be their eloquence, their real test as to value, must be brought to the humble references in their margin. Yet these must not terminate our inquiries; for in tracing a story to its original source, we shall find that fictions have been sometimes grafted on truths or hearsays, and to separate them as they appeared in their first stage, is the pride and glory of learned criticism.

EXPRESSION OF SUPPRESSED OPINION.

A people denied the freedom of speech or of writing, have usually left some memorials of their feelings in that silent language which addresses itself to the eye. Many ingenious inventions have been contrived, to give vent to their suppressed indignation. The voluminous grievance which they could not trust to the voice or the pen, they have carved in wood, or sculptured on stone; and have sometimes even facetiously concealed their satire among the playful ornaments, designed to amuse those of whom they so fruitlessly complained! Such monuments of the suppressed feelings of the multitude are not often inspected by the historian—their minuteness escapes all eyes but those of the philosophical antiquary; nor are these satirical appearances always considered as grave authorities, which unquestionably they will be found to be by a close observer of human nature. An entertaining history of the modes of thinking, or the discontents of a people, drawn from such dispersed efforts in every era, would cast a new light of secret history over many dark materials.

Did we possess a secret history of the Saturnalia, it would doubtless have afforded some materials for the present article. In those revels of venerable radicalism, when the senate was closed, and the Pileus, or cap of liberty, was triumphantly worn, all things assumed an appearance contrary to what they were; and human nature, as well as human laws, might be said to have been parodied. Among so many whimsical regulations in favour of the licentious rabble, there was one which forbade the circulation of money; if any one offered the coin of the state, it was to be condemned as an act of madness, and the man was brought to his senses by a penitential fast for that day. An ingenious French antiquary seems to have discovered a class of wretched medals, cast in lead or copper, which formed the circulating medium of these mob Lords, who, to ridicule the idea of money, used the basest metals, stamping them with grotesque figures or odd devices,—such as a sow; a chimerical bird; an imperator in his car, with a monkey behind him; or an old woman's head, Acca Larentis, either the traditional old nurse of Romulus, or an old courtesan of the same name, who bequeathed the fruits of her labours to the Roman people! As all things were done in mockery, this base metal is stamped with a s. c., to ridicule the senatus consulto, which our antiquary happily explains,† in the true spirit of this government of mockery, Saturnalia consule, agreeing with the legend of the reverse, inscribed in the midst of four testi, or bones, which they used as dice, Qui ludit artem dicit, quod satis sit.—'Let them who play give a pledge, which will be sufficient.' This mock money served not only as an expression of the native irony of the radical gentry of Rome during their festival, but had they spoken their mind out, meant a ridicule of money itself; for these citizens of equality have always imagined that society might proceed without this contrivance of a medium which served to represent property, in which they themselves must so little participate.

A period so glorious for exhibiting the suppressed sen-

* Taylor, Annot. ad Lyriam

† Baudet de Dalry de P Utilité des Voyages, II, 645. There is a work, by Fioroni on these lead coins or Tickets. They are found in the cabinets of the curious metallist Pinkerton, referring to this entertaining work, regrets that 'Such curious remains have almost escaped the notice of metallists, and have not yet been ranged in one class, or named.' A special work on them would be highly acceptable. The time has perhaps arrived when antiquaries may begin to be philosophers, and philosophers antiquaries! The unhappy separation of erudition from philosophy, and of philosophy from erudition, has hitherto thrown impediments in the progress of the human mind, and the history of man.

timents of the populace, as were these Saturnalia, had been nearly lost for us, had not some notions been preserved by Lucian; for we glean but sparingly from the solemn pages of the historian, except in the remarkable instance which Suetonius has preserved of the arch-mime who followed the body of the Emperor Vespasian at his funeral. This officer, as well as a similar one, who accompanied the general to whom they granted a triumph, and who was allowed the unrestrained licentiousness of his tongue, were both the organs of popular feeling, and studied to gratify the rabble, who were their real masters. On this occasion the arch-mime, representing both the exterior personage and the character of Vespasian, according to custom, inquired the expense of the funeral? He was answered, 'ten millions of sesterces!' In allusion to the love of money which characterized the emperor, his mock representative exclaimed, 'Give me the money, and, if you will, throw my body into the Tiber.'

All these mock offices and festivals among the ancients, I consider as organs of the suppressed opinions and feelings of the populace, who were allowed no other, and had not the means of the printing ages to leave any permanent records. At a later period, before the discovery of the art, which multiplies, with such facility, libels or panegyrics; when the people could not speak freely against those rapacious clergy, who sheared the fleece and cared not for the sheep, many a secret of popular indignation was confided not to books (for they could not read) but to pictures and sculptures, which are books which the people can always read. The sculptors and illuminators of those times, no doubt shared in common the popular feelings, and boldly trusted to the paintings or the carvings which met the eyes of their luxurious and indolent masters their satirical inventions. As far back as in 1300, we find in Wolfius* the description of a picture of this kind, in a MS. of Æsop's Fables, found in the Abbey of Fulda, among other emblems of the corrupt lives of the churchmen. The present was a wolf, large as life, wearing a monkish cowl, with a shaven crown, preaching to a flock of sheep, with these words of the apostle in a label from his mouth,—'God is my witness how I long for you all in my bowels.' And underneath was inscribed,—'This hooded wolf is the hypocrite of whom it is said in the Gospel, "Beware of false prophets!"' Such exhibitions were often introduced into articles of furniture. A cushion was found in an old abbey, in which was worked a fox preaching to geese, each goose holding in his bill his praying beads! In the stone wall, and on the columns of the great church at Strasburg was once viewed a number of wolves, bears, foxes, and other mischievous animals carrying holy-water, crucifixes, and tapers; and others more indelicate. These, probably as old as the year 1300, were engraven in 1617, by a protestant; and were not destroyed till 1685, by the pious rage of the catholics, who seemed at length to have rightly construed these silent lampoons; and in their turn broke to pieces the protestant images as the others had done the papistical dolls. The carved seats and stalls in our own cathedrals exhibit subjects, not only strange and satirical, but even indecent. At the time they built churches they satirized the ministers; a curious instance how the feelings of the people struggle to find a vent. It is conjectured that rival orders satirized each other, and that some of the carvings are caricatures of certain monks. The margins of illuminated manuscripts frequently contain ingenious caricatures, or satirical allegories. In a magnificent chronicle of Froissart I observed several. A wolf, as usual, in a monk's frock and cowl, stretching his paw to bless a cock, bending its head submissively to the wolf; or a fox with a crozier, dropping beads, which a cock is picking up; to satirize the blind devotion of the bigots; perhaps the figure of the cock alluded to our Gallic neighbours. A cat in the habit of a nun, holding a platter in its paws to a mouse approaching to lick it; alluding to the allurements of the abbesses to draw young women into their convents; while sometimes I have seen a sow in an abbess's veil, mounted on stilts; the sex marked by the sow's dugs. A pope sometimes appears to be thrust by devils into a caldron; and cardinals are seen roasting on spits! These ornaments must have been generally executed by monks themselves; but these more ingenious members of the ecclesiastical order appear to have sympathized with the people, like the curates in our church, and saved the pampered abbot and the purple bishop. Churchmen were the usual objects of the suppressed indignation of the people in those days; but the knights and feudal lords have not always escaped from the 'curses not loud but deep,' of their satirical pencils.

As the Reformation, or rather the Revolution, was hastening, this custom became so general, that in one of the dialogues of Erasmus, where two Franciscans are entertained by their host, 'it appears that such satirical exhibitions were hung up as common furniture in the apartments of inns. The facetious genius of Erasmus either invents or describes one which he had seen of an ape in the habit of a Franciscan sitting by a sick man's bed, dispoosing ghostly counsel, holding up a crucifix in one hand, while with the other he is fliching a purse out of the sick man's pocket. Such are 'the straws' by which we may always observe from what corner the wind rises! Mr Dibdin has recently informed us, that Geyler, whom he calls 'the herald of the Reformation,' preceding Luther by twelve years, had a stone chair or pulpit in the cathedral at Strasburg, from which he delivered his lectures, or rather rolled the thunders of his anathemas against the monks. This stone pulpit was constructed under his own superintendence, and is covered with very indecent figures of monks and nuns, expressly designed by him to expose their profligate manners. We see Geyler doing what for centuries had been done!

In the curious folios of Sauval, the Stowe of France, there is a copious chapter entitled 'Heretiques, leurs attitudes.' In this enumeration of their attempts to give vent to their suppressed indignation, it is very remarkable, that preceding the time of Luther, the minds of many were perfectly Lutheran respecting the idolatrous worship of the Roman church; and what I now notice would have rightly entered into that significant Historia Reformationis ante Reformationem, which was formerly projected by continental writers.

Luther did not consign the pope's decretals to the flames till 1520—this was the first open act of reformation and insurrection, for hitherto he had submitted to the court of Rome. Yet in 1490, thirty years preceding this great event, I find a priest burnt for having snatched the host in derision from the hands of another celebrating mass. Twelve years afterwards, 1502, a student repeated the same deed, trampling on it; and in 1523 the resolute death of Anne de Bourg, a counsellor in the parliament of Paris, to use the expression of Sauval, 'corrupted the world.' It is evident that the Huguenots were fast on the increase. From that period I find continued accounts which prove that the Huguenots of France, like the Puritans of England, were most resolute iconoclasts. They struck off the heads of Virgins and little Jesuses, or blunted their daggers by chipping the wooden saints, which were then fixed at the corners of streets. Every morning discovered the scandalous treatment they had undergone in the night. Then their images were painted on the walls, but these were heretically scratched and disfigured; and, since the saints could not defend themselves, a royal edict was published in their favour, commanding that all holy paintings in the streets should not be allowed short of ten feet from the ground! They entered churches at night, tearing up or breaking down the prieaux, the benitoires, the crucifixes, the colossal ecce-homo's, which they did not always succeed in dislodging for want of time or tools. Amidst these battles with wooden adversaries, we may smile at the frequent solemn processions instituted to ward off the vengeance of the parish saint; the wooden was expiated by a silver image, secured by iron bars, and attended by the king and the nobility, carrying the new saint, with prayers that he would protect himself from the heretics!

In the early period of the Reformation, an instance occurs of the art of concealing what we wish only the few should comprehend, at the same time that we are addressing the public. Curious collectors are acquainted, with 'The Olivetan Bible': this was the first translation published by the protestants, and there seems no doubt that Calvin was the chief, if not the only translator; but at that moment not choosing to become responsible for this new version, he made use of the name of an obscure relative, Robert Pierre Olivetan. Calvin, however, prefixed a Latin preface, remarkable for delivering positions very opposite to those tremendous doctrines of absolute predestination, which in his theological despotism he afterwards assumed. De Bure describes this first protestant Bible not only as rare, but when found as usually imperfect, muscle soiled, and dog-eared, as the well-read first edition of Shakespeare, by the perpetual use of the multitude. But a curious fact has escaped the detection both of De Bure and Beboe; at the end of the volume are found ten verses, which, in a concealed manner, authenticate the translation; and which no one, unless initiated into the secret, could possibly suspect. The verses are not poetical, but I give the first sentence:

* Lucet Mem. I, ad. an. 1300.

Lecture entendis si verbes adresse
Viens donc ouyr intantem as promesses
Et vis parler. — &c.

The first letter of every word of these ten verses form a perfect distich, containing information important to those to whom the Olivetan Bible was addressed.

Lee Vaudois, peuple evangelique
Ont mis ce thesaur en publique.

An anagram had been too inartificial a contrivance to have answered the purpose of concealing from the world at large this secret. There is an adroitness in the invention of the initial letters of all the words through these ten verses. They contained a communication necessary to authenticate the version, but which at the same time, could not be suspected by any person not instructed with the secret.

When the art of medal-engraving was revived in Europe, the spirit, we are now noticing, took possession of those less perishable and more circulating vehicles. Satiric medals were almost unknown to the ancient mint, notwithstanding those of the Saturnalia, and a few which bear miserable puns on the unlucky names of some consuls. Medals illustrate history, and history reflects light on medals; but we should not place such unreserved confidence on medals, as their advocates who are warm in their favourite study. It has been asserted, that medals are more authentic memorials than history itself; but a medal is not less susceptible of the bad passions than a pamphlet or an epigram. Ambition has its vanity, and engraves a dubious victory; and Flattery will practise its art, and deceive us in gold! A calumny or a fiction on metal may be more durable than on a fugitive page; and a libel has a better chance of being preserved, when the artist is skilful, than simple truths when miserably executed. Medals of this class are numerous, and were the precursors of those political satires exhibited in caricature prints. There is a large collection of wooden cuts about the time of Calvin, where the Romish religion is represented by the most grotesque forms which the ridicule of the early Reformers could invent. More than a thousand figures attest the exuberant satire of the designers. This work is equally rare and costly.*

Satires of this species commenced in the freedom of the Reformation; for we find a medal of Luther in a monk's habit, satirically bearing for its reverse Catharine de Bora, the non whom this monk married; the first step of his personal reformation! Nor can we be certain that Catharine was not more concerned in that great revolution than appears in the voluminous lives we have of the great reformer. However, the reformers were as great sticklers for medals as the papalists. Of Pope John VIII., an effeminate voluptuary, we have a medal with his portrait, inscribed Pope Joan! and another of Innocent X., dressed as a woman holding a spindle; the reverse, his famous mistress, Donna Olympia, dressed as a Pope, with the tiara on her head, and the keys of St Peter in her hands!

When, in the reign of Mary, England was groaning under Spanish influence, and no remonstrance could reach the throne, the queen's person and government were made ridiculous to the people's eyes, by prints or pictures, 'representing her majesty naked, meagre, withered, and wrinkled, with every aggravated circumstance of deformity that could disgrace a female figure, seated in a regal chair; a crown on her head, surrounded with M. R. and A. in capitals, accompanied by small letters; Maria Regina Angliæ! a number of Spaniards were sucking her to skin and bone, and a specification was added of the money, rings, jewels, and other presents with which she had secretly gratified her husband Philip.†. It is said that the queen suspected some of her own council of this invention, who alone were privy to these transactions. It is, however, in this manner that the voice, which is suppressed by authority, comes at length in another shape to the eye.

* Mr Douce possesses a portion of this very curious collection: for a complete one, De Bure asked about twenty pounds.

The age of Elizabeth, when the Roman pontiff and all his adherents were odious to the people, produced a remarkable caricature, an ingenious invention—a gorgon's head! A church bell forms the helmet; the ornaments, instead of the feathers, are a wolf's head in a mitre devouring a lamb, an ass's head with spectacles reading, a goose holding a rosary; the face is made out with a fish for the nose, a chalice and water for the eye, and other priestly ornaments for the shoulder and breast, on which rolls of parchment pardons hang.*

A famous Bishop of Munster, Bernard de Galen, who, in his charitable violence for converting protestants, got himself into such celebrity that he appears to have served as an excellent sign-post to the inns in Germany, was the true church militant; and his figure was exhibited according to the popular fancy. His head was half mitre and half helmet; a crozier in one hand and a sabre in the other; half a rochet and half a cuirass: he was made performing mass as a dragon on horseback, and giving out the charge when he ought the Te, missa est! He was called the converter! and the 'Bishop of Munster' became popular as a sign-post in German towns; for the people like fighting men, though they should even fight against themselves.

It is rather curious to observe of this new species of satire, so easily distributed among the people, and so directly addressed to their understandings, that it was made the vehicle of national feeling. Ministers of state condescended to invent the devices. Lord Orford says, that caricatures on cards were the invention of George Townshend in the affair of Byng, which was soon followed by a pack. I am informed of an ancient pack of cards which has caricatures of all the Parliamentarian Generals, which might be not unusefully shuffled by a writer of secret history. We may be surprised to find the grave Sully practising this artifice on several occasions. In the civil wars of France the Duke of Savoy had taken by surprise Saluces, and struck a medal; on the reverse a centaur appears shooting with a bow and arrow, with the legend Opportunitas! But when Henry the Fourth had reconquered the town, he published another, on which Hercules appears killing the centaur, with the word Opportunus. The great minister was the author of this retort! A medal of the Dutch ambassador at the court of France, Van Beuningen, whom the French represent as a haughty burghmaster, but who had the vivacity of a Frenchman, and the haughtiness of a Spaniard, as Voltaire characterizes him, is said to have been the occasion of the Dutch war in 1672; but wars will be hardly made for an idle medal. Medals may, however, indicate a preparatory war. Louis the Fourteenth was so often compared to the sun at its meridian, that some of his creatures may have imagined that, like the sun, he could dart into any part of Europe as he willed, and be as cheerfully received. The Dutch minister, whose christian name was Joshua, however, had a medal struck of Joshua stopping the sun in his course, inferring that this miracle was operated by his little republic. The medal itself is engraven in Van Loon's voluminous Histoire Medallique du Pays Bas, and in Marchand's Dictionnaire Historique, who labours to prove against twenty authors that the Dutch ambassador was not the inventor; it was not, however, unworthy of him, and it conveyed to the world the high feeling of her power which Holland had then assumed. Two years after the noise about this medal, the republic paid dear for the device; but thirty years afterwards this very burghmaster concluded a glorious peace, and France and Spain were compelled to receive the mediation of the Dutch Joshua with the French sun.* In these vehicles of national satire, it is odd that the phlegmatic Dutch, more than any other nation, and from the earliest period of their republic, should have indulged freely, if not licentiously. It was a republican humour. Their taste was usually gross. We owe to them, even in the reign of Elizabeth, a severe medal on Leicester, who having retired in disgust from the government of their provinces, struck a medal with his bust, reverse, a dog and sheep.

Non gregem, sed ingratos incivis docere:

on which the angry juvenile states struck another, representing * This ancient caricature, as descriptive of the popular feelings, is tolerably given in Malcom's History of 'Caricaturing,' plate II. fig. 2.

† The history of this medal is useful in more than one respect; and may be found in Prosper Marchand.

sending an ape and young ones, reverse, Leicester near a fire,

Fugiens fumum, incidit in ignem.

Another medal, with an excellent portrait of Cromwell, was struck by the Dutch. The protector, crowned with laurels, is on his knees, laying his head in the lap of the commonwealth, but loosely exhibiting himself to the French and Spanish ambassadors with gross indecency: the Frenchman, covered with a fleurs de lis, is pushing aside the grave Don, and disputes with him the precedence—Retirez toy; l'honneur appartient au roy mon maître, Louis le Grand. Van Loon is very right in denouncing this same medal, so grossly flattering to the English, as most detestable and imbecile! But why does Van Loon envy us this lumpy invention? why does the Dutchman quarrel with his own cheese? The honour of the medal we claim, but the invention belongs to his country. The Dutch went on, commenting in this manner on English affairs, from reign to reign. Charles the Second declared war against them in 1672 for a malicious medal, though the States-General offered to break the die by purchasing it of the workman for one thousand ducats; but it served for a pretext for a Dutch war, which Charles cared more about than the mala bestia of his exergue. Charles also complained of a scandalous picture which the brothers De Witt had in their house, representing a naval battle with the English. Charles the Second seems to have been more sensible to this sort of national satire than we might have expected in a professed wit; a race, however, who are not the most patient in having their own sauce returned to their lips. The king employed Evelyn to write a history of the Dutch war, and 'enjoined him to make it a little keen, for the Hollanders had very unhandsoomely abused him in their pictures, books, and libels.' The Dutch continued their career of conveying their national feeling on English affairs more triumphantly when their stadtholder ascended an English throne. The birth of the Pretender is represented by the chest which Minerva gave to the daughters of Cecrops to keep, and which, opened, discovered an infant with a serpent's tail: Infantumque videt appropinquare draconem; the chest perhaps alluding to the removes of the warming-pan: and in another, James and a Jesuit flying in terror, the king throwing away a crown and sceptre, and the Jesuit carrying a child, Re, misso est, the words applied from the mass. But in these contests of national feeling, while the grandeur of Louis the Fourteenth did not allow of these ludicrous and satirical exhibitions; and while the political idolatry which his forty academicians paid to him, exhausted itself in the splendid fictions of a series of famous medals, amounting to nearly four hundred; it appears that we were not without our reprisals: for I find Prosper Marchand, who writes as a Hollander, censuring his own country for having at length adulated the grand monarch by a complimentary medal. He says, 'The English cannot be reproached with a similar debonairété.' After the famous victories of Marlborough, they indeed inserted in a medal the head of the French monarch and the English queen, with this inscription, Ludovicus Magnus, Anna Major. Long ere this, one of our queens had been exhibited by ourselves with considerable energy. On the defeat of the Armada, Elizabeth, Pinkerton tells us, struck a medal representing the English and Spanish fleets, Hesperidum regem devicit virgo. Philip had medals dispersed in England of the same impression, with this addition, Negatur. Est meretrix vulgi. These the queen suppressed, but published another medal, with this legend:

*Hesperidum regem devicit virgo; negatur,
Est meretrix vulgi: res eo deterior.*

An age fertile in satirical prints was the eventful era of Charles the First; they were showered from all parties, and a large collection of them would admit of a critical historical commentary, which might become a vehicle of the most curious secret history. Most of them are in a bad style, for they are all allegorical; yet that these satirical exhibitions influenced the eyes and minds of the people is evident, from an extraordinary circumstance. Two grave collections of historical documents adopted them. We are surprised to find prefixed to Rushworth's and Nalson's historical collections, two such political prints! Nalson's was an act of retributive justice; but he seems to have been aware, that satire in the shape of pictures is a language very attractive to the multitude;

for he has introduced a caricature print in the solemn folio of the trial of Charles the First. Of the happiest of these political prints is one by Taylor the water-pooter, not included in his folio, but prefixed to his 'Mad fashions; odd fashions or the emblems of these distracted times.' It is the figure of a man whose eyes have left their sockets, and whose legs have usurped the place of his arms; a horse on his hind legs is drawing a cart; a church is inverted; fish fly in the air; a candle burns with the flame downwards; and the mouse and rabbit are pursuing the cat and the fox!

The animosities of national hatreds have been a fertile source of these vehicles of popular feeling—which discover themselves in severe or grotesque caricatures. The French and the Spaniards mutually exhibited one another under the most extravagant figures. The political caricatures of the French, in the seventeenth century, are numerous. The badadois of Paris amused themselves for their losses, by giving an emetic to a Spaniard, to make him render up all the towns his victories had obtained; seven or eight Spaniards are seen seated around a large turnip, with their frizzled mustachios, their hats en pot à buerre; their long rapiers, with their pummals down to their feet, and their points up to their shoulders; their ruffs stiffened by many rows, and pieces of garlic stuck in their girdles. The Dutch were exhibited in as great variety as the uniformity of frogs would allow. We have largely participated in the vindictive spirit, which these grotesque emblems keep up among the people; they mark the secret feelings of national pride. The Greeks despised foreigners, and considered them only as fit to be slaves; the ancient Jews, inflated with a false idea of their small territory, would be masters of the world: the Italians placed a line of demarcation for genius and taste, and marked it by their mountains. The Spaniards once imagined that the conferences of God with Moses on Mount Sinai were in the Spanish language. If a Japanese becomes the friend of a foreigner, he is considered as committing treason to his emperor; and rejected as a false brother in a country which we are told is figuratively called Tenko, or the kingdom under the Heavens. John Bullism is not peculiar to Englishmen; and patriotism is a noble virtue, when it secures our independence without depriving us of our humanity.

The civil wars of the league in France, and those in England under Charles the First, bear the most striking resemblance; and in examining the revolutionary scenes exhibited by the graver in the famous satire Mentippe, we discover the foreign artist revelling in the caricatures of his ludicrous and severe exhibition; and in that other revolutionary period of La Fronde, there was a mania for political songs; the curious have formed them into collections; and we, not only have 'the Rump songs' of Charles the First's times, but have repeated this kind of evidence of the public feeling at many subsequent periods. Caricatures and political songs might with us furnish a new sort of history; and perhaps would preserve some truths, and describe some particular events, not to be found in more grave authorities.

AUTOGRAPHS.

The art of judging of the characters of persons by their writing can only have any reality, when the pen, acting without constraint, may become an instrument guided by, and indicative of the natural dispositions. But regulated as the pen is now too often by a mechanical process, which the present race of writing-masters seem to have contrived for their own convenience, a whole school exhibits a similar hand-writing; the pupils are forced in their automatic motions, as if acted on by the pressure of a steam-engine; a bevy of beauties will now write such fac-similes of each other, that in a heap of letters presented to the most sharp-sighted lover, to select that of his mistress—though like Bassanio among the caskets, his happiness should be risked on the choice—he would despair of fixing on the right one, all appearing to have come from the

* A passage may be found in Aristotle's politics, vol. i. c. 2—7; where Aristotle advises Alexander to govern the Greeks like his subjects, and the barbarians like slaves; for that the one he was to consider as companions, and the other as creatures of an inferior race.

same rolling-press. Even brothers of different tempers were to their letters, the same regularity to their line, and have made our hand-writings as monotonous as are our characters in the present habits of society. The true physiognomy of writing will be lost among our rising generation: it is no longer a face that we are looking on, but a beautiful mask of a single pattern; and the fashionable hand-writing of our young ladies is like the former tight-lacing of their mother's youthful days, when every one alike had what was supposed to be a fine shape!

Assuredly Nature would prompt every individual to have a distinct sort of writing, as she has given a peculiar countenance—a voice—and a manner. The flexibility of the muscles differs with every individual, and the hand will follow the direction of the thoughts, and the emotions and the habits of the writers. The phlegmatic will portray his words, while the playful haste of the volatile will scarcely sketch them; the slovenly will blot and efface and scrawl, while the neat and orderly minded will view themselves in the paper before their eyes. The merchant's clerk will not write like the lawyer or the poet. Even nations are distinguished by their writing; the vivacity and variability of the Frenchman, and the delicacy and suppleness of the Italian, are perceptibly distinct from the slowness and strength of pen discoverable in the phlegmatic German, Dane, and Swede. When we are in grief, we do not write as we should in joy. The elegant and correct mind, which has acquired the fortunate habit of a fixity of attention, will write with scarcely an erasure on the page, as Fenelon and Gray and Gibbon; while we find in Pope's manuscripts the perpetual struggles of correction, and the eager and rapid interlineations struck off in heat. Lavater's notion of hand-writing is by no means chimerical; nor was General Paoli fanciful, when he told Mr Northcote, that he had decided on the character and dispositions of a man from his letters, and the hand-writing.

Long before the days of Lavater, Shenstone in one of his letters said, 'I want to see Mrs Jago's hand-writing, that I may judge of her temper.' One great truth must however be conceded to the opponents of the physiognomy of writing; general rules only can be laid down. Yet the vital principle must be true, that the hand-writing bears an analogy to the character of the writer, as all voluntary actions are characteristic of the individual. But many causes operate to counteract or obstruct this result. I am intimately acquainted with the hand-writings of five of our great poets. The first in early life acquired among Scottish advocates a hand-writing which cannot be distinguished from that of his ordinary brothers; the second, educated in public schools, where writing is shamefully neglected, composes his sublime or sportive verses in a school-boy's ragged scrawl, as if he had never finished his tasks with the writing master; the third writes his highly-wrought poetry in the common hand of a merchant's clerk, from early commercial avocations; the fourth has all that finished neatness, which polished his verses; while the fifth is a specimen of a full mind, not in the habit of correction or alteration; so that he appears to be printing down his thoughts, without a solitary erasure. The hand-writing of the first and third poets, not indicative of their character, we have accounted for; the others are admirable specimens of characteristic autographs.

Odys, in one of his curious notes, was struck by the distinctness of character in the hand-writings of several of our kings. He observed nothing farther than the mere fact, and did not extend his idea to the art of judging of the natural character by the writing. Odys has described these hand-writings with the utmost correctness, as I have often verified. I shall add a few comments.

'Henry the Eighth wrote a strong hand, but as if he had seldom a good pen.'—The vehemence of his character conveyed itself into his writing; bold, hasty, and commanding, I have no doubt the asserter of the Pope's supremacy and its triumphant destroyer, split many a good quill.

'Edward the Sixth wrote a fair legible hand.' We have this promising young prince's diary, written by his own hand; in all respects he was an assiduous pupil, and he had scarcely learned to write and to reign when we lost him.

'Queen Elizabeth writ an upright hand, like the bastard Italian.' She was indeed a most elegant calligrapher, whom Roger Ascham had taught all the elegancies of the pen. The French editor of the little autographical work I have noticed has given the autograph of her name, which she usually wrote in a very large tall character, and painfully elaborate. He accompanies it with one of the Scottish Mary, who at times wrote elegantly, though usually in uneven lines; when in haste and distress of mind, in several letters during her imprisonment which I have read, much the contrary. The French editor makes this observation: 'Who could believe that these writings are of the same epoch? The first denotes asperity and ostentation; the second indicates simplicity, softness, and nobleness. The one is that of Elizabeth, queen of England; the other that of her cousin, Mary Stuart. The difference of these two hand-writings answers most evidently to that of their characters.'

'James the First writ a poor ungainly character, all awry, and not in a straight line.' James certainly wrote a slovenly scrawl, strongly indicative of that personal negligence which he carried into all the little things of life; and Buchanan, who had made him an excellent scholar, may receive the disgrace of his pupil's ugly scribble, which sprawls about his careless and inelegant letters.

'Charles the First wrote a fair open Italian hand, and more correctly perhaps, than any prince we ever had.' Charles was the first of our monarchs who intended to have domesticated taste in the kingdom, and it might have been conjectured from this unfortunate prince, who so finely discriminated the manners of the different painters, which are in fact their hand-writings, that he would have not been insensible to the elegancies of the pen.

'Charles the Second wrote a little fair running hand, as if wrote in haste, or uneasy till he had done.' Such was the writing to have been expected from this illustrious vagabond, who had much to write, often in odd situations, and could never get rid of his natural restlessness, and vivacity.

'James the Second writ a large fair hand.' It is characterised by his phlegmatic temper, as an exact detailer of occurrences, and the matter-of-business genius of the writer.

'Queen Ann wrote a fair round hand' that is the writing she had been taught by her master, probably without any alteration of manner naturally suggested by herself; the copying hand of a common character.

This subject of autographs associates itself with what has been dignified by its professors as calligraphy, or the art of beautiful writing. As I have something curious to communicate on that subject considered professionally, it shall form our following article.

THE HISTORY OF WRITING-MASTERS.

There is a very apt letter from James the First to prince Henry when very young, on the neatness and fairness of his hand-writing; the royal father suspecting that the prince's tutor, Mr, afterwards Sir Adam Newton, had helped out the young prince in the composition; and that in this specimen of calligraphy he had relied also on the pains of Mr Peter Bales, the great writing-master, for touching up his letters; his majesty shows a laudable anxiety that the prince should be impressed with the higher importance of the one over the other. James shall himself speak. 'I confess I long to receive a letter from you that may be wholly yours, as well matter as form; as well formed by your mind as drawn by your fingers; for ye may remember, that in my book to you I warn you to beware with (of) that kind of wit that may fly out at the end of your fingers; not that I commend not a fair hand-writing; sed hoc facito, illud non omitto; and the other is multo magis precipiendum.' Prince Henry, indeed, wrote with that elegance which he borrowed from his own mind, and in an age when such minute elegance was not universal among the crowned heads of Europe. Henry IV, on receiving a letter from prince Henry, immediately opened it, a custom not usual with him, and comparing the writing with the signature, to decide whether it were of one hand, Sir George Carew, observing the French king's hesitation, called Mr Douglas to testify to the fact; on which Henry the Great, admiring an art in which he had little skill, and looking on the neat elegance of the writing before him, politely observed, 'I see that in writing fair, as in other things, the elder must yield to the younger.'

Had this anecdote of neat writing reached the professors of calligraphy, who in this country have put forth such painful panegyrics on the art, these royal names had unquestionably blazoned their pages. Not, indeed, that these penmen require any fresh inflation; for never has there been a race of professors in any art, who have exceeded in solemnity and pretensions the practitioners in this simple and mechanical craft. I must leave to more ingenious investigators of human nature, to reveal the occult cause which has operated such powerful delusions on these 'Vive la Plume' men, who have been generally observed to possess least intellectual ability, in proportion to the excellence they have obtained in their own art. I suspect this maniacal vanity is peculiar to the writing-masters of England; and I can only attribute the immense importance which they have conceived of their art, to the perfection to which they have carried the art of short-hand writing; an art which was always better understood, and more skillfully practised, in England, than in any other country. It will surprise some when they learn that the artists—verses and colours, poets and painters, have not raised after pretensions to the admiration of mankind. Writing-masters, or calligraphers, have had their engraved fligees, with a Fame in flourishes, a pen in one hand, and a trumpet in the other; and fine verses inscribed, and their very lives written! They have compared to the beautiful in art, and the sublime in invention; nor is this wonderful, since they discover the art of writing, like the invention of language, in a divine original; and from the tablets of stone which the Deity himself delivered, they trace their German broad-text, or their fine running-hand.

One, for 'the bold striking of those words, Vive la Plume,' was so sensible of the reputation that this last piece of command of hand would give the book which he thus adorned, and which his biographer acknowledges was the product of about a minute—(but then how many years of flourishing had that single minute cost him!)—that he claims the glory of an artist, observing,—

'We seldom find

The man of business with the artist join'd.'

Another was flattered that his writing could impart immortality to the most wretched compositions!—

'And any lines prove pleasing, when you write.'

Sometimes the calligrapher is a sort of hero:—

'To you, you rare commander of the quill,

Whose wit and worth, deep learning, and high skill,

Speak you the honour of great Tower Hill'

The last line became traditionally adopted by those who were so lucky as to live in the neighbourhood of this Parnassus. But the reader must form some notion of that charm of calligraphy which has so bewitched its professors, when,

'Soft, bold, and free, your manuscripts still please'

'How justly bold in Snell's improving hand

The Pen at once joins freedom with command!

With softness strong, with ornaments not vain,

Loose with proportion, and with neatness plain;

Not swell'd, not full, complete in every part,

And artful most, when not affecting art.'

And these describe those penciled knots and flourishes, 'the angels, the men, the birds, and the beasts, which as one of them observed, he could

'Command

Even by the gentle motion of his hand,' and the speciosa miracula of calligraphy!

'Thy tender strokes infinitely fine,

Crown with perfection every flowing line;

And to each grand performance add a grace,

As curling hair adorns a beautiful face:

In every page new fancies give delight,

And sporting round the margin charm the sight.

One Massey, a writing-master, published, in 1763, The Origin, and Progress of Letters. The great singularity of this volume is 'A new species of biography never attempted before in English.' This consists of the lives of 'English Penmen,' otherwise writing-masters! If some have foolishly enough imagined that the sedentary lives of authors are void of interest from deficient incident and interesting catastrophe, what must they think of the barren labours of those, who, in the degree they become eminent, to use their own style, in their art of 'dash, dash, long-tail fly,' the less they become interesting to the public; for what can the most skilful writing-master do but wear away his life in leaning over his paper's copy, or sometimes snatch a pen to decorate the margin, though he cannot compose the page? Montaigne has a very original notion on writing-masters: he says that some of those calligraphers, who had obtained promotion by their excellence in the art, afterwards affected to write carelessly, lest their promotion should be suspected to have been owing to such an ordinary acquisition!

Massey is an enthusiast, fortunately for his subject. He considers that there are schools of writing, as well as of painting or sculpture; and expatiates with the eye of fraternal feeling on 'a natural genius, a tender stroke, a grand performance, a bold striking freedom, and a liveliness in the sprigged letters, and penciled knots and flourishes;' while this Vasari of writing-masters relates the controversies and the libels of many a rival pen-mibber. 'George Shelley, one of the most celebrated worthies who have made a shining figure in the commonwealth of English calligraphy, born I suppose of obscure parents, because brought up in Christ's hospital, yet under the humble blue-coat he laid the foundation of his calligraphic excellence and lasting fame, for he was elected writing-master to the hospital.' Shelley published his 'Natural Writing,' but, alas! Snell, another blue-coat, transcended the other. He was a genius who would 'bear no brother near the throne.'—'I have been informed that there were jealous heart-burnings, if not bickerings, between him and Col. Ayres, another of our great reformers in the writing commonwealth, both eminent men, yet, like our most celebrated poets, Pope and Addison, or, to carry the comparison still higher, like Cæsar and Pompey, one could bear no superior, and the other no equal.' Indeed, the great Snell practised a little stratagem against Mr Shelley, which, if writing-masters held courts-martial, this hero ought to have appeared before his brothers. In one of his works he procured a number of friends to write letters, in which Massey confesses 'are some satirical strokes upon Shelley,' as if he had arrogated too much to himself in his book of 'Natural Writing.' They find great fault with penciled knots and sprigged letters. Shelley, who was an advocate for ornaments in fine penmanship, which Snell utterly rejected, had parodied a well-known line of Herbert's in favour of his favourite decorations:

'A Knot may take him who from letters flies,
And turn delight into an exercise.'

These reflections created ill-blood, and even an open difference amongst several of the superior artists in writing. The commanding genius of Snell, had a more terrific contest when he published his 'Standard Rules,' pretending to have demonstrated them as Euclid would. 'This proved a bone of contention, and occasioned a terrific quarrel between Mr Snell and Mr Clark. This quarrel about "Standard Rules" ran so high between them, that they could scarce forbear scurrilous language therein, and a treatment of each other unbecoming gentlemen.' Both sides in this dispute had their abettors; and to say which had the most truth and reason, non nostrum est tantas componere lites; perhaps both parties might be so fond of their own schemes. They should have left them to people to choose which they liked best.' A candid politician is our Massey, and a philosophical historian too; for he winds up the whole story of this civil war by describing its result, which happened as all such great controversies have ever closed. 'Who now-a-days takes those Standard Rules, either one or the other, for their guide in writing?' 'This is the finest lesson ever offered to the ferocious heads of parties, and to all their men; let them meditate on the nothingness of their "standard rules"—by the fate of Mr Snell!'

It was to be expected when once these writing-masters imagined that they were artists, that they would be infected with those plague-spots of genius, envy, detraction, and all the jealousie du métier. And such to this hour we find them! An extraordinary scene of this nature has long been exhibited in my neighbourhood, where two doughty champions of the quill have been posting up libels in their windows respecting the inventor of a new art of writing, the Carstairian or the Lewisian? When the great German philosopher asserted that he had discovered the me-of fluxions before Sir Isaac, and when the dispute was so violent that even the calm Newton sent a formal lance in set terms, and got even George the Second to arbitrate, (who would rather have undertaken a campaign) the method of fluxions was no more cleared up, in the present affair between our two heroes of the pen.

A recent instance of one of these egregious calligraphers may be told of the late Tomkins. This vainest of writing-masters dreamed through life that penmanship was one of the fine arts, and that a writing-master should be seated with his peers in the Academy! He bequeathed to the British Museum his opus magnum; a copy of Macklin's bible, profusely embellished with the most beautiful and varied decorations of his pen; and as he conceived that the workman and the work would alike be daring objects with posterity, he left something immortal with the pen, his fine bust by Chantry! unaccompanied by which they were not to receive the unparalleled gift. When Tomkins applied to have his bust, our great sculptor abated the usual price, and courteously kind to the writings of the man, said that he considered Tomkins as an artist! It was the proudest day of the life of our writing-master!

But an eminent artist and wit now living, once looking at this fine bust of Tomkins, declared, that 'this man had died for want of a dinner!'—a fate, however, not so lamentable as it appeared! Our penman had long felt that he stood degraded in the scale of genius by not being received at the Academy, at least among the class of enrôlés; the next approach to academic honour he conceived would be that of appearing as a guest at their annual dinner. These invitations are as limited as they are select, and all the Academy persisted in considering Tomkins as a writing-master! Many a year passed, every intrigue was practised, every remonstrance was urged, every stratagem of courtesy was tried; but never ceasing to detest the failure of his hopes, it preyed on his spirits, and he luckless calligrapher went down to his grave—without being at the Academy! This authentic anecdote has been considered as 'satire improperly directed'—by some friend of Mr Tomkins—but the criticism is much too grave! The foible of Mr Tomkins as a writing-master, presents a striking illustration of the class of men here denominated. I am a mere historian—and am only responsible for the veracity of this fact. That 'Mr Tomkins lived a familiar intercourse with the Royal Academicians of his day, and was a frequent guest at their private tables,' and moreover was a most worthy man, I believe—but it is less rue that he was ridiculously mortified by being never invited to the Academic dinner, on account of his calligraphy? He had some reason to consider that his art was of the exalted class, to which he aspired to raise it, when his friend concludes his eulogy of this writing-master thus—'Mr Tomkins, as an artist, stood foremost in his own profession, and his name will be handed down to posterity with the Heroes and Statesmen, whose excellences his penmanship has contributed to illustrate and to commemorate.' I always give the Pour and the Contre!

Such men about such things have produced public contests, combats à l'outrance, where much ink was spilt by the knights in a joust of goose-quills; these solemn trials have often occurred in the history of writing-masters, which is enlivened by public defiance, proclamations, and judicial trials by umpires! The prize was usually a golden pen of some value. One as late as the reign of Anne took place between Mr German and Mr More. German having courteously insisted that Mr More should set the copy, he thus set it, ingeniously quaint!

As more, and More, our understanding clears,
So more and more our ignorance appears.

The result of this pen-combat was really lamentable; they displayed such an equality of excellence that the umpires refused to decide, till one of them espied that Mr German had omitted the title of an ! But Mr More was evidently a man of genius, not only by his couplet, but in his 'Essay on the Invention of Writing,' where occurs this noble passage: 'Art with me is of no party. A noble emulation I would cherish, while it proceeded neither from, nor to malevolence. Bales had his Johnson, Norman his Mason, Ayres his Matlock and his Shelley; yet Art the while was no sufferer. The busy-body who officiously employs himself in creating misunderstandings between artists, may be compared to a turn-stile, which stands in every man's way, yet hinders nobody; and he is the slanderer who gives ear to the slander.*'

Among these knights of the 'Plume volant,' whose chivalric exploits assounded the beholders, must be distinguished Peter Bales in his joust with David Johnson. In this tilting match the guerdon of calligraphy was won by the greatest of calligraphers; its arms were assumed by the victor, assur, a pen or; while 'the golden pen,' carried away in triumph, was painted with a hand over the door of the calligrapher. The history of this renowned encounter was only traditionally known, till with my own eyes I pondered on this whole trial of skill in the precious manuscript of the champion himself; who, like Caesar, not only knew how to win victories, but also to record them. Peter Bales was a hero of such transcendent eminence, that his name has entered into our history. Ho-lingshead chronicles one of his curiosities of microscopic writing, at a time when the taste prevailed for admiring writing which no eye could read! In the compass of a silver penny this calligrapher put more things than would fill several of these pages. He presented Queen Elizabeth with the manuscript set in a ring of gold covered with a crystal; he had also contrived a magnifying glass of such power, that, to her delight and wonder, her majesty read the whole volume, which she held on her thumb nail, and 'commended the same to the lords of the council, and the ambassadors'; and frequently, as Peter often heard, did her majesty vouchsafe to wear this calligraphic ring.

'Some will think I labour on a cobweb'—modestly exclaimed Bales in his narrative, and his present historian much fears for himself! The reader's gratitude will not be proportioned to my pains, in condensing such copious pages into the size of a 'silver penny,' but without its worth!

For a whole year had David Johnson affixed a challenge 'To any one who should take exceptions to this my writing and teaching.' He was a young friend of Bales, daring and longing for an encounter; yet Bales was magnanimously silent, till he discovered that he was 'doing much less in writing and teaching' since this public challenge was proclaimed! He then set up his counter challenge, and in one hour afterwards Johnson arrogantly accepted it, 'in a most despicable and arrogant manner.' Bales's challenge was delivered 'in good terms.' 'To all Englishmen and strangers.' It was to write for a gold pen of twenty pound's value in all kinds of hands, 'best, straightest and fastest,' and most kind of ways; a full, a mean, a small, with line and without line; in a slow set hand, a mean facile hand, and a fast running hand; and farther, 'to write truest and speediest, most secretary and clerk-like, from a man's mouth, reading or pronouncing, either English or Latin.'

Young Johnson had the hardihood now of turning the tables on his great antagonist, accusing the veteran Bales of arrogance. Such an absolute challenge says he, was never witnessed by man, 'without exception of any in the world!' And a few days after meeting Bales, 'of set purpose to affront and disgrace him what he could, showed Bales a piece of writing of secretary's hand, which he had very much laboured in fine abortive parchment,' uttering to the challenger these words: 'Mr Bales, give me one shilling out of your purse, and if within six months you better, or equal this piece of writing, I will give you forty pounds for it.' This legal deposit of the shilling was made, and the challenger, or appellant, was thereby bound by law to the performance.

The day before the trial a printed declaration was affixed throughout the city, taunting Bales's 'proud poverty,' and his pecuniary motives, as 'a thing ungentle, base, and mercenary, and not answerable to the dignity of the golden pen!' Johnson declares he would maintain his challenge for a thousand pounds more, but for the respondent's inability to perform a thousand groats. Bales retorts on the libel; declares it as a sign of his rival's weakness, 'yet who so bold as blind Bayard, that hath not a word of Latin to cast at a dog, or say Bo! to a goose!'

On Michaelmas day, 1596, the trial opened before five judges: the appellant and the respondent appeared at the appointed place, and an ancient gentleman was intrusted with 'the golden pen.' In the first trial, for the manner of teaching scholars, after Jenson had taught his pupil a fortnight, he would not bring him forward! This was awarded in favour of Bales.

The second, for secretary and clerk-like writing, dictating to them both in English and in Latin, Bales performed best, being first done; written straight without line, with true orthography; the challenger himself confessing that he wanted the Latin tongue, and was no clerk!

The third and last trial for fair writing in sundry kinds of hands, the challenger prevailed for the beauty and most 'authentic proportion,' and for the superior variety of the Roman hand. In the court hand the respondent exceeded the appellant, and likewise in the set text; and in bastard secretary was also somewhat perfecter.

At length Bales perhaps perceiving an equilibrium in the judicial decisions, to overwhelm his antagonist, presented what he distinguishes as his 'master-piece,' composed of secretary and Roman hand four ways varied, and offering the defendant to let pass all his previous advantages if he could better this specimen of calligraphy! The challenger was silent! At this moment some of the judges perceiving that the decision must go in favour of Bales, in consideration of the youth of the challenger, lest he might be disgraced to the world, requested the other judges not to pass judgment in public. Bales assures us, that he in vain demonstrated; for by these means the winning of the golden pen might not be so famously spread as otherwise it would have been. To Bales the prize was awarded. But our history has a more interesting close; the subtle Machiavelism of the first challenger!

When the great trial had closed, and Bales, carrying off the golden pen, exultingly had it painted and set up for his sign, the baffled challenger went about reporting that he had won the golden pen, but that the defendant had obtained the same by 'plots and shifts, and other base and cunning practices.' Bales vindicated his claim, and offered to show the world his 'master-piece' which had acquired it. Jenson issued an 'Appeal to all impartial Pen-men,' which he spread in great numbers through the city for ten days, a libel against the judges and the victorious defendant! He declared that there had been a subtil combination with one of the judges concerning the place of trial; which he expected to have been before Pen-men, but not before a multitude like a stage-play, and shouts and tumults, with which the challenger had hitherto been unacquainted. The judges were intended to be twelve; but of the five, four were the challenger's friends, honest gentlemen, but unskilled in judging of most hands; and he offered again forty pounds to be allowed in six months to equal Bales's master piece. And he closes his 'appeal' by declaring that Bales had lost in several parts of the trial, neither did the judges deny that Bales possessed himself of the golden pen by a trick! Before judgment was awarded, alleging the sickness of his wife to be extreme, he desired she might have a sight of the golden pen to comfort her! The ancient gentleman who was the holder, taking the defendant's word, allowed the golden pen to be carried to the sick wife; and Bales immediately pawned it, and afterwards, to make sure work, sold it at a great loss, so that when the judges met for their definitive sentence, nor pen nor penny-worth was to be had! The judges being ashamed of their own conduct, were compelled to give such a verdict as suited the occasion:

Bales rejoins: he publishes to the universe the day and the hour when the judges brought the golden pen to his house, and while he checks the insolence of this Bobadil, to show himself no recreant, assumes the golden pen for his sign.

Such is the shortest history I could contrive of this chivalry of the pen; something mysteriously clouds over the fate of the defendant; Bales's history, like Cæsar's, is but an ex-parte evidence. Who can tell whether he has not slurred over his defeats, and only dwelt on his victories?

There is a strange phrase connected with the art of the calligrapher, which I think may be found in most, if not in all modern languages, to write like an angel! Ladies have been frequently compared to angels; they are beautiful as angels, and sing and dance like angels; but however intelligible these are, we do not so easily connect penmanship with the other celestial accomplishments. This fanciful phrase, however, has a very human origin. Among these last Greeks who emigrated to Italy, and afterwards to France, in the reign of Francis I, was one Angelo Grieco, whose beautiful calligraphy excited the admiration of the learned. The French monarch had a Greek cast, modelled by his writing. The learned Henry Stephens, who, like our Porson for correctness and delicacy was one of the most elegant writers of Greek, had learned the practice from our Angelo. His name became synonymous for beautiful writing, and gave birth to the proverb or familiar phrase, to write like an angel!

THE ITALIAN HISTORIANS.

It is remarkable that the country, which has long been political independence, may be considered as the true rent of modern history. The greater part of the historians have abstained from the applause of their contemporaries, while they have not the less elaborately exposed their posthumous folios, consecrated solely to posterity! The true principles of national glory, opened by the grandeur of the minds of these assured political freedom. It was their indignant spirit, and to console its injuries by confiding them to their manuscripts, which raised up this singular phenomenon in the literary world.

Of the various causes which produced such a lofty spirit of patriots, one is prominent. The proud recollection of their Roman fathers often troubled the dreams of the petty republics, and the petty despotic principalities, which had started up from some great families, who, at first came forward as the protectors of the people from their exterior enemies or their interior factions, length settled into a corruption of power; a power which had been conferred on them to preserve liberty. These factions often shook by their jealousies, their feuds and their hatreds, that divided land, which groaned whenever they witnessed the 'Ultramontanes' descending from their Alps and their Apennines. Petrarch, in a noble vective, warmed by Livy and ancient Rome, impatiently beheld the French and the Germans passing the mountains, 'Enemies,' he cries, 'so often conquered, prepared to strike with swords, which formerly served us to raise trophies: shall the mistress of the world bear disfigured by hands which she has so often bound to her backs?' Machiavel, in his 'Exhortations to free Italy from the barbarians,' rouses his country against their changeable masters, the Germans, the French, and the Spaniards; closing with the verse of Petrarch, that should be the battle for which patriot virtue arms to show the world—

'che l' antico valore
Ne ge' Italici cuor non è ancor morto.'

Nor has this sublime patriotism declined even in more recent times; I cannot resist from preserving in this place a sonnet by Filicaja, which I could never read without participating in the agitation of the writer, for the ancient glory of his degenerated country! The energetic personification of the close, perhaps, surpasses even his more celebrated sonnet, preserved in Lord Byron's notes to the fourth canto of 'Childe Harold.'

Dov' è Italia, il tuo braccio? e a che ti servi
Tu dell' altri? non è s'io scorgo il vero,
Di chi t' offende il defensor men fiero:
Ambe nemici sono, ambo fur eervi.
Così dunque l' onor, così conservi
Gli avanzi tu del glorioso Impero?
Così al valor, così al valor primiero
Che a te fede giuro, la fede osservi?
Or va; repudia il valor primiero,
L' ozio, e fra il sangue, i gemiti, e le strida
Nel periglio maggior dormi e riposa!
Dormi, Adultera vil! fin che omicida
Spada ultrice ti svegli, e nonnacchio,
E nuda in braccio al tuo fedel t' uccida!

Oh, Italy! where is thine arm? What purpose serves
So to be helped by others? Deem I right,
Among offenders thy defender stands?
Both are thy enemies—both were thy servants!
Thus dost thou honour—thus dost thou preserve
The mighty boundaries of the glorious empire?
And thine to Valour, to thy pristine Valour
That swore its faith to thee, thy faith thou keep'st?
Go! and divorce thyself from thy old Vallance,
And marry illness! and midst the blood,
The heavy groans and cries of agony,
In thy last danger sleep, and seek repose!

Slugg, vile Adulterers! the homicidal sword
Vengeful, shall waken thee; and lull'd to slumber,
While naked in thy minion's arms, shall strike!

Among the domestic contests of Italy the true principles of political freedom were developed; and in that country may be found the origin of Philosophical History, which includes so many important views and so many new results, unknown to the ancients.

Machiavel seems to have been the first writer who directed the secret of what may be called comparative history.

He it was who first sought in ancient history for the parallels which were to illustrate the events of his own age; by fixing on analogous facts, similar personages, parallel periods. This was enlarging the field of history, and opening a new combination for philosophical relation.

His profound genius advanced still further; not only explained modern by ancient history, but he used those results or principles founded on this new mode of evidence, which guided him in forming his opinions. Very had hitherto been, if we except Tacitus, but a very well told, and in writers of limited capacity, the dearth of facts had too often been considered as the only valuable portion of history. An erudition of facts in the philosophy of history; an historian unskilful in art of applying his facts amasses impure ore, which he must strike into coin.

The chancellor D'Aguessseau, in instructions to his son on the study of history, has adroitly touched on this distinction. 'Minds which are not historical mistake a fact for an argument; they are accustomed to satisfy themselves by repeating a great heap of facts and enriching their memory, that they become incapable of reasoning on principles. It often happens that the result of their knowledge breeds confusion and universal indecision; for their facts, often contradictory, only raise up doubts. The superfluous and the false occupy the place of what is essential and solid, or at least so overload and darken it, that we must sail with the wind in a sea of trifles to get to firm land. Those who only see the philosophical part of history, fall into an opposite extreme; they judge of what has been done by that which should be done; while the others always decide on that which should be done by that which has been; the first are slaves of their reasoning, the second of the facts which they mistake for reasoning. We should not separate two things which ought always to go in concert, and mutually aid, reason and example. Avoid equally the contempt of some philosophers for the science of facts, and the incapacity which those who confine themselves to facts often contract for whatever depends on reasoning. True and solid philosophy should direct the study of history, and the study of history should perfect philosophy. Such was the enlightened man, as far back as at the beginning of the last century, the studious chancellor of France, before the more re-designation of Philosophical History was so generally used, and so familiar on our title-pages.

From the moment that the Florentine secretary conceived the idea that the history of the Roman people, opening a varied spectacle of human nature, served as a point of comparison to which he might perpetually recur to try analogous facts of other nations, and the events pass under his own eye; a new light broke out and ran through the vast extents of history. The maturity of excellence seemed to have been obtained by the historian, in his early meditations. Livy in the grandeur of Rome, Tacitus in its fated decline, exhibited for Machiavel a living picture of his own republics—the march of destiny in human governments! The text of Livy and Tacitus led to him many an imperfect secret—the fuller truths drew from the depth of his own observations on his times. In Machiavel's 'Discourses on Livy,' we discover the foundations of our Philosophical History. He is the example of Machiavel, like that of all creative geniuses, influenced the character of his age, and his history of Rome produced an emulative spirit among a new dynasty of historians.

These Italian historians have proved themselves to be an extraordinary race, for they devoted their days to the narration of historical works, which they were certain not to see the light during their lives! They nobly despised that their works should be posthumous, rather than be compelled to mutilate them for the press. These men were rather the saints than the martyrs of history; they did not always personally suffer for truth, but during their protracted labour they sustained their spirits by anticipating their glorified after-state.

Among these Italian historians must be placed the illustrious Guicciardini, the friend of Machiavel. No perfect edition of this historian existed till recent times. The history itself was posthumous; nor did his nephew venture to publish it, till twenty years after the historian's death. He only gave the first sixteen books, and these castrated. The obnoxious passages consisted of some statements relating to the papal court, then so important in the affairs of Europe; some account of the origin and progress of the papal power; some eloquent pictures of the abuses and disorders of that corrupt court; and some free caricatures on the government of Florence. The precious fragments were fortunately preserved in manuscript, and the Protestants procured transcripts which they published separately, but which were long very rare.* All the Italian editions continued to be reprinted in the same truncated condition, and appear only to have been reinstated in the immortal history, so late as in 1775! Thus it required two centuries, before an editor could venture to give the world the pure and complete text of the manuscript of the lieutenant-general of the papal army, who had been so close and so indignant an observer of the Roman cabinet.

Idrizi, whom his son entitles gentilhom Florentino: the writer of the pleasing dissertation 'on the ancient painters noticed by Pliny,' prefixed to his friend Vasari's biographies; wrote, as a continuation of Guicciardini, a history of his own times in twenty-two books, of which Demina gives the highest character for its moderate spirit, and from which De Thou has largely drawn and commends for its authenticity. Our author, however, did not venture to publish his history during his lifetime: it was after his death that his son became the editor.

Nardi, of a noble family and high in office, famed for a translation of Livy which rivals its original in the pleasure it affords, in his retirement from public affairs wrote a history of Florence, which closes with the loss of the liberty of his country, in 1531. It was not published till fifty years after his death; even then the editors suppressed many passages which are found in manuscript in the libraries of Florence and Venice, with other historical documents of this noble and patriotic historian.

About the same time the senator Philip Nerli was writing his 'Commentary de' fatti civili,' which had occurred in Florence. He gave them with his dying hand to his nephew, who presented the MSS to the Grand Duke; yet although this work is rather an apology than a crimination of the Medici family for their ambitious views and their over-grown power, probably some state-reason interfered to prevent the publication, which did not take place till 160 years after the death of the historian!

Bernardo Segni composed a history of Florence still more valuable, which shared the same fate as that of Nerli. It was only after his death that his relatives accidentally discovered this history of Florence, which the author had carefully concealed during his lifetime. He had abstained from communicating to any one the existence of such a work while he lived, that he might not be induced to check the freedom of his pen, nor compromise the cause and the interests of truth. His heirs presented it to one of the Medici family, who threw it aside. Another copy had been more carefully preserved, from which it was printed, in 1713, about 180 years after it had been written. It appears to have excited great curiosity, for Lenglet du Fresnoy observes, that the scarcity of this history is owing to the circumstance 'of the Grand Duke having bought up the copies.' Du Fresnoy, indeed, has noticed more than once this sort of address of the Grand Duke; for he observes on the Florentine history of Bruto, that the work was not common; the Grand Duke having bought up the copies, to suppress them. The author was even obliged to fly from Italy, for having delivered his opinions too freely on the house of the Medici. This honest historian thus expresses himself at the close of his work. 'My design has but one end; that our posterity may learn by these notices the root and the causes of so many troubles which we have suffered, while they expose the malignity of those men who have raised them up, or prolonged them; as well as the goodness of those who did all which they could to turn them away.'

* They were printed at Basle in 1699—at London in 1696—in Amsterdam, 1693. How many attempts to echo the voice of suppressed truth!—Haym's Bib. Ital. 1803.

It was the same motive, the fear of offending the great personages or their families, of whom these historians had so freely written, which deterred Benedetto Varchi from publishing his well-known 'Storie Fiorentine,' which was not given to the world till 1721, a period which appears to have roused the slumbers of the literary men of Italy to recur to their native historians. Varchi, who wrote with so much zeal the history of his father-land, is noticed by Nardi as one who never took an active part in the events he records; never having combined with any party, and living merely as a spectator. This historian closes the narrative of a horrid crime of Peter Lewis Farnese with this admirable reflection: 'I know well this story, with many others which I have freely exposed, may hereafter prevent the reading of my history; but also I know, that besides what Tacitus has said on this subject, the great duty of an historian is not to be more careful of the reputation of persons than is suitable with truth, which is to be preferred to all things, however detrimental it may be to the writer.'*

Such was that free manner of thinking and of writing which prevailed in these Italian historians, who, often living in the midst of the ruins of popular freedom, poured forth their injured feelings in their secret pages; without the hope, and perhaps without the wish, of seeing them published in their life-time: a glorious example of self-denial and lofty patriotism!

Had it been inquired of these writers why they did not publish their histories, they might have answered, in nearly the words of an ancient sage, 'Because I am not permitted to write as I would; and I would not write as I am permitted.' We cannot imagine that these great men were in the least insensible to the applause they denied themselves; they were not of tempers to be turned aside; and it was the highest motive which can inspire an historian, a stern devotion to truth, which reduced them to silence, but not to inactivity! These Florentine and Venetian historians, ardent with truth, and profound in political sagacity, were solely writing these legacies of history for their countrymen, hopeless of their gratitude! If a Frenchman wrote the English history, that labour was the aim of his own glory; if Hume and Robertson devoted their pens to history, the motive of the task was less glorious than their work; but here we discover a race of historians, whose patriotism alone instigated their secret labour, and who substituted for fame and fortune that mightier spirit, which, amidst their conflicting passions, has developed the truest principles, and even the errors, of Political Freedom!

None of these historians, we have seen, published their works in their life-time. I have called them the saints of history, rather than the martyrs. One, however, had the intrepidity to risk this awful responsibility, and he stands

* My friend Merivale, whose critical research is only equalled by the elegance of his taste, has supplied me with a note which proves, but too well, that even writers who compose uninfluenced by party feelings, may not, however, be sufficiently scrupulous in weighing the evidence of the facts which they collect. Mr Merivale observes, 'The strange and improbable narrative with which Varchi has the misfortune of closing his history, should not have been even hinted at without adding, that it is denounced by other writers as a most impudent forgery, invented years after the occurrence is supposed to have happened, by the "Apostate" bishop Petrus Paulus Vergerius. See its refutation in Amiani, Hist. di Fano II, 149 et seq. 160.'

Varchi's character, as an historian, cannot but suffer greatly from his having given it insertion on such authority. The responsibility of an author for the truth of what he relates should render us very cautious of giving credit to the writers of memoirs not intended to see the light till a distant period. The credibility of Vergerius, as an acknowledged libeller of Pope Paul III. and his family, appears all more conclusively from his article in Bayle, note K. It must be added, that the calumny of Vergerius may be found in Wolfius's Lect. Mem. II, 621. In a tract de Idolo Laurotens, published 1558. Varchi is more particular in his details of this monstrous tale. Vergerius's libels, universally read at the time, though they were collected afterwards, are now not to be met with, even in public libraries. Whether there was any truth in the story of Peter Lewis Farnese I know not; but crimes of as monstrous a diabolism in the authentic Guicciardini. The story is not yet forgotten, since in the last edition of Hayn's Biblioteca Italiana, the best edition is marked as that which at p. 639 contains 'Inaccertatezza di Pier Lewis Farnese.' I am of opinion that Varchi believed the story, by the solemnity of his proposition. Whatever be its truth, the historian's feeling was elevated and intrepid.

This great historian is Giannone, whose civil life the kingdom of Naples is remarkable for in its inquiries concerning the civil and ecclesiastical constitution, the laws and customs of that kingdom. With interruptions from his professional avocations, and twenty years were consumed in writing this history, searches on ecclesiastical usurpations, and severities on the clergy, are the chief subjects of his unreserved pen. These passages, curious, grave, and dignified, were afterwards extracted from the hands of Vernet, and inserted in a small volume, under the title of 'Anecdotes Ecclesiastiques,' 1738. When Giannone consulted with a friend on the propriety of publishing his history, his critic, in admiring the work, predicted of the author, 'You have,' said he, 'placed at the head a crown of thorns, and of very sharp ones; a historian set at naught his own personal repose; and this elaborate history saw the light. From that time the historian never enjoyed a day of quiet! But tempted at first to extinguish the author with his own books were seized on; and copies of the first are of extreme rarity. To escape the fangs of imperial power, the historian of Naples flew from Naples, the publication of his immortal work. The fugitive excommunicated author sought an asylum at Vienna, where, though he found no friend in the emperor, Eugene and other nobles became his patrons. He fled to quit Vienna, he retired to Venice, when a new persecution arose from the jealousy of the state inquisitors, one night landed him on the borders of the pope's dominions. Escaping unexpectedly with his life to Genoa, he was preparing a supplemental volume to his civil history, when, enticed by a treacherous friend to his native village, Giannone was arrested by an order of the king of Sardinia; his manuscripts were sent to Rome, and the historian imprisoned in a fort. It is curious that the imprisoned Giannone wrote a vindication of the rights of the king of Sardinia, against the claims of the court of Rome. This powerful appeal to the feelings of this sovereign, at first favourably received; but, under the secret influence of Rome, the Sardinian monarch, on the customary plea that he kept Giannone as a prisoner, that he might preserve him from the papal power, and that the vindicator of his rights should be more confined than before! and, for this purpose, transferred his state-prisoner to the Citadel of Turin, where, twelve years of persecution and of agitation, our historian closed his life!

Such was the fate of this historical martyr, whose catholic Hayn describes as opera scripta cum furore e troppa liberta. He hints that this history is paralleled by De Thou's great work. This Italian history will ever be ranked among the most philosophical, profound as was the masculine genius of Giannone, and his love of fame, that he wanted the intrepidity to deny himself the delight of giving his history to the world, though some of his great predecessors had attained a noble and dignified example.

One more observation on these Italian historians, of them represent man in his darkest colours; their life is terrific; the actors are monsters of perfidy, of inhumanity, and inventors of crimes which seem to us new! They were all 'princes of darkness,' and they seemed to afford a triumph to Manicheism! The passions were called into play by all parties. But if this thing is to be ascribed to the manners of the times, more may be traced to that science of politics, sought for mastery in an undefinable struggle of impalpable political power; in the remorseless ambition of despots, and the hatreds and jealousies of the royal court. These Italian historians have formed a perpetual lesson on the contemptible simulation and dissimulation, and inexpressible crimes of that system of politics, which has derived a name from one of themselves—the great, and add, the calumniated, Machiavel?

OF PALACES BUILT BY MINISTERS.

Our ministers and court favourites, as well as the continent, practised a very impolitic custom, and likely to be repeated, although it has never failed to excite popular odium on their name, exciting even the rage of their equals—in the erection of palaces for themselves.

strived those of the sovereign; and which, to the populace, appeared as a perpetual and insatiable of what they deemed the ill-earned wages of power, oppression, and court-favour. We discover then of this passion for ostentation, this haughtiness of their power, and this self-idolatry, even among the prudent and the wisest of our ministers; and not lived to lament over this vain act of imprudence. A minister the noble simplicity of Pitt will ever admirable contrast; while his personal character, too, descends to posterity, unstained by calumnies of Cardinal Wolsey appear to have exceeded all the splendours of the sovereign in magnificence; and perhaps was in all the pride of pomp, the great Cardinal raved with envy pursuing him so close at his heels, relinquished one palace after the other, and gave place to the monarch, what, in all his overgrown pride, he trembled to retain for himself. The state of that day was often pointed at this very circumstance appears in Skilton's 'Why come ye not to' and Roy's 'Rede me, and be not wrothe.' Skelton's rhymes leave their bitter teeth in his purple and the style of both these satirists, if we use our topography, shows how little the language of the people has varied during three centuries.

Set up the wretch on high
In a throne triumphantly;
Make him a great state
And he will play check-mate
With royal majesty—
The King's Court
Should have the excellence,
But Hampton Court
Hath the pre-eminence;
And York's Place
With my Lord's grace.
To whose magnificence
Is all the confluence,
Suits, and supplications;
Embassies of all nations.

in contemplating the palace, is maliciously reminded of the butcher's lad, and only gives plain sense in words.

Hath the Cardinal any gay mansion?
Great palaces without comparison,
Most glorious of outward sight,
And within decked point-device,*
More like unto a paradise
Than an earthly habitation.
He cometh then of some noble stock?
His father could match a bullock,
A butcher by his occupation.

Now we may now think of the structure, and the apartments of Wolsey's palace, it is described not in his own times, but much later, as of unparalleled beauty; and indeed Cavendish's narrative of the king's entertainment of the French ambassadors, an idea of the ministerial-prelate's imperial estate, very puzzling to the comprehension of a modern spectator. Six hundred persons, I think, were banqueting and slept in an abode which appears to us so mean, which Stowe calls 'so stately a palace.' To avoid the idea of living in this splendid edifice, Wolsey pretends to the king, who, in recompense, suffered the king occasionally to inhabit this wonder of England, character of keeper of the king's palace;† so that he only dared to live in his own palace by a subterfuge. This perhaps was a tribute which ministerial flattery paid to popular feeling, or to the jealousy of a master.

We elsewhere shown the extraordinary elegance and policy of expenditure of Buckingham's residences; were such as to have extorted the wonder, even of the device, a term ingeniously explained by my learned friend Doce. He thinks that it is borrowed from the idea of the needle, as we have point-lace, so point-device, I think, is a rich, and device, devised or invented; applied to any thing uncommonly exact, or worked with the precision of stitches made or devised by the needle. Shakespeare, i. 2. But Mr Gifford has since said that the origin of the expression is, perhaps, yet to be found; he derives it from a mathematical phrase, a point, or a given point, and hence exact, correct, &c. ibid. Vol. IV. 170. See for various examples—Mr Gifford, Art. Point-device. John's Enriches v. 66

Bassompierre, and unquestionably excited the indignation of those who lived in a poor court, while our gay and thoughtless minister alone could indulge in the wanton profusion.

But Wolsey and Buckingham were ambitious and adventurous; they rose and shone the comets of the political horizon of Europe. The Roman tiara still haunted the imagination of the Cardinal; and the egotistic pride of having out-rivalled Richelieu and Olivarez, the nominal ministers but the real sovereigns of Europe, kindled the buoyant spirits of the gay, the gallant, and the splendid Villiers. But what 'folly of the wise' must account for the conduct of the profound Clarendon, and the sensible Sir Robert Walpole, who, like the other two ministers, equally became the victims of this imprudent passion for the ostentatious pomp of a palace. This magnificence looked like the vaunt of insolence in the eyes of the people, and covered the ministers with a popular odium.

Clarendon House is now only to be viewed in a print; but its story remains to be told. It was built on the site of Grafton-street; and when afterwards purchased by Monk, the Duke of Albemarle, he left his title to that well known-street. It was an edifice of considerable extent and grandeur. Clarendon reproaches himself in his life for 'his weakness and vanity,' in the vast expense incurred in this building, which he acknowledges had more contributed to that gust of envy that had so violently shaken him, than any misdemeanor that he was thought to have been guilty of.† It ruined his estate; but he had been encouraged to it by the royal grant of the land, by that passion for building to which he owes 'he was naturally too much inclined,' and perhaps by other circumstances, among which was the opportunity of purchasing the stones which had been designed for the rebuilding of St Paul's; but the envy it drew on him, and the excess of the architect's proposed expense, had made his life 'very uneasy, and near insupportable.' The truth is, that when this palace was finished, it was imputed to him as a state-crime; all the evils in the nation, which were then numerous, pestilence, conflagration, war, and defeats, were discovered to be in some way connected with Clarendon-house; or, as it was popularly called, either Dunkirk-House, or Tangier-Hall, from a notion that it had been erected with the golden bribery which the chancellor had received for the sale of Dunkirk and Tangiers. He was reproached with having profaned the sacred stones dedicated to the use of the church. The great but unfortunate master of this palace, who, from a private lawyer, had raised himself by alliance even to royalty, the father-in-law of the Duke of York, it was maliciously suggested, had persuaded Charles the Second to marry the Infanta of Portugal, knowing (but how Clarendon obtained the knowledge, his enemies have not revealed) that the Portuguese Princess was not likely to raise any obstacle to the inheritance of his own daughter to the throne. At the Restoration, among other enemies, Clarendon found that the royalists were none the least active; he was reproached by them for preferring those who had been the cause of their late troubles. The same reproach has been incurred in the late restoration of the Bourbons. It is perhaps difficult, and more political to maintain active men, who have obtained power, than to reinstate inferior talents, who at least have not their popularity. This is one of the parallel cases which so frequently strike us in exploring political history; and the atras of Louis the Eighteenth are only the royalists of Charles the Second. There was a strong popular delusion carried on by the wits and the Missee, who formed the court of Charles the Second, that the government was as much shared by the Hydes as the Stuarts. We have in the state-poems, an unsparring lampoon, entitled, 'Clarendon's House-warming;' but a satire yielding nothing in severity I have discovered in manuscript, and it is also remarkable for turning chiefly on a pun of the family name of the Earl of Clarendon. The witty and malicious rhymor, after making Charles the Second demand the great seal, and resolve to be his own chancellor, proceeds, reflecting on the great political victim.

Lo! his whole ambition already divides
The sceptre between the Stuarts and the Hydes.
Behold, in the depth of our plague and wars,
He built him a palace out-braves the stars;
Which house (we Dunkirk, he Clarendon, names
Looks down with shame upon St James;
But 'tis not his golden globe that will save him,

Being less than the custom-house farmers gave him;
His chapel for consecration calls,
Whose sacrifice plundered the stones from Paul's.
When Queen Dido landed she bought as much ground
As the Hyde of a lusty fat bull would surround;
But when the said Hyde was cut into thongs,
A city and kingdom to Hyde belongs;
So here in court, church, and country, far and wide,
Here's naught to be seen but Hyde! Hyde! Hyde!
Of old, and where law the kingdom divides,
'Twas our hides of land, 'tis now land of Hydes!

Clarendon-House was a palace, which had been raised with at least as much fondness as pride; and Evelyn tells us, that the garden was planned by himself and his lordship; but the cost, as usual, trebled the calculation, and the noble master grieved in silence amidst this splendid pile of architecture.* Even when in his exile the sale was proposed to pay his debts, and secure some provision for his younger children, he honestly tells us, that 'he remained still so infatuated with the delight he had enjoyed, that though he was deprived of it, he hearkened very unwillingly to the advice.' In 1683 Clarendon-House met its fate, and was abandoned to the brokers, who had purchased it for its materials. An affecting circumstance is recorded by Evelyn on this occasion. In returning to town with the Earl of Clarendon, the son of the great earl, 'in passing by the glorious palace his father built but few years before, which they were now demolishing, being sold to certain undertakers, I turned my head the contrary way till the coach was gone past by, lest I might minister occasion of speaking of it, which must needs have grieved him, that in so short a time this pomp was fallen.' A feeling of infinite delicacy, so perfectly characteristic of Evelyn!

And now to bring down this subject to times still nearer. We find that Sir Robert Walpole had placed himself exactly in the situation of the great minister we have noticed; we have his confession to his brother Lord Walpole, and to his friend Sir John Hynde Cotton. The historian of this minister observes, that his magnificent buildings at Houghton drew on him great obloquy. On seeing his brother's house at Wolterton, Sir Robert expressed his wishes that he had contented himself with a similar structure. In the reign of Anne, Sir Robert sitting by Sir John Hynde Cotton, alluding to a sumptuous house which was then building by Harley, observed, that to construct a great house was a high act of imprudence in any minister! It was a long time after, when he had become prime minister, that he forgot the whole result of the present article; and pulled down his family mansion at Houghton to build its magnificent edifice; it was then Sir John Hynde Cotton reminded him of the reflection which he had made some years ago: the reply of Sir Robert is remarkable—'Your recollection is too late; I wish you had reminded me of it before I began building, for then it might have been of service to me!'

The statesman and politician then are susceptible of all the seduction of ostentation and the pride of pomp! Who could have credited it? But bewildered with power, in the magnificence and magnitude of the edifices which their colossal greatness inhabits, they seem to contemplate on its image!

Sir Francis Walsingham died and left nothing to pay his debts, as appears by a curious fact noticed in the anonymous life of Sir Philip Sidney prefixed to the Arcadia, and evidently written by one acquainted with the family history of his friend and hero. The chivalric Sidney, though sought after by court beauties, solicited the hand of the daughter of Walsingham, although, as it appears, she could have had no other portion than her own virtues and her father's name. 'And herein,' observes our anonymous biographer, 'he was exemplary to all gentlemen not to carry their love in their purses.' On this he notices this secret history of Walsingham.

* This is that Sir Francis who impoverished himself to enrich the state, and indeed made England his heir; and was so far from building up of fortune by the benefit of his place, that he demolished that fine estate left by his ancestors to purchase dear intelligence from all parts of Christendom. He had a key to unlock the pope's cabinet;

* At the gateway of the Three King's Inn, near Dover-street, in Piccadilly, are two pilasters with Corinthian capitals, which belonged to Clarendon-House, and are perhaps the only remains of that edifice.

and as if master of some invisible whispering-plant, secrets of christian princes met at his closet. Well then if he bequeathed no great wealth to his daughter, ing privately interred in the quire of Paul's as much as ed to his creditors, though not so much as our state debted to his memory.

Some curious inquirer may afford us a considerable augmentation of their private fortune, while they are engaged in the noble pursuits of patriotic glory; labour of this research will be great, and the result small!

'TAXATION NO TYRANNY.'

Such was the title of a famous political tract, and at a moment when a people, in a state of ignorance, forth a declaration that taxation was tyranny! It was against an insignificant tax they protested, but a taxation itself! and in the temper of the moment a tract proposition appeared an insolent paradox. It instantly ran down by that everlasting party which, back as in the laws of our Henry the First, are dealt by the odd descriptive term of acephali, a people heads! the strange equality of levellers!

These political monsters in all times have had an association of ideas of taxation and tyranny, and with one name instantly suggests the other! This happened to one Gigli of Sienna, who published the first political dictionary of the Tuscan language, of which leaves amused the Florentines; these having the honour of being consigned to the flames by the hangman for certain popular errors; such an instance, under the word Grana Ducis we find Falbelli! (see Taxes!) and the word Gubella was explained by a reference to Grana Ducis. Grana Ducis and Gubella were synonymous, according to this mordacious knave! Such grievances, and the mode of expressing are equally ancient. A Roman consul, by levying on salt during the Punic war, was nicknamed salicarius and condemned by the 'majesty' of the people! He formerly done his duty to the country, but the people now his reward! He retired from Rome, let his hair grow, and by his sordid dress, and melancholy air, showed his acute sensibility. The Romans at length were so used to command the army—as an injured man, refused—but he was told that he should bear the cap of the Roman people with the tenderness of a son for the sours of a parent! He had lost his reputation by deductive tax on salt, though this tax had provided for and obtained a victory!

Certain it is that Gigli and his numerous adherents were wrong; for were they freed from all restraints as if they slept in forests and not in houses; were the inhabitants of wilds and not of cities, so that every man should be his own law-giver, with a perpetual exemption from all taxation, we could not necessarily infer the political happiness. There are nations where taxes are hardly known, for the people exist in such utter want, that they are too poor to be taxed; of which Chinese, among others, exhibit remarkable signs. When Nero would have abolished all taxes, in his sive passion for popularity, the senate thanked him for good will to the people, but assured him that this certain means not of repairing, but of ruining the commonwealth. Bodin, in his curious work 'The Republic,' has noticed a class of politicians who are in the favour with the people. 'Many seditious citizens, desirous of innovations, did of late years promise the abolition of taxes and subsidies to our people; but neither they do it, or if they could have done it, they would not.'

* Cowell's Interpreter, art. Acephali. This by some expectedly find in a grave antiquarian law-dictionary derived from Pliny's description of a people who travellers had reported to have found in this predicament their fright and haste in attempting to land on a beach among the savages. How it came to be introduced in the laws of Henry the First remains to be told by some antiquary; but it was common in the middle ages. I say, 'Those are called acephali who were the lords that age, and acknowledged no head or superior.'

† Vocabulario di Santa Caterina e della Lingua Fiorentina. This pungent lexicon was prohibited at Rome by the Court of Florence. The history of this work may be found in Il Giornale dei Letterati d'Italia, xxix.—1410. In the last edition of Rayn's 'Bibliotheca,' 1803, it is said to be reprinted at Manila, with the title:—For the book-licensors it is a great way to so first breaking out of the American troubles, they ably would have yielded to the mother-country the of taxation, modified by the term regulation (of their s; this I infer from a letter of Dr. Robertson, who es, that 'the distinction between taxation and regu- is a mere folly.' Even despotic governments have descended to disguise the contributions forcibly levied, some appellative which should partly conceal its real re. Terms have often influenced circumstances, as as do things; and conquest or oppression, which we allow to be synonymous, apes benevolence whenever time as as what it exacts as a tribute.

sort of philosophical history of taxation appears in narrative of Wood, in his inquiry on Homer. He tells bat 'the presents (a term of extensive signification in East) which are distributed annually by the bashaw of ascus to the several Arab princes through whose terri-ty he conducts the caravan of pilgrims to Mecca, are, constantinople, called a free gift, and considered as an
 of the sultan's generosity towards his indigent subjects;
 le, on the other hand, the Arab sheikhs deny even a of passage through the districts of their command, and at these sums as a tax due for the permission of going igh their country. In the frequent bloody contests ch the adjustment of these fees produce, the Turks plain of robbery, and the Arabs of invasion.† ere we trace taxation through all its shifting forms, accommodating itself to the feelings of the different people;
 some principle regulated the alternate terms proposed the buccanniers, when they asked what the weaker parwas sure to give, or when they levied what the others
 d only as a common toll.

When Louis the Eleventh of France beheld his coun-exhausted by the predatory wars of England, he bought ace of our Edward the Fourth by an annual sum of fifty moad crowns, to be paid at London, and likewise grant-pensions to the English ministers. Holingshead and all historians call this a yearly tribute; but Comines, the such memoir writer, with a national spirit, denies that so gifts were either pensions or tributes. 'Yet,' says ie, a Frenchman also, but affecting a more philosophiindifference, 'it must be either the one, or the other;
 igh I confess, that those who receive a pension to ob-a peace, commonly boast of it as if it were a tribute.'‡ sh are the shades of our feelings in this history of taxa- ion and tribute. But there is another artifice of applying s names to hard things, by veiling a tyrannical act by a m which presents no disagreeable idea to the imagination. When it was formerly thought desirable, in the reation of morals which prevailed in Venice to institute office of censor, three magistrates were elected bearing a title; but it seemed so harsh and austere in that dissi-d city, that these reformers of manners were compelled change their title; when they were no longer called cen- sors, but i signori sopra il bon vivere della città, all agreed the propriety of the office under the softened term. Fa-ie Joseph the secret agent of Cardinal Richelieu, was inventor of lettres de cachet, disguising that instrument despotism by the amusing term of a sealed letter. Extinction would have been merciful compared with the reb of that billet-doux, a sealed letter from his majesty!
 Burke reflects with profound truth—'Abstract liberty, is other mere abstractions, is not to be found. Liberty here in some sensible object; and every nation has need to itself some favourite point which, by way of employment, becomes the criterion of their happiness. It hapned that the great contests for freedom in this country re from the earliest times chiefly upon the question of
 ing. Most of the contests in the ancient commonwealths turned primarily on the right of election of magistrates, or on the balance among the several orders of the state. The question of money was not with them so immediate. But in England it was otherwise. On this point of taxes the ablest pens and most eloquent tongues have been exercised; the greatest spirits have acted and suffered.'§

One party clamorously asserts that taxation is their grievance, while another demonstrates that the annihilation of taxes would be their ruin! The interests of a great nation, among themselves, are often contrary to each other, and each seems alternately to predominate and to decline. 'The sting of taxation,' observes Mr Hallam, 'is wastefulness; but it is difficult to name a limit beyond which taxes will not be borne without impatience when faithfully applied.' In plainer words, this only signifies, we presume, that Mr Hallam's party would tax us without 'wastefulness' Ministerial or opposition, whatever be the administration, it follows that 'taxation is no tyranny';
 Dr Johnson then was terribly abused in his day for a vox at prætera nihil.

Still shall the innocent word be hateful, and the people will turn even on their best friend, who in administration inflicts a new impost; as we have shown by the fate of the Roman Salinator. Among ourselves, our government, in its constitution, if not always in its practice, long had a consideration towards the feelings of the people, and often contrived to hide the nature of its exactions, by a name of blandishment. An enormous grievance was long the office of purveyance. A purveyor was an officer who was to furnish every sort of provision for the royal house, and sometimes for great lords, during their progresses or journeys. His oppressive office, by arbitrarily fixing the market-prices, and compelling the countrymen to bring their articles to market, would enter into the history of the arts of grinding the labouring class of society; a remnant of feudal tyranny! The very title of this officer became odious; and by a statute of Edward III, the hateful name of purveyor was ordered to be changed into acheteur or buyer. A change of name, it was imagined, would conceal its nature! The term often devised strangely contrasted with the thing itself. Levies of money were long raised under the pathetic appeal of benevolences. When Edward IV was passing over to France, he obtained, under this gentle demand, money towards 'the great journey,' and afterwards having 'rode about the more part of the lands, and used the people in such fair manner, that they were liberal in their gifts; Old Fabian adds, 'the which way of the levying of this money was after-named a benevolence.' Edward IV was courtious in this newly-invented style, and was besides the handsomest tax-gatherer in his kingdom! His royal presence was very dangerous to the purses of his loyal subjects, particularly to those of the females. In his progress, having kissed a widow for having contributed a larger sum than was expected from her estate, she was so overjoyed at the singular honour and delight that she doubled her benevolence, and a second kiss had ruined her!
 but in the succeeding reign of Richard III, the term had already lost the freshness of its innocence. In the speech which the Duke of Buckingham delivered from the Hus-ings in Guildhall, he explained the term to the satisfaction of his auditors, who even then were as cross-humoured as the livery of this day, in their notions of what now we gently call 'supplies.' 'Under the plausible name of be- nevolence, as it was held in the time of Edward IV, your goods were taken from you much against your will, as if by that name was understood that every man should pay not what he pleased, but what the king would have him; or, as a marginal note in Buck's Life of Richard III, more pointedly has it, that 'the name of benevolence signified that every man should pay, not what he of his own good will list, but what the king of his good will list to take.¶ Richard III, whose business, like that of all usurpers, was to be popular, in a statute even condemns this 'benevolence' as 'a new imposition,' and enacts that 'none shall be charged with it in future; many families having been ruined under these pretended gifts.

* Burke's Works, vol. I. 288.

† Daines Barrington, in 'Observations on the Statutes,' gives the marginal note of Buck as the words of the Duke; they certainly served his purpose to amuse, better than the veracious ones; but we expect from a grave antiquary invincible authenticity. The Duke is made by Barrington a sort of wit, but the pithy quaintness is Buck's.

 ard Knolles, 1606. A work replete with the practical knowledge of politics; and of which Mr Dugald Stewart has delivered a high opinion. Yet this great politician wrote a volume ‡ Bodin's Commonwealth, translated by R. Knolles, p. 166.

His successor, however, found means to levy 'a benevolence'; but when Henry VIII demanded one, the citizens of London appealed to the act of Richard III. Cardinal Wolsey insisted that the law of a murderous usurper should not be enforced. One of the common-council courageously replied, that 'King Richard, conjointly with parliament, had enacted many good statutes.' Even then the citizen seems to have comprehended the spirit of our constitution—that taxes should not be raised without consent of parliament!

Charles the First, amidst his urgent wants, at first had hoped, by the pathetic appeal to benevolence, that he should have touched the hearts of his unfriendly commoners; but the term of benevolence proved unlucky. The resisters of taxation took full advantage of a significant meaning, which had long been lost in the custom; asserting by this very term that all levies of money were not compulsory, but the voluntary gifts of the people. In that political crisis, when in the fullness of time all the national grievances, which had hitherto been kept down, started up with one voice, the courteous term strangely contrasted with the rough demand. Lord Digby said 'the granting of subsidies, under so preposterous a name as of a benevolence, was—a malevolence.' And Mr Grimstone observed, that 'They have granted a benevolence, but the nature of the thing agrees not with the name.' The nature indeed had so entirely changed from the name, that when James I had tried to warm the hearts of his 'benevolent' people, he got 'little money, and lost a great deal of love.' 'Subsidies,' that is, grants made by parliament, observes Arthur Wilson, a dispassionate historian, 'get more of the people's money, but exactions enslave the mind.'

When benevolences had become a grievance, to diminish the odium they invented more inviting phrases. The subject was cautiously informed that the sums demanded were only loans; or he was honoured by a letter under the privy seal; a bond which the king engaged to repay at a definite period; but privy seals at length got to be hawked about to persons coming out of church. 'Privy seals,' says a manuscript letter, 'are flying thick and threefold in sight of all the world, which might surely have been better performed in delivering them to every man privately at home.' The general loan, which in fact was a forced loan, was one of the most crying grievances under Charles I. Ingenious in the destruction of his own popularity, the king contrived a new mode, of 'secret instructions to commissioners.'* They were to find out persons who could bear the largest rates. How the commissioners were to acquire this secret and inquisitorial knowledge appears in the bungling contrivance. It is one of their orders that after a number of inquiries have been put to a person, concerning others who had spoken against loan-money, and what arguments they had used, this person was to be charged in his majesty's name, and upon his allegiance, not to disclose to any other the answer he had given. A striking instance of that fatuity of the human mind, when a weak government is trying to do what it knows not how to perform: it was seeking to obtain a secret purpose by the most open and general means; a self-destroying principle!

Our ancestors were children in finance; their simplicity has been too often described as tyranny! but from my soul do I believe, on this obscure subject of taxation, that old Burleigh's advice to Elizabeth includes more than all the squabbling pamphlets of our political economists—'win hearts, and you have their hands and purses!'

THE BOOK OF DEATH.

Montaigne was fond of reading minute accounts of the deaths of remarkable persons; and, in the simplicity of his heart, old Montaigne wished to be learned enough to form a collection of these deaths, to observe 'their words, their actions, and what sort of countenance they put upon it.' He seems to have been a little over curious about deaths, in reference, no doubt, to his own, in which he was certainly deceived; for we are told that he did not die as he had promised himself,—expiring in the adoration of the mass; or, as his preceptor Buchanan would have called it, in 'the act of rank idolatry.'

I have been told of a privately printed volume, under the singular title of 'The Book of Death,' where an amateur has compiled the pious memorials of many of our eminent men in their last moments: and it may form a companion-piece to the little volume on 'Les grands hommes qui sont morts en plaisantant.' This work, however, must be monotonous; the deaths of the righteous do resemble each other; the learned and the eloquent can only receive in silence that hope which awaits 'the tenant of the grave.' But this volume will not establish a decisive principle; since the just and the religious are not always encountered death with indifference, nor in a fit composure of mind.

The functions of the mind are connected with those of the body. On a death-bed a fortnight's disease may reduce the firmest to a most wretched state; while, on the contrary, the soul struggles, as it were in torture, in the most robust frame. Nani, the Venetian historian, has charmingly described the death of Innocent X, who was a countenance unblemished by vices, and who died at an advanced age with too robust a constitution. Dopo lunga e terribile agonia, con dolore e con pena, superandosi l'anima da quel corpo robusto, egli spirò al letto di Genova, nel ottantesimo anno de suoi anni. 'After a long and terrible agony with great bodily pain and difficulty, his soul separated itself from that robust frame, and expired in his eighty-year.'

Some have composed sermons on death, while they passed many years of anxiety, approaching to madness, contemplating their own. The certainty of an immediate separation from all our human sympathies may, even at a death-bed, suddenly disorder the imagination. The great physician of our times told me of a general, who had defaced the cannon's mouth, dropping down in terror, was informed by him that his disease was rapid and fatal. Some have died of the strong imagination of death. This is a print of a knight brought on the scaffold to suffer; he viewed the headsman; he was blinded, and knelt down to receive the stroke. Having passed through the whole of the remony of a criminal execution, accompanied by all its disgrace, it was ordered that his life should be spared; instead of the stroke from the sword, they poured cold water over his neck. After this operation the knight remained motionless; they discovered that he had expired in the very imagination of death! Such are among the many causes which may affect the mind in the hour of its trial. The habitual associations of the natural character are most likely to prevail—though not always! The timid Marshal Biron disgraced his exit by womanish tears and raging imbecility; the virtuous Erasmus, with innumerable groans was heard crying out Domine! Domine! fac Anem! fac Anem! Bayle having prepared his proof to the printer, pointed to where it lay when dying. The last words which Lord Chesterfield was heard to speak were when the valet opening the curtains of the bed, announced Mr Dayroles—'Give Dayroles a chair?' This good breeding, observed the late Dr Warren his physician 'only quits him with his life.' The last words of Nelson were, 'Tell Collingwood to bring the fleet to an anchor.' The tranquil grandeur which cast a new majesty on Charles the First on the scaffold, appeared when he declared—'I fear not death! Death is not terrible to me.' And the characteristic pleasantry of Sir Thomas More exhilarated his last moments, when observing the weakness of the scaffold, he said, in mounting it, 'I pray you see me up safe, and for my coming down, let me shift it myself!' Sir Walter Raleigh passed a similar note when going to the scaffold.

My ingenious friend Dr Sberwon has furnished me with the following anecdotes of death. In one of the bloody battles fought by the Duke of Enghien, two French noblemen were left wounded among the dead on the field of battle. One complained loudly of his pains, the other after long silence thus offered him consolation. 'My friend, whoever you are, remember that our God died on the cross, our king on the scaffold; and if you have strength to look at him who now speaks to you, you will see that both his legs are shot away.'

At the murder of the Duke D'Enghien, the royal victor looking at the soldiers who had pointed their fuses, said 'Grenadiers! lower your arms, otherwise you will miss or only wound me!' To two of them who proposed to tie a handkerchief over his eyes, he said, 'A loyal soldier who has been so often exposed to fire and sword, can at the approach of death with naked eyes, and without fear

After a similar caution on the part of Sir George Lisle or Sir Charles Lucas, when murdered in nearly the same manner at Colchester, by the soldiers of Fairfax, the last here in answer to their assertions and assurances that they would take care not to miss him, nobly replied: 'You have often missed me when I have been nearer to you in the field of battle.'

When the governor of Cadiz, the Marquis de Selazo, was murdered by the enraged and mistaken citizens, to one of his murderers who had run a pike through his back, he calmly turned round and said, 'Coward to strike there! Come round, if you dare—face, and destroy me!'

Mr Abernethy in his Physiological Lectures has ingeniously observed, that 'Shakespeare has represented Mercutio continuing to jest, though conscious that he was mortally wounded; the expiring Hotspur thinking of nothing but honour; and the dying Falstaff still cracking his jests upon Bardolph's nose. If such facts were duly attended to, they would prompt us to make a more liberal allowance for each other's conduct under certain circumstances than we are accustomed to do.' The truth seems to be, that whenever the functions of the mind are not disturbed by 'the nervous functions of the digestive organs,' the personal character predominates even in death, and its habitual associations exist to its last moments. Many religious persons may have died without showing in their last moments any of those exterior acts, or employing those fervent expressions, which the collector of 'The Book of Death' would only deign to chronicle; their hope is not gathered in their last hour.

Yet many with us have delighted to taste of death long before they have died, and have placed before their eyes all the furniture of mortality. The horrors of a charnel-house is the scene of their pleasure. The 'Midnight Meditations' of Quarles preceded Young's 'Night Thoughts' by a century, and both these poets loved preternatural terror.

'If I must die, I'll snatch at every thing
That may but mind me of my latest breath;
Death's-heads, Graves, Knells, Blacks,* Tombs, all these shall bring
Into my soul such useful thoughts of death,
That this sable king of fears
Shall not catch me unawares.' QUARLES.

But it may be doubtful whether the thoughts of death are useful, whenever they put a man out of the possession of his faculties. Young pursued the scheme of Quarles: he raised about him an artificial emotion of death; he darkened his sepulchral study, placing a skull on his table by lamp-light; as Dr Donne had his portrait taken, first winding a sheet over his head and closing his eyes; keeping this melancholy picture by his bed-side as long as he lived, to remind him of his mortality. Young even in his garden had his conceits of death: at the end of an avenue was viewed a seat of an admirable chiaro oscuro, which, when approached, presented only a painted surface, with an inscription, alluding to the deception of the things of this world. To be looking at 'The mirror which flatters not,' to discover ourselves only as a skeleton with the horrid life of corruption about us, has been among those penitential inventions, which have often ended in shaking the innocent by the pangs which are only natural to the damned. Without adverting to those numerous testimonies, the diaries of fanatics, I shall offer a picture of an accomplished and innocent lady, in a curious and unaffected transcript she has left of a mind of great sensibility, where the preternatural terror of death might perhaps have hastened the premature one she suffered.

From the 'Reliquiæ Gethinianæ,'† I quote some of Lady Gethin's ideas on 'Death.'—'The very thoughts of death disturb one's reason; and though a man may have many excellent qualities, yet he may have the weakness of not commanding his sentiments. Nothing is worse for one's health, than to be in fear of death. There are some so wise, as neither to hate nor fear it; but for my part I have an aversion for it, and with reason; for it is a rash inconsiderate thing, that always comes before it is looked for; always comes unseasonably, parts friends, ruins beauty, laughs at youth, and draws a dark veil over all the pleasures of life. This dreadful evil is but the evil of a moment, and what we cannot by any means avoid; and it is that which makes it so terrible to me; for were it uncertain, hope might diminish some part of the fear; but when I think I must die, and that I may die every moment, and that too a thousand several ways, I am in such a fright as you cannot imagine. I see dangers where, perhaps, there never were any. I am persuaded 'tis happy to be somewhat dull of apprehension in this case; and yet the best way to cure the pensiveness of the thoughts of death is to think of it as little as possible.' She proceeds by enumerating the terrors of the fearful, who 'cannot enjoy themselves in the pleasantest places, and although they are neither on sea, river, or creek, but in good health in their chamber, yet are they so well instructed with the fear of dying, that they do not measure it only by the present dangers that wait on us. Then is it not best to submit to God! But some people cannot do it as they would; and though they are not destitute of reason but perceive they are to blame, yet at the same time that their reason condemns them, their imagination makes their hearts feel what it pleases.'

Such is the picture of an ingenuous and a religious mind, drawn by an amiable woman, who, it is evident, lived all ways in the fear of death. The Gothic skeleton was ever haunting her imagination. In Dr Johnson the same horror was suggested by the thoughts of death. When Boswell once in conversation persecuted Johnson on this subject, whether we might not fortify our minds for the approach of death; he answered in a passion, 'No, Sir! let it alone! It matters not how a man dies, but how he lives! The art of dying is not of importance, it lasts so short a time!' But when Boswell persisted in the conversation, Johnson was thrown into such a state of agitation, that he thundered out, 'Give us no more of this!' and, further, sternly told the trembling and too curious philosopher, 'Don't let us meet to-morrow!'

It may be a question whether those who by their preparatory conduct have appeared to show the greatest indifference for death, have not rather betrayed the most curious art to disguise its terrors. Some have invented a mode of escaping from life in the midst of convivial enjoyment. A mortuary preparation of this kind has been recorded of an amiable man, Moncriff, the author of 'Histoire des Chartes' and 'L'Art de Plaire,' by his literary friend La Place, who was an actor in, as well as the historian of the singular narrative. One morning La Place received a note from Moncriff, requesting that 'he would immediately select for him a dozen volumes most likely to amuse, and of a nature to withdraw the reader from being occupied by melancholy thoughts.' La Place was startled at the unusual request, and flew to his old friend, whom he found deeply engaged in being measured for a new peruke, and a taffety robe de chambre, earnestly enjoining the utmost expedition. 'Shut the door!'—said Moncriff, observing the surprise of his friend. 'And now that we are alone, I confide my secret: on rising this morning, my valet in dressing me showed me on this leg this dark spot—from that moment I knew I "was condemned to death;" but I had presence of mind enough not to betray myself.' 'Can a head so well organised as yours imagine that such a trifle is a sentence of death?'—'Don't speak so loud, my friend!—or rather deign to listen a moment. At my age it is fatal! The system from which I have derived the felicity of a long life has been, that whenever any evil, moral or physical, happens to us, if there is a remedy, all must be sacrificed to deliver us from it—but in a contrary case, I do not choose to wrestle with destiny and to begin complaints, endless as useless! All that I request of you, my friend, is to assist me to pass away the few days which remain for me, free from all cares, of which otherwise they might be too susceptible. But do not think,' he added with warmth, 'that I mean to elude the religious duties of a citizen, which so many of late affect to contemn.' The good and virtuous curate of my parish is coming here under a pretext of an annual contribution, and I have even ordered my physician, on whose confidence I can rely. Here is a list of ten or twelve persons, friends beloved! who are mostly known to you. I shall write to them this evening, to tell them of my condemnation; but if they wish me to live, they will do me the favour to assemble here at five in the evening, where they may be certain of finding all these objects of amusement, which I shall study to discover suitable to their tastes. And you, my old friend, with my doctor, are two on whom I most depend.'

La Place was strongly affected by this appeal—neither

Socrates, nor Cato, nor Seneca looked more serenely on the approach of death.

'Familiarize yourself early with death!' said the good old man with a smile.—It is only dreadful for those who dread it!

During ten days after this singular conversation, the whole of Moncriff's remaining life, his apartment was open to his friends, of whom several were ladies; all kinds of games were played till nine o'clock, and that the sorrows of the host might not disturb his guests, he played the shoveille at his favourite game of piquet: a supper, seasoned by the wit of the master, concluded at eleven. On the tenth night, in taking leave of his friend, Moncriff whispered to him, 'Adieu, my friend! to-morrow morning I shall return your books!' He died, as he foresaw, the following day.

I have sometimes thought that we might form a history of this fear of death, by tracing the first appearances of the skeleton which haunts our funeral imagination. In the modern history of mankind we might discover some very strong contrasts in the notion of death entertained by men at various epochs. The following article will supply a sketch of this kind.

HISTORY OF THE SKELETON OF DEATH.

Euthanasia! Euthanasia! an easy death! was the exclamation of Augustus; it was what Antonius Pius enjoyed; and it is that for which every wise man will pray, said Lord Orrery, when perhaps he was contemplating on the close of Swift's life.

The ancients contemplated death without terror, and met it with indifference. It was the only divinity to which they never sacrificed, convinced that no human being could turn aside its stroke. They raised altars to fever, to misfortune, to all the evils of life; for these might change! But though they did not court the presence of death in any shape, they acknowledged its tranquillity; and in the beautiful fables of their allegorical religion, Death was the daughter of Night, and the sister of Sleep; and ever the friend of the unhappy! To the eternal sleep of death they dedicated their sepulchral monuments—Eterni Somno! If the full light of revelation had not yet broken on them, it can hardly be denied that they had some glimpses and a dawn of the life to come, from the many allegorical inventions which describe the transmigration of the soul. A butterfly on the extremity of an extinguished lamp, held up by the messenger of the Gods intently gazing above, implied a dedication of that soul; Love, with a melancholy air, his legs crossed, leaning on an inverted torch, the flame thus naturally extinguishing itself, elegantly denoted the cessation of human life; a rose sculptured on a sarcophagus, or the emblems of epicurean life traced on it, in a skull wreathed by a chaplet of flowers, such as they wore at their convivial meetings, a flask of wine, a patera, and the small bones used as dice; all these symbols were indirect allusions to death, veiling its painful recollections. They did not pollute their imagination with the contents of a charnel-house. The sarcophagi of the ancients rather recall to us the remembrance of the activity of life; for they are sculptured with battles or games, in basso relievo; a sort of tender homage paid to the dead, observes Mad. De Staël, with her peculiar refinement of thinking.

It would seem that the Romans had even an aversion to mention death in express terms, for they disguised its very name by some periphrasis, such as discessit e vita, 'he has departed from life'; and they did not say that their friend had died, but that he had lived; vixit! In the old Latin chronicles, and even the Flores and other documents of the middle ages, we find the same delicacy about using the fatal word Death, especially when applied to kings and great people. 'Transire a Saeculo—Vitam suam mutare—Si quid de eo humanitus contigerit, &c.' I am indebted to Mr Morival for this remark. Even among a people less refined, the obtrusive idea of death has been studiously avoided: we are told that when the Emperor of Morocco inquires after any one who has recently died, it is against etiquette to mention the word 'death'; the answer is 'his destiny is closed!' But this tenderness is only reserved for 'the elect' of the Mussulmen. A Jew's death is at once plainly expressed, 'He is dead, sir! asking your pardon for mentioning such a contemptible wretch!' i. e. a Jew! A Christian's is described by 'The infidel is dead!' or 'The cuckold is dead!'

† Montfaucon, L'Antiquité Expliquée, i, 362.

The artists of antiquity have so rarely attempted to personify Death, that we have not discovered a single revolting image of this nature in all the works of antiquity—as conceal its deformity to the eye, as well as to elude its suggestion to the mind, seems to have been an universal feeling, and it accorded with a fundamental principle of ancient art; that of never offering to the eye a distasteful form in the violence of passion, which destroyed the beauty of its representation; such is shown in the Laocoon, where the mouth only opens sufficiently to indicate the suppressed agony of superior humanity, without expressing the loud cry of vulgar suffering. Pausanias considered as a personification of death a female figure, whose teeth and nails, long and crooked, were engraven on a cypress of cedar, which enclosed the body of Cypselus; this female was unquestionably only one of the Furies, or the Fates, 'watchful to cut the thread of life'; Hesiod describes Atropos indeed as having sharp teeth, and long nails, waiting to tear and devour the dead; but this image was in a barbarous era. Catullus ventured to personify the Sister-Destines as three Crones; but in general, Winkelman observes, 'they are portrayed as beautiful virgins, with winged heads, one of whom is always in the attitude of writing on a scroll.' Death was a monerity to the ancient artist. Could he exhibit what represents nothing? Could he animate into action what lies in a state of eternal tranquillity? Elegant images of repose and tender sorrow were all he could invent to indicate the state of death. Even the terms which different nations have bestowed on a burial-place are not associated with emotions of horror. The Greeks called a burying-ground by the soothing term of Cemetery, or, 'the sleeping-place'; the Jews, who had no horrors of the grave, by Bethlem, or 'the house of the living'; the Germans, with religious simplicity, 'God's field.'

Whence, then, originated that stalking skeleton, suggesting so many false and sepulchral ideas, and which for us has so long served as the image of death?

When the christian religion spread over Europe, the world changed! the certainty of a future state of existence, by the artifices of wicked worldly men, terrified instead of consoling human nature; and in the resurrection the ignorant multitude seemed rather to have dreaded retribution, than to have hoped for remuneration. The Founder of christianity every where breathes the blessedness of social feelings. It is 'our Father!' whom he addresses. The horrors with which christianity was afterwards disguised arose in the corruptions of christianity among those insane ascetics, who, misinterpreting 'the word of life,' trampled on nature; and imagined that to secure an existence in the other world it was necessary not to exist in the one in which God had placed them. The dominion of mankind fell into the usurping hands of those imperious monks whose artifices trafficked with the terrors of ignorant and hypochondriac 'Kaisers and kings.' The scene was darkened by penances and by pilgrimages, by midnight vigils, by miraculous shrines, and bloody flagellations; spectres started up amidst their tenebres; millions of masses increased their supernatural influence. Amidst this general gloom of Europe, their troubled imaginations were frequently predicting the end of the world. It was at this period that they first beheld the grave yawn, and Death in the Gothic form of a gaunt anatomy parading through the universe! The people were frightened, as they viewed every where hung before their eyes, in the twilight of their cathedrals, and their 'pale cloisters,' the most revolting emblems of death. They startled the traveller on the bridge; they stared on the sinner in the carvings of his table and chair; the spectre moved in the hangings of the apartment; it stood in the niche, and was the picture of their sitting-room; it was worn in their rings, while the illuminator shaded the bony phantom in the margins of their 'horse,' their primers, and their breviaries. Their barbarous taste perceived no absurdity in giving action to a heap of dry bones, which could only keep together in a state of immovability and repose; nor that it was burlesquing the awful idea of the resurrection, by ex-

* A representation of Death by a skeleton appears amongst the Egyptians; a custom more singular than barbarous prevailed, of enclosing a skeleton of beautiful workmanship in a small coffin, which the bearer carried round at their eternal mansions; observing, 'after death you will resemble this figure: drink then! and be happy!' a symbol of Death in a convivial party was not designed to excite terrific or gloomy ideas.

abiting the incorruptible spirit under the unnatural and ludicrous figure of mortality drawn out of the corruption of the grave.

An anecdote of these monkish times has been preserved by old Gerard Leigh; and as old stories are best set off by old words, Gerard speaketh! 'The great Maximilian the emperor came to a monastery in high Almaine (Germany,) the monks whereof had caused to be curiously painted the charnel of a man, which they termed—death! When that well-learned emperor had beheld it awhile, he called unto him his painter, commanding to blot the skeleton out, and to paint therein the image of—a fool. Wherewith the abbot, humbly beseeching him to the contrary, said, "It was a good remembrance!"—"Nay," quoth the emperor, "as vermin that annoyeth man's body cometh unlooked for, so doth death, which here is but a faded image, and life is a certain thing, if we know to deserve it."'" The original mind of Maximilian the Great is characterised by this curious story of converting our emblem of death into a party-coloured fool; and such satirical allusions to the folly of those who persisted in their notion of the skeleton were not unusual with the artists of those times; we find the figure of a fool sitting with some drollery between the legs of one of these skeletons.†

This story is associated with an important fact. After they had successfully terrified the people with their charnel-house figure, a reaction in the public feelings occurred, for the skeleton was now employed as a medium to convey the most facetious, satirical, and burlesque notions of human life. Death, which had so long harassed their imaginations, suddenly changed into a theme fertile in coarse humour. The Italians were too long accustomed to the study of the beautiful to allow their pencil to sport with deformity; but the Gothic taste of the German artists, who could only copy their own homely nature, delighted to give human passions to the hideous physiognomy of a noseless skull; to put an eye of mockery or malignity into its hollow socket, and to stretch out the gaunt anatomy into the postures of a Hogarth; and that the ludicrous might be carried to its extreme, this imaginary being, taken from the bone-house, was viewed in the action of dancing! This blending of the grotesque with the most disgusting image of mortality, is the more singular part of this history of the skeleton, and indeed of human nature itself!

'The Dance of Death' erroneously considered as Holbein's with other similar dances, however differently treated, have one common subject which was painted in the arcades of burying-grounds, or on town-halls and in market-places. The subject is usually The Skeleton in the act of leading all ranks and conditions to the grave, personated after nature, and in the strict costume of the times. This invention opened a new field for genius; and when we can for a moment forget their luckless choice of their bony and bloodless hero, who to abuse us by a variety of action becomes a sort of horrid harlequin in these pantomimical scenes, we may be delighted by the numerous human characters, which are so vividly presented to us. The origin of this extraordinary invention is supposed to be a favourite pageant, or religious mummery, invented by the clergy, who in these ages of barbarous christianity always found it necessary to amuse, as well as to frighten the populace; a circumstance well known to have occurred in so many other grotesque and licentious festivals they allowed the people. This pageant was performed in churches, in which the chief characters in society were supported in a sort of masquerade, mixing together in a general dance, in the course of which every one in his turn vanished from the scene, to show how one after the other died off.‡ The subject was at once poetical and ethical; and the poets and painters of Germany adopting the skeleton, sent forth this chimerical Ulysses of another world to roam among the men and manners of their own. One Macabre composed a popular poem, and the old Gaulish version reformed is still printed at Troyes, in France, with the ancient blocks of wood-cuts under the title of 'La grande Danse Macabre des hommes et des femmes.' Merian's 'Todten Tans,' or the 'Dance of the Dead,' is a curious set of prints of a dance of death from an ancient painting, I think not entirely defaced, in a cemetery at Basle, in Switzerland. It was ordered to be painted by a council which was held there during many years, to comme morate the mortality occasioned by a plague in 1439. The prevailing character of all these works is unquestionably grotesque and ludicrous; not, however, that genius, however barbarous, could refrain in this large subject of human life from inventing scenes often imagined with great delicacy of conception, and even great pathos! Such is the new-married couple, whom Death is leading, beating a drum, and in the rapture of the hour, the bride seems with a melancholy look, now insensible of his presence; or Death is seen issuing from the cottage of the poor widow with her youngest child, who waves his hand sorrowfully, while the mother and the sister vainly answer; or the old man, to whom death is playing on a psaltery, seems anxious; that his withered fingers should once more touch the strings, while he is carried off in calm tranquility. The greater part of these subjects of death are, however, ludicrous and it may be a question, whether the spectators of these dances of death did not find their mirth more excited than their religious emotions. Ignorant and terrified as the people were at the view of the skeleton, even the grossest simplicity could not fail to laugh at some of those domestic scenes and familiar persons drawn from among themselves. The skeleton, skeleton as it is in the creation of genius, gesticulates and mimics, which even its hideous skull is made to express every diversified character, and the result is hard to describe; for we are at once amused and disgusted with so much genius founded on so much barbarism.

When the artist succeeded in conveying to the eye the most ludicrous notions of death, the poets also discovered in it a fertile source of the burlesque. The curious collector is acquainted with many volumes where the most extraordinary topics have been combined with this subject. They made the body and the soul debate together, and ridicule the complaints of a damned soul! The greater part of the poets of the time were always composing on the subject of Death in their humorous pieces.¶ Such historical records of the public mind, historians, intent on political events, have rarely noticed.

Of a work of this nature, a popular favourite was long the one entitled 'Le fait mourir et les excuses inutiles qu'on apporte a cette necessité; Le tout en vers burlesques, 1658: Jacques Jacques, a canon of Ambrun, was the writer, who humorously says of himself, that he gives his thoughts just as they lie on his heart, without dissimulation; 'for I have nothing double about me except my name! I tell thee some of the most important truths in laughing; it is for thee d'y penser tout a bon.' This little volume was procured for me with some difficulty in France; and it is considered as one of the happiest of this class of death-poems of which I know not of any in our literature.

Our canon of Ambrun, in facetious rhymes, and with the mauvais of expression which belongs to his age, and an idiomatic turn fatal to a translator, excels in pleasantry; his haughty hero condescends to hold very amusing dialogues with all classes of society, and delights to confound their 'excuses inutiles.' The most miserable of men, the galley-slave, the medicant, alike would escape when he appears to them. 'Were I not absolute over them,' Death exclaims, 'they would confound me with their long speeches; but I have business, and must gallop on!' His geographical rhymes are droll.

This veil of gaiety in the old canon of Ambrus covers deeper and more philosophical thoughts than the singular mode of treating so solemn a theme. He has introduced many scenes of human life, which still interest, and he addresses the 'Teste à triple couronne,' as well as the 'forest de galere,' who exclaims, 'Laissez moi vivre dans mes fers,' 'le guer,' the 'bourgeois,' the 'chanoine,' the 'pauvre soldat,' the 'medicin,' in a word, all ranks in life are exhibited, as in the 'dances of death.' But our object of noticing those burlesque paintings and poems is to show, that after the monkish Goths had opened one general scene of melancholy and tribulation over Europe, and given birth to that dismal skeleton of death, which still terrifies the imagination of many, a reaction of feeling was experienced by the populace, who at length came to laugh at the gloomy spectre which had so long terrified them !

THE RIVAL BIOGRAPHERS OF HEYLIN.

Peter Heylin was one of the popular writers of his times, like Fuller and Howell, who, devoting their amusing pens to subjects which deeply interested their own busy age, will not be slighted by the curious. We have nearly outlived their divinity, but not their politics. Metaphysical absurdities are luxuriant weeds which must be cut down by the scythe of Time; but the great passions branching from the tree of life are still 'growing with our growth.'

There are two biographies of our Heylin, which led to a literary quarrel of an extraordinary nature; and, in the progress of its secret history, all the feelings of rival authorship were called out.

Heylin died in 1682. Dr Barnard, his son-in-law, and a scholar, communicated a sketch of the author's life to be prefixed to a posthumous folio, of which Heylin's son was the editor. This life was given by the son, but anonymously, which may not have gratified the author, the son-in-law.

* Tablatüre d'ur loth, Cogreve says, is the belly of a lute, meaning 'all in nature must dance to my music !'

Twenty years had elapsed when, in 1682, appeared 'The Life of Dr Peter Heylin, by George Vernon.' The writer, alluding to the prior life prefixed to the posthumous folio, asserts, that in borrowing something from Barnard, Barnard had also 'Excerpted passages out of my papers, the very words as well as matter, when he had them in his custody, as any reader may discern who will be at the pains of comparing the life now published with what is extant before the Keimales Ecclesiasticæ,' the quaint, pedantic title, after the fashion of the day, of the posthumous folio.

This strong accusation seemed countenanced by a dedication to the son and the nephew of Heylin. Roused now into action, the indignant Barnard soon produced a more complete Life, to which he prefixed 'A necessary Vindication.' This is an unparagoned castigation of Vernon, the literary pet whom the Heylins had fondled in preference to their learned relative. The long smothered family grudge, the suppressed mortifications of literary pride, after the subterranean grumbings of twenty years, now burst out, and the volcanic particles flow about in caustic pleasant-ries and sharp invectives; all the lava of an author's vengeance, mortified by the choice of an inferior rival.

It appears that Vernon had been selected by the son of Heylin, in preference to his brother-in-law Dr Barnard, from some family disagreement. Barnard tells us, in describing Vernon, that 'No man, except himself, who was totally ignorant of the Doctor, and all the circumstances of his life, would have engaged in such a work, which was never primarily laid out for him, but by reason of some unhappy differences, as usually fall out in families; and he who loves to put his ear in troubled waters, instead of closing them up hath made them wider.'

Barnard tells his story plainly. Heylin, the son, intending to have a more elaborate life of his father prefixed to his works, Dr Barnard, from the high reverence in which he held the memory of his father-in-law, offered to contribute it. Many conferences were held, and the son trusted him with several papers. But suddenly his caprice, more than his judgment, fancied that George Vernon was worth John Barnard. The doctor affects to describe his rejection with the most stoical indifference. He tells us, 'I was satisfied, and did patiently expect the coming forth of the work, not only term after term, but year after year, a very considerable time for such a tract. But at last, instead of the life, came a letter to me from a bookseller in London, who lived at the sign of the Black Boy, in Fleet Street.'

Now it seems that he who lived at the Black Boy had combined with another who lived at the Fleur de Luce, and that the Fleur de Luce had assured the Black Boy that Dr Barnard was concerned in writing the Life of Heylin,—this was a strong recommendation. But lo! it appeared that 'one Mr Vernon, of Gloucester,' was to be the man! a gentle thin-skinned authoring, who bleated like a lamb, and who was so fearful to trip out of its shelter, that it allows the Black Boy and the Fleur de Luce to communicate its papers to any one they choose, and erase, or add, at their pleasure.

It occurred to the Black Boy, on this proposed arithmetical criticism, that the work required addition, subtraction, and division: that the fittest critic, on whose name, indeed, he had originally engaged in the work, was our Dr Barnard; and he sent the package to the doctor, who resided near Lincoln.

The doctor, it appears, had no appetite for a dish dressed by another, while he himself was in the very act of the cookery; and it was suffered to lie cold for three weeks at the carrier's.

But entreated and overcome, the good doctor at length sent to the carrier's for the life of his father-in-law. 'I found it, according to the bookseller's description most lame and imperfect; ill begun, worse carried on, and abruptly concluded.' The learned doctor exercised that plenitude of power with which the Black Boy had invested him—he very obligingly showed the author in what a confused state his materials lay together, and how to put them in order;

'Nec secundis deest hunc, nec lucida ordo.'

If his rejections were copious, to show his good will as was as his severity, his additions were generous, though he used the precaution of carefully distinguishing by 'distinct paragraphs' his own insertion amidst Vernon's mass, with a gentle hint, that 'He knew more of Heylin than any man now living, and ought therefore to have been the biographer.' He returned the MS. to the gentleman with great civility, but none he received back! When Vernon pretended to ask for improvements, he did not imagine that the work was to be improved by being nearly destroyed; and when he asked for correction, he probably expected all might end in a compliment.

The narrative may now proceed in Vernon's details of his doleful mortifications, in being 'altered and mangled' by Dr Barnard.

'Instead of thanks from him (Dr Barnard,) and the return of common civility, he disfigured my papers, that no sooner came into his hands, but he fell upon them as a lion rampant, or the cat upon the poor cock in the fable, saying, Tu hœdis mihi discipulis—so my papers came home miserably clawed, blotted, and blurred; whole sentences dismembered, and pages scratched out; several leaves omitted which ought to be printed,—shamefully he used my copy; so that before it was carried to the press, he swooped away the second part of the life wholly from it—in the room of which he shuffled in a preposterous conclusion at the last page, which he printed in a different character, yet could not keep himself honest, as the poet saith, Dilectus tua pagina, fur es.

MARTIAL.

For he took out of my copy Doctor Heylin's dream, his sickness, his last words before his death, and left out the burning of his surplice. He so mangled and metamorphosed the whole life I composed, that I may say as Socia did, Egomet mihi non credo ille dicit, Socia, me malis vulcavit modis—Plaut.'

Doctor Barnard would have 'patiently endured these wrongs'; but the accusation Vernon ventured on, that Barnard was the plagiarist, required the doctor 'to return the poisoned chalice to his own lips,' that 'himself was the plagiarist both of words and matter.' The fact is, that this reciprocal accusation was owing to Barnard having had a prior perusal of Heylin's papers, which afterwards came into the hands of Vernon: they both drew their waters from the same source. These papers Heylin himself had left for 'a rule to guide the writer of his life.'

Barnard keenly retorts on Vernon for his surreptitious use of whole pages from Heylin's works, which he has appropriated to himself without any marks of quotation. 'I am no such excerptor (as he calls me); he is of the humour of the man who took all the ships in the Attic haven for his own, and yet was himself not master of any one vessel.'

Again:—

'But all this while I misunderstand him, for possibly he meaneth his own dear words I have excerpted. Why doth he not speak in plain downright English, that the word may see my faults? For every one does not know what is excerpting. If I have been so bold to pick or snap a word from him, I hope I may have the benefit of the clergy. What words have I robbed him of? and how have I become 'the richer for them? I was never so taken with him as to be once tempted to break the commandments, because I love plain speaking, plain writing, and plain dealing, which he does not; I hate the word excerpted, and the action imported in it. However, he is a fanciful man, and thinks there is no elegance nor wit but in his own way of talking. I must say as Tully did, Matim equidem indisertam prudentiam quam stultam loquacitatem.'

In his turn he accuses Vernon of being a perpetual transcriber, and for the Malone minuteness of his history.

'But how have I excerpted his matter? Then I am sure to rob the spittle-house; for he is so poor and put to hard shifts, that has much ado to compose a tolerable story, which he hath been hammering and conceiving in his mind for four years together, before he could bring forth his fatus of intolerable transcriptions to molest the reader's patience and memory. How doth he run himself out of breath, sometimes for twenty pages and more, at other times fifteen, ordinarily nine and ten, collected out of Dr Heylin's old books, before he can take his wind again to return to it. I never met with such a transcriber in all my days; for want of matter to fill up a scœcum, of which his book was in much danger, he hath set down the story of Westminster, as long as the ploughman's tale in Chaucer, which to the reader would have been more pertinent and pleasant. I wonder he did not transcribe bills of chancery, especially about a tedious suit my father had for several years about a lease at Norton.'

In his railing of Vernon's affected metaphors and comparisons, 'his similitudes and dissimilitudes strangely hooked in, and fetched as far as the Antipodes,' Barnard observes, 'The man hath also a strange opinion of himself that he is Doctor Heylin; and because he writes his life, that he hath his natural parts, if not acquired. The soul of St Augustine (say the schools) was Pythagorically transfused into the corpse of Aquinas; so the soul of Dr Heylin into a narrow soul. I know there is a question in philosophy, an animas sint æquales? Whether souls be alike? But there's a difference between the spirits of Elijah and Elisha: so small a prophet with so great a one.'

Dr Barnard concludes by regretting that good counsel came now unseasonable, else he would have advised the writer to have transmitted his task to one who had been an ancient friend of Dr Heylin, rather than ambitiously have assumed it, who was a professed stranger to him, by reason of which no better account could be expected from him than what he has given. He hits off the character of this piece of biography—'A life to the half; an imperfect creature, that is not only lame (as the honest bookseller said,) but wanteth legs, and all other integral parts of a man; nay the very soul that should animate a body like Dr Heylin. So that I must say of him as Plutarch doth of Tib. Gracchus, "that he is a bold undertaker and rash talker of those matters he does not understand." And so I have done with him, unless he creates to himself and me a future trouble.'

Vernon appears to have slunk away from the duel. The son of Heylin stood corrected by the superior life produced by their relative; the learned and vivacious Barnard probably never again ventured to alter and improve the works of an author kneeling and praying for corrections. These bleating lambs, it seems, often turn out roaring lions!

OF LENGLET DU FRENOY.

The 'Méthode pour étudier l'Histoire,' by the Abbé Lenglet du Fresnoy, is a master-key to all the locked-up treasures of ancient and modern history, and to the more secret stores of the obscurer memorialists of every nation. The history of this work and its author are equally remarkable. The man was a sort of curiosity in human nature, as his works are in literature. Lenglet du Fresnoy is not a writer merely laborious; without genius, he still has a hardy originality in his manner of writing and of thinking; and his vast and restless curiosity fermenting his immense book-knowledge, with a freedom verging on cynical causticity, led to the pursuit of uncommon topics. Even the prefaces to the works which he edited are singularly curious, and he has usually added bibliothèques, or critical catalogues of authors, which we may still consult for notices on the writers of romances—of those on literary subjects—on alchemy, or the hermetic philosophy; of those who have written on apparitions, visions, &c.—an historical treatise on the secret of confession, &c.; besides those 'Pieces Justificatives,' which constitute some of the most extraordinary documents in the philosophy of History. His manner of writing secured him readers even among the unlearned; his mordacity, his sarcasm, his derision, his pregnant interjections, his unguarded frankness, and often his strange opinions, contribute to his reader's amusement more than comports with his graver tasks; but his peculiarities cannot alter the value of his knowledge, whatever they may sometimes detract from his opinions; and we may safely admire the ingenuity, without quarrelling with the sincerity of the writer, who having composed a work on L'Usage des Romans, in which he gayly impugned the authenticity of all history, to prove himself not to have been the author, ambi-dexterously published another of L'Histoire justifiée contre les Romans; and perhaps it was not his fault that the attack was spirited, and the justification dull.

This 'Méthode' and his 'Tablettes Chronologiques, of nearly forty other publications are the only ones which outlived their writer; volumes, merely curious, are exiled to the shelf of the collector; the very name of an author merely curious—that shadow of a shade—is not always even preserved by a dictionary-compiler in the universal charity of his alphabetical mortuary.

The history of this work is a striking instance of those imperfect beginnings, which have often closed in the most important labours. This admirable 'Méthode' made its first meagre appearance in two volumes in 1713. It was soon reprinted at home and abroad, and translated into various languages. In 1729 it assumed the dignity of four quartos; but at this stage it encountered the vigilance of government, and the lacerating hand of a celebrated censor Gros de Boze. It is said, that from a personal dislike of the author, he cancelled one hundred and fifty pages from the printed copy submitted to his censorship. He had formerly approved of the work, and had quietly passed over some of these obnoxious passages: it is certain that Gros de Boze, in a dissertation on the Janus of the ancients in this work, actually erased a high commendation of himself,* which Lenglet had, with unusual courtesy, bestowed on Gros de Boze; for, as a critic he is most penurious of panegyric, and there is always a caustic flavour even in his drops of honey. This censor either affected to disdain the commendation, or availed himself of it as a trick of policy. This was a trying situation for an author, now proud of a great work, and who himself partook more of the bull than of the lamb. He who winced at the scratch of an epithet, beheld his perfect limbs bruised by erasures and mutilated by cancels. This sort of troubles indeed was not unusual with Lenglet. He had occupied his old apartment in the Bastille so often, that at the sight of the officer who was in the habit of conducting him there, Lenglet would call for his night-cap and snuff; and finish the work he had then in hand at the Bastille, where he told Jordan, that he made his edition of Marot. He often silently restituted an epithet or a sentence which had been condemned by the censor, at the risk of returning once more; but in the present desperate affair he took his revenge by collecting the castrations into a quarto volume, which was sold clandestinely. I find, by Jordan, in his voyage littéraire, who visited him, that it was his pride to read these cancels to his friends, who generally, but secretly, were of opinion that the decision of the censor was not so wrong as the harshness of Lenglet insisted on. All this increased the public rumour, and raised the price of the cancels. The craft and mystery of authorship was practised by Lenglet to perfection, and he often exulted, not only in the subterfuges by which he parried his censors, but in his bargains with his booksellers, who were equally desirous to possess, while they half-fared to enjoy, his uncertain or his perilous copyrights. When the unique copy of the Méthode, in its pristine state, before it had suffered any dilapidations, made its appearance at the sale of the curious library of the censor Gros de Boze, it provoked a Roxburgh competition, where the collectors, eagerly out-bidding each other, the price of this uncastrated copy reached to 1500 livres; an event more extraordinary in the history of French bibliography, than in our own. The curious may now find all these cancel sheets, or castrations, preserved in one of those works of literary history, to which the Germans have contributed more largely than other European nations; and I have discovered that even the erasures, or brèves, are amply furnished in another bibliographical record.†

This Méthode, after several later editions, was still enlarging itself by fresh supplements; and having been translated by men of letters in Europe, by Coletti in Italy, by Mencken in Germany, and by Dr Rawlinson in England, these translators have enriched their own editions by more copious articles, designed for their respective nations. The sagacity of the original writer now renovated his work by the infusions of his translators; like old Æson, it had its veins filled with green juices; and thus

* This fact appears in the account of the minuter erasures.

† The castrations are in Beyer's Memorie historico-critice Librorum rariorum, p. 166. The bruises are carefully noted in the Catalogue of the Duke de la Vallière, 4667. Those who are curious in such singularities will be gratified by the extraordinary opinions and results in Beyer; and which after all were purloined from a manuscript 'Abridgment of Universal History,' which was drawn up by Count de Boulainvilliers, and more audaciously, than delicately, inserted by Lenglet in his own work. The original manuscript exists in various copies, which were afterwards discovered. The misuser corrections, in the Duke de la Vallière's catalogue, furnish a most enlightening article in the dryness of bibliography.

The personal character of our author was as singular as many of the uncommon topics which engaged his inquiries; these we might conclude had originated in mere eccentricity, or were chosen at random. But Lenglet has shown no deficiency of judgment in several works of acknowledged utility; and his critical opinions, his last editor has shown, have, for the greater part, been sanctioned by the public voice. It is curious to observe how the first direction which the mind of a hardy inquirer may take, will often account for that variety of uncommon topics he delights in, and which, on a closer examination, may be found to bear an invisible connexion with some preceding inquiry. As there is an association of ideas, as in literary history there is an association of research; and a very judicious writer may thus be impelled to compose on subjects which may be deemed strange or injudicious.

This observation may be illustrated by the literary history of Lenglet du Fresnoy. He opened his career by addressing a letter and a tract to the Sorbonne, on the extraordinary affair of Maria d'Agreda, abbess of the monastery of the Immaculate Conception in Spain, whose mystical life of the Virgin, published on the decease of the abbess, and which was received with such rapture in Spain, had just appeared at Paris, where it excited the murmurs of the pious, and the inquiries of the curious. This mystical life was declared to be founded on apparitions and revelations experienced by the abbess. Lenglet proved, or asserted, that the abbess was not the writer of this pretended life, though the manuscript existed in her hand-writing; and secondly, that the apparitions and revelations recorded were against all the rules of apparitions and revelations which he had painfully discovered. The affair was of a delicate nature. The writer was young and incredulous; a grey-beard, more deeply versed in theology, replied, and the Sorbonists silenced our philosopher in embryo.

Lenglet confined these researches to his portfolio; and so long a period as fifty-five years had elapsed before they saw the light. It was when Calmet published his Dissertations on Apparition, that the subject provoked Lenglet to return to his forsaken researches. He now published all he had formerly composed on the affair of Maria d'Agreda, and two other works; the one 'Traité historique et dogmatique sur les Apparitions, les Visions, et les Révelations particulières,' in two volumes; and 'Recueil de Dissertations anciennes et nouvelles, sur les Apparitions, &c.' with a catalogue of authors on this subject, in four volumes. When he edited the Roman de la Rose; in compiling the glossary of this ancient poem, it led him to reprint many of the earliest French poets; to give an enlarged edition of the Arrets d'Amour, that work of love and chivalry, in which his fancy was now so deeply imbedded; while the subject of Romance itself naturally led to the taste of romantic productions which appeared in 'L'Usage des Romans,' and its accompanying copious nomenclature of all romances and romance-writers, ancient and modern. Our vivacious Abbé had been bewildered by his delight in the works of a chemical philosopher; and though he did not believe in the existence of apparitions, and certainly was more than a sceptic in history, yet it is certain that the 'grand œuvre' was an article in his creed; it would have runned him in experiments, if he had been rich enough to have been ruined. It altered his health; and the most important result of his chemical studies appears to have been the invention of a syrup, in which he had great confidence; but its trial blew him up into a tympany, from which he was only relieved by having recourse to a drug, also of his own discovery, which, in counteracting the syrup, reduced him to an alarming state of atrophy. But the mischances of the historian do not enter into his history; and our curiosity must be still eager to open Lenglet's 'Histoire de la Philosophie Hermetique,' accompanied by a catalogue of the writers in this mysterious science, in two volumes; as well as his enlarged edition of the works of a great Paracelsian, Nicholas la Ferre. This philosopher was appointed by Charles the Second superintendent over the royal laboratory at St James's: he was also a member of the Royal Society, and the friend of Boyle, to whom he communicated the secret of infusing young blood into old veins, with a notion that he could renovate that which admits of no second creation.* Such was the origin of Du Fresnoy's active curiosity on a variety of singular topics, the germs of which may be traced to three or four of our author's principal works.

Our Abbé promised to write his own life, and his pugnacious vivacity, and hardy frankness, would have seasoned a piece of auto-biography; an amateur has, however, written it in the style which amateurs like, with all the truth he could discover, enlivened by some secret history, writing the life of Lenglet with the very spirit of Lenglet; it is a mask taken from the very features of the man, not the insipid wax-work of an hyperbolic eulogist.

Although Lenglet du Fresnoy commenced in early life his career as a man of letters, he was at first engaged in the great chase of political adventure; and some striking facts are recorded, which show his successful activity. Michault describes his occupations by a paraphrased delicacy of language, which an Englishman might not have so happily composed. The minister for foreign affairs, the Marquis de Torcy, sent Lenglet to Lisle, where the court of the Elector of Cologne was then held; 'He had particular orders to watch that the two ministers of the elector should do nothing prejudicial to the king's affairs.' He seems, however, to have watched many other persons, and detected many other things. He discovered a captain, who agreed to open the gates of Mons to Marlborough, for 100,000 piastres; the captain was arrested on the parade, the letter of Marlborough was found in his pocket, and the traitor was broken on the wheel. Lenglet denounced a foreign general in the French service, and the event warranted the prediction. His most important discovery was that of the chimerical plots of Alberoni; to the honour of Lenglet, he would not engage in its detection, unless the minister promised that no blood should be shed. These successful incidents in the life of an honourable spy were rewarded with a moderate pension. Lenglet must have been no vulgar intriguer; he was not only perpetually confined by his very patrons when he resided at home for the freedom of his pen, but I find him early imprisoned in the citadel of Strasburgh for six months: it is said for purloining some curious books from the library of the Abbé Bignon, of which he had the care. It is certain that he knew the value of the scarcest works, and was one of those lovers of bibliography who trade at times in costly rarities. At Vienna he became intimately acquainted with the poet Rousseau and Prince Eugene. The prince, however, who suspected the character of our author, long avoided him. Lenglet insinuated himself into the favour of the prince's librarian; and such was his bibliographical skill, that this acquaintance ended in Prince Eugene laying aside his political dread, and preferring the advice of Lenglet to his librarian's, to enrich his magnificent library. When the motive of Lenglet's residence at Vienna became more and more suspected, Rousseau was employed to watch him; and not yet having quarrelled with his brother spy, he could only report that the Abbé Lenglet was every morning occupied in working on his 'Tablettes Chronologiques,' a work not worthy of alarming the government; that he spent his evenings at a violin player's married to a French woman, and returned home

* The Dictionnaire Historique, 1789, in their article Nich. Le Fevre, notices the third edition of his 'Course of Chemistry,' that of 1664, in two volumes; but the present one of Lenglet du Fresnoy's is more recent, 1751, enlarged into five volumes, two of which contain his own additions. I have never met with this edition, and it is wanting at the British Museum. Le Fevre published a tract on the great cordial of Sir Walter Raleigh, which may be curious.

† This anonymous work of 'Mémolres de Monsieur l'Abbé Lenglet du Fresnoy,' although the dedication is signed G. P., is written by Michault, of Dijon, as a presentation copy to Count de Vienne in my possession proves. Michault is the writer of two volumes of agreeable 'Mélanges Historiques, et Philologiques,' and the present is a very curious piece of literary history. The Dictionnaire Historique has complied the article of Lenglet entirely from this work; but the Journal des Savans was too tacet in this opinion. 'Eot-ce la peine de faire un livre pour apprendre au public qu'un homme de lettres, fut Espion, Escroc, bizarre, fougueux, cynique incapable d'amitié, de décence, de soumission aux loix?' &c. Yet they do not deny that the bibliography of Lenglet du Fresnoy is at all deficient in curiosity.

at eleven. As soon as our historian had discovered that the poet was a brother spy and newsmonger on the side of Prince Eugene, their reciprocal civilities cooled. Lenglet now imagined that he owed his six months retirement in the citadel of Strasburgh to the secret officiousness of Rousseau: each grew suspicious of the other's fidelity; and spies are like lovers, for their mutual jealousies settled into the most inveterate hatred. One of the most defamatory libels is Lenglet's intended dedication of his edition of Marot to Rousseau, which being forced to suppress in Holland, by order of the States-general; at Brussels, by the intervention of the Duke of Aremberg; and by every means the friends of the unfortunate Rousseau could contrive; was however many years afterwards at length subjoined by Lenglet to the first volume of his work on Romances; where an ordinary reader may wonder at its appearance unconnected with any part of the work. In this dedication or 'éloge historique' he often addresses 'Mon cher Rousseau,' but the irony is not delicate, and the calumny is heavy. Rousseau lay too open to the unlicensed causticity of his accuser. The poet was then expatriated from France for a false accusation against Saurin, in attempting to fix on him those criminal couplets, which so long disturbed the peace of the literary world in France, and of which Rousseau was generally supposed to be the writer; but of which on his death-bed he solemnly protested that he was guiltless. The coup de grace is given to the poet, stretched on this rack of invective, by just accusations on account of those infamous epigrams, which appear in some editions of that poet's works; a lesson for a poet, if poets would be lessoned, who indulge their imagination at the cost of their happiness, and seem to invest crimes, as if they themselves were criminals.

But to return to our Lenglet. Had he composed his own life, it would have offered a sketch of political servitude and political adventure, in a man too intractable for the one, and too literary for the other. Yet to the honour of his capacity, we must observe that he might have chosen his patrons, would he have submitted to patronage. Prince Eugene at Vienna; Cardinal Passionei at Rome; or Mons. Le Blanc, the French minister, would have held him on his own terms. But 'Liberty and my books' was the secret ejaculation of Lenglet; and from that moment all things in life were sacrificed to a jealous spirit of independence, which broke out in his actions as well as in his writings; and a passion for study for ever crushed the worm of ambition.

He was as singular in his conversation, which, says Jordan, was extremely agreeable to a foreigner, for he delivered himself without reserve on all things, and on all persons, seasoned with secret and literary anecdotes. He refused all the conveniences offered by an opulent sister, that he might not endure the restraint of a settled dinner hour. He lived to his eightieth year, still busied, and then died by one of those grievous chances, to which aged men of letters are liable: our caustic critic slumbered over some modern work, and, falling into the fire, was burnt to death. Many characteristic anecdotes of the Abbé Lenglet have been preserved in the Dictionnaire Historique, but I shall not repeat what is of easy recurrence.

THE DICTIONARY OF TREVoux.

A learned friend, in his very agreeable 'Trimester, or a three months' journey in France and Switzerland,' could not pass through the small town of Trevoux without a literary association of ideas which should accompany every man of letters in his tours, abroad or at home. A mind well informed cannot travel without discovering that there are objects constantly presenting themselves, which engage literary, historical, and moral facts. My friend writes, 'As you proceed nearer to Lyons you stop to dine at Trevoux, on the left bank of the Soane. On a sloping hill, down to the water-side, rises an amphitheatre, crowned with an ancient Gothic castle, in venerable ruin; under it is the small town of Trevoux, well known for its Journal and Dictionary, which latter is almost an encyclopædia, as there are few things of which something is not said in that most valuable compilation, and the whole was printed at Trevoux. The knowledge of this circumstance greatly enhances the delight of any visitor who has consulted the book and is acquainted with its merits and must add much to his local pleasures.'

A work from which every man of letters may be continually deriving such varied knowledge, and which is little known but to the most curious readers, claims a place in these volumes; nor is the history of the work itself without interest. Eight large folios, each consisting of a thousand closely printed pages, stand like a vast mountain, of which, before we climb, we may be anxious to learn the security of the passage. The history of dictionaries is the most mutable of all histories; it is a picture of the inconstancy of the knowledge of man; the learning of one generation passes away with another; and a dictionary of this kind is always to be repaired, to be recinded, and to be enlarged.

The small town of Trevoux gave its name to an excellent literary journal, long conducted by the Jesuits, and to this dictionary—as Edinburgh has to its critical Review and Annual Register, &c. It first came to be distinguished as a literary town from the Duc du Maine, as prince sovereign of Dombes, transferring to this little town of Trevoux not only his parliament and other public institutions, but also establishing a magnificent printing house, in the beginning of the last century. The duke, probably to keep his printers in constant employ, instituted the 'Journal de Trevoux;' and this, perhaps, greatly tended to bring the printing house into notice, so that it became a favourite with many good writers, who appear to have had no other connexion with the place; and this dictionary borrowed its first title, which it always preserved, merely from the place where it was printed. Both the journal and the dictionary were, however, consigned to the cares of some learned Jesuits, and perhaps the place always indicated the principles of the writers, of whom none were more eminent for elegant literature than the Jesuits.

The first edition of this dictionary sprung from the spite of rivalry, occasioned by a French dictionary published in Holland, by the protestant Basnage de Beauval. The duke set his Jesuits hastily to work; who, after a pompous announcement that this dictionary was formed on a plan suggested by their patron, did little more than pilage Furetiere, and rummage Basnage, and produced three new folios without any novelties; they pleased the Duc du Maine and no one else. This was in 1704. Twenty years after it was republished and improved; and editions increasing, the volumes succeeded each other, till it reached to its present magnitude and value in eight large folios, in 1771, the only edition now esteemed. Many of the names of the contributors to this excellent collection of words and things, the industry of Monsieur Barhier has revealed in his 'Dictionnaire des Anonymes,' art. 10782. The work, in the progress of a century, evidently became a favourite receptacle with men of letters in France, who eagerly contributed the smallest or the largest articles with a zeal honourable to literature and most useful to the public. They made this dictionary their common-place book for all their curious acquisitions; every one competent to write a short article preserving an important fact, did not aspire to compile the dictionary, or even an entire article in it; but it was a treasury in which such mites collected together formed its wealth; and all the literati may be said to have been engaged in perfecting these volumes during a century. In this manner, from the humble beginnings of three volumes, in which the plagiarist much more than the contributor was visible, eight were at length built up with more durable materials, and which claim the attention and the gratitude of the student.

The work, it appears interested the government itself, as a national concern, from the tenor of the following anecdotes.

Most of the minor contributors to this great collection were satisfied to remain anonymous; but as might be expected among such a number, sometimes a contributor was anxious to be known to his circle; and did not like this penitential abstinence of fame. An anecdote recorded of one of this class will amuse: a Monsieur Lantour du Chatel, avocat au parlement de Normandie, voluntarily devoted his studious hours to improve this work, and furnished near three thousand articles to the supplement of the edition of 1762. This ardent scholar had had a lively quarrel thirty years before with the first authors of the dictionary. He had sent them one thousand three hundred articles, on condition that the donor should be handsomely thanked in the preface of the new edition, and further receive a copy en grand papier. They were accepted. The conductors of the new edition, in 1721, forgot all the promises—nor thanks, nor copy! Our learned avocat, who was a little irritable, as his nephew who wrote his life acknowledges, as soon as the great work appeared, astonished, like Dennis, that 'they were rattling his own thunder,' without saying a word, quits his country town, and ventures, half dead with sickness and indignation, on an expedition to Paris, to make his complaint to the chancellor; and the work was deemed of that importance in the eye of government, and so zealous a contributor was considered to have such an honourable claim, that the chancellor ordered, first, that a copy on large paper, should be immediately delivered to Monsieur Lantour, richly bound and free of carriage; and secondly, as a remuneration of the unperformed promise, and an acknowledgment of gratitude, the omission of thanks should be inserted and explained in the three great literary journals of France; a curious instance among others of the French government often mediating, when difficulties occurred in great literary undertakings, and considering not lightly the claims and the honour of men of letters.

Another proof, indeed, of the same kind, concerning the present work, occurred after the edition of 1752. One Jamet l'ainé, who had with others been usefully employed on this edition, addressed a proposal to the government for an improved one, dated from the Bastille. He proposed that the government should choose a learned person, accustomed to the labour of the researches such a work requires; and he calculated, that if supplied with three amanuenses, such an editor would accomplish his task in about ten or twelve years; the produce of the edition would soon repay all the expenses and capital advanced. This literary projector did not wish to remain idle in the Bastille. Fifteen years afterwards the last improved edition appeared, published by the associated booksellers of Paris.

As for the work itself, it partakes of the character of our Encyclopædias; but in this respect it cannot be safely consulted, for widely has science enlarged its domains and corrected its errors since 1771. But it is precious as a vast collection of ancient and modern learning, particularly in that sort of knowledge which we usually term antiquarian and philological. It is not merely a grammatical, scientific and technical dictionary, but it is replete with divinity, law, moral philosophy, critical and historical learning, and abounds with innumerable miscellaneous curiosities. It would be difficult, whatever may be the subject of inquiry, to open it, without the gratification of some knowledge neither obvious nor trivial. I heard a man of great learning declare, that whenever he could not recollect his knowledge he opened Hoffman's 'Lexicon Universale Historicum,' where he was sure to find what he had lost. The works are similar; and valuable as are the German's four folios, the eight of the Frenchman may safely be recommended as their substitute, or their supplement. As a Dictionary of the French Language it bears a peculiar feature, which has been presumptuously dropped in the Dictionnaire de l'Académie: the last invents phrases to explain words, which therefore have no other authority than the writer himself! this of Trevoux is furnished, not only with mere authorities, but also with quotations from the classical French writers—an improvement which was probably suggested by the English Dictionary of Johnson. One nation improves by another.

QUADRIO'S ACCOUNT OF ENGLISH POETRY.

It is, perhaps, somewhat mortifying in our literary researches to discover that our own literature has been only known to the other nations of Europe comparatively within recent times. We have at length triumphed over our continental rivals in the noble struggles of genius, and our authors now see their works printed even at foreign presses, while we are furnishing with our gratuitous labours nearly the whole literature of a new empire; yet so late as in the reign of Anne, our poets were only known by the Latin versifiers of the 'Musa Anglicana;' and when Boileau was told of the public funeral of Dryden, he was pleased with the national honours bestowed on genius, but he declared that he never heard of his name before. This great legislator of Parnassus has never alluded to one of our own poets, so insular then was our literary glory! The most remarkable fact, or perhaps assertion, I have met with, of the little knowledge which the continent had of our writers, is a French translation of Bishop Hall's 'Characters of Virtues and Vices.' It is a duodecimo, printed at Paris of 109 pages, 1610, with this title, 'Caractères de Vertus et de Vices; tirés de l'Anglois de M. Jean Hall.' In a dedication to the Earl of Salisbury, the translator informs his lordship that ce livre est la première tra- laction de l'Anglois jamais imprimé aucun vulgaire. The first translation from the English ever printed in any modern language! Whether the translator is a bold liar, or an ignorant blunderer, remains to be ascertained; at all events it is a humiliating demonstration of the small progress which our home literature had made abroad in 1610!

I come now to notice a contemporary writer, professing to write the history of our Poetry, of which his knowledge will open to us as we proceed with our enlightened and amateur historian.

Father Quadrio's Della Storia e della ragione d'ogni Poesia,—is a gigantic work, which could only have been rejected and persevered in by some hypochondriac monk, who, to get rid of the saeva of life, could discover no pleasure than to bury himself alive in seven monstrous loosely-printed quartos, and every day be compiling something on a subject which he did not understand. Fortunately for Father Quadrio, without taste to feel, and determination to decide, nothing occurred in this progress of literary history and criticism to abridge his volumes and its amusements; and with diligence and erudition unparalleled, he has here built up a respectable for his immense, various, and trifling knowledge on the poetry of every nation. Quadrio is among that class of authors whom we receive with more gratitude than pleasure, fly to sometimes to quote, but never linger to read; and fix on our shelves, not seldom have in our hands.

I have been much mortified, in looking over this voluminous compiler, to discover, although he wrote so late as about 1750, how little the history of English Poetry was known to foreigners. It is assuredly our own fault. We are too long neglected the bibliography and the literary history of our own country. Italy, Spain and France, have enjoyed eminent bibliographers—we have none to rival them. Italy may justly glory in her Tiraboschi and her Mazzuchelli; Spain in the Bibliotheca of Nicholas Antonio; and France, so rich in bibliographical treasures, affords models to every literary nation of every species of literary history. With us, the partial labour of the hermit Anthony for the Oxford writers, compiled before philosophical criticism existed in the nation; and Warton's History of Poetry, which was left unfinished at its most critical period, when that delightful antiquary of taste had not touched the threshold of his Paradise—these are the great labours to which foreigners might resort, but these will not be found of much use to them. The neglect of our own literary history has, therefore, occasioned the errors, sometimes very ridiculous ones, of foreign writers respecting our authors. Even the lively Chaudon, in his Dictionnaire Historique, gives the most extraordinary accounts of most of the English writers. Without an English guide to attend such weary travellers, they have too often been deceived by the Mirages of our literature. They have given blundering accounts of works which do exist, and chronicled others which never did exist; and are often made up the personal history of our authors, confounding two or three into one. Chaudon, mentioning Dryden's tragedies, observes that Atterbury translated two into Latin verse, entitled Achitophel and Abealom!*

Of all these foreign authors none has more egregiously erred than this good Father Quadrio. In this universal history of poetry, I was curious to observe what sort of pure we made; and whether the fertile genius of our original poets had struck the foreign critic with admiration, or with critical censure. But little was our English poetry known to its universal historians. In the chapter on those 'who have cultivated 'la melica poesia in propria lingua tra Tedeschi, Piemontesi e Inglesi'† we find the following list of English poets.

Of John Cowper; whose rhymes and verses are preserved in manuscript in the college of the most holy Trinity, in Cambridge.

'Arthur Keiton flourished in 1548, a skilful English poet; he composed various poems in English; also he made the Cambrains and their genealogy.

The works of W. Wycherley in English prose and verse. These were the only English poets whom Quadrio at last could muster together! In his subsequent additions I caught the name of Sir Philip Sidney with an adven-

*Even recently Il Cavaliere Onofrio Boni, in his Eloge of an, in naming the three Augustan periods of modern literature, fixes them, for the Italians, under Leo the Tenth; for the French, under Lewis the Fourteenth, or the Great; and for the English, under Charles the Second!

turous criticism, 'le sue poesie assai buone.' He then was lucky enough to pick up the title—not the volume surely—which is one of the rarest; 'Flori poetici di A. Cowley,' which he calls 'poesia amorosa'; this must mean that early volume of Cowley's, published in his thirteenth year, under the title of 'Poetical Blossoms.' Further he laid hold of 'John Donne' by the skirt, and 'Thomas Creech,' at whom he made a full pause; informing his Italians, that his poems are reputed by his nation as 'assai buone.' He has also 'Le opere di Guglielmo'; but to this christian name, as it would appear, he had not ventured to add the surname. At length in his progress of inquiry, in this fourth volume (for they were published at different periods) he suddenly discovers a host of English poets—in Waller, Duke of Buckingham, Lord Roscommon, and others, among whom is Dr Swift; but he acknowledges their works have not reached him, Shakespeare at length appears on the scene, but Quadrio's notions are derived from Voltaire, whom, perhaps, he boldly translates. Instead of improving our drama, he conducted it a totale rovina nelle sue false monstruose, che si chiaman tragedie; alcune scene vi abbia luminesse e belle e alcuni tratti si trovano terribili e grandi. Otway is said to have composed a tragic drama on the subject of 'Venezia Salvata'; he adds with surprise, 'ma affatto regolare.' Regularity is the essence of genius with such critics as Quadrio. Dryden is also mentioned; but the only drama specified is 'King Arthur.' Addison is the first Englishman who produced a classical tragedy; but though Quadrio writes much about the life of Addison, he never alludes to the Spectator.

We come now to a more curious point. Whether Quadrio had read our comedies may be doubtful; but he distinguishes them by very high commendation. Our comedy, he says, represents human life, the manners of citizens and the people, much better than the French and Spanish comedies, in which all the business of life is mixed up with love affairs. The Spaniards had their gallantry from the Moors, and their manners from chivalry; to which they added their tumid African taste, differing from that of other nations. I shall translate what he now adds of English comedy.

'The English more skilfully even than the French, have approximated to the true idea of comic subjects, choosing for the argument of their invention the customary and natural objects of the citizens and the populace. And when religion and decorum were more respected in their theatres, they were more advanced in this species of poetry, and merited not a little praise, above their neighbouring nations. But more than the English and the French, (to speak according to pure and bare truth,) have the Italians signalized themselves.' A sly, insinuating criticism! But, as on the whole, for reasons which I cannot account for, Father Quadrio seems to have relished our English comedy, we must value his candour. He praises our comedy; 'per il bello ed il buono;' but, as he is a methodical Aristotelian, he will not allow us that liberty in the theatre, which we are supposed to possess in parliament—by delivering whatever we conceive to the purpose. His criticism is a specimen of the irrefragable. 'We must not abandon legitimate rules to give more pleasure thereby; because pleasure is produced by, and flows from, the beautiful; and the beautiful is chiefly drawn from the good order and unity in which it consists!'

Quadrio succeeded in discovering the name of one of our greatest comic geniuses; for, alluding to our diversity of action in comedy, he mentions in his fifth volume, page 148,—'Il celebre Benjasson nella sua commedia intitolata Bartolomeo Fruciere, e in quella altra commedia intitolata Ippom Vetti.' The reader may decipher the poet's name and his Fair: but it required the critical sagacity of Mr Douce to discover that by Ippom Vetti we are to understand Shadwell's comedy of Epsom Wells. The Italian critic had transcribed what he and his Italian printer could not spell; we have further discovered the source of his intelligence in St Evremund, who had classed Shadwell's comedy with Ben Jonson's. To such shifts is the writer of an universal history d'ogni poesia, miserably reduced!

Towards the close of the fifth volume we at last find the sacred muse of Milton,—but, unluckily, he was a man 'di pochissima religione,' and spoke of Christ like an Arian. Quadrio quotes Ramsay for Milton's vomiting forth abuse on the Roman church. His figures are said to be often mean, unworthy of the majesty of his subject; but in a later place, excepting his religion, our poet, it is decided on, is worthy 'di molti laudi.'

Thus much for the information the curious may obtain on English poetry, from its universal history. Quadrio unquestionably writes with more ignorance than prejudice against us: he has not only highly distinguished the comic genius of our writers, and raised it above that of our neighbours, but he has also advanced another discovery, which ranks us still higher for original invention, and which I am confident, will be as new as it is extraordinary to the English reader.

Quadrio, who, among other erudite accessories to his work, has exhausted the most copious researches on the origin of Punch and Harlequin, has also written, with equal curiosity and value, the history of Puppet-shows. But whom has he lauded? whom has he placed paramount, above all other people, for their genius of invention in improving this art?—The English! and the glory which has hitherto been universally conceded to the Italian nation themselves, appears to belong to us! For us, it appears, while others were dandling and pulling their little representatives of human nature into such awkward and unnatural motions, first invented pulleys, or wires, and gave a fine and natural action to the artificial life of these gesticulating machines!

We seem to know little of ourselves as connected with the history of puppet-shows; but in an article in the curious Dictionary of Trevoux, I find that John Brioché, to whom had been attributed the invention of Marionettes, is only to be considered as an improver; in his time (but the learned writers supply no date,) an Englishman discovered the secret of moving them by springs, and without strings; but the Marionettes of Brioché were preferred for the pleasures which he made them deliver. The erudite Quadrio appears to have more successfully substantiated our claims to the pulleys or wires, or springs of the puppets, than any of our own antiquaries; and perhaps the uncommemorated name of this Englishman was that Powell, whose Solomon and Sheba were celebrated in the days of Addison and Steele; the former of whom has composed a classical and sportive Latin poem on this very subject. But Quadrio might well rest satisfied, that the nation, which could boast of its Fantoccini, surpassed, and must ever surpass the puny efforts of all doll-loving people!

'POLITICAL RELIGIONISM.'

In Professor Dugald Stewart's first Dissertation on the progress of Philosophy, I find this singular and significant term. It has occasioned me to reflect on those contests for religion, in which a particular faith has been made the ostensible pretext, while the secret motive was usually political. The historians, who view in these religious wars only religion itself, have written large volumes, in which we may never discover that they have either been a struggle to obtain predominance, or an expedient to secure it. The hatreds of ambitious men have disguised their own purposes, while Christianity has borne the odium of loosening a destroying spirit among mankind; which, had Christianity never existed, would have equally prevailed in human affairs. Of a mortal malady, it is not only necessary to know the nature, but to designate it by a right name that we may not err in our mode of treatment. If we call that religion which we shall find for the greater part is political, we are likely to be mistaken in the regimen and the cure.

Fox, in his 'Acts and Monuments,' writes the martyrology of the protestants in three mighty folios; where, in the third, 'the tender mercies' of the catholics are 'cut in wood' for those who might not otherwise be enabled to read or spell them. Such pictures are abridgments of long narratives, but they leave in the mind a fulness of horror. Fox made more than one generation shudder; and his volume, particularly this third, chained to a reading-desk in the halls of the great, and in the aisles of churches, often detained the loiterer, as it furnished some new scene of papistical horrors to paint forth on returning to his fire-side. The protestants were then the martyrs, because, under Mary, the protestants had been thrown out of power.

Dodd has opposed to Fox three curious folios, which he calls 'the Church History of England,' exhibiting a most abundant martyrology of the catholics, inflicted by the hands of the protestants; who in the succeeding reign of Elizabeth, after long trepidations and balancings, were confirmed into power. He grieves over the delusion and seduction of the black-letter romance of honest John Fox, which, he says, 'has obtained a place in protestant churches next to the Bible, while John Fox himself is esteemed little less than an evangelist.' Dodd's narrations are not less pathetic; for the situation of the catholic, who had to secrete himself, as well as to suffer, was more adapted for romantic adventures than even the monacholy but monotonous story of the protestants tortured in the cell, or bound to the stake. These catholics, however, were attempting all sorts of intrigues; and the misdeeds and martyrs of Dodd to the parliament of England were only traitors and conspirators!

Heylin, in his history of the Puritans and the Presbyterians, blackens them for political evils. He is the Spinoza of history, delighting himself with horrors at which the painter himself must have started. He tells of their 'oppositions' to monarchical and episcopal government, their 'innovations' in the church; and their 'embroidering' of the kingdoms. The sword rages in their hands; treason, sacrilege, plunder; while 'more of the blood of Englishmen had poured like water within the space of forty years, than had been shed in the civil wars of York and Lancaster in four centuries!'

Neale opposes a more elaborate history; where these 'great and good men,' the puritans and the presbyterians, 'are placed among the reformers;' while their fame is blanched into angelic purity. Neale and his party opined that the protestant had not sufficiently protested, and that the reformation itself needed to be reformed. They married the impatient Elizabeth, and her ardent churchmen; and disputed with the learned James, and his courtly bishops, about such ceremonial trifles, that the historians may blush or smile who has to record them. And when the puritans was thrown out of preference, and succeeded into separation, he turned into a presbyter. Nonconformity was their daring sin, and their sullen triumph.

Calamy, in four painful volumes, chronicles the bloodless martyrology of the two thousand silenced and ejected ministers. Their history is not glorious, and their heroisms are obscure; but it is a domestic tale! When the second Charles was restored, the presbyterians, like every other faction, were to be amused, if not courted. Some of the king's chaplains were selected from among them, and preached once. Their hopes were raised that they should, by some agreement, be enabled to share in that ecclesiastical establishment which they had so often opposed; and the bishops met the presbyterians in a convocation at the Savoy. A conference was held between the high church resuming the seat of power, and the low church, now proscribed; that is, between the old clergy who had recently been mercilessly ejected by the new, who in their turn were awaiting their fate. The conference was closed with arguments by the weaker, and votes by the stronger. Many curious anecdotes of this conference have come down to us. The presbyterians, in their last struggle, petitioned for indulgence; but oppressors who had become petitioners, only showed that they possessed no longer the means of resistance. This conference was followed up by the Act of Uniformity, which took place on Bartholomew day, August 24, 1662: an act which ejected Calamy's two thousand ministers from the bosom of the established church. Bartholomew day with this party was long paralleled, and perhaps is still with the dreaded French massacre of that fatal saint's day. The calamity was rather, however, of a private than of a public nature. The two thousand ejected ministers were indeed deprived of their livings; but this was, however, a happier fate than what has often occurred in these contests for the security of political power. This ejection was not like the expulsion of the Moriscos, the best and most useful subjects of Spain, which was a human sacrifice of half a million of men, and the proscription of many Jews from that land of catholicism; or the massacre of thousands of Huguenots, and the expulsion of more than a hundred thousand by Louis the Fourteenth from France. The presbyterian divines were not driven from their father-land, and compelled to learn another language than their mother-tongue. Destitute as divines, they were suffered to remain as citizens; and the result was remarkable. These divines could not disrobe themselves of their learning and their piety, while several of them were compelled to become tradesmen; among these the learned Samuel Chandler, whose literary productions are numerous, kept a bookseller's shop in the Poultry.

Hard as this event proved in its result, it was however pleaded, that 'It was but like for like.' And that the his-ty of 'the like' might not be curtailed in the telling, opposed to Calamy's chronicle of the two thousand ejected ministers stands another, in folio magnitude, of the same sort of chronicle of the clergy of the church of England, with a title by no means less pathetic.

This is Walker's 'Attempt towards recovering an account of the Clergy of the Church of England who were persecuted, harassed, &c., in the late Times.' Walker himself astonished at the size of his volume, the number his sufferers, and the variety of the sufferings. 'Shall a church,' says he, 'not have the liberty to preserve a history of her sufferings, as well as the separation set forth an account of theirs? Can Dr Calamy acquit for publishing the history of the Bartholomew sufferers, if I am condemned for writing that of the persecuted loyalists?' He allows that 'the number of ejected amounts to two thousand,' and there were no more than 'seven or eight thousand of the episcopal clergy imprisoned, banished, and sent a starving,' &c. &c.

Whether the reformed were martyred by the catholics, the catholics executed by the reformed; whether the ritans expelled those of the established church, or the established church ejected the ritans, all seems reduced to two classes, conformists and non-conformists, or, in a political style, the administration and the opposition. When we discover that the heads of all parties are of the same hot temperament, and observe the same evil conduct similar situations; when we view honest old Latimer with his own hands hanging a mendicant friar on a tree, and the government changing the friars binding Latimer the stake; when we see the French catholics cutting the tongues of the protestants, that they might no longer protest; the haughty Luther writing submissive apologies to Leo the Tenth and Henry the Eighth for the security with which he had treated them in his writings, and finding that his apologies were received with contempt, and retracting his retractions; when we find that haughtiness of the haughty, John Knox, when Elizabeth first ascended the throne, crouching and repenting of having given his famous excommunication against all female sovereignty; or pulling down the monasteries, from the town that when the rookery was destroyed, the rooks would never return; when we find his recent apologist adverting, while he apologizes for, some extraordinary proofs of Machiavelian politics—an impenetrable mystery seems hang over the conduct of men who profess to be guided by the bloodless code of Jesus—but try them by a human standard, and treat them as politicians; and the motives be discovered, the actions are understood!

Two edicts of Charles the Fifth, in 1555, condemned to death the Reformed of the Low Countries, even should they return to the catholic faith, with this exception, however, in favour of the latter, that they shall not be burnt, but that the men shall be beheaded, and the women strangled alive! Religion could not then be the real motive of the Spanish cabinet, for in returning to the ancient faith that point was obtained; but the truth is, that the Spanish government considered the reformed as rebels, and it was not safe to re-admit to the rights of citizenship. The undisguised fact appears in the codicil to the will of the emperor, when he solemnly declares that he is written to the inquisition 'to burn and extirpate the heretics,' after trying to make Christians of them, because he is convinced that they never can become sincere catholics; and he acknowledges that he had committed a great deal in permitting Luther to return free on the faith of safe conduct, as the emperor was not bound to keep his word with a heretic. 'It is because that I destroyed a man, that heresy has now become strong, which I am convinced might have been stifled with him in its birth.'* The whole conduct of Charles the Fifth in this mighty religion, was, from its beginning, censured by contemporaries as purely political. Francis the First observed, that the emperor, under the colour of religion, was placing himself at the head of a league to make his way to a pre-eminant monarchy. The pretext of religion is no new thing, writes the Duke of Nevers. Charles the Fifth had undertaken a war against the protestant princes, with the design of rendering the imperial crown hereditary in the house of Austria; and he has only attacked the electoral princes to ruin them, and to abolish their right of election. Had it been zeal for the catholic reform, would he have delayed from 1519 to 1549 in arm, and he might have extinguished the Lutheran heresy, which he could easily have done in 1526? But he considered that this novelty would serve to divide the German princes; and he patiently waited till the effect was realized.*

Good men of both parties, mistaking the nature of these religious wars, have drawn horrid inferences! The 'dragonades of Louis XIV, excited the admiration of Bruyere; and Anquetil, in his 'Esprit de la Ligue,' compares the revocation of the edict of Nantes to a salutary amputation. The massacre of St Bartholomew in its own day, and even recently, has found advocates; a Greek professor at the time asserted that there were two classes of protestants in France, political and religious; and that 'the late ebullition of public vengeance was solely directed against the former.' Dr McCre cursing the catholic with a catholic's curse, execrates 'the stale sophistry of this calumniator.' But should we allow that the Greek professor who advocated their national crime was the wretch the calvinistic doctor describes, yet the nature of things cannot be altered by the equal violence of Peter Charpentier and Dr McCre.

This subject of 'Political Religionism' is indeed as nice as it is curious; politics have been so cunningly worked into the cause of religion, that the parties themselves will never be able to separate them; and to this moment, the most opposite opinions are formed concerning the same events, and the same persons. When public disturbances recently broke out at Nismes on the first restoration of the Bourbons, the protestants, who there are numerous, declared that they were persecuted for religion, and their cry echoed by their brethren the dissenters, resounded in this country. We have not forgotten the ferment it raised here; much was said, and something was done. Our minister however persisted in declaring that it was a mere political affair. It is clear that our government was right on the cause, and those zealous complainants wrong, who only observed the effect; for as soon as the Bourbonists had triumphed over the Bonapartists, we heard no more of those sanguinary persecutions of the protestants of Nismes, of which a dissenter has just published a large history. It is a curious fact, that when two writers at the same time were occupied in a life of Cardinal Ximenes, Flechier converted the cardinal into a saint, and every incident in his administration was made to connect itself with his religious character. Marsollier, a writer very inferior to Flechier, shows the cardinal merely as a politician. The elegancies of Flechier were soon neglected by the public, and the deep interests of truth soon acquired, and still retain, for the less elegant writer, the attention of the statesman.

A modern historian has observed, that 'the affairs of religion were the grand fomenters and promoters of the thirty years' war, which first brought down the powers of the North to mix in the politics of the Southern states.' The fact is indisputable, but the cause is not so apparent. Gustavus Adolphus, the vast military genius of his age, had designed, and was successfully attempting, to oppose the overgrown power of the imperial house of Austria, which had long aimed at an universal monarchy in Europe; a circumstance which Philip IV weakly hinted at to the world when he placed this motto under his arms—'Sine ipso factum est nihil,' an expression applied to Jesus Christ by St John.

TOLERATION.

An enlightened toleration is a blessing of the last age—it would seem to have been practised by the Romans, when they did not mistake the primitive Christians for seditious members of society; and was inculcated even by Mahomet, in a passage in the Koran, but scarcely practised by his followers. In modern history, it was condemned, when religion was turned into a political contest, under the aspiring house of Austria—and in Spain—and in France. It required a long time before its nature was comprehended—and to this moment it is far from being clear, either to the tolerators, or the tolerated.

It does not appear, that the precepts or the practice of Jesus and the apostles inculcate one compelling of any to be Christians; yet an expression employed in the nuptial parable of the great supper, when the hospitable lord commanded the servant, finding that he had still room to accommodate more guests, 'to go out in the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in, that my house may be filled,' was alleged as an authority by those catholics, who called themselves 'the convertors,' for using religious force, which, still alluding to the hospitable lord, they called 'a charitable and salutary violence.' It was this circumstance which produced Bayle's Commentaire philosophique sur ces Paroles de Jesus Christ, published under the supposititious name of an Englishman, as printed at Canterbury in 1686, but really at Amsterdam. It is curious that Locke published his first letter on 'Toleration' in Latin at Gouda, in 1689—the second in 1690—and the third in 1692. Bayle opened the mind of Locke, and sometime after quotes Locke's Latin letter with high commendation.* The caution of both writers in publishing in foreign places, however, indicates the prudence which it was deemed necessary to observe in writing in favour of Toleration.

These were the first philosophical attempts; but the earliest advocates for Toleration may be found among the religious controversialists of a preceding period; it was probably started among the fugitive sects who had found an asylum in Holland. It was a blessing which they had gone far to find, and the miserable, reduced to human feelings, are compassionate to one another. With us the sect called 'the Independents' had, early in our revolution under Charles the First, pleaded for the doctrine of religious liberty, and long maintained it against the presbyterians. Both proved persecutors when they possessed power. The first of our respectable divines who advocated this cause was Jeremy Taylor, in his 'Discourse on the liberty of Prophesying,' 1647, and Bishop Hall, who had pleaded the cause of moderation in a discourse about the same period.† Locke had no doubt examined all these writers. The history of opinions is among the most curious of histories; and I suspect that Bayle was well acquainted with the pamphlets of our sectaries, who, in their flight to Holland, conveyed those curiosities of theology, which had cost them their happiness and their estates: I think he indicates this hidden source of his ideas, by the extraordinary ascription of his book to an Englishman, and fixing the place of its publication at Canterbury!

Toleration has been a vast engine in the hands of modern politicians. It was established in the United Provinces of Holland, and our numerous non-conformists took refuge in that asylum for disturbed consciences; it attracted a valuable community of French refugees; it conducted a colony of Hebrew fugitives from Portugal; conventicles of Brownists, quakers' meetings, French churches, and Jewish synagogues, and (had it been required) Mahometan mosques, in Amsterdam, were the precursors of its mart and its exchange; the moment they could preserve their consciences sacred to themselves, they lived without mutual persecution, and mixed together as good Dutchmen.

The excommunicated part of Europe seemed to be the most enlightened, and it was then considered as a proof of the admirable progress of the human mind, that Locke and Clarke and Newton corresponded with Leibnitz, and others of the learned in France and Italy. Some were astonished that philosophers, who differed in their religious opinions, should communicate among themselves with so much toleration.‡

It is not, however, clear, that had any one of these sects at Amsterdam obtained predominance, which was sometimes attempted, they would have granted to others the toleration they participated in common. The infancy of a party is accompanied by a political weakness, which disables it from weakening others.

* In the article Sanctarius. Note F.

† Recent writers among our sectaries assert that Dr Owen was the first who wrote in favour of toleration, in 1648! Another claims the honour for John Goodwin, the chaplain of Oliver Cromwell, who published one of his obscure polemical tracts in 1644, among a number of other persons, who at that crisis did not venture to prefix their names to pleas in favour of Toleration, so delicate and so obscure did this subject then appear! In 1631, they translated the liberal treatise of Grotius de Imperio animum potestatum circa sacra; under the title of 'The authority of the highest powers about sacred things,' London. Svo. 1631. To the honour of Grotius, the first of philosophical reformers, be it recorded, that he dis-pleased both parties!

‡ J. P. Rabaut, sur la Revolution Française, p. 27

The catholic in this country pleads for toleration to his own, he refuses to grant it. Here, the presbyterian had complained of persecution, once forced in the power, abrogated every kind of independence of others. When the flames consumed Servetus in the controversy began, whether the civil magistrates punish heretics, which Beza, the assessor of the court, maintained: he triumphed in the small protestant city of Geneva; but the book he wrote was first perused by a few leagues distant, among a few catholics. Whenever the protestants complained of persecutions they suffered, the catholics for equal sanction, never failed to appeal to the volume of the Beza.

M. Necker de Saussure has recently observed on trivial circumstances the change or the preservation established religion in different districts of Europe depended! When the Reformation penetrated into Scotland, the government of the principality of Neuchâtel wished to allow liberty of conscience to all their subjects, invited each parish to vote 'for or against the adoption of the new worship; and in all the parishes, except a majority of suffrages declared in favour of the protestant communion.' The inhabitants of the canton of Creissier had also assembled; and forming an assembly, there happened to be an equality of votes against the change of religion. A shepherd being absent, tending the flocks on the hills, they sent him to appear and decide this important question: he having no liking to innovation, he gave his voice in favour of the existing form of worship; and this parish remained catholic, and is so at this day, in the heart of the protestant cantons.

I proceed to some facts, which I have arranged in the history of Toleration. In the memoirs of James the Second, when that monarch published 'The Declaration for Liberty of Conscience,' the catholic reasons and realises like a modern philosopher: he accuses 'the avarice of our clergy, who had degraded themselves into triflers; and like mechanics in a trade, who are contented with nothing so much as interlopers—they had therefore reduced indifferent persons to imagine that their earnest test was not about their faith, but about their temporal possessions. It was incongruous that a church, which does not pretend to be infallible, should constrain persons under heavy penalties and punishments, to believe as it does: they delighted, he asserted, to hold an even number of dissenters and catholics; so sweet was death to that the very thought of others participating in their freedom made them deny the very doctrine they preached. The chief argument the catholic urged on this occasion was the reasonableness of repealing laws which made men liable to the greatest punishments for that it was in their power to remedy, for that no man could force himself to believe what he really did not believe.*

Such was the rational language of the most bigoted zealots!—The fox can bleat like the lamb. At the moment James the Second was uttering this mild explanation, in his own heart he had anathematized the nation for I have seen some of the king's private papers, which still exist; they consist of communications chiefly by the most bigoted priests, with the wildest projects, and the most infatuated prophecies and dreams of restoring the catholic faith in England! Had the Jesuit-like monarch retained the English throne, the language he now addressed to the nation would have been no longer used; and that case it would have served his protestant subjects. He asked for toleration, to become intolerant! He devoted himself, not to the hundredth part of the English nation; yet he was surprised that he was left one morning without an army! When the catholic monarch issued this declaration for 'liberty of conscience,' the Jekyll of his day served, that 'It was but scaffolding: they intend to build another house; and when that house (Popery) is built they will take down the scaffold.†

When the Presbytery was our lord, they who had endured the tortures of persecution, and raised such sharp outcries for freedom, of all men, were the most intolerant; hardly had they tasted of the Circean cup of dominion, ere they were transformed into the most hideous or the most grotesque monsters of political power. To their eyes toleration was an hydra, and the dethroned bishops to vehemently declaimed against what, in judi-one of the high-flying presbyterians called 'a terable toleration'! They advocated the rights of conscience, and 'Shallow Edwards,' as Milton calls one of 'The Grangreana,' published a treatise on toleration. They who had so long complained of the intolerance, now sent all the books they condemned to the flames. Prynne now vindicated the very doctrines he himself had so severely suffered; and assuming the greatest possible power of civil government, even the power of death, on its opponents. Prynne lost the ears of others!

The idea of toleration was not intelligible for too long a the words 'Vgonotomiar Strages, 1572.'—The massacre of Huguonots—proves that toleration will not be at that date. Castelnau, a statesman and a humanist, was at a loss how to decide on a point of the importance to France. In 1552 they first began to Lutherans or Calvinists, and to cut out the of all protestants, 'that they might no longer pro-how it happened, that the more they punish-death, it only increased the number of the vici-tims produced proselytes. As a statesman, he found the great field of human actions in the history; there he discovered that the Romans were enlightened in their actions than ourselves; Cicero commanded Pliny the younger not to molest pagans for their religion; but should their conduct be the state, to put down illegal assemblies; that the Apostate expressly forbid the execution of the pagans, who then imagined that they were securing salvation by martyrdom; but he ordered all their to be confiscated—a severe punishment—by which prevented more than he could have done by persecution.

'All this,' he adds, 'we read in ecclesiastical history.' Such were the sentiments of Castelnau, in the midst of perplexities of state necessity, and of our humanity, the notion of toleration had not entered the views of the statesman. It was also at this time that Sainctes, a great controversial writer, declared, and the fires lighted for the destruction of Calvinism was extinguished, the sect had not spread! About the century subsequent to this period Thuanus was the first great mind who appears to have insinuated the French monarch and his nation, that they lived at peace with heretics; by which avowed he down on himself: the haughty indignation of Rome, a declaration, that the man who spoke in favour of the must necessarily be one of the first class. Hear the dictatorial historian: 'Have men no compassion, after years passed full of continual miseries? Have they no after the loss of the Netherlands, occasioned by frantic obstinacy which marked the times? I grieve such sentiments should have occasioned my book to be examined with a rigour that amounts to calumny. Such was the language of Thuanus, in a letter in 1606; which indicates an approximation to toleration, but which term was not probably yet found in the dictionary. We may consider, as so many attempts at toleration, the great national synod of Dort, whose history is simply written by Brandt; and the mitigating processions of Laud, to approximate to the ceremonies of the Roman church; but the synod, after holding about two hundred sessions, closed, dividing men into universalists and semi-universalists, supralapsarians and sublapsarians!

The reformed themselves produced the remonstrants; and Laud's ceremonies ended in placing the altar eastward, and in raising the scaffold for the monarchy and the hierarchy. Error is circuitous when it will do what it has not yet learnt. They were pressing for conformity to do that which a century afterwards they found could only be done by toleration.

The secret history of toleration among certain parties has been disclosed to us by a curious document, from that religious Machiavel, the fierce ascetic republican John Knox, a calvinistical Pope. 'While the posterity of Abraham,' says that mighty and ardent reformer, 'were few in number, and while they sojourned in different countries, they were merely required to avoid all participation in the idolatrious rites of the heathen; but as soon as they proceeded into a kingdom, and had obtained possession of Canaan, they were strictly charged to suppress idolatry, and to destroy all the monuments and incentives. The same duty was now incumbent on the professors of the true religion in Scotland: formerly, when not more than ten persons in a county were enlightened, it would have been foolishness to have demanded of the nobility the suppression of idolatry. But now, when knowledge had been increased, &c.' Such are the men who cry out for toleration during their state of political weakness, but who cancel the bond by which they hold their tenure whenever they 'obtain possession of Canaan.' The only commentary on this piece of the secret history of toleration is the acute remark of Swift: 'We are fully convinced that we shall always tolerate them, but not that they will tolerate us.'

The truth is, that toleration was allowed by none of the parties! and I will now show the dilemmas into which each party thrust itself.

When the kings of England would forcibly have established episcopacy in Scotland, the presbyters passed an act against the toleration of dissenters from presbyterian doctrines and discipline! and thus, as Guthrie observes, they were committing the same violence on the conscience of their brethren, which they opposed in the king. The presbyterians contrived their famous covenant to dispossess the royalists of their livings; and the independents, who assumed the principle of toleration in their very name, shortly after enforced what they called the engagement, to eject the presbyterians! In England, where the dissenters were ejected, their great advocate Calamy complains that the dissenters were only making use of the same arguments which the most eminent reformers had done in their noble defence of the reformation against the papists, while the arguments of the established church against the dissenters were the same which were urged by the papists against the protestant reformation! When the dissenters

* Dr M'Crie's Life of John Knox, II, 122.

I quote from an unpublished letter, written so late as in 1749, addressed to the author of 'The Free and Candid Dis-quisition,' by the Reverend Thomas Allen, Rector of Kettering, Northamptonshire. However extravagant his doctrine appears to us, I suspect that it exhibits the concealed sentiments of even some protestant churchmen! This rector of Kettering attributes the growth of schisms to the negligence of the clergy, and seems to have persecuted both the archbishops,
'to his detriment,' as he tells us, with singular plans of reform borrowed from monastic institutions. He wished to revive the practice inculcated by a canon of the council of Leo-dicea, of having prayers said ad horam nonam et ad vesperam—prayers twice a day in the churches. But his grand project took in his own words:

'I let the archbishop know that I had composed an Irenicon, wherein I prove the necessity of an ecclesiastical power over consciences in matters of religion, which utterly silences their arguments who plead so hard for toleration. I took my scheme from 'a Discourse of Ecclesiastical Polity,' wherein the authority of the civil magistrate over the consciences of subjects in matters of external religion is asserted; the mis-chiefs and inconveniences of toleration are represented, and all protestances pleaded in behalf of liberty of conscience are fully answered. If this book were reprinted and considered, the king would know his power and the people their duty.'

The rector of Kettering seems not to have known that the author of this 'Discourse on Ecclesiastical Polity,' was the notorious Parker, immortalized by the satire of Marvell
This political apostate, from a republican and presbyterian, became a furious advocate for arbitrary government in church and state! He easily won the favour of James the Second, who made him Bishop of Oxford! His principles were so violent, that Father Petre, the confessor of James the Second, were our masters, and preached up the doctrine of passive obedience in spiritual matters to the civil power, it was unquestionably passing a self-condemnation on their own recent opposition and detraction of the former episcopacy. Whenever men act from a secret motive entirely contrary to their ostensible one, such monstrous results will happen; and as extremes will join, however opposite they appear in their beginnings, John Knox and Father Petre, in office, would have equally served James the Second, as confessor and prime minister!

A fact relating to the famous Justus Lipsius proves the difficulty of forming a clear notion of Toleration. Thus learned man, after having been ruined by the religious wars of the Netherlands, found an honourable retreat in a professor's chair at Leyden, and without difficulty abjured papacy. He published some political works; and adopted as his great principle, that only one religion should be allowed to a people, and that no clemency should be granted to non-conformists, who, he declares, should be pursued by sword and fire; in this manner a single member would be cut off to preserve the body sound. Ure, secæ—are his words. Strange notions these in a protestant republic; and, in fact, in Holland it was approving of all the horrors of their oppressors, the Duke D'Alva and Philip II, from which they had hardly recovered. It was a principle by which we must inevitably infer, says Bayle, that in Holland no other mode of religious belief but one sect should be permitted; and that those Pagans who had hanged the missionaries of the Gospel had done what they ought. Lipsius found himself sadly embarrassed when refuted by Theodore Cornhart,* the firm advocate of political and religious freedom, and at length Lipsius, that protestant with a catholic heart, was forced to eat his words, like Pistol his onion, declaring that the two objectionable words, ure, secæ, were borrowed from medicine, meaning not literally fire and sword, but a strong efficacious remedy, one of those powerful medicines to expel poison. Jean de Serres, a warm Huguenot, carried the principle of Toleration so far in his 'Inventaire generale de l'Histoire de France,' as to blame Charles Martel for compelling the Frisians, whom he had conquered, to adopt Christianity! 'A pardonable zeal,' he observes, 'in a warrior; but in fact the minds of men cannot be gained over by arms, nor that religion forced upon them, which must be introduced into the hearts of men by reason.' It is curious to see a protestant, in his zeal for toleration, blaming a king for forcing idolators to become Christians; and to have found an opportunity to express his opinions in the dark history of the eighth century, is an instance how historians incorporate their passions in their works, and view ancient facts with modern eyes.

The protestant cannot grant toleration to the catholic, unless the catholic ceases to be a papist; and the Armenian church, which opened its wide bosom to receive every denomination of Christians, nevertheless were forced to exclude the papists, for their passive obedience to the supremacy of the Roman Pontiff. The catholic has curiously told us, on this word Toleration, that, Ce mot devient fort en usage a mesure que le nombre des tolerans augmente.† It was a word which seemed of recent introduction, though the book is modern! The protestants have disputed much how far they might tolerate, or whether they should tolerate at all; 'a difficulty,' triumphantly exclaims the catholic, 'which they are not likely ever to settle, while they maintain their principles of pretended reformation: the consequences which naturally follow, excite horror to the Christian. It is the weak who raise such outcries for toleration; the strong find authority legitimate.'

A religion which admits not of toleration cannot be safely tolerated, if there is any chance of their obtaining a political ascendancy.

When Priscillian and six of his followers were condemned to torture and execution for asserting that the made sure of him! This letter of the rector of Kettering, in adopting the system of such a catholic bishop, confirms my suspicion, that toleration is condemned as an evil among some protestants!

* Cornhart was one of the fathers of Dutch literature, and even of their arts. He was the composer of the great national air of William of Orange; he was too a famous engraver, the master of Golzius. On his death-bed, he was still writing against the persecution of heretics.

† Dictionnaire de Trevoux, ad vocem Tolerance. Printed in 1771.

three persons of the Trinity were to be considered as different acceptations of the same being, Saint Ambrose, Saint Martin asserted the cause of offended innocence, and refused to communicate with the bishops who called out for the blood of the Priscillianists; but Cardinal Baronsius, the annalist of the church, was greatly embarrassed to explain how men of real purity could be from applauding the ardent zeal of the persecutors; preferred to give up the saints rather than to allow of excommunication—for he acknowledges that the toleration of these saints would have allowed was not exempt from sin.*

In the preceding article, 'Political Religion,' have shown how to provide against the possible evil of tolerated becoming the tolerators! Toleration has, indeed, been suspected of indifference to Religion itself; but sound minds, it is only an indifference to the language of theology—things 'not of God, but of man,' that are perished, and that are perishing around us!

APOLGY FOR THE PARISHAN MASSACRE.

An original document now lying before me, the graph letter of Charles the Ninth, will prove, that that parallel massacre, called by the world religieuse, was the French cabinet, considered merely as political; of those revolving state expedients which a protestant necessity has too often inflicted on that part of a nation which, like the under-current, subterraneously runs its way, and runs counter to the great stream, till the cal moment arrives when one, or the other, must cease.

The massacre began on St Bartholomew day, in August, 1572, lasted in France during seven days: a awful event interrupted the correspondence of our court with that of France. A long silence ensued; the secret dare to tell the tale which the other could not tell. But sovereigns know how to convert a mere domestic event into a political expedient. Charles the Ninth, on the birth of a daughter, sent over an ambassador extraordinary to request Elizabeth to stand as sponsor; this the French monarch obtained a double purpose served to renew his interrupted intercourse with the Queen, and alarmed the French protestants by shattering their hopes, which long rested on the aid of the English queen.

The following letter, dated 8th February, 1573, is addressed by the king to La Motte Fenelon, his resident ambassador at London. The king in this letter sets out details a confidential intercourse with his mother, Catherine of Medicis, who perhaps, may have dictated the letter to the secretary, although signed by the king with his own hand.† Such minute particulars could only be known to herself. The Earl of Walsingham (Walsingham) was now taking his departure, having come to Paris on the baptism of the princess; and accompanied Walsingham, our resident ambassador, after taking leave of Charles, had the following interview with Catherine of Medicis. An interview with the young monarch usually concluded by a separate audience with his mother who probably was still the directress of his councils.

The French court now renewed their favourite project of marrying the Duke D'Alençon with Elizabeth. They had long wished to settle this turbulent spirit, and the negotiation with Elizabeth had been broken off in consequence of the massacre at Paris. They were somewhat uneasy lest he should share the fate of his brother, the Duke of Anjou, who had not long before been expedited on a same fruitless errand; and Elizabeth had already objected to the disparity of their ages, the Duke of Alençon being only seventeen, and the maiden queen six and thirty; Catharine observed, that D'Alençon was only one year

* Sismondi, Hist. des Français, I. 41. The character of this first person who introduced civil persecution into the Christian church has been described by Sulpicius Severus. See MacLaine's note in his translation of Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, Vol. I.—428.

† All the numerous letters which I have seen of Charles the Ninth, now in the possession of Mr Murray, are carefully signed by himself, and I have also observed postscripts written with his own hand: they are always counter-signed by the secretary. I mention this circumstance, because in the Dictionnaire Historique, it is said that Charles, who died young, was so given up to the amusements of his age, that he would not even sign his despatches, and introduced the constant secretaries subscribing for the king. This voluminous correspondence shows the falsity of this statement. History is often composed of popular tales of this stamp.

anger than his brother, against whom this objection not occurred to Elizabeth, for he had been sent back to another pretext—some difficulty which the queen had arrived at his performing mass in his own house.

After Catharine de Medicis had assured the Earl of Worcester of her great affection for the Queen of England, and her and the king's strict intention to preserve it, that they were therefore desirous of this proposed marriage taking place, she took this opportunity of inquiring of the Earl of Worcester the cause of the queen's mistress's marked coldness towards them. The narrative becomes now dramatic.

On this Walsingham, who kept always close by the side of the count, here took on himself to answer, acknowledging that the said count had indeed been charged to speak on this head; and he then addressed some words in English to Worcester. And afterwards the count gave my lady and mother to understand, that the queen his mistress had been waiting for an answer on two articles; one concerning religion, and the other for an interview. My lady and mother instantly replied, that she had never read any articles mentioned, on which she would not be immediately satisfied the Sieur Walsingham, who had just taken up the word; first observing that the count was not accustomed to business of this nature, but that he himself knew for certain that the cause of this negotiation marriage not being more advanced, was really these unsettled points: that his mistress still wished that the point of religion should be cleared up; for that they resided in England that this business was designed only to amuse and never to be completed, (as happened in that my brother the Duke of Anjou;) and the other point concerned the interview between my brother the Duke of Anjou; because some letters, which may have been often between the parties* in such sort of matters, could not have the same force which the sight and presence of the persons would undoubtedly have. But he added, another thing, which had also greatly retarded this business, was what had happened lately in this kingdom; and during these troubles, proceeding from religion, it could not have been well timed to have spoken with them concerning the said marriage; and that himself and those of his nation had been in great fear in this kingdom, thinking that we wanted to extirpate all those of the said religion. On this, my lady and mother answered him instantly, and in order; that she was certain that the queen his mistress could never like nor value a prince who had not his religion at heart; and whoever would desire to have this otherwise, would be depriving him of what we hold dearest in this world; That he might recollect that my brother had always insisted on the freedom of religion, and that it was the difficulty of its public exercise, which he always insisted on, which had broken off this negotiation: the Duke d'Alençon will be satisfied when this point is agreed, and will hasten over to the queen, persuaded that she will not occasion him the pain and the shame of passing over the seas without happily terminating this affair. In regard to what has occurred these latter days, that he must have seen how it happened by the fault of the chiefs of those who remained here; for when the late admiral was treacherously wounded at Notre Dame, he knew the affliction it threw us unto, (fearful that it might have occasioned great troubles in this kingdom,) and the diligence was used to verify judicially whence it proceeded; and the fabrication was nearly finished, when they were so forgetful to raise a conspiracy, to attempt the lives of myself, my lady and mother, and my brothers, and endanger the whole state; which was the cause, that to avoid this, I was compelled, to my very great regret, to permit what happened in this city; but as he had witnessed, I gave orders to stop, as soon as possible, this fury of the people, to place every one in repose. On this, the Sieur Walsingham replied to my lady and mother, that the exercise of the said religion had been interdicted in this kingdom. To which she also answered, that this had not been done for a good and holy purpose; namely, that the fury of the catholic people might the sooner be allayed, who else had been reminded of the past calamities, and would again have been let loose against those of the said religion, had

* These love-letters of Alençon to our Elizabeth are noticed by Camden, who observes that the queen became wearied by waiting so many, and to put an end to this trouble, she commanded that the young duke should come over, conditionally, that he should not be offended if her suitor should return home they continued to preach in this kingdom. Also should these once more fix on any chiefs, which I will prevent as soon as possible, giving him clearly and pointedly to understand, that what is done here is much the same as what has been done, and is now practised by the queen his mistress in her kingdom. For she permits the exercise of but of one religion, although there are many of her people who are of another; and having also, during her reign, punished those of her subjects whom she found seditious and rebellious. It is true this has been done by the laws, but I indeed could not act in the same manner; for finding myself in such imminent peril, and the conspiracy raised against me and mine, and my kingdom, ready to be executed; I had no time to arraign and try in open justice as much as I wished, but was constrained, to my very great regret, to strike the blow (lascher la main) in what has been done in this city.*

This letter of Charles the Ninth, however, does not here conclude. 'My lady and mother' plainly acquaints the Earl of Worcester and Sir Francis Walsingham that 'her son had never interfered between their mistress and her subjects, and in return expects the same favour; although, by accounts they had received from England, many ships were arming to assist their rebels at Rochelle.' 'My lady and mother' advances another step, and declares that Elizabeth by treaty is bound to assist her son against his rebellious subjects; and they expect, at least, that Elizabeth will not only stop these armaments in all her ports, but exemplarily punish the offenders. I resume the letter.

And on hearing this, the said Walsingham changed colour, and appeared somewhat astonished, as my lady and mother well perceived by his face; and on this, he requested the Count of Worcester to mention the order which he knew the queen his mistress had issued to prevent these people from assisting those of La Rochelle; but that in England, so numerous were the seamen and others who gained their livelihood by maritime affairs, and who would starve without the entire freedom of the seas, that it was impossible to interdict them.*

Charles the Ninth encloses the copy of a letter he had received from London, in part agreeing with an account the ambassador had sent to the king, of an English expedition nearly ready to sail for La Rochelle, to assist his rebellious subjects. He is still further alarmed, that Elizabeth fomented the warreuxes, and assists underhand the discontented. He urges the ambassador to hasten to the queen, to impart these complaints in the most friendly way, as he knows the ambassador can well do, and as, no doubt, Walsingham will have already prepared her to receive. Charles entreates Elizabeth to prove her good faith by deeds and not by words; to act openly on a point which admits of no dissimulation. The best proof of her friendship will be the marriage; and the ambassador, after opening this business to her chief ministers, who the king thinks are desirous of this projected marriage, is then 'to acquaint the queen with what has passed between her ambassadors and myself.'

Such is the first letter on English affairs which Charles the Ninth despatched to his ambassador, after an awful silence of six months, during which time La Motte Feneclon was not admitted into the presence of Elizabeth. The apology for the massacre of St Bartholomew comes from the king himself, and contains several remarkable expressions, which are at least divested of that style of bigotry and exultation we might have expected: on the contrary, this sanguinary and inconsiderate young monarch, as he is represented, writes in a subdued and sorrowing tone, lamenting his hard necessity, regretting he could not have recourse to the laws, and appealing to others for his efforts to check the fury of the people, which he himself had let loose. Catharine de Medicis, who had governed him from the tender age of eleven years, when he ascended the throne, might unquestionably have persuaded him that a conspiracy was on the point of explosion. Charles the Ninth died young, and his character is unfavourably viewed by the historians. In the voluminous correspondence which I have examined, could we judge by state letters of the character of him who subscribes them, we must form a very different notion: they are so prolix and so earnest, that one might conceive they were dictated by the young monarch himself!

PREDICTION.

In a curious treatise on 'Divination,' of the knowledge of future events, Cicero has preserved a complete account of the state-contrivances which were practised by the Roman government, to instil among the people those hopes and fears by which they regulated public opinion. The pagan creed, now become obsolete and ridiculous, has occasioned this treatise to be rarely consulted; it remains, however, as a chapter in the history of man!

To these two books of Cicero on 'Divination' perhaps a third might be added, on political and moral prediction. The principles which may even raise it into a science are self-evident; they are drawn from the heart of man, and they depend on the nature and connexion of human events! We presume we shall demonstrate the positive existence of such a faculty; a faculty which Lord Bacon describes of 'making things future and remote as present.' The aruspex, the augur, and the astrologer, have vanished with their own superstitions; but the moral and the political predictor, proceeding on principles authorized by nature and experience, has become more skillful in his observations on the phenomena of human history; and it has often happened that a tolerable philosopher has not made an indifferent prophet.

No great political or moral revolution has occurred which has not been accompanied by its prognostic; and men of a philosophic cast of mind, in their retirement, freed from the delusions of parties and of sects, at once intelligent in the quiescent agent homines, while they are withdrawn from their conflicting interests, have rarely been confounded by the astonishment which overwhelms those who, absorbed in active life, are the mere creatures of sensation, agitated by the shadows of truth, the unsubstantial appearances of things! Intellectual nations are advancing in an eternal circle of events and passions which succeed each other, and the last is necessarily connected with its antecedent; the solitary force of some fortuitous incident only can interrupt this concatenated progress of human affairs.

That every great event has been accompanied by a presage or prognostic, has been observed by Lord Bacon. 'The shepherds of the people should understand the prognostics of state-tempests; hollow blasts of wind seemingly at a distance, and secret swellings of the sea, often precede a storm.' Such were the prognostics discerned by the politic Bishop Williams in Charles the First's time, who clearly foresaw and predicted the final success of the Puritanic party in our country; attentive to his own security, he abandoned the government and sided with the rising opposition, at a moment when such a change in public affairs was by no means apparent.*

In this spirit of foresight our contemplative antiquary Dugdale must have anticipated the scene which was approaching in 1641, in the destruction of our ancient monuments in cathedral churches. He hurried on his itinerant labours of taking draughts and transcribing inscriptions, as he says, 'to preserve them for future and better times.' Posterity owes to the prescient spirit of Dugdale the ancient Monuments of England, which bear the marks of the haste, as well as the zeal, which have perpetuated them.

Continental writers formerly employed a fortunate expression, when they wished to have an Historia Reformationis ante Reformationem: this history of the Reformation would have commenced at least a century before the Reformation itself! A letter from Cardinal Julian to Pope Eugenius IV, written a century before Luther appeared, clearly predicts the Reformation and its consequences. He observed that the minds of men were ripe for something tragical; he felt the axe striking at the root, and the tree beginning to bend, and that his party, instead of proping it, were hastening its fall.† In England, Sir Thomas More was not less prescient in his views; for when his son Roper was observing to him, that the Catholic religion, under 'the Defender of the Faith,' was in a most flourishing state, the answer of More was an evidence of political foresight, — 'Truth it is, son Roper! and yet I pray God that we may not live to see the day that we would gladly be at league and composition with heretics, to let them have their churches quietly to themselves, so that they would be contented to let us have ours quietly to ourselves.' Whether our great chancellor predicted from a more intimate knowledge of the king's character, or from some private circumstances which may not have been recorded for our information, of which I have an obscure suspicion, remains to be ascertained. The minds of men of great political sagacity were unquestionably at that moment full of obscure indications of the approaching change: Erasmus, when at Canterbury before the tomb of Becket, observing it loaded with a vast profusion of jewels, wished that those had been distributed among the poor, and that the shrine had been only adorned with boughs and flowers; 'For,' said he, 'those who have heaped up all this mass of treasure will one day be plundered, and fall a prey to those who are in power;' — a prediction literally fulfilled about twenty years after it was made. The unknown author of the Visions of Piers Ploughman, who wrote in the reign of Edward the Third, surprised the world by a famous prediction of the fall of the religious houses from the hand of a king. The event was realized two hundred years afterwards, by our Henry the Eighth. The protestant writers have not scrupled to declare, that in this instance he was divine numine afflatus. But moral and political prediction is not inspiration; the one may be wrought out by man; the other descends from God. The same principle which led Erasmus to predict that those who were 'in power' would destroy the rich shrines, because no other class of men in society could mate with so mighty a body as the monks, conducted the author of Piers Ploughman to the same conclusion; and since power only could accomplish that great purpose, he fixed on the highest as the most likely; and thus the wise prediction was, so long after, literally accomplished!

Sir Walter Rawleigh foresaw the future consequences of the separatists and the sectaries in the national church, and the very scene his imagination raised in 1680 has been exhibited, to the letter of his description, two centuries after the prediction! His memorable words are, 'Time will even bring it to pass, if it were not resisted, that God would be turned out of churches into barns, and from thence again into the fields and mountains, and under hedges — all order of discipline and church-government left to weakness of opinion and men's fancies, and as many kinds of religion spring up as there are parish-churches within England.' We are struck by the profound genius of Tacitus, who clearly foresaw the calamities which so long ravaged Europe on the fall of the Roman empire, in a work written five hundred years before the event! In that sublime anticipation of the future, he observed, 'When the Romans shall be hunted out from those countries which they have conquered, what will then happen? The revolted people, freed from their master-oppressor, will not be able to subsist without destroying their neighbours, and the most cruel wars will exist among all these nations.'

We are told that Solon at Athens, contemplating on the port and citadel of Munichia, suddenly exclaimed, 'How blind is man to futurity! Could the Athenians foresee what mischief this will do their city, they would even eat it with their own teeth, to get rid of it!' — a prediction verified more than two hundred years afterwards! Thales desired to be buried in an obscure quarter of Milestia, observing that that very spot would in time be the forum. Charlemagne, in his old age, observing from the window of a castle a Norman descent on his coast, tears started in the eyes of the aged monarch. He predicted, that since they dared to threaten his dominions while he was yet living, what would they do when he should be no more! A melancholy prediction, says De Foix, of their subsequent incursions, and of the protracted calamities of the French nation during a whole century!

There seems to be something in minds, which take in extensive views of human nature, which serves them as a kind of divination, and the consciousness of this faculty has been asserted by some. Cicero appeals to Atticus how he had always judged of the affairs of the Republic as a good diviner; and that its overthrow had happened, as he had foreseen, fourteen years before.* Cicero had not only predicted what happened in his own times, but also what occurred long after, according to the testimony of Cornelius Nepos. The philosopher indeed, affects no secret revelation, nor visionary second-sight; he honestly tells us that this art had been acquired merely by study, and the administration of public affairs, while he reminds his friend of several remarkable instances of his success.

* See Rushworth, vol. i. p. 420. His language was decisive.

editions. 'I do not divine human events by the arts actuated by the augurs; but I use other signs.' Cicero expresses himself with the guarded obscurity of a philosopher who could not openly ridicule the prevailing superstitions; but we perfectly comprehend the nature of his signs; when, in the great pending event of the rival misdeeds of Pompey and of Cæsar, he shows the means as used for his purpose. 'On one side I consider the honour and genius of Cæsar, and on the other the condition and manner of civil wars.*' In a word, the political diviner foretold events by their dependence on general causes, while the moral diviner, by his experience of the personal character, anticipated the actions of the individual. Others, too, have asserted the possession of this faculty. De Vair, a famous chancellor of France, imagined the faculty was intuitive with him: by his own experience he had observed the results of this curious and obscure faculty, and at a time when the history of the human mind was so imperfectly comprehended, it is easy to account for the apparent egotism of this grave and dignified character. 'Born,' says he, 'with constitutional firmity, a mind and body but ill adapted to be laborious, with a most treacherous memory, enjoying no gift of nature, but able at all times to exercise a sagacity so great, that I do not know, since I have reached manhood, that anything of importance has happened to the state, to the public, or to myself in particular, which I had not foreseen.†' This faculty seems to be described by a remarkable expression employed by Thucydides, in his character of Themistocles, of which the following is given as a close translation. 'By a species of sagacity peculiarly his own, for which he was in no degree indebted either to early education or after study, he was supereminently happy in forming a prompt judgment in matters that admitted but little time for deliberation; at the same time that he far surpassed all in his deductions of the future from the past; or was the most guesser of the future from the past.‡' Should this faculty of moral and political prediction be ever considered as a science, we can even furnish it with a denomination; or the writer of the life of Sir Thomas Brown, prefixed to his works, is claiming the honour of it for that philosopher, calls it 'the Stochastic,' a term derived from the Greek word from archery, meaning, 'to shoot at a mark.' This eminent genius, it seems, often 'hit the white.' Our biographer declares, that 'though he were no prophet, yet in that faculty which comes nearest to it he excelled, i. e. the Stochastic, wherein he was seldom mistaken as to future events, as well public as private.

We are not, indeed, inculcating the fanciful elements of an occult art: we know whence its principles may be drawn, and we may observe how it was practised by the wisest among the ancients. Aristotle, who collected all the curious knowledge of his times, has preserved some remarkable opinions on the art of divination. In detailing the various subterfuges practised by the pretended diviners of his day, he reveals the secret principles by which one of them regulated his predictions. He frankly declared that he future being always very obscure, while the past was easy to know, his predictions had never the future in view; or he decided from the past as it appeared in human affairs, which, however, he concealed from the multitude.§ Such is the true principle by which a philosophical historian may become a skilful diviner.

Human affairs make themselves; they grow out of one another, with slight variations; and thus it is that they usually happen as they have happened. The necessary dependence of effects on causes, and the similarity of human interests and human passions, are confirmed by comparative parallels with the past. The philosophic sage of holy writ truly deduced the important principle, that the thing that hath been is that which shall be.¶ The real facts of history, deadened by the touch of chronological antiquarianism, are restored to animation when we comprehend the principles which necessarily terminate in certain results, and discover the characters among mankind who are the usual actors in these scenes. The heart of man beats on the same eternal springs; and whether he advances or retrogrades, he cannot escape out of the march of human thought. Hence, in the most extraordinary revolutions, we discover that the time and the place only have changed; for even when events are not strictly parallel, we detect the same conducting principles. Scipio Ammirato, one of the great Italian historians, in his curious discourses on Tacitus, intermingles ancient examples with the modern; that, he says, all may see how the truth of things is not altered by the changes and diversities of time. Machiavel drew his illustrations of modern history from the ancient.

When the French revolution recalled our attention to a similar eventful period in our own history, the neglected volumes which preserved the public and private history of our Charles the First and Cromwell were collected with eager curiosity. Often the scene existing before us, even the very personages themselves, opened on us in these forgotten pages. But as the annals of human nature did not commence with those of Charles the First, we took a still more retrograde step, and it was discovered in this wider range, that in the various governments of Greece and Rome, the events of those times had been only reproduced. Among them the same principles had terminated in the same results, and the same personages had figured in the same drama. This strikingly appeared in a little curious volume, entitled, 'Essai sur l'Histoire de la Revolution Française, par une Société d'Auteurs Latins,' published at Paris in 1801. The 'Society of Latin Authors,' who so imitatively have written the history of the French revolution, consists of the Roman historians themselves! By extracts ingeniously applied, the events of that melancholy period are so appositely described, indeed so minutely narrated, that they will not fail to surprise those who are not accustomed to detect the perpetual parallels which we meet with in philosophical history.

Many of these cruises in history are close resemblances of each other. Compare the history of 'The League' in France with that of our own civil wars. We are struck by the similar occurrences performed by the same political characters who played their part on both those great theatres of human action. A satirical royalist of those times has commemorated the motives, the incidents, and the personages in the 'Saire Menippée de la Vertu du Catholicon d'Espagne;' and this famous 'Saire Menippée,' is a perfect Hudibras in prose! The writer discovers all the bitter ridicule of Butler in his ludicrous and severe exhibition of the 'Etats de Paris,' while the artist who designed the satirical prints becomes no contemptible Hogarth. So much are these public events alike in their general spirit and termination, that they have afforded the subject of a printed but unpublished volume, entitled 'Essai sur les Révolutions.*' The whole work was modelled on this principle. 'It would be possible,' says the eloquent writer, 'to frame a table or chart in which all the given imaginable events of the history of a people would be reduced to a mathematical exactness.' The conception is fanciful, but its foundation lies deep in truth.

A remarkable illustration of the secret principle divulged by Aristotle, and described by Thucydides, appears in the recent confession of a man of genius among ourselves. When Mr Coleridge was a political writer in the Morning Post and the Courier, at a period of darkness and utter confusion, that writer was then conducted by a tract of light not revealed to ordinary journalists, on the Napoleonic empire. 'Of that despotism in masquerade' he decided by 'the state of Rome under the first Cæsars;' and of the Spanish American Revolution, by taking the war of the united provinces with Philip II, as the ground work of the comparison. 'On every great occurrence,' he says, 'I endeavoured to discover, in past history, the event that most nearly resembled it. I procured the contemporary historians, memorialists, and pamphleteers. Then fairly subtracting the points of difference from those of likeness, as the balance favoured the former or the latter, I conjectured that the result would be the same or different. In the essays "On the probable final Restoration of the Bourbons," I feel myself authorized to affirm, by the effect produced on many intelligent men, that were the dates wanting, it might have been suspected that the essays had been written within the last twelve months.*

In moral predictions on individuals, many have discovered the future character. The revolutionary character of Cardinal de Retz, even in his youth, was detected by the sagacity of Mazarine. He then wrote the history of the conspiracy of Fiesco with such vehement admiration of his hero, that the Italian politician, after its perusal, predicted that the young author would be one of the most turbulent spirits of the age! The father of Marshal Biron, even amid the glory of his son, discovered the cloud which, inevitable to others, was to obscure it. The father, indeed, well knew the fiery passions of his son. 'Biron,' said the domestic seer, 'I advise thee, when peace takes place, to go and plant cabbages in thy garden, otherwise I warn thee, thou wilt lose thy head on a scaffold!' Lorenzo de Medici had studied the temper of his son Piero; for Guicciardini informs us, that he had often complained to his most intimate friends, that 'he foresaw the imprudence and arrogance of his son would occasion the ruin of his family.' There is a remarkable prediction of James the First, of the evils likely to ensue from Laud's violence, in a conversation given by Hacket, which the king held with Archbishop Williams. When the king was hard pressed to promote Laud, he gave his reasons why he intended to 'keep Laud back from all place of rule and authority, because I find he hath a restless spirit, and cannot see when matters are well, but loves to toss and change, and to bring things to a pitch of reformation floating in his own brain, which endangers the steadfastness of that which is in a good pass: I speak not at random; he hath made himself known to me to be such an one.' James then gives the circumstances to which he alludes; and at length, when, still pursued by the archbishop, then the organ of Buckingham, as usual, this king's good-nature too easily yielded; he did not, however, without closing with this prediction: 'Then take him to you—but, on my soul, you will repent it!' The future character of Cromwell was apparent to two of our great politicians. 'This coarse unpromising man,' said Lord Falkland, pointing to Cromwell, 'will be the first person in the kingdom, if the nation comes to blows!' And Archbishop Williams told Charles the First confidentially, that 'There was that in Cromwell which foreboded something dangerous, and wished his majesty would either win him over to him, or get him taken off.' The Marquis of Wellesley's incomparable character of Buonaparte predicted his fall when highest in his glory; that great statesman then poured forth the sublime language of philosophical prophecy. 'His eagerness of power is so inordinate; his jealousy of independence so ferocious; his keenness of appetite so feverish in all that touches his ambition, even in the most trifling things, that he must plunge into dreadful difficulties. He is one of an order of minds that by nature make for themselves great reverses.'

Lord Mansfield was once asked, after the commencement of the French revolution, when it would end? His lordship replied, 'It is an event without precedent, and therefore without prognostic.' The truth, however, is, that it had both. Our own history had furnished a precedent in the times of Charles the First. And the prognostics were so redundant, that a volume might be collected of passages from various writers who had predicted it. However ingenious might be a history of the Reformation before it occurred, the evidence could not be more authentic and positive than that of the great moral and political revolution which we have witnessed in our own days.

A prediction, which Bishop Butler threw out in a sermon before the House of Lords, in 1741, does honour to his political sagacity, as well as to his knowledge of human nature; he calculated that the irreligious spirit would produce, some time or other, political disorders, similar to those which, in the seventeenth century, had arisen from religious fanaticism. 'Is there no danger,' he observed, 'that all this may raise somewhat like that levelling spirit, upon atheistical principles, which in the last age prevailed upon enthusiastic ones? Not to speak of the possibility that different sorts of people may unite in it upon those contrary principles?' All this literally has been accomplished! Leibnitz, indeed, foresaw the results of those selfish, and at length demoralizing, opinions, which began to prevail through Europe in his day. These disorganizing principles, conducted by a political sect, who tried 'to be worse than they could be,' as old Montaigne expresses it; a sort of men who have been audaciously congratulated as 'having a taste for evil,' exhibited to the astonished world the dismal catastrophe the philosopher had predicted. I shall give this remarkable passage. 'I find that certain opinions approaching those of Epicurus and Epicurus, are, little by little, insinuating themselves into the minds of the great rulers of public affairs, who serve as the guides of others, and on whom all matters depend; besides, these opinions are also sliding into fashionable books, and thus they are preparing all things to that general revolution which menaces Europe; destroying those generous sentiments of the ancients, Greek and Roman, which preferred the love of country and public good, and the care of posterity, to fortune and even to life. Our public spirit,' as the English call them, excessively diminish, and are more in fashion, and will be still less while the latest vices of these men preserve only one principle, which they call honour; a principle which only keeps them from doing what they deem a low action, while they openly laugh at the love of country—ridicule those who are zealous for public ends—and when a well-intentioned man asks what will become of their posterity? they reply, "Then, as now!" But it may happen to these persons themselves to have to endure those evils which they believe are reserved for others. If this epidemical and intellectual disorder could be corrected, whose bad effects are already visible, these evils might still be prevented; but if it proceeds in its growth, Providence will correct man by the very revolution which must spring from it. Whatever may happen indeed, all must turn out as usual, for the best in general at the end of the account, although this cannot happen without the punishment of those who contribute even to the general good by their evil actions.' The most superficial reader will hardly require a commentary on this very remarkable passage; he must instantly perceive how Leibnitz, in the seventeenth century, foresaw what has occurred in the eighteenth; and the prediction has been verified in the history of the actors in the late revolution, while the result, which we have not perhaps yet had, according to Leibnitz's own exhilarating system of optimism, is a solution of good from evil.

A great genius, who was oppressed by malignant rheumatism in his own times, has been noticed by Madame de Staël as having left behind him an actual prophecy of the French revolution; this was Guibert, who, in his commentary on Folard's Polybius, published in 1727, declared, that 'a conspiracy is actually forming in Europe, by means at once so subtle and efficacious, that I am sorry not to have come into the world thirty years later to witness its result. It must be confessed that the sovereigns of Europe were very bad spectacles. The proofs of it are mathematical, if such proofs ever were, of a conspiracy.' Guibert unquestionably foresaw the anti-monarchical spirit gathering up its mighty wings, and rising over the universe; he could not judge of the nature of the impulse which he predicted; prophesying from the ideas in his luminous intellect, he seems to have been far more curious about, than certain of the consequences. Rousseau even circumstantially predicted the convulsions of modern Europe. He stood on the crisis of the French revolution, which he vividly foresaw, for he seriously advised the higher classes of society to have their children taught some useful trade; a notion highly ridiculed on the first appearance of the Emile; but at its hour the awful truth struck! He, too, foresaw the horrors of that revolution; for he announced that Emile designed to emigrate, because, from the moral state of the people, a virtuous revolution had become impossible.† The eloquence of Burke was often accurate; and

* Public spirit, and public spiritus, were about the year 1740 household words with us. Leibnitz was struck by their dissimilarity, but it might now puzzle us to find synonyms, or even to explain the very terms themselves.

† This extraordinary passage is at the close of the third book of Emile, to which I must refer the reader. It is curious, however, to observe, that in 1760 Rousseau poured forth the following awful predictions, which were considered quite as surd. 'Vous vous fiez à l'ordre actuel de la société sans songer que cet ordre est sujet à des révolutions inévitables; le grand devient petit, le riche devient pauvre, le puissant devient sujet—nous approchons l'état de crise et du schisme des révolutions. Que fera donc dans la bascule ce monde qui se vult n'être élevé que pour la grandeur? Que fera ce pauvre qui se publicit; qui ne peut vivre que d'un? Que fera ce pauvre de tout, ce fatigué imbécille qui ne sait point de lui-même? &c. &c.

speech of Pitt, in 1800, painted the state of Europe as was only realized fifteen years afterwards.

But many remarkable predictions have turned out to be true. Whenever the facts on which the prediction is raised are altered in their situation, what was relatively true ceases to operate as a general principle. For instance, to strike striking anticipation which Rousseau formed of the French revolution, he added, by way of note, as remarkable a prediction on MONARCHY. Je tiens pour impossible que les grandes monarchies de l'Europe aient encore long me à durer; toutes ont brillé, et tout est qui brille est sur sa déclin. The predominant anti-monarchical spirit among the rising generation seems to hasten on the accomplishment of the prophecy; but if an important alteration has occurred in the nature of things, we may question the result. If by looking into the past, Rousseau found facts which sufficiently proved that nations in the height of their splendour and corruption had closed their career by falling a easy conquest to barbarous invaders, who annihilated the most polished people at a single blow; we now find that no such power any longer exists in the great family of Europe: the state of the question is therefore changed. It is now how corrupt nations will act against corrupt nations equally enlightened? But if the citizen of Geneva drew his prediction of the extinction of monarchy in Europe from that predilection for democracy which assumes that a republic must necessarily produce more happiness to the people than a monarchy, then we say that he fatal experiment was again repeated since the prediction, and the fact proved not true! The very excess of democracy inevitably terminates in a monarchical state; and were all the monarchies in Europe republics, a philosopher might safely predict the restoration of monarchy!

If a prediction be raised on facts which our own prejudices induce us to infer will exist, it must be chimerical. We have an universal Chronicle of the Monk Carion, dated in 1652, in which he announces that the world was about ending, as well as his chronicle of it; that the Turkish empire would not last many years; that after the death of Charles the Fifth the empire of Germany would be torn to pieces by the Germans themselves. This monk will no longer pass for a prophet; he belongs to that class of historians who write to humour their own prejudices, like a certain lady-prophetess, who, in 1811, predicted that grass was to grow in Cheapside about this time! The monk Carion, like others of greater name, had miscalculated the weeks of Daniel, and wished more ill to be Mahomedans than suit the Christian cabinets of Europe to inflict on them; and, lastly, the monastic historian had no notion that it would please Providence to prosper the heresy of Luther! Sir James Macintosh once beavered, 'I am sensible, that in the field of political prediction, veteran sagacity has often been deceived.' Sir James alluded to the memorable example of Harrington, who published a demonstration of the impossibility of re-establishing monarchy in England six months before the restoration of Charles the Second. But the author of the book was a political fanatic, who ventured to predict an event, not by other similar events, but by a theoretical principle which he had formed, that 'the balance of power depends on that of property.' Harrington, in his abstracted view of human nature, had dropped out of his speculation all the stirring passions of ambition and party, and the vacillations of the multitude. A similar error of a great genius occurs in De Foe. 'Child,' says Mr George Balmers, 'foreseeing from experience that men's conduct must finally be decided by their principles, foretold a colonial result. De Foe, allowing his prejudices to obscure his sagacity, reproached that suggestion, because he seemed interested a more strenuous promoter than enthusiasm.' The predictions of Harrington and De Foe are scarcely such as we might expect from a petty calculator—political economist, who can see nothing farther than immediate results; but the true philosophical predictor was Child, who had read the past. It is probable that the American emancipation from the mother-country of England was foreseen, twenty or thirty years before it occurred, though not perhaps by the administration. Lord Orford, rising in 1784 under the ministry of the Duke of Newcastle, blames 'The instructions to the governor of New York, which seemed better calculated for the latitude of Mexico, and for a Spanish tribunal, than for a free British settlement, and in such opulence and such haughtiness, but suspicious had long been conceived of their meditating a throw off the dependence on their mother country.' If this was written at the time, as the author asserts, it is a very remarkable passage, observes the noble editor of his memoirs. The prognostics or presages of this revolution; it may now be difficult to recover; but it is evident that Child before the time when Lord Orford wrote this passage predicted the separation on true and philosophical principles.

Even when the event does not always justify the prediction, the predictor may not have been the less correct in his principles of divination. The catastrophe of human life, and the turn of great events, often prove accidental. Marshal Biron, whom we have noticed, might have ascended the throne instead of the scaffold; Cromwell and De Retz might have become only the favourite general, or the minister of their sovereigns. Fortuitous events are not comprehended in the reach of human prescience; such must be assigned to those vulgar superstitions which presume to discover the issue of human events, without pretending to any human knowledge. There is nothing supernatural in the prescience of the philosopher.

Sometimes predictions have been condemned as false ones, which, when scrutinized, we can scarcely deem to have failed: they may have been accomplished, and they may again revolve on us. In 1749, Dr Hartley published his 'Observations on Man'; and predicted the fall of the existing governments and hierarchies in two simple propositions; among others—

PAOR. 81. It is probable that all the civil governments will be overturned.

PAOR. 82. It is probable that the present forms of church-government will be dissolved.

Many were alarmed at these predicted falls of church and state. Lady Charlotte Wentworth asked Hartley when these terrible things would happen? The answer of the predictor was not less awful; 'I am an old man, and shall not live to see them; but you are a young woman, and probably will see them.' In the subsequent revolutions of America and of France, and perhaps now of Spain, we can hardly deny that these predictions had failed. A fortuitous event has once more thrown back Europe into its old corners; but we still revolve in a circle, and what is now dark and remote may again come round, when time has performed its great cycle. There was a prophetic passage in Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity, regarding the church, which long occupied the speculations of its expounders. Hooker indeed seemed to have done what no predictor of human events should do! he fixed on the period of its accomplishment. In 1597, he declared that it would 'peradventure fall out to be three-score and ten years, or if strength do awe, into four score.' Those who had outlived the revolution in 1841, when the long parliament pulled down the ecclesiastical establishment, and sold the church-lands,—a circumstance which Hooker had contemplated—and were afterwards returned to their places on the Restoration, imagined that the prediction had not yet been completed and were looking with great anxiety towards the year 1677, for the close of this extraordinary prediction! When Bishop Barlow, in 1676, was consulted on it, he endeavoured to dissipate the panic, by referring to an old historian, who had reproached our nation for their proneness to prophecies! The prediction of the venerable Hooker in truth had been fully accomplished, and the event had occurred without Bishop Barlow having recurred to it; so easy it seems to forget what we dislike to remember! The period of time was too literally taken and seems to have been only the figurative expression of man's age in scriptural language, which Hooker had employed; but no one will now deny that this prescient sage had profoundly foreseen the results of that rising party, whose designs on church and state were clearly depicted in his own luminous view.

The philosophical predictor in foretelling a crisis, from the appearances of things, will not rashly assign the period of time; for the crisis which he anticipates is calculated on by that inevitable march of events which generate each other in human affairs; but the period is always dubious, being either retarded or accelerated by circumstances of a nature incapable of entering into this moral arithmetic. It is probable, that revolution, similar to that of France, would have occurred in this country, had it not been counteracted by the genius of Pitt. In 1818, it was easy to foretell, by the political prognostics, that a mighty war throughout Europe must necessarily occur. At that moment, observes Bayle, the house of Austria aimed at an universal monarchy; the consequent domineering spirit of the ministers of the Emperor and the king of Spain, combined with their determination to exterminate the new religions, excited a re-action to this imperial despotism; public opinion had been suppressed, till every people grew impatient: while their sovereigns, influenced by national feeling, were combining against Austria. But Austria was a vast military power, and her generals were the first of their class. The efforts of Europe would then be often repulsed! This state of affairs prognosticated a long war—and when at length it broke out, it lasted thirty years! The approach and the duration of the war might have been predicted: but the period of its termination could not have been foreseen.

There is, however, a spirit of political vaticination which presumes to pass beyond the boundaries of human prescience; it has been often ascribed to the highest source of inspiration by enthusiasts; but since 'the language of prophecy' has ceased, such pretensions are not less impious than they are unphilosophical. Knox the reformer possessed an extraordinary portion of this awful prophetic confidence: he appears to have predicted several remarkable events, and the fates of some persons. We are told, that, condemned to a galley at Rochelle, he predicted that 'within two or three years, he should preach the gospel at Saint Giles's in Edinburgh': an improbable event, which happened. Of Mary and Darnley, he pronounced, that 'as the king, for the queen's pleasure, had gone to mass, the Lord, in his justice, would make her the instrument of his overthrow.' Other striking predictions of the deaths of Thomas Maitland, and of Kirkaldy of Grange, and the warning he solemnly gave to the Regent Murray not to go to Linlithgow, where he was assassinated, occasioned a barbarous people to imagine that the prophet Knox had received an immediate communication from Heaven. A Spanish friar and almanac-maker, predicted in clear and precise words, the death of Henry the Fourth of France: and Piersce, though he had no faith in the vain science of astrology, yet, alarmed at whatever menaced the life of a beloved monarch, consulted with some of the king's friends, and had the Spanish almanac laid before his majesty. That high-spirited monarch thanked them for their solicitude, but utterly slighted the prediction; the event occurred, and in the following year the Spanish friar spread his own fame in a new almanac. I have been occasionally struck at the Jeremiahs of honest George Withers, the vaticinating poet of our civil wars: some of his works afford many solemn predictions. We may account for many predictions of this class, without the intervention of any supernatural agency. Among the busy spirits of a revolutionary age, the heads of a party, such as Knox, have frequently secret communications with spies or with friends. In a constant source of concealed information, a shrewd, confident and enthusiastic temper will find ample matter for mysterious prescience. Knox exercised that deep sagacity which took in the most enlarged views of the future, as appears by his Machiavelian foresight on the barbarous destruction of the monasteries and the cathedrals.—The best way to keep the rocks from returning, is to pull down their nests? In the case of the prediction of the death of Henry the Fourth, by the Spanish friar, it resulted either from his being acquainted with the plot, or from his being made an instrument for their purpose by those who were. It appears that rumours of Henry's assassination were rife in Spain and Italy, before the event occurred. Such vaticinators as George Withers will always rise in those disturbed times which his own prosaic metre has forcibly depicted.

It may be on that darkness, which they find Within their hearts, a sudden light hath shin'd,
Making reflections of some things to come,
Which leave within them musings troublesome
To their weak spirits; or too intricate
For them to put in order, and relate.
They act as men in ecstasies have done—
Striving their cloudy visions to declare—
And I, perhaps, among these may be one
That was too loose for service to be done:
I blunder out what worldly-prudent men
Count madness.—F. 7.*

Separating human prediction from inspired prophecy, we only ascribe to the faculties of man that acquired prescience which we have demonstrated that some great minds have unquestionably exercised. We have discovered its principles in the necessary dependence of actions on general causes, and we have shown that, impelled by the same motives, and circumscribed by the same passions, all human affairs revolve in a circle; and we have opened the true source of this yet imperfect science of moral and political prediction, in an intimate, but a diminutive, knowledge of the past.

Authority is sacred, when experience affords parallels and analogies. If much which may overwhelm when it shall happen, can be foreseen, the precient statesman and moralist may provide defensive measures to break its waters, whose streams they cannot always direct; and venerable Hooker has profoundly observed, that 'the best things have been overthrown, not so much by puissance and might of adversaries, as through defect of counsel in those that should have upheld and defended the same.'

The philosophy of history blends the past with the present, and combines the present with the future; each is but a portion of the other! The actual state of a thing is necessarily determined by its antecedent, and thus progressively through the chain of human existence; while 'the present is always full of the future,' as Leibnitz has happily expressed the idea.

A new and beautiful light is thus thrown over the annals of mankind, by the analogies and the parallels of different ages in succession. How the seventeenth century has influenced the eighteenth; and the results of the eighteenth as they shall appear in the twentieth, might open a source of predictions, to which, however difficult it might be to affix their dates, there would be none in exploring into causes, and tracing their inevitable effects.

The multitude live only among the shadows of things in the appearances of the present; the learned, based with the past, can only trace whence, and how, all comes; but he, who is one of the people and one of the learned, the true philosopher, views the natural tendency and terminations which are preparing for the future!

DREAMS AT THE DAWN OF PHILOSOPHY.

Modern philosophy, theoretical or experimental, only amuses while the action of discovery is suspended or advances: the interest ceases with the inquirer when the catastrophe is ascertained, as in the romance whose denouement turns on a mysterious incident, which, once unfolded, all future agitation ceases. But in the true infancy of Science, philosophers were as an imaginative race as poets: marvels and portents, undemonstrable and undefinable, with occult fancies, perpetually beginning and never ending, were delightful as the shifting castles of Ariosto. Then science entranced the eye by its theurgy: when they looked through an optic tube, they believed they were looking into futurity; or, starting at some shadow darkening the glassy globe, beheld the absent person; while the mechanical inventions of art were toys and tricks, with sometimes an automaton, which frightened them with life.

The earlier votaries of modern philosophy only witnessed, as Gaffarel calls his collection, 'Unheard-of Curiosities.' This state of the marvellous, of which we are now forever deprived, prevailed among the philosophers and the virtuosi in Europe, and with ourselves, long after the establishment of the Royal Society. Philosophy then depended mainly on authority—a single one however was sufficient: so that when this had been repeated by fifty others, they had the authority of fifty honest men—whatever the first man might have been! They were then a blissful race of children, rambling here and there in a golden age of innocence and ignorance, where at every step each gifted discoverer whispered to the few, some half-concealed secret of nature, or played with some toy of art; some invention which with great difficulty performed what, without it, might have been done with great

* Hooker wrote this about 1600, and he wrote before the Bible des Révolutions had begun, even among ourselves. He penetrated into this important principle merely by the force of his own meditation. At this moment, after more practical experience in political revolutions, a very intelligent French writer in a pamphlet, entitled 'M. de Villele,' says 'Experience proclaims a great truth—namely, that revolutions themselves cannot succeed, except when they are favoured by a portion of the Government.' He illustrates the axiom by the different revolutions which have occurred in his nation within these thirty years. It is the same truth traced to its source by another road.

use. The cabinets of the lovers of mechanical arts were enchanted apartments, where the admirers feared to stir or look about them; while the philosophers themselves half imagined they were the very thaumaturgi, for which the world gave them too much credit, at least for their quiet! Would we run after the shadows in this dreaming land of moonshine, or sport with these children in the fresh morning of science, ere Aurora had scarcely crept on the hills, we must enter into their feelings, view with their eyes, and believe all they confide to us; and so for our own dreaming. They are the fairy tales and the Arabian nights' entertainments of Science. But if he reader is stubbornly mathematical and logical, he will be holding up a great torch against the muslin curtain, upon which the fantastic shadows playing upon it must vanish at the instant. It is an amusement which can only take place by carefully keeping himself in the art.

What a subject, were I to enter on it, would be the narratives of magical writers! These precious volumes have been so constantly wasted by the profane, that now a book of real magic requires some to find it, as well as a magician to use it. Albertus Magnus, or Albert the Great, as he is erroneously styled—for this sage only derived thisivable epithet from his surname De Groot, as did Hugo Iroitus—this sage, in his 'Admirable Secrets' delivers an opinion that these books of magic should be most precious preserved; for, he prophetically added, the time is riving when they would be understood! It seems they were not intelligible in the thirteenth century; but, if Albertus has not miscalculated, in the present day they may be! Magical terms with talismanic figures may yet conceal many a secret; gunpowder came down to us in a sort of anagram, and the kaleidoscope, with all its terminable substitutions of forms, lay at hand, for two centuries, in l'apostrophe of the 'Natural Magic.' The abbot Trithemius, in a confidential letter, happened to call himself a magician, perhaps at the moment he thought himself one, and sent three or four leaves stuffed with the names of devils, and with their evocations. At the death of his friend these leaves fell into the unwary hands of the prior, who was so frightened on the first glance at the diabolical nomenclature, that he raised the country against the abbot, and Trithemius was nearly a lost man! Yet, for all this, this evocation of devils has reached us in his Steganographia, and proves to be only one of this ingenious abbot's polygraphic attempts at secret writing; for he had flattered himself that he had invented a mode of concealing his thoughts from all the world, while he communicated them to a friend. Roger Bacon promised to use thunder and lightning, and disperse clouds, by directing them into rain. The first magical process has been obtained by Franklin; and the other, of far more use to our agriculturists, may perchance be found lurking in some corner which has been overlooked in the 'Opus magus' of our 'Doctor mirabilis.' Do we laugh at their magical works of art? Are we ourselves such indifferent artists? Cornelius Agrippa, before he wrote his 'Vanity of the Arts and Sciences,' intended to reduce into a system and method the secret of communicating with spirits and demons. On good authority, that of Porphyrius, Pselmus, Plotinus, Jamblicus—and on better, were it necessary to allege it—he was well assured that the upper regions of the air swarm with what the Greeks called dæmones, not as our lower atmosphere is full of birds, our waters of fish, and our earth of insects. Yet this occult philosopher, who knew perfectly eight languages, and married two wives, with whom he had never exchanged a harsh word any of them, was every where avoided as having by his side, for his companion, a personage no less than a demon! This was a great black dog whom he suffered to stretch himself out among his magical manuscripts, or lie on his side, often kissing and patting him, and feeding him on choice morsels. Yet for this would Paulus Jovius and all his world have had him put to the ordeal of fire and fagot! The truth was afterwards boldly asserted by Wierus, in learned domestic, who believed that his master's dog was really nothing more than what he appeared! 'I believe,' says he, 'that he was a real natural dog; he was indeed black, but of a moderate size, and I have often led him by a string, and called him by the French name Agrippa had given him, Monsieur! and he had a female who was called Mademoiselle! I wonder how authors of such great character should write so absurdly on his vanishing at his death, nobody knows how! But as it is probable that Monsieur and Mademoiselle must have generated some puppy demons, Wierus ought to have been more circumstantial.

Albertus Magnus, for thirty years, had never ceased working at a man of brass, and had cast together the qualities of his materials under certain constellations, which threw such a spirit into his man of brass, that it was reported his growth was visible; his feet, legs, thighs, shoulders, neck, and head, expanded, and made the city of Cologne uneasy at possessing one citizen too mighty for them all. This man of brass, when he reached his maturity, was so loquacious, that Albert's master, the great scholastic Thomas Aquinas, one day, tired of his babble, and declaring it was a devil, or devilish, with his staff knocked the head off; and, what was extraordinary, this brazen man, like any human being thus effectually silenced, 'word never spoke more.' This incident is equally historical and authentic; though whether heads of brass can speak, and even prophecy, was indeed a subject of profound inquiry, even at a later period. Naudef, who never questioned their vocal powers, and yet was puzzled concerning the nature of this new species of animal, has no doubt most judiciously stated the question, whether these speaking brazen heads had a sensitive and reasoning nature, or whether demons spoke in them? But brass has not the faculty of providing its own nourishment, as we see in plants, and therefore they were not sensitive; and as for the act of reasoning, these brazen heads presumed to know nothing but the future: with the past and the present they seemed totally unacquainted, so that their memory and their observation were very limited; and as for the future, that is always doubtful and obscure—even to heads of brass! This learned man then infers, that 'These brazen heads could have no reasoning faculties, for nothing altered their nature; they said what they had to say, which no one could contradict; and having said their say, you might have broken the head for any thing more that you could have got out of it. Had they had any life in them, would they not have moved, as well as spoken? Life itself is but motion, but they had no lungs, no spleen; and, in fact, though they spoke, they had no tongue. Was a devil in them? I think not. Yet why should men have taken all this trouble to make, not a man, but a trumpet?'

Our profound philosopher was right not to agitate the question whether these brazen heads had ever spoken? Why should not a man of brass speak, since a doll can whisper, a statue play chess, and brass ducks have performed the whole process of digestion? Another magical invention has been ridiculed with equal reason. A magician was annoyed, as philosophers still are, by passengers in the street; and he, particularly so, by having horses led to drink under his window. He made a magical horse of wood, according to one of the books of Hermes, which perfectly answered its purpose, frightening away the horses, or rather the grooms! the wooden horse, no doubt, gave some palpable kick. The same magical story might have been told of Dr Franklin, who finding that under his window the passengers had discovered a spot which they made too convenient for themselves, he charged it with his newly discovered electrical fire. After a few remarkable incidents had occurred, which at a former period had lodged the great discoverer of electricity in the Inquisition, the modern magician succeeded just as well as the ancient, who had the advantage of conning over the books of Hermes. Instead of ridiculing these works of magic, let us rather become magicians ourselves!

The works of the ancient alchemists have afforded numberless discoveries to modern chemists; nor is even their grand operation despaired of. If they have of late not been so renowned, this has arisen from a want of what Ahmole calls 'apertness,' a qualification early inculcated among these illuminated sages. We find authentic accounts of some who have lived three centuries, with tolerable complexions, possessed of nothing but a crucible and a bellows! but they were so unnecessarily mysterious, that whenever such a person was discovered, he was sure in an instant to disappear, and was never afterwards heard of.

In the 'Liber Patris Sapientie' this selfish cautiousness is all along impressed on the student, for the accomplishment of the great mystery. In the commentary on this precious work of the alchemist Norton who counsels,

'Be thou in a place secret, by thyself alone,
That no man see or hear what thou shalt say or do.
Trust not thy friend too much whereoe'er thou go,
For he thou trustest best, sometime may be thy foe.'

Ashmole observes, that 'Norton gives exceeding good advice to the student in this science where he bids him be secret in the carrying on of his studies and operations, and not to let any one know of his undertakings but his good angel and himself; and such a close and retired breast had Norton's master, who,

'When men disputed of colours of the rose,
He would not speak, but kept himself full close!'

We regret that by each leaving all his knowledge to 'his good angel and himself,' it has happened that 'the good angels,' have kept it all to themselves!

It cannot, however, be denied, that if they could not always extract gold out of lead, they sometimes succeeded in washing away the pimples on ladies' faces, notwithstanding that Sir Kenelm Digby poisoned his most beautiful lady, because, as Sancho would have said, he was one of those who would 'have his bread whiter than the finest wheaten.' Van Helmont, who could not succeed in discovering the true elixir of life, however hit on the spirit of hartshorn, which for a good while he considered was the wonderful elixir itself, restoring to life persons who seemed to have lost it. And though this delightful enthusiast could not raise a ghost, yet he thought he had; for he raised something aerial from spa-water, which mistaking for a ghost, he gave it that very name; a name which we still retain in gas, from the German geist, or ghost! Paracelsus carried the tiny spirits about him in the hilt of his great sword! Having first discovered the qualities of laudanum, this illustrious quack made use of it as an universal remedy; and distributed, in the form of pills, which he carried in the basket-hilt of his sword; the operations he performed were as rapid as they seemed magical. Doubtless we have lost some inconceivable secrets by some unexpected occurrences, which the secret itself, it would seem, ought to have prevented taking place. When a philosopher had discovered the art of prolonging life to an indefinite period, it is most provoking to find that he should have allowed himself to die at an early age! We have a very authentic history from Sir Kenelm Digby himself, that when he went in disguise to visit Descartes at his retirement at Egmond, lamenting the brevity of life, which hindered philosophers getting on in their studies, the French philosopher assured him that 'he had considered that matter; to render a man immortal was what he could not promise, but that he was very sure it was possible to lengthen out his life to the period of the patriarchs.' And when his death was announced to the world, the abbé Picot, an ardent disciple, for a long time would not believe it possible; and at length insisted, that if it had occurred, it must have been owing to some mistake of the philosophers.

The late Holcroft, Louthborough, and Cosway, imagined that they should escape the vulgar era of scriptural life by reorganizing their old bones, and moistening their dry marrow; their new principles of vitality were supposed by them to be found in the powers of the mind; this seemed more reasonable, but proved to be as little efficacious as those other philosophers who imagine they have detected the hidden principle of life in the eels frisking in vinegar, and allude to 'the book-binder who creates the book-worm!'

Paracelsus has revealed to us one of the grandest secrets of nature. When the world began to dispute on the very existence of the elementary folk, it was then that he boldly offered to give birth to a fairy, and has sent down to posterity the recipe. He describes the impurity which is to be transmuted into such purity, the gross elements of a delicate fairy, which, fixed in a phial, placed in fuming dung, will in due time settle into a full-grown fairy, bursting through its vitreous prison—on the vivifying principle by which the ancient Egyptians hatched their eggs in ovens. I recollect at Dr Farmer's sale the leaf which preserved this recipe for making a fairy, forcibly folded down by the learned commentator; from which we must infer the credit he gave to the experiment. There was a greatness of mind in Paracelsus, who, having furnished a recipe to make a fairy, had the delicacy to refrain from it. Even Baptista Porta, one of the most enlightened philosophers, does not deny the possibility of engendering creatures, which 'at their full growth shall not exceed the size of a mouse;' but he adds 'they are only pretty little dogs to play with.' Were these akin to the fairy, a Paracelsus?

They were well convinced of the existence of such elemental beings; frequent accidents in mines showed the potency of the metallic spirits; which so tormented the workmen in some of the German mines, by blindness, giddiness, and sudden sickness, that they have been obliged to abandon mines well known to be rich in silver. A metallic spirit at one sweep annihilated twelve men, who were all found dead together. The fact was unquestionable; and the safety-lamp was undiscovered!

Never was a philosophical imagination more beautiful than that exquisite Phænomenia, as it has been termed from the Greek, or a regeneration; or rather, the apparitions of animals and plants. Schott, Kircher, Gaffarel, Borelli, Digby, and the whole of that admirable school, discovered in the ashes of plants their primitive form, which were again raised up by the force of heat. Nothing, they say, perishes in nature; all is but a continuation, or a revival. The semina of resurrection are concealed in extinct bodies, as in the blood of man; the ashes of roses will again revive into roses, though smaller and paler than if they had been planted; unsubstantial and unendurable, they are not roses which grow on rose-trees, but their delicate apparitions; and, like apparitions, they are seen but for a moment! The process of the Phænomenia, this picture of immortality, is described. These phænophers having burst a flower, by calcination disengaged the salts from its ashes, and deposited them in a glass phial; a chemical mixture acted on it; till in the fermentation they assumed a bluish and spectral hue. This dust, thus excited by heat, shoots upwards into its primitive form; by sympathy the parts unite, and while each is returning to its destined place, we see distinctly the stalk, the leaves, and the flower, arise: it is the pale spectre of a flower coming slowly forth from its ashes. The heat passes away, the magical scene declines, till the whole matter again precipitates itself into the chaos at the bottom. This vegetable phænix lies thus concealed in its cold ashes, till the presence of heat produces this resurrection—in its absence it returns to its death. Thus the dead naturally revive; and a corpse may give out its shadowy resurrection, when not too deeply buried in the earth. Bodies corrupted in their graves have risen, particularly the murdered; for murderers are apt to bury their victims in a slight and hasty manner. Their salts, exhaled in vapour by means of their fermentation, have arranged themselves on the surface of the earth, and formed those phantoms, which at night have often terrified the passing spectator, as authentic history witnesses. They have opened the graves of the phantom, and discovered the bleeding corpse beneath; hence it is astonishing how many ghosts may be seen at night after a recent battle, standing over their corpses! On the same principle, my old philosopher Gaffarel conjectures on the raining of frogs; but these frogs, we must conceive, can only be the phantoms of frogs; and Gaffarel himself has modestly opened this fact by a 'peradventure. A more satisfactory origin of ghosts modern philosophy has not afforded.

And who does not believe in the existence of ghosts! for, as Dr More forcibly says, 'That there should be no universal fame and fear of that which never was, nor is, nor can be ever in the world, is to me the greatest miracle of all. If there had not been, at some time or other, two miracles, it had not been so easy to impose on the people by false. The alchemist would never go about to sophisticate metals to pass them off for true gold and silver, unless that such a thing was acknowledged as true gold and silver in the world.'

The Pharmacopoeia of those times combined more of morals with medicine than our own. They discovered that the agate rendered a man eloquent and even witty; a laurel leaf placed on the centre of the skull, fortified the memory; the brains of fowls, and birds of swift wing, wonderfully helped the imagination. All such specifics have not disappeared, and have greatly reduced the chances of an invalid recovering, that which perhaps he never possessed. Lentils and rape-seed were a certain cure for the small pox, and very obviously, their grains resembling the spots of this disease. They discovered that those who lived on 'fair plants became fair, those on fruitful ones were never barren; on the principle that Hercules acquired his mighty strength by feeding on the arrow of lions. But their talismans, provided they were genuine, seem to have been wonderfully operative; and ad we the same confidence, and melted down the guineas to give physicians, engraving on them talismanic figures, would answer for the good effects of the experiment. Naudé, indeed, has utterly ridiculed the occult virtues of talismans, in his defence of Virgil, accused of being a magician: the poet, it seems, cast into a well a talisman (a horse-leech, graven on a plate of gold, to drive away the great number of horse-leeches which infested Naples. Naudé positively denies that talismans ever possessed any such occult virtues: Gaffarel regrets that so judicious a man as Naudé should have gone this length, giving the lie to so many authentic authors; and Naudé's paradox is indeed, as strange as his denial; he suspects the thing is not true because it is so generally told! 'It leads one to suspect,' says he, 'as animals are said to have been driven away from so many places by these talismans, whether they were ever driven from any one place.' Gaffarel, suppressing by his good temper his indignant feelings at such reasoning, turns the paradox on its sakes:—'As if, because of the great number of battles that Hannibal is reported to have fought with the Romans, we might not, by the same reason, doubt whether he fought any one with them.' The reader must be aware that the strength of the argument lies entirely with the firm adherent in talismans. Gaffarel, indeed, who passed his days collecting 'Curiosités inouïes,' is a most authentic historian of unparalleled events, even in his own times; such as that heavy rain in Poitou, which showered down petites bestioles, 'little creatures like bishops with their mitres, and monks with their capuchins over their heads; it is true, afterwards they all turned into butterflies!

The museums, the cabinets, and the inventions of our early virtuosi were the baby-house of philosophers. Baptista Porta, Bishop Wilkins, and old Ashmole, were they now living, had been enrolled among the quiet members of 'The Society of Arts,' instead of flying in the air, collecting 'A ring of the phoenix, as tradition goes;' or catching the dissipated syllables of an old doting astrologer. But these early dilettanti had not derived the same pleasure from the useful inventions of the aforesaid 'Society of Arts,' as he received from what Cornelius Agrippa, in a fit of spleen, calls 'things vain and superfluous, invented to no other end but for pomp and idle pleasure.' Baptista Porta was more skilful in the mysteries of art and nature than any man in his day. Having founded the Academia degli Oristi, he held an inferior association in his own house, called de Secretis, where none was admitted but those elect who had communicated some secret; for, in the early period of modern art and science, the slightest novelty became a secret, not to be confided to the uninitiated. Porta was unquestionably a fine genius, as his works still show; but it was his misfortune that he attributed his own penetrating sagacity to his skill in the art of divination. He considered himself a prognosticator; and, what was more unfortunate, some eminent persons really thought he was. Predictions and secrets are harmless, provided they are not believed; but his Holiness finding Porta's were, warned him that magical sciences were great hindrances to the study of the Bible, and paid him the compliment to forbid his prophesying, Porta's genius was now limited, to astonish, and sometimes to terrify, the more ingenious part of i Secreti. On entering his cabinet, some phantom if an attendant was sure to be hovering in the air, moving as he who entered moved; or he observed in some mirror that his face was twisted on the wrong side of his shoulders, and did not quite think that all was right when he clapped his hand on it; or passing through a darkened apartment, a magical landscape burst on him, with human beings in motion, the boughs of trees bending, and the very clouds passing over the sun; or sometimes banquets, battles, and smiting-parties, were in the same apartment. 'All these spectacles my friends have witnessed!' exclaims the self-satisfied Baptista Porta. When his friends drank wine out of the same cup which he had used they were mortified with wonder; for he drank wine, and they only water! On a summer's day, when all complained of the sirocco, he would freeze his guests with cold air in the room; or on a sudden, let off a flying dragon to sail along with a racker in its tail, and a cat tied on its back; shrill was he heard, and awful was the concussion; so that it required strong nerves, in an age of apparitions and devils, to meet his great philosopher when in his best humour. Albertus Magnus entertained the Earl of Holland, as that earl passed through Cologne, in a severe winter, with a warm summer scene, luxuriant in fruits and flowers. The fact is related by Trithemius—and this magical scene connected with his vocal head, and his books de Secretis Mulierum, and de Mirabilibus, confirmed the accusations they raised against the great Albert, for being a magician. His apologist, Theophilus Raynaud, is driven so hard to defend Albertus, that he at once asserts, the winter changed to summer, and the speaking head, to be two infamous fables! He will not believe these authenticated facts, although he credits a miracle which proves the sanctity of Albertus—after three centuries, the body of Albert the great remained as sweet as ever!

'Whether such enchantments,' as old Mandeville cautiously observeth, two centuries preceding the days of Porta, were 'by craft or by pyromancy, I wot not.' But that they were not unknown to Chaucer, appears in his 'Frankeloin's Tale,' where, minutely describing them, he communicates the same pleasure he must himself have received from the ocular illusions of 'the Tregetoours,' or 'Jogelours.' Chaucer ascribes the miracle to a 'natural magic,' in which, however, it was as unsettled, whether the 'Prince of Darkness' was a party concerned.

'For I am siker that there be sciences
By which men maken divers apperences
Swiche as these subtil tregetoours play.
For oft at festes have I wel herd say
That tregetoours, within an halle large,
Have made come in a water and a barge,
And in the halle rowen up and down.
Sometime hath semed come a grim leoun,
And sometime floures spring as in a mede,
Sometime a vine and grapes white and rede;
Sometime a castel al of lime and ston,
And whan hem liketh voideth it anon:
Thus semeth it to every mannes sight.'

Bishop Wilkins's museum was visited by Evelyn, who describes the sort of curiosities which occupied and amused the children of science. 'Here, too, there was a hollow statue, which gave a voice, and uttered words by a long concealed pipe that went to its mouth, whilst one speaks through it at a good distance;' a circumstance, which, perhaps, they were not then aware revealed the whole mystery of the ancient oracles, which they attributed to demons, rather than to tubes, pulleys, and wheels. The learned Charles Patin, in his scientific travels, records, among other valuable productions of art, a cherry-stone, on which were engraven about a dozen and a half of portraits! Even the greatest of human geniuses, Leonardo da Vinci, to attract the royal patronage, created a lion which ran before the French monarch, dropping flowers de lis from its shaggy breast. And another philosopher who had a spinnet which played and stopped at command, might have made a revolution in the arts and sciences, had the half-tamed child that was concealed in it not been forced, unluckily, to crawl into day-light, and thus it was proved that a philosopher might be an impostor!

The arts, as well as the sciences, at the first institution of the Royal Society, were of the most amusing class. The famous Sir Samuel Moreland had turned his house into an enchanted palace. Every thing was full of devices, which showed art and mechanism in perfection: his coach carried a travelling kitchen; for it had a fire-place and grate, with which he could make a soup, broil cutlets, and roast an egg; and he dressed his meat by clock-work. Another of these virtuosi, who is described as 'a gentleman of superior order, and whose house was a knick-knackatory,' valued himself on his multifarious inventions, but most in 'sowing salads in the morning, to be cut for dinner.' The house of Winstanley, who afterwards raised the first Eddystone light-house, must have been the wonder of the age. If you kicked aside an old slipper, purposely lying in your way, up started a ghost before you; or if you sat down in a certain chair, a couple of gigantic arms would immediately clasp you in. There was an arbour in the garden, by the side of a canal; you had scarcely seated yourself, when you were sent out afloat to the middle of the canal—from whence you could not escape till this man of art and science wound you up to the arbour. What was passing at the 'Royal Society' was also occurring at the 'Académie des Sciences' at Paris. A great and gouty member of that philosophical body, on the departure of a stranger, would point to his legs, to show the impossibility of conducting him to the door; yet the astonished visitor never failed finding the virtuous waiting for him on the outside, to make his final bow! While the visitor was going down stairs, this inventive genius was descending with great velocity in a machine from the window: so that he proved, that if a man of science cannot force nature to walk down stairs, he may drive her out at the window!

If they travelled at home, they set off to note down prodigies. Dr Plot, in a magnificent project of journeying through England, for the advantage of 'Learning and Trade,' and the discovery of 'Antiquities and other Curiosities,' for which he solicited the royal aid which Leland enjoyed, among other notable designs, discriminates a class thus: 'Next I shall inquire of animals; and first of strange people.'—'Strange accidents that attend corporations of families, as that the deans of Rochester ever since the foundation by turns have died deans and bishops; the bird with a white breast that haunts the family of Oxenham near Exeter just before the death of any of that family; the bodies of trees that are seen to swim in a pool near Brereton in Cheshire, a certain warning to the heir of that honourable family to prepare for the next world.' And such remarkable as 'Number of children, such as the Lady Temple, who before she died saw seven hundred descended from her.' This fellow of the Royal Society, who lived nearly to 1700, was requested to give an edition of Pliny: we have lost the benefit of a most copious commentary! Bishop Hall went to 'the Spa.' The wood about that place was haunted not only by 'freebooters, but by wolves and witches; although these last are oftentimes but one.' They were called loups garous: and the Greeks, it seems, knew them by the name of Λυκαῖοι, men wolves; witches that have put on the shapes of those cruel beasts. 'We saw a boy there, whose half-face was devoured by one of them near the village; yet so, as that the ears were rather cut than bitten off.' Rumour had spread that the boy had had half his face devoured; when it was examined, it turned out that his ear had only been scratched! However, there can be no doubt of the existence of witch wolves; for Hall saw at Limburgh 'one of those miscreants executed, who confessed on the wheel to have devoured two and forty children in that form.' They would probably have found it difficult to have summoned the mothers who had lost the children. But observe our philosopher's reasoning: 'It would ask a large volume to scan his problem of lycanthropy.' He had laboriously collected all the evidence, and had added his arguments: the result offers a curious instance of acute reasoning on a wrong principle.*

Men of science and art then, passed their days in a bustle of the marvellous. I will furnish a specimen of philosophical correspondence in a letter to old John Aubrey. The writer betrays the versatility of his curiosity by very opposite discoveries. 'My hands are so full of work that I have no time to transcribe for Dr Henry More an account of the Barnstable apparition—Lord Keeper North would take it kindly from you—give a sight of this letter from Barnstable, to Dr Whitecoat.' He had lately heard of a Scotchman who had been carried by fairies into France; but the purpose of his present letter is to communicate other sort of apparitions than the ghost of Barnstable. He had gone to Glastonbury, 'to pick up a few berries from the holy thorn which flowered every Christmas day.' The original thorn had been cut down by a military saint in the civil wars; but the trade of the place was not damaged, for they had contrived not to have a single holy thorn, but several, 'by grafting and inoculation.' He promises to send these 'berries'; but requests Aubrey to inform 'that person of quality who had rather have a bush, that it was impossible to get one for him. I am told,' he adds, 'that there is a person about Glaston-

* Hall's postulate is that God's work could not admit of any substantial change, which is above the reach of all infernal powers; but 'Herein the devil plays the double sophist; or the sorcerer with sorcerers. Hee both deludes the witch's conceit and the beholder's eyes.' In a word, Hall believes, in what he cannot understand! Yet Hall will not believe one of the Catholic miracles of 'the Virgin of Louvain,' though Lipsius had written a book to commemorate 'the goddess,' as Hall sarcastically calls her; Hall was told, with great indignation, in the shop of the bookseller of Lipsius, that when James the First had just looked over this work, he flung it down, vociferating 'Damnation to him that made it and to him that believes it!'

bury who hath a nursery of them, which he sells for a crown a piece,' but they are supposed not to be 'of the right kind.'

The main object of this letter is the writer's 'surprise of gold in this country,' for which he offers three reasons. Tacitus says there was gold in England, and that Agricola came to a spot where he had a prospect of Ireland—from which place he writes; secondly, that 'an honest man' had in this spot found stones from which he had extracted good gold, and that he himself 'had seen in the broken stones a clear appearance of gold'; and thirdly, 'there is a story which goes by tradition in that part of the country, that in the hill alluded to there was a door into a hole, that when any wanted money, they used to go and knock there, that a woman used to appear, and give to such as came. At a time one by greediness or otherwise gave her offence, she flung to the door, and delivered this old saying, still remembered in the country:

"When all THE Daws be gone and dead,
Then . . . Hill shall shine gold red."

My fancy is, that this relates to an ancient family of this name, of which there is now but one man left, and he not likely to have any issue.' These are his three reasons; and some mines have perhaps been opened with no better ones! But let us not imagine that this great naturalist was credulous; for he tells Aubrey that 'he thought it was but a monkish tale, forged in the abbey, so famous in former time; but as I have learned not to despise our forefathers, I question whether this may not refer to some rich mine in the hill, formerly in use and now lost. I shall shortly request you to discourse with my lord about it, to have advice, &c. In the mean time it will be best to keep all private for his majesty's service, his lordship's, and perhaps some private person's benefit.' But he has also positive evidence: 'A mason not long ago coming to the rector of the abbey for a freestone, and sawing it, cut came down pieces of gold of 3/ 10s value a piece, of ancient coin. The stone belonged to some chimney-work; the gold was hidden in it, perhaps, when the Dissolution was near. This last incident of finding coins in a chimney-piece, which he had accounted for very rationally, serves only to confirm his dream that they were coined out of the gold of the mine in the hill; and he becomes more urgent for 'a private search into these mines, which I have, I think, a way to.' In the postscript he adds an account of a well, which by washing wrought a cure on a person deep in the king's evil. 'I hope you don't forget your promise to communicate whatever thing you have, relating to your Idea.'

This promised Idea of Aubrey may be found in his MSS under the title of 'The Idea of Universal Education.' However whimsical, one would like to see it. Aubrey's life might furnish a volume of these Philosophical dreams; he was a person who from his incessant bustle and insatiable curiosity, was called 'The Carrier of Conceptions of the Royal Society.' Many pleasant nights were 'privately' enjoyed by Aubrey and his correspondent about the 'Mine in the Hill'; Ashmole's manuscripts at Oxford, contain a collection of many secrets of the Rosicrucians; one of the completest inventions is 'a Recipe how to walk invisible.' Such were the fancies which rocked the children of science in their cradles! and so feeble were the steps of our curious infancy! But I start in my dreams! dreading the reader may also have fallen asleep!

'Measure is most excellent,' says one of the oracles; 'to which also we being in like manner persuaded, O most friendly and pious Asclepiades, here finish!—the dream at the dawn of philosophy!

ON PUCK THE COMMENTATOR.

Literary forgeries recently have been frequently indulged in, and it is urged that they are of an innocent nature; but impostures more easily practised than detected leave their mischief behind, to take effect at a distant period; and as I shall show, may entrap even the judicious! It may require no high exertion of genius, to draw up a grave account of an ancient play-wright whose name has never reached us, or to give an extract from a volume inaccessible to our inquiries; and as dulness is no proof of spuriousness, forgeries, in time, mix with authentic documents.

We have ourselves witnessed versions of Spanish and Portuguese poets, which are passed on their unsuspecting readers without difficulty, but in which no parts of the pretended originals can be traced; and to the present hour, whatever antiquaries may affirm, the poems of Chatterton and Ossian are veiled in mystery!

If we possessed the secret history of the literary life of George Stevens, it would display an unparalleled series of arch deception, and malicious ingenuity. He has been aptly characterized by Mr Gifford, as 'the Puck of commentators.' Stevens is a creature so spotted over with literary forgeries and adulterations, that any remark one about the time he flourished may be attributed to him. They were the habits of a depraved mind, and were as a darkness in his character many shades deeper than belonged to Puck; even in the playfulness of his insinuation, there was usually a turn of personal malignity, and the real object was not so much to raise a laugh, as to grin horribly a ghastly smile, on the individual. It is more than rumoured, that he carried his ingenious malignity into the privacies of domestic life; and it is to be regretted, that Mr Nichols, who might have furnished much secret history of this extraordinary literary forger, has, from delicacy, mutilated his collective vigour.

George Stevens usually commenced his operations by passing some pretended discovery in the evening papers, where were then of a more literary cast; the St James's Chronicle, the General Evening Post, or the Whitehall, were they not dead in body and in spirit, would now bear witness to his successful efforts. The late Mr Boswell told me, that Stevens frequently wrote notes on Shakespeare, purposely to mislead or entrap Malone, and obtain for himself an easy triumph in the next edition! Stevens loved to assist the credulous in getting up for them some strange new thing, dancing them about with a Will o' the wisp—now alarming them by a shriek of laughter; and now like a grinning Pigwigin sinking them chin-deep into a quagmire! Once he presented them with a fictitious portrait of Shakespeare, and when the brotherhood were sufficiently divided in their opinions, he pounced upon them with a demonstration, that every portrait of Shakespeare partook of the same doubtful authority! Stevens usually assumed the nom de guerre of Collins, a pseudo-commentator, and sometimes of Amner, who was discovered to be an obscure puritanic minister who never read text or notes of a play-wright, whenever he explored into 'a thousand notable secrets' with which he has polluted the pages of Shakespeare! The marvellous narrative of the upas-tree of Java, which Darwin adopted in his plan of 'enlisting imagination under the banner of science,' appears to have been another forgery which amused our 'Puck.' It was first given in the London Magazine, as an extract from a Dutch traveller, but the extract was never discovered in the original author, and 'the effluvia of this noxious tree, which through a district of twelve or fourteen miles had killed all vegetation, and had spread the skeletons of men and animals, affording a scene of melancholy beyond what poets have described, or painters de-limited,' is perfectly chimerical. A splendid flim-flam! When Dr Berkenhout was busied in writing, without much knowledge or skill, a history of our English authors, Stevens allowed the good man to insert a choice letter by George Peele, giving an account of 'a merry meeting at the Globe,' wherein Shakespeare and Ben Jonson and Ned Alleyn are admirably made to perform their respective parts. As the nature of the 'Biographia Literaria' required authorities, Stevens ingeniously added, 'Whence I copied this letter I do not recollect.' However he well knew it came from 'the Theatrical Mirror,' where he had first deposited the precious original, to which he had un-guardsly ventured to affix the date of 1600; unluckily, Peele was discovered to have died two years before he wrote his own letter! The date is adroitly dropped in Berkenhout! Stevens did not wish to refer to his original, which I have often seen quoted as authority. One of these numerous forgeries of our Puck, appears in an article in Isaac Reed's catalogue, art. 8708. 'The Boke of the Soldan, conteynynge strange matters touchynge his life and death, and the ways of his course, in two partes, 12mo,' with this marginal note by Reed. 'The foregoing was written by George Stevens, Esq. from whom I received it. It was composed merely to impose on "a literary friend," and had its effect; for he was so far deceived as to its authenticity that he gave implicit credit to it, and put down the person's name in whose possession the original books were supposed to be.'

One of the sort of inventions which I attribute to Stevens has been got up with a deal of romantic effect, to embellish the poetical life of Milton; and unquestionably must have sadly perplexed his last matter-of-fact editor, who is not a man to comprehend a flim-flam!—for he has sanctioned the whole fiction, by preserving it in his biographical narrative! The first impulse of Milton to travel in Italy is ascribed to the circumstance of his having been found asleep at the foot of a tree in the vicinity of Cambridge, when two foreign ladies, attracted by the loveliness of the youthful poet, alighted from their carriage, and having admired him for some time as they imagined unperceived, the youngest, who was very beautiful, drew a pencil from her pocket, and having written some lines, put the paper with her trembling hand into his own! But it seems, for something was to account how the sleeping youth could have been aware of these minute particulars, unless he had been dreaming them,—that the ladies had been observed at a distance by some friends of Milton, and they explained to him the whole silent adventure. Milton, on opening the paper, read four verses from Guarini, addressed to those 'human stars' his own eyes! On this romantic adventure, Milton set off for Italy, to discover the fair 'incognita,' to which undiscovered lady we are told we stand indebted for the most impassioned touches in the Paradise Lost! We know how Milton passed his time in Italy, with Dati, and Gaddi, and Frescobaldi, and other literary friends, amidst its academies, and often busied in book-collecting. Had Milton's tour in Italy been an adventure of knight-errantry, to discover a lady whom he had never seen, at least he had not the merit of going out of the direct road to Florence and Rome, nor of having once alluded to this Dame des songes, in his letters or inquiries among his friends, who would have thought themselves fortunate to have introduced so poetical an adventure in the numerous canzoni they showered on our youthful poet.

This historiette, scarcely fitted for a novel, first appeared where generally Steven's literary amusements were carried on, in the General Evening Post, or the St James's Chronicle; and Mr Todd, in the improved edition of Milton's Life, obtained this spurious original, where the reader may find it; but the more curious part of the story remains to be told. Mr Todd proceeds, 'The preceding highly-coloured relation, however, is not singular; my friend, Mr Walker, points out to me a counter-part in the extract from the preface to Poesies de Marguerite-Eleanore Clotilde, depuis Madame de Surville, Poete Francaise du XV Siecle. Paris, 1803.'

And true enough we find among 'the family traditions' of this same Clotilde, that Justine de Levis, great-grand-mother of this unknown poetess of the fifteenth century, walking in a forest, witnessed the same beautiful spectacles which the Italian Unknown had at Cambridge; never was such an impression to be effaced, and she could not avoid leaving her tablets by the side of the beautiful sleeper, declaring her passion in her tablets to four Italian verses! The very number our Milton had melted to him! Oh! these four verses! they are as fatal in their number as the date of Peele's letter proved to George Stevens! Something still escapes in the most ingenious fabrication which serves to decompose the materials. It is well our voracious historian dropped all mention of Guarini—else that would have given that coup de grace—a fatal anachronism! However his invention supplied him with more originality than the adoption of this story and the four verses would lead us to infer. He tells us how Petrarch was jealous of the genius of his Clotilde's grandmother, and has even pointed out a sonnet which, 'among the traditions of the family,' was addressed to her! He narrates, that the gentleman, when he fairly awoke, and had read the 'four verses,' set off for Italy, which he run over till he found Justine, and Justine found him at a tournament at Modena! This parallel adventure disconcerted our two grave English critics—they find a tale which they wisely judge improbable, and because they discover the tale copied, they conclude that 'it is not singular!' This knot of perplexity is, however, easily cut through, if we substitute, which we are fully justified in, for 'Poete du XV Siecle'—du XIX Siecle! The 'Poesies' of Clotilde are as genuine a fabrication as Chatterton's; subject to the same objections, having many ideas and expressions which were unknown in the language at the time they are pretended to have been composed, and exhibiting many imitations of Voltaire and other poets. The present story of the four Italian verses, and the beautiful Sleeper, would be quite sufficient evidence of the authenticity of 'the family traditions' of Cleilde, depuis Madame de Surville, and also Monsieur De Surville himself; a pretended editor, who is said to have found by mere accident the precious manuscript, and while he was copying for the press, in 1793, these pretty poems, for such they are, of his grande tante, was shot in the reign of terror, and so completely expired, that no one could ever trace his existence! The real editor, who we must presume to be the poet, published them in 1808.

Such then, is the history of a literary forgery! A Puck composes a short romantic adventure, which is quietly thrown out to the world in a newspaper or a magazine; some collector, such as the late Mr Bingley, who procured for Mr Todd his original, as idle, at least, as he is curious, houses the forlorn fiction—and it enters into literary history! A French Chatterton picks up the obscure tale, and behold, astonishes the literary inquirers of the very country whence the imposture sprang! But the four Italian verses, and the Sleeping Youth! Oh! Monsieur Vanderbourg! for that gentleman is the ostensible editor of Clouilde's poetries of the fifteenth century, some ingenious persons are unlucky in this world! Perhaps one day we may yet discover that this 'romantic adventure' of Milton and Justine de Lewis is not so original as it seems—it may be hid in the Astrée of D'Urfé, or some of the long romances of the Scuderies, whence the English and the French Chattertons may have drawn it. To such literary inventors we say with Swift:

— Such are your tricks;
But since you hatch, pray your own chicks!

Will it be credited that for the enjoyment of a temporary piece of malice, Steevens would even risk his own reputation as a poetical critic? Yet this he ventured, by throwing out of his edition the poems of Shakespeare, with a remarkable hyper-criticism, that 'the strongest act of parliament that could be framed would fail to compel readers into their service.' Not only he denounced the sonnets of Shakespeare, but the sonnet itself, with an absurd question, 'What has truth or nature to do with Sonnets?' The secret history of this unwarrantable mutilation of a great author by his editor was, as I was informed by the late Mr Boswell, merely done to spite his rival commentator Malone, who had taken extraordinary pains in their elucidation. Steevens himself had formerly repented them, but when Malone from these sonnets claimed for himself one ivy leaf of a commentator's pride, behold, Steevens in a rage would annihilate even Shakespeare himself, that he might gain a triumph over Malone! In the same spirit, but with more caustic pleasantry, he opened a controversy with Malone respecting Shakespeare's wife! It seems that the poet had forgotten to mention his wife in his copious will; and his recollection of Mrs Shakespeare seems to mark the slightness of his regard, for he only introduced by an interlineation, a legacy to her of his 'second best bed with the furniture'—and nothing more! Malone naturally inferred that 'the poet had forgot her, and so recollected her as more strongly to mark how little he esteemed her. He had already, as it is vulgarly expressed, cut her off, not indeed with a shilling, but with an old bed!' All this seems judicious, till Steevens asserts the conjugal affection of the bard, tells us, that the poet having, when in health, provided for her by settlement, or knowing that her father had already done so (circumstances entirely conjectural,) he bequeathed to her at his death, not merely an old piece of furniture, but, perhaps, as a mark of peculiar tenderness,

'The very bed that on his bridal night
Receiv'd him to the arms of Belvidera.'

Steevens's severity of satire marked the deep malevolence of his heart; and Murphy has strongly portrayed him in his address to the Malcontents.

Such another Puck was Horace Walpole! The King of Prussia's 'Letter' to Rousseau, and 'The Memorial' pretended to have been signed by noblemen and gentlemen, were fabrications, as he confesses, only to make mischief. It well became him, whose happier invention, the Castle of Otranto, was brought forward in the guise of forgery, so unfeelingly to have reprobated the innocent inventions of a Chatterton.

We have Pucks busied among our contemporaries: whoever shall discover their history will find it copious though intricate; the malignity at least will exceed, tenfold, the merriment.

LITERARY FORGERIES.

The preceding article has reminded me of a subject no means incurious to the lovers of literature. A large volume might be composed on literary impostors; the modes of deception, however, were frequently repeated, particularly those at the restoration of letters, when it prevailed a mania for burying spurious antiquities, that they might afterwards be brought to light to confound the contemporaries. They even perplex us at the present day. More sinister forgeries have been performed by Scotchmen, of whom Archibald Bower, Landis, Macpherson, are well known.

Even harmless impostures by some unexpected accident have driven an unwary inquirer out of the country. George Steevens must again make his appearance in a memorable trick played on the antiquary Gough. It was the famous tombstone on which was engraved drinking-horn of Hardyknute to indicate his last fatal rouse; for this royal Dane died drunk! To prevent doubt, the name, in Saxon characters, was sufficiently gible. Steeped in pickle to hasten a precocious satire, it was then consigned to the corner of a broker's shop, where the antiquarian eye of Gough often pored on venerable odds and ends; it perfectly succeeded on 'Director of the Antiquarian Society.' He purchased the relic for a trifle, and dissertations of a due size were preparing for the Archæologia.* Gough never forgave himself nor Steevens, for this flagrant act of imposture. On every occasion in the Gentleman's Magazine was compelled to notice this illustrious imposture, he also struck out his own name, and muffled himself up in his titular office of 'The Director.' Gough never knew that this 'modern antique' was only a piece of retailed trash. In reviewing Masters's Life of Baker he found two holes scratched down from painted glass by George Steevens, who would have passed it off for a portrait of one of the kings. Gough, on the watch to have a fling at George Steevens, attacked his graphic performance, and reprobated a portrait which had nothing human in it! Steevens was then wretched as Gough deemed his pencil to be, it also made 'The Director' ashamed of his own eyes, and fairly taken in by something scratched much worse. So was the origin of his adoption of this fragment of a chimney-slab, which I have seen, and with a better judge would derided at the injudicious antiquary, who could have been duped by the slight and ill-formed scratches, and even with a false spelling of the name, which however succeeded in being passed off as a genuine Saxon inscription: 'Is he had counted on his man?' The trick is not so original as it seems. One De Grassis had engraved on marble the epitaph of a mule, which he buried in his vineyard sometime after, having ordered a new plantation on the spot, the diggers could not fail of disinterring what was ready for them. The inscription imported that one Publius Grassus had raised this monument to his mule! De Grassis gave it out as an odd coincidence of names, and a prophecy about his own mule! It was a simple joke. The marble was thrown by, and no more thought of. Several years after it rose into celebrity, for with the erudite it then passed for an ancient inscription, and the antiquary Porcacchi inserted the epitaph in his work on 'Burials.' Thus De Grassis and his mule, equally respectable, would have come down to posterity, had not the story by some means got wind! An incident of this nature is recorded in Portuguese history, contrived with the intention to keep

* I have since been informed that this famous invention was originally a flim-flam of a Mr Thomas White, a noted collector and dealer in antiquities. But it was Steevens, who placed it in the broker's shop, where he was certain of catching the antiquary. When the late Mr Pegge, a profound brother, was preparing to write a dissertation on it, the first inventor of the flim stepped forward to save any further tragical termination; the wicked wit had already succeeded too well!

The stone may be found in the British Museum, HARDENVT is the reading on the Harthacnut stone; but the true orthography of the name is HARDENVT.

Sylvanus Urban, my excellent and old friend, seems a trifle uncourteous on this grave occasion—He tells us, however, that 'The history of this wanton trick, with a fac-simile of Schnebbelie's drawing may be seen in his volume L.X. p. 217. He says that this wicked contrivance of George Steevens was to entrap this famous draftsman! Does Sylvanus then deny that 'the Director' was not also 'Entressed?' And that he always struck out his own name in the proof-sheets of the Magazine substituting his official designation, by which the whole society itself seemed to acquiesce in 'the Director'!

the national spirit, and diffuse hopes of the new enterprise of Vasco de Gama, who had just sailed on a voyage of discovery to the Indies. Three stones were discovered in Cintra, bearing in ancient characters, a Latin inscription; a sibylline oracle addressed prophetically 'To the inhabitants of the West' stating that when these three seas shall be found, the Ganges, the Indus, and the Tarsus shall exchange their commodities! This was the fraud of a Portuguese poet, sanctioned by the approbation of the king. When the stones had lain a sufficient time in the damp earth, so as to become apparently lique, our poet invited a numerous party to dinner at his manly-house; in the midst of the entertainment a peasant rushed in, announcing the sudden discovery of this treasure! The inscription was placed among the royal lectures as a sacred curiosity! The prophecy was accomplished, and the oracle was long considered genuine! In such cases no mischief resulted; the annals of mankind were not confused by spurious dynasties and fabulous genealogies; but when literary forgeries are published by those whose character hardly admits of a suspicion that they are themselves the impostors, the difficulty of assigning a motive only increases that of forming a decision; to opt or to reject them may be equally dangerous.

In this class we must place Annus of Viterbo, who published a pretended collection of historians of the remotest antiquity, some of whose names had descended to us in the works of ancient writers, while their works themselves had been lost. Afterwards he subjoined commentaries to affirm their authority, by passages from unknown authors. These at first were eagerly accepted by the learners; the blunders of the presumed editor, one of which in his mistaking the right name of the historian he forged, were gradually detected till at length the imposture was apparent! The pretended originals were more remarkable for their number than their volume; for the whole collection does not exceed 171 pages, which lessened the difficulty of the forgery; while the commentaries, which were afterwards published, must have been manufactured at the same time as the text. In favour of Annus, the high rank occupied at the Roman court, his irreproachable conduct, and his declaration that he had recovered some of the fragments at Mantua, and that others had come from Armenia, induced many to credit these pseudo-historians. A literary war soon kindled; Nicéron has discriminated between four parties engaged in this conflict. One party decried the whole of the collection as gross forgeries; another obstinately supported their authenticity; a third decided that they were forgeries before Annus increased them, who was only credulous; while a fourth party considered them as partly authentic, and described the blunders to the interpolations of the editor, to increase their importance. Such as they were, they scattered confusion over the whole face of history. The false Berosius was his history before the deluge, when, according to him, the Chaldeans through preceding ages had faithfully preserved their historical evidences! Annus hints, in his commentary, at the archives and public libraries of the Babylonians: the days of Noah comparatively seemed modern history with this dreaming editor. Some of the fanciful writers of Italy were duped: Sansovino, to delight the Florentine nobility, accommodated them with a new tale of antiquity in their ancestor Noah, Imperatore e monarcha della genti, visse e morì in quelle parti. The pariahs complained that in forging these fabulous origins of different nations, a new series of kings from the time of Noah had been introduced by some of their rhodomontade historians to pollute the sources of their history. Bodin's otherwise valuable works are considerably injured by Annus's supposititious discoveries. One historian died in grief for having raised his elaborate speculations on such fabulous originals; and their credit was at length so much reduced, that Pignoria and Maffei both announced to their readers that they had not referred in their works to the pretended writers of Annus! Yet, to the present day, these presumed forgeries are not always given up; the problem remains unsolved—and the silence of the respectable Annus, in regard to the forgery, as well as that he affirmed when alive, leave us in doubt whether he really intended to laugh at the world by these fairy tales of the giants of antiquity. Sanchoniathon, as preserved by Eusebius, may be classed among these ancient writings, forgeries, and has been equally rejected and defended.

Another literary forgery supposed to have been grafted on those of Annus, involved the Inghirami family. It was by digging in their grounds that they discovered a number of Etruscan antiquities, consisting of inscriptions, and also fragments of a chronicle, pretended to have been composed sixty years before the vulgar era. The characters on the marbles were the ancient Etruscan, and the historical work tended to confirm the pretended discoveries of Annus. They were collected and enshrined in a magnificent folio by Curtius Inghirami, who, a few years after, published a quarto volume exceeding one thousand pages to support their authenticity. Notwithstanding the erudition of the forger, these monuments of antiquity betrayed their modern condiment. There were uncouth letters which no one knew; but these were said to be undiscovered ancient Etruscan characters; it was more difficult to defend the small italic letters, for they were not used in the age assigned to them; besides that there were dots on the letter i, a custom not practised till the eleventh century. The style was copied from the Latin of the Psalms and the Breviary; but Inghirami discovered that there had been an intercourse between the Etruscans and the Hebrews, and that David had imitated the writings of Noah and his descendants! Of Noah the chronicle details speeches and anecdotes!

The Romans, who have preserved so much of the Etruscans, had not, however, noticed a single fact recorded in these Etruscan antiquities. Inghirami replied, that the manuscript was the work of the secretary of the college of the Etrurian augurs, who alone was permitted to draw his materials from the archives, and who, it would seem, was the only scribe who has favoured posterity with so much secret history. It was urged in favour of the authenticity of these Etruscan monuments, that Inghirami was so young an antiquary at the time of the discovery, that he could not even explain them; and that when fresh researches were made on the spot, other similar monuments were also discovered, where evidently they had long lain; the whole affair, however contrived, was confined to the Inghirami family. One of them, half a century before, had been the librarian of the Vatican, and to him is ascribed the honour of the forgeries which he buried where he was sure they would be found. This, however, is a mere conjecture! Inghirami, who published and defended their authenticity, was not concerned in their fabrication; the design was probably merely to raise the antiquity of Volaterra, the family estate of the Inghirami; and for this purpose one of its learned branches had bequeathed his posterity a collection of spurious historical monuments, which tended to overturn all received ideas on the first ages of history.*

It was probably such impostures, and those of the false decretals of Isidore, which were forged for the maintenance of the papal supremacy, and for eight hundred years formed the fundamental basis, of the canon law, the discipline of the church, and even the faith of Christianity, which led to the monstrous pyrrhonism of father Hardouin, who, with immense erudition, had persuaded himself, that, excepting the Bible and Homer, Herodotus, Ptolemy, Pliny the elder, with fragments of Cicero, Virgil, and Horace, all with remains of classical literature were forgeries of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries! In two dissertations he imagined that he had proved that the Æneid was not written by Virgil, nor the Odes of Horace by that poet. Hardouin was one of those wrong-headed men, who once having fallen into a delusion, whatever afterwards occurs to them on their favourite subject only tends to strengthen it. He died in his own faith! He seems not to have been aware, that by ascribing such prodigious inventions as Plutarch, Thucydides, Livy, Tacitus, and other historians, to the men he did, he was raising up an unparalleled age of learning and genius when monks could only write meagre chronicles, while learning and genius themselves lay in an enchanted slumber with a suspension of all their vital powers.

There are numerous instances of the forgeries of small or documents. The Prayer-Book of Columbus presented to him by the Pope, which the great discoverer of a new world bequeathed to the Genoese republic, has a codicil in his own writing as one of the leaves testifies, but as volumes composed against its authenticity deny. The famous description in Petrarch's Virgil, so often quoted, of his first rencontre with Laura in the church of St Clair on a Good

* The volume of these pretended Antiquities is entitled Etruscarum Antiquitatum fragmenta. fo. Franc. 1637. That which Inghirami published to defend their authenticity is in Italian, Discorso sopra opposizioni false all' Antichità Toscana. 4to. Firenze, 1645.

Friday, 6 April, 1327, it has been recently attempted to be shown is a forgery. By calculation, it appears that the 6 April, 1327, fell on a Monday! The Good Friday seems to have been a blunder of the manufacturer of the note. He was entrapped by reading the second sonnet, as it appears in the printed editions!

*Era il giorno ch' al sol si scolorasse
Per la pietà del suo fattore i rai.*

'It was on the day when the rays of the sun were obscured by compassion for his Maker.' The forger imagined his description alluded to Good Friday and the eclipse at the Crucifixion. But how stands the passage in the MS. in the imperial library of Vienna, which Abbé Costain has found?

*Era il giorno ch' al sol di color rare
Perse la pietà del suo fattore, e i rai
Quando Io fu preado; e non mi guardai
Che bea vostri occhi dentro mi legaro.*

'It was on the day that I was captivated, devotion for its Maker appeared in the rays of a brilliant sun, and I did not well consider that it was your eyes that enchained me!'

The first meeting, according to the Abbé Costain, was not in a church, but in a meadow—as appears by the 91st sonnet. The Laura of Sade, was not the Laura of Petrarch; but Laura de Baux, unmarried, and who died young, residing in the vicinity of Vauluse. Petrarch had often viewed her from his own window, and often enjoyed her society amidst her family.* If the Abbé Costain's discovery be confirmed, the good name of Petrarch is freed from the idle romantic passion for a married woman. It would be curious if the famous story of the first meeting with Laura in the church of St Clare originated in the blunder of the forger's misconception of a passage which was incorrectly printed, as appears by existing manuscripts!

Literary forgeries have been introduced into bibliography; dates have been altered; fictitious titles affixed; and books have been reprinted, either to leave out, or to interpolate whole passages! I forbear entering minutely into this part of the history of literary forgery, for this article has already grown voluminous. When we discover, however, that one of the most magnificent of amateurs, and one of the most critical of bibliographers, were concerned in a forgery of this nature, it may be useful to spread an alarm among collectors. The duke de la Vallière, and the Abbé de St Léger, once concerted together to supply the eager purchaser of literary rarities with a copy of De Tribus Impostoribus, a book, by the date, pretended to have been printed in 1598, though, probably, a modern forgery of 1898. The title of such a work had long existed by rumour, but never was a copy seen by man! Works printed with this title have all been proved to be modern fabrications. A copy, however, of the inimitable original was sold at the Duke de la Vallière's sale! The history of this volume is curious. The Duke and the abbé having manufactured a text, had it printed in the old Gothic character, under the title De Tribus Impostoribus. They proposed to put the great bibliopoli, De Bure, in good humour, whose agency would sanction the imposture. They were afterwards to dole out copies at twenty-five louis each, which would have been a reasonable price for a book which no one ever saw! They invited De Bure to dinner, flattered and cajoled him, and, as they imagined, at a moment they had wound him up to their pitch, they exhibited their manufacture; the keen eyed-glance of the renowned cataloguer of the 'Bibliographic Instructive' instantly shot like lightning over it, and, like lightning destroyed the whole edition. He not only discovered the forgery, but reprobated it! He refused his sanction; and the forging duke and abbé, in confusion, suppressed the livre inimitable; but they owed a grudge to the honest bibliographer, and attempted to write down the work whence the de Bures derive their fame.

Among the extraordinary literary impostors of our age,

* I draw this information from a little 'new year's gift,' which my learned friend, the Rev. S. Weston, presented to his friends in 1832, entitled, 'A visit to Vauluse,' accompanied by a Supplement.' He derives his account apparently from a curious publication of L'Abbé Costain de Fusigier d'Avignon, which I with other inquirers have not been able to procure, but which it is absolutely necessary to examine, before we can decide on the very curious but unsatisfactory accounts we have hitherto possessed of the Laura of Petrarch.

if we except Lauder, who, detected by the Lithuanian Bishop Douglas, lived to make his public recantation of audacious forgeries, and Chatterton, who has buried his inexplicable story in his own grave; a tale, which we but half told; we must place a man well known in the literary world under the assumed name of George Palmanazar. He composed his autobiography as a penance of contrition, not to be published till he was more, when all human motives had ceased which might cause his veracity to be suspected. The life is tedious, but I have curiously traced the progress of the mind in ingenious imposture, which is worth preservation. The present literary forgery consisted of personating a converted islander of Formosa; a place then little known but by the reports of the Jesuits, and constructing language and history of a new people, and a new religion entirely of his own invention! This man was evidently a native of the south of France; educated in some provincial college of the Jesuits, where he had heard some of their discoveries of Japan; he had looked over the maps, and listened to their comments. He forgot the manner in which the Japanese wrote; but supposed, like orientalists, they wrote from the right to the left, which he found difficult to manage. He set about excogitating an alphabet; but actually forgot to give names to his letters which afterwards baffled him before literary men.

He fell into gross blunders; having inadvertently affirmed that the Formosans sacrificed eighteen thousand male infants annually, he persisted in not lessening the number. It was proved to be an impossibility in so small an island, without occasioning a depopulation. He made it a principle in this imposture never to vary what he had once said a thing. All this was projected in his fearful detection by those about him.

He was himself surprised at his facility of invention and the progress of his forgery. He had formed an alphabet, a considerable portion of a new language, a grammar, a new division of the year into twenty months, and a new religion! He had accustomed himself to write his language; but being an inexperienced writer with the unusual way of writing backwards, he found this so difficult, that he was compelled to change the complicated forms of some of his letters. He now finally quitted his home, assuming the character of a Formosan convert, who had been educated by the Jesuits. He was then in his fifteenth or sixteenth year. To support his new character, he practised some religious mummeries; he was seen worshipping the rising and setting sun. He made a prayer-book, with rude drawings of the sun, moon, and stars, to which he added some gibberish prose and verse, written in his invented character, muttering or chanting it, as the humour took him. His custom of eating raw flesh seemed to assist his deception more than the sun and moon.

In a garrison at Sluys he found a Scotch regiment in the Dutch pay; the commander had the curiosity to invite our Formosan to confer with Innes, the chaplain of the regiment. This Innes was probably the chief cause of the imposture being carried to the extent it afterwards reached. Innes was a clergyman, but a disgrace to his cloth. As soon as he fixed his eye on our Formosan, he hit on a project; it was nothing less than to make Palmanazar the ladder of his own ambition, and the stepping-place for him to climb up to a good living! Innes was a worthless character; as afterwards appeared, when by an audacious imposition, Innes practised on the Bishop of London, he avowed himself to be the author of an anonymous work, entitled 'A modest Inquiry after Moral Virtue'; for this he obtained a good living in Essex; the real author, a poor Scotch clergyman, obliged him afterwards to disclaim the work in print, and to pay him the profit of the edition which Innes had made! He lost his character, and retired to the solitude of his living; if not penitent, at least mortified.

Such a character was exactly adapted to become the foster-father of imposture. Innes courted the Formosan, and easily won on the adventurer, who had hitherto in vain sought for a patron. Meanwhile no time was lost by Innes to inform the unsuspecting and generous Bishop of London of the prize he possessed—to convert the Formosan was his ostensible pretext; to procure preferment his concealed motive. It is curious enough to observe, that the ardour of conversion died away in Innes, and the most marked neglect of his convert prevailed, while the answer of the bishop was protracted or doubtful. He had at first proposed to our Formosan impostor to procure his dis-arge, and convey him to England; this was eagerly consented to by our pliant adventurer. A few Dutch shellings, fair words, kept him in good humour; but no letter coming from the bishop, there were fewer words, and not longer! This threw a new light over the character of him to the inexperienced youth. Psalmanazsar sagaciously now turned all his attention to some Dutch minister; Innes grew jealous lest they should pluck the bird which he had already in his net. He resolved to baptize an impostor—which only the more convinced Psalmanazsar that Innes was one himself; for before this time he had perceived a stratagem on him, which had clearly shown what sort of a man his Formosan was.

The stratagem was this: he made him translate a passage in Cicero, of some length, into his pretended language, and give it him in writing; this was easily done, by Psalmanazsar's facility of inventing characters. After he had made him construe it, he desired to have another version of it on another paper. The proposal, and in a sly manner of making it, threw our impostor into the most visible confusion. He had had but a short time to read the first paper, less to recollect it; so that in the second transcript not above half the words were to be found which existed in the first. Innes assumed a solemn air, and Psalmanazsar was on the point of throwing himself on his mercy, but Innes did not wish to unmask the impostor; he was rather desirous of fitting the mask closer to his face. Psalmanazsar, in this hard trial, had given evidence of uncommon facility, combined with a singular memory. Innes cleared his brow, smiled with a friendly air, and only hinted in a distant manner, that he ought to be careful to be better provided for the future! An advice which Psalmanazsar afterwards bore in mind, and at length produced the forgery of an entire new language; and which, he remarkably observes, 'by what I have tried since I came into England, I cannot say but I could have compassed it with less difficulty than can be conceived had I applied closely to it.' When a version of the catechism has made into the pretended Formosan language, which was submitted to the judgment of the first scholars, it appeared to them grammatical, and was pronounced to be a real language, from the circumstance that it resembled no other! and they could not conceive that a stripling could be the inventor of a language. If the reader is curious to examine this extraordinary imposture, I refer him to that literary curiosity, 'An historical and geographical Description of Formosa, with accounts of the Religion, Customs, and Manners of the Inhabitants, by George Psalmanazsar, a Native of the said Isle, 1704; with numerous plates, wretched inventions! of their dress! religious ceremonies! their tabernacle and altars to the sun, the moon, and the ten stars! their architecture! the viceroys' castle! a temple! a city house! a countryman's house! had the Formosan alphabet! In his conferences before the Royal Society with a Jesuit just returned from China, the Jesuit had certain strong suspicions that our hero was an impostor. The good father remained obstinate in his own conviction, but could not satisfactorily communicate it to others; and Psalmanazsar, after politely asking pardon for the expression, complains of the Jesuit that 'he lied most impudently,' mentitur impudentissime! Dr Mead absurdly insisted Psalmanazsar was a Dutchman or a German; some thought him a Jesuit in disguise, a tool of the non-jurors; the catholics thought him bribed by the protestants to expose their church; the presbyterians that he was paid to explode their doctrine, and cry up episcopacy! This fabulous history of Formosa seems to have been projected by his artful prompter Innes, who put Varrenius into Psalmanazsar's hands to assist him; trumpeted forth in the domestic and foreign papers on account of this converted Formosan; maddened the booksellers to hurry the author, who was scarcely allowed two months to produce this extraordinary volume: and as the former accounts which the public possessed of this island were full of monstrous absurdities and contradictions, these assisted the present imposture. Our forger resolved not to describe new and surprising things as they had done, but rather studied to clash with them, probably that he might have an opportunity of pretending to correct them. The first edition was immediately sold; the world was more divided than ever in opinion: in a second edition he prefixed a vindication!—the unhappy forger got about twenty guineas for an imposture, whose delusions spread far and wide! Some years afterwards Psalmanazsar was engaged in a minor imposture; one man had persuaded him to father a white composition called the Formosan papers! which was to be sold at a high price! It was curious for its whiteness, but it had its faults. The project failed, and Psalmanazsar considered the miscarriage of the white Formosan papers as a providential warning to repent of all his impostures of Formosa!

Among these literary forgeries may be classed several ingenious ones fabricated for a political purpose. We had certainly numerous ones during our civil wars in the reign of Charles I. This is not the place to continue the controversy respecting the mysterious Eikon Basilike, which has been ranked among them, from the ambiguous claim of Gauden. A recent writer who would probably incline not to leave the monarch were he living, not only his head but the little fame he might obtain by the 'Verses' said to be written by him at Carisbrooke Castle, would deprive him also of these. Henderson's death-bed recantation is also reckoned among them; and we have a large collection of 'Letters of Sir Henry Martin to his Lady of Delight,' which were certainly the satirical effusions of a wit of that day, but by the price they have obtained, are probably considered as genuine ones, and exhibit an amusing picture of his loose rambling life. There is a ludicrous speech of the strange Earl of Pembroke, which was forged by the imitator Butler, and Sir John Firkhead, a great humorist and wit, had a busy pen in these spurious letters and speeches.

OF LITERARY FILCHERS.

An honest historian at times will have to inflict severe strokes on his favourites. This has fallen to my lot, for in the course of my researches, I have to record that we have both forgers and purloiners, as well as other more obvious impostors, in the republic of letters! The present article descends to relate anecdotes of some contrivances to possess our literary curiosities by other means than by purchase; and the only apology which can be alleged for the splendida peccata, as St Austin calls the virtues of the heathens, of the present innocent criminals, is their excessive passion for literature, and otherwise the respectability of their names. According to Grose's 'Classical Dictionary of the Vulgar Tongue,' we have had celebrated collectors, both in the learned and vulgar idioms. But one of them, who had some reasons too to be tender on this point, distinguishes this mode of completing his collections, not by book-stealing, but by book-coveting. On some occasions, in mercy, we must allow of softening names. Were not the Spartans allowed to steal from one another, and the bunglers only punished?

It is said that Pinelli made occasional additions to his literary treasures sometimes by his skill in an art which lay much more in the hand than in the head: however, as Pinelli never stirred out of his native city but once in his lifetime, when the plague drove him from home, his field of action was so restricted, that we can hardly conclude that he could have been so great an enterpriser in this way. No one can have lost their character by this sort of exercise in a confined circle, and be allowed to prosper! A light-fingered Mercury would hardly haunt the same spot: however, this is, as it may be! It is probable that we owe to this species of accumulation many precious manuscripts in the Cottonian collection. It appears by the manuscript note-book of Sir Nicholas Hyde, chief-justice of the king's bench from the second to the seventh year of Charles the First, that Sir Robert Cotton had in his library, records, evidences, ledger-books, original letters; and other state-papers, belonging to the king; for the attorney-general of that time, to prove this, showed a copy of the pardon which Sir Robert had obtained from King James for *embezzling records, &c.

Gough has more than insinuated that Rawlinson and his friend Umfreville 'lie under very strong suspicions,' and he asserts that the collector of the Wilton treasures made as free as Dr Willis with his friend's coins. But he has also put forth a declaration relating to Bishop More, the famous collector, that 'the bishop collected his library by plundering those of the clergy in his diocese; some he paid with sermons or more modern books; others, less civilly, only with a quid illiterati cum libris?' This plundering then consisted rather of expropriating others out of what they knew not how to value; and this is an advantage which every skilful lover of books must enjoy over those whose apprenticeship has not expired. I have myself been plundered by a very dear friend of some such literary curiosities, in the days of my innocence and of his precocity of knowledge. However, it does appear that Bishop More did actually lay violent hands in a snug corner on some irresistible little charmer; which we gather from a precaution adopted by a friend of the bishop, who one day was found busy in hiding his rarest books, and locking up as many as he could. On being asked the reason of this odd occupation, the bibliopist ingenuously replied, 'the Bishop of Ely dines with me to-day.' This fact is quite clear, and here is another as indisputable. Sir Robert Saville writing to Sir Robert Cotton, appointing an interview with the founder of the Bodleian Library, cautions Sir Robert, that 'If he held any book so dear as that he would be loath to lose it, he should not let Sir Thomas out of his sight, but set "the books" aside before hand.' A surprise and detection of this nature has been revealed in a piece of secret history by Amelot de la Housaie, which terminated in very important political consequences. He assures us that the personal dislike which Pope Innocent X, bore to the French had originated in his youth, when cardinal, from having been detected in the library of an eminent French collector, of having purloined a most rare volume. The delirium of a collector's rage overcame even French politesse; the Frenchman not only openly accused his illustrious culprit, but was resolved that he should not quit the library without replacing the precious volume—from accusation and denial both resolved to try their strength; but in this literary wrestling-match the book dropped out of the cardinal's robes!—and from that day he hated the French—at least their more curious collectors!

Even an author on his dying-bed, at those awful moments, should a collector be by his side, may not be considered secure from his too curious hands. Sir William Dugdale possessed the minutes of King James's life, written by Camden, till within a fortnight of his death; as also Camden's own life, which he had from Hacket, the author of the folio life of Bishop Williams; who, adds Aubrey, 'did sick it from Mr Camden, as he lay a dying!' He afterwards corrects his information, by the name of Dr Thorndyke, which, however, equally answers our purpose, to prove that even dying authors may dread such collectors!

The medallists have, I suspect, been more predatory than these subtractors of our literary treasures; not only from the facility of their conveyance, but from a peculiar contrivance which of all those things which admit of being secretly purloined, can only be practised in this department—for they can steal and no human hand can search them with any possibility of detection—they can pick a cabinet and swallow the curious things, and transport them with perfect safety, to be digested at their leisure. An adventure of this kind happened to Baron Stoeck, the famous antiquary. It was in looking over the gems of the royal cabinet of medals, that the keeper perceived the loss of one; his place, his pension, and his reputation were at stake; and he insisted that Baron Stoeck should be most minutely examined: in this dilemma, forced to confession, this ordidite collector assured the keeper of the royal cabinet, that the strictest search would not avail: 'Alas, sir! I have it here within,' he said, pointing to his breast—an emetic was suggested by the learned practitioner himself, probably from some former experiment. This was not the first time that such a natural cabinet had been invented; the antiquary Vaillant, when attacked at sea by an Algerine, zealously swallowed a whole series of Syrian kings; when he landed at Lyons, groaning with his concealed treasure, he hastened to his friend, his physician, and his brother antiquary Dufour,—who at first was only anxious to inquire of his patient, whether the medals were of the higher empire? Vaillant showed two or three, of which nature had kindly relieved him. A collection of medals was left to the city of Exeter, and the donor accompanied the bequest by a clause in his will, that should a certain antiquary, his old friend and rival, be desirous of examining the coins, he should be watched by two persons, one on each side. La Croze informs us in his life, that the learned Charles Patin, who has written a work on medals, was one of the present race of collectors; Patin offered the curators of the public library at Basle to draw up a catalogue of the cabinet of Amerbach there preserved, containing a good number of medals; but they would have been more numerous, had the catalogue-writer not diminished both them and his labour, by securing some of the most rare, which was not discovered till plunderer of antiquity was far out of their reach.

When Gough touched on this odd subject in the 1st edition of his 'British Topography,' 'An Academician in Gentleman's Magazine for August 1772, imputed this charge of literary pilfering was only a jocular one, which Gough, in his second edition, observed that this was not the case, and that "one might point out enough of fingered antiquaries in the present age, to reader might charge extremely probable against earlier ones." The most extraordinary part of this slight history is, that the public denouncer sometime after proved himself to be one of these 'light-fingered antiquaries'; the deed itself, however, was more singular than disgraceful. At the disinterment of the remains of Edward the First, around thirty years ago, assembled our most erudite antiquary Gough was observed, as Steevens used to relate, in wrapping great coat of unusual dimensions; that witty and malicious 'Puck,' so capable himself of inventing much, easily suspected others, and divided his glance as much to the living piece of antiquity, as on the elder. In the unclosing up the relics of royalty, there was found within an entire fore-finger of Edward the first; and as the latter was perfect when opened, a murmur of dissatisfaction was spreading, when 'Puck' directed their attention to the great antiquary in the watchman's great coat—from whence too surely was extracted Edward the First's great fore-finger!—so that 'the light-fingered antiquary' was re-sized ten years after he had denounced the race, when he came to 'try his hand.'*

OF LORD BACON AT HOME.

The history of Lord Bacon would be that of the intellectual faculties, and a theme so worthy of the philosophical biographer remains yet to be written. The personal narrative of this master-genius or inventor most for ever be separated from the scala intellectus he was perpetually ascending: and the domestic history of this creative mind must be consigned to the most humiliating chapter in the volume of human life: a chapter already sufficiently enlarged, and which has irrefutably proved how the greatest minds are not freed from the infirmities of the most vulgar.

The parent of our philosophy is now to be considered in a new light one which others do not appear to have observed. My researches into contemporary notices of Bacon have often convinced me that his philosophical works, in his own days and among his own countrymen, were not only not comprehended, but often ridiculed, and sometimes reprobated; that they were the occasion of many slights and mortifications which this depreciated man endured; but that from a very early period in his life, in that last record of his feelings which appears in his will, this 'servant of posterity,' as he prophetically called himself, sustained his mighty spirit with the confidence of his own posthumous greatness. Bacon cast his views through the maturity of ages, and perhaps amidst the scepticisms and the rejectors of his plans, may have felt at times all that idolatry of fame, which has now consecrated his philosophical works.

At college, Bacon discovered how 'that scrap of Grecian knowledge, the peripatetic philosophy,' and the scholastic babble, could not serve the ends and purposes of knowledge; that syllogisms were not things, and that a new logic might teach us to invent and judge by induction. He found that theories were to be built upon experiments. When a young man, abroad, he began to make those observations on Nature, which afterwards led on to the fount-

* It is probable that this story of Gough's pocketing the fore-finger of Edward the First, was one of the malicious inventions of George Steevens, after he discovered that the antiquary was among the few admitted to the unloading of the royal corpse; Steevens himself was not there! Sylvanus Urban who must know much more than he cares to record of 'Puck,'—has, however, given the following 'secret history' of what he calls 'ungentlemanly and unwarrantable ascription' on Gough, by Steevens. 'It seems that Steevens was a collector of the works of Hogarth, and while engaged in forming his collection, wrote an abrupt letter to Gough, to obtain from him some early impressions, by purchase or exchange. Gough resented the manner of his address by a rough refusal, &c. It is admitted to have been a 'peremptory one.' Thus arose the implacable vengeance of Steevens, who used to boast that all the mischievous tricks he played on the great antiquary, who was rarely over-kind to any one, was but a pleasant kind of revenge!

tions of the new philosophy. At sixteen, he philosophized; at twenty-six, he had framed his system into some form; and after forty years of continued labour, unfinished to his last hour, he left behind him sufficient to found the new philosophical reformation.

On his entrance into active life, study was not however in prime object. With his fortune to make, his court connexions and his father's example opened a path for ambition. He chose the practice of common law as his means, while his inclinations were looking upwards to judicial affairs as his end. A passion for study however was strongly marked him; he had read much more than was required in his professional character, and this circumstance excited the mean jealousies of the minister Cecil, and the attorney-general Coke. Both were mere practical men of business, whose narrow conceptions and those stubborn habits assume, that whenever a man acquires much knowledge foreign to his profession, he will know less of professional knowledge than he ought. These men of strong minds, yet limited capacities, hold in contempt all studies alien to their habits.

Bacon early aspired to the situation of solicitor-general; he court of Elizabeth was divided into factions; Bacon adopted the interests of the generous Essex, which were inimical to the party of Cecil. The queen, from his boyhood, was delighted by conversing with her 'young lord-keeper,' as she early distinguished the precocious gravity and the ingenious turn of mind of the future philosopher. It was unquestionably to attract her favour, that Bacon presented to the queen his Maxims and Elements of the Common Law, not published till after his death. Elizabeth suffered her minister to form her opinions on the legal character of Bacon. It was alleged that Bacon was addicted to more general pursuits than law, and the miscellaneous books which he was known to have read confirmed the accusation. This was urged as a reason why the post of solicitor-general should not be conferred on a man of speculation, more likely to distract than to direct her affairs. Elizabeth, in the height of that political prudence which marked her character, was awayed by the vulgar notion of Cecil, and believed that Bacon, who afterwards filled the situation both of solicitor-general and lord chancellor, was 'A man rather of show than of depth.' We have been recently told by a great lawyer, that 'Bacon was a master.'

On the accession of James the First, when Bacon still found the same party obstructing his political advancement, he appears, in some momentary fit of disgust, to have meditated on a retreat into a foreign country; a circumstance which has happened to several of our men of genius, during a fever of solitary indignation. He was for some time thrown out of the sunshine of life, but he found its shade more fitted for contemplation; and, unquestionably, philosophy was benefited by his solitude at Gray's inn. His hand was always on his work, and better thoughts will find an easy entrance into the mind of those who feed on their thoughts, and live amidst their reveries. In a letter on this occasion, he writes, 'My ambition now shall only put upon my pen, whereby I shall be able to maintain memory and merit, of the times succeeding.' And many years after when he had finally quitted public life, he told the king, 'I would live to study, and not study to live: yet I am prepared for data obtemus Bellisario; and I that have borne a bag, can bear a wallet.'

Ever were the times succeeding in his mind. In that delightful Latin letter to Father Fulgentio, where, with the simplicity of true grandeur, he takes a view of all his works, and in which he describes himself as 'one who served posterity,' in communicating his past and his future designs, he adds, that 'they require some ages for the ripening of them.' There, while he despairs of finishing what was intended for the sixth part of his Instauratio, how nobly he despairs! 'Of the perfecting this I have cast away all hopes; but in future ages, perhaps, the design may be again.' And he concludes by avowing, that he zeal and constancy of his mind in the great design, after so many years, had never become cold and indifferent. He remembers how, forty years ago, he had composed a juvenile work about those things, which, with consideration, but with too pompous a title, he had called Thesaurus Peritus Maximus; the great birth of time! Besides the public dedication of his Novum Organum to James the First, he accompanied it with a private letter. He wishes the king's favour to the work, which he accounts as much as a hundred years time; for he adds, 'I am persuaded the work will gain upon men's minds in ages.'

In his last will appears his remarkable legacy of fame. 'My name and memory I leave to foreign nations, and to mine own countrymen after some time be passed over.' Time seemed always personated in the imagination of our philosopher, and with time he wrestled with a consciousness of triumph.

I shall now bring forward sufficient evidence to prove how little Bacon was understood, and how much he was even despised, in his philosophical character.

In those prescient views by which the genius of Verulam has often anticipated the institutions and the discoveries of succeeding times, there was one important object which even his foresight does not appear to have contemplated. Lord Bacon did not foresee that the English language would one day be capable of embalming all that philosophy can discover, or poetry can invent; that his country should at length possess a national literature of its own, and that it should exult in classical compositions which might be appreciated with the finest models of antiquity. His taste was far unequal to his invention. So little he esteemed the language of his country, that his favourite works are composed in Latin; and he was anxious to have what he had written in English preserved in that 'universal language which may last as long as books last.' It would have surprised Bacon to have been told, that the most learned men in Europe have studied English authors to learn to think and to write. Our philosopher was surely somewhat mortified, when in his dedication of the Essays he observed, that 'of all my other works my Essays have been most current; for that as it seems, they come home to men's business and bosoms.' It is too much to hope to find in a vast and profound inventor a writer also who bestows immortality on his language. The English language is the only object in his great survey of art and of nature, which owes nothing of its excellence to the genius of Bacon.

He had reason indeed to be mortified at the reception of his philosophical works; and Dr Rawley, even some years after the death of his illustrious master, had occasion to observe, that 'His fame is greater and sounds louder in foreign parts abroad than at home in his own nation; thereby verifying that divine sentence, a prophet is not without honour, save in his own country and in his own house.' Even the men of genius, who ought to have comprehended this new source of knowledge thus opened to them, reluctantly entered into it; so repugnant are we suddenly to give up ancient errors which time and habit have made apart of ourselves. Harvey, who himself experienced the sluggish obstinacy of the learned, which repelled a great but a novel discovery, could however in his turn deride the amazing novelty of Bacon's Novum Organum. Harvey said to Aubrey, that 'Bacon was no great philosopher; he writes philosophy like a lord chancellor.' It has been suggested to me that Bacon's philosophical writings have been much over-rated. His experimental philosophy from the era in which they were produced must be necessarily defective; the time he gave to them could only have been had at spare hours; but like the great prophet on the mount, Bacon was doomed to view the land afar, which he himself could never enter.

Bacon found but small encouragement for his new learning among the most eminent scholars, to whom he submitted his early discoveries. A very copious letter by Sir Thomas Bodley on Bacon's desiring him to return the manuscript of Cogitata et Ficta, some portion of the Novum Organum has come down to us; it is replete with objections to the new philosophy. 'I am one of that crew,' says Sir Thomas, 'that say we possess a far greater holdfast of certainty in the sciences than you will seem to acknowledge. He gives a hint too that Solomon complained of the infinite making of books in his time; that all Bacon delivers is only 'by avowment without other force of argument, to disclaim all our axioms, maxims, &c, left by tradition from our elders unto us, which have passed all probations of the sharpest wits that ever were;' and he concludes, that the end of all Bacon's philosophy, by 'a fresh creating new principles of sciences, would be to be dispossessed of the learning we have;' and he fears that it would require as many ages as have marched before us that knowledge should be perfectly achieved. Bodley truly compares himself to 'the carrier's horse which cannot pluck the beaten way in which I was trained.'

'Bacon did not lose heart by the timidity of 'the carrier's horse'; a smart vivacious note in return shows his quick apprehension.

'As I am going to my house in the country, I shall want my papers, which I beg you therefore to return. You are slothful, and you help me nothing, so that I am half in conceit you affect not the argument; for myself I know well you love and affect. I can say no more, but non canimus surdis, respondent omnia syllas. If you be not of the lodgings chalked up, whereof I speak in my preface, I am but to pass by your door. But if I had you a fortnight at Gornhambury, I would make you tell another tale; or else I would add a cogitation against libraries, and be revenged on you that way.'

A keen but playful retort of a great author too conscious of his own views to be angry with his critic! The lodgings chalked up is some sarcasm which we must supply from our own conception; but the threatened cogitation against libraries must have caused Bodley's cheek to tingle.

Let us now turn from the scholastic to the men of the world, and we shall see what sort of notion these critics entertained of the philosophy of Bacon. Chamberlain writes, 'This week the lord chancellor hath set forth his new work called Instauratio Magna, or a kind of Novum Organum of all philosophy. In sending it to the king, he wrote that he wished his majesty might be so long in reading it as he hath been in composing and polishing it, which is well near thirty years. I have read no more than the bare title, and am not greatly encouraged by Mr Cuffe's judgment,* who having long since persued it, gave this censure, that a fool could not have written such a work, and a wise man would not.' A month or two afterwards we find that 'The king cannot forbear sometimes in reading the lord chancellor's last book to say, that it is like the peace of God, that surpasseth all understanding.'

Two years afterwards the same letter-writer proceeds with another literary paragraph about Bacon. 'This lord busies himself altogether about books, and hath set out two lately, Historia Ventorum, as de Vita et Morte, with promise of more. I have yet seen neither of them, because I have not leisure; but if the life of Henry the Eighth (the Seventh), which they say he is about, might come out after his own manner (meaning his Moral Essays), I should find time and means enough to read it.' When this history made its appearance, the same writer observes, 'My Lord Verulam's history of Henry the Seventh is come forth; I have not read much of it, but they say it is a very pretty book.'

Bacon, in his vast survey of human knowledge, included even its bumber provinces, and condescended to form a collection of apophthegms: his lordship regretted the loss of a collection made by Julius Caesar, while Plutarch indiscriminately drew much of the dregs. The wits, who could not always comprehend his plans, ridiculed the sage. I shall now quote a contemporary poet, whose works, for by their size they may assume that distinction, were never published. A Dr Andrews wasted a sportive pen on fugitive events; but though not always deficient in humour and wit, such is the freedom of his writings, that they will not often admit a quotation. The following is indeed but a strange pun on Bacon's title, derived from the town of St Alban's and his collection of apophthegms:

ON LORD BACON PUBLISHING APOPTHEGMS.

When learned Bacon wrote essays,
He did deserve and hath the praise;
But now he writes his apophthegms
Surely he does or he dreams;
One said, St Alban now is grown unable,
And is in the high-road-way—to Dunstable. [i. e. Dunce-table.]

To the close of his days were Lord Bacon's philosophical pursuits still disregarded and depreciated by ignorance and envy, in the forms of friendship or rivalry. I shall now give a remarkable example. Sir Edward Coke was a mere great lawyer, and like all such, had a mind so walled in by law-knowledge, that in its bounded views it shut out the horizon of the intellectual faculties, and the whole of his philosophy lay in the statutes. In the library at Habbam there must be found a presentation copy of Lord Bacon's Novum Organum, the Instauratio Magna, 1620. It was given to Coke, for it bears the following note on the title-page in the writing of Coke:

Edw. Coke, *Es dono auctoris
Auctori consilium*

*Instaurare parvas veterum documentis asperum
Instaura leges, iustitiamque prius.*

The verum not only reproves Bacon for going out of his profession, but must have alluded to his character as a prerogative lawyer, and his corrupt administration of the chancery. The book was published in October, 1620, a few months before the impeachment. And so far as may easily excuse the causticity of Coke; but how he really valued the philosophy of Bacon appears by this: in this first edition there is a device of a ship passing between Hercules's pillars; the plus ultra, the proud exultation of our philosopher. Over this device Coke has written a miserable distich in English, which marks his utter contempt of the philosophical pursuits of his illustrious rival. This ship passing beyond the columns of Hercules he has caustically conceits as 'The Ship of Fools,' the famous satire of the German Sebastian Brandt, translated by Alexander Barclay.

*It deserveth not to be read in schools,
But to be freighted in the Ship of Fools.*

Such then was the fate of Lord Bacon; a history not written by his biographers, but which may serve as a comment on that obscure passage dropped from the pen of his chaplain, and already quoted, that he was more valued abroad than at home.

SECRET HISTORY OF THE DEATH OF QUEEN ELIZABETH.

It is an extraordinary circumstance in our history, that the succession to the English dominion, in two remarkable cases, was never settled by the possessors of the throne themselves during their lifetime; and that there is every reason to believe this mighty transfer of three kingdoms became the sole act of their ministers, who considered the succession merely as a state expedient. Two of our most able sovereigns found themselves in this predicament; Queen Elizabeth, and the Protector Cromwell! Cromwell probably had his reasons not to name his successor; his positive election would have dissatisfied the opposite parties of his government, whom he only ruled while he was able to cajole them. He must have been aware that latterly he had need of conciliating all parties to his usurpation, and was probably as doubtful on his death-bed whom to appoint his successor, as at any other period of his reign. Ludlow suspects that Cromwell was 'so decomposed in body or mind, that he could not attend to that matter; and whether he named any one is to me uncertain.' All that we know is the report of the Secretary Thurlow and his chaplain, who, when the protector lay in his last agonies, suggested to him the propriety of choosing his eldest son, and they tell us that he agreed to this choice. Had Cromwell been in his senses, he would have probably fixed on Henry, the lord lieutenant of Ireland, rather than on Richard, or possibly had not chosen either of his sons!

Elizabeth, from womanish infirmity, or from state-reasons, could not endure the thoughts of her successor; and long threw into jeopardy the policies of all the cabinets of Europe, each of which had its favourite candidate to support. The legitimate heir to the throne of England was to be the creature of her breath, yet Elizabeth would not speak him into existence! This had, however, often raised the discontents of the nation, and we shall see how it harassed the queen in her dying hours. It is even suspected that the queen still retained so much of the woman, that she could never overcome her perverse dislike to name a successor, so that according to this opinion, she died and left the crown to the mercy of a party! This would have been acting unworthy of the magnanimity of her great character—and as it is ascertained that the queen was very sensible that she lay in a dying state several days before the natural catastrophes occurred, it is difficult to believe that she totally disregarded so important a circumstance. It is, therefore, reasoning a priori, most natural to conclude, that the choice of a successor must have occupied her thoughts as well as the anxieties of her mind.

ness; and that she would not have left the throne in the same unsettled state at her death as she had persevered during her whole life. How did she express herself in bequeathing the crown to James the First, or did she sneeze it at all?

In the popular pages of her female historian, Miss Ikin has observed, that 'the closing scene of the long and eventful life of Queen Elizabeth was marked by that scularity of character and destiny which attended her from the cradle, and pursued her to the grave.' The last days of Elizabeth were, indeed, most melancholy—she died a victim of the higher passions, and perhaps as much 'grief as age, refusing all remedies and even nourishment. But in all the published accounts, I can nowhere discover how she conducted herself respecting the circumstance of our present inquiry. The most detailed narrative, or as Gray the poet calls it, 'the Earl of Monmouth's last account of Queen Elizabeth's death,' is the one most deserving notice; and there we find the circumstance of its inquiry introduced. The queen, at that moment, was reduced to so sad a state, that it is doubtful whether her majesty was at all sensible of the inquiries put to her by her ministers respecting the succession. The Earl of Monmouth says, 'on Wednesday, the 23d of March, she was speechless. That afternoon, by signs, she called for her council, and by putting her hand to her head when the king of Scots was named to succeed her, they all knew she was the man she desired should reign after her.' Such again as that of a dying woman putting her hand to her head was, to say the least, a very ambiguous acknowledgment of the right of the Scottish monarch to the English throne. The 'odd' but very naive account of Robert Cary, afterwards Earl of Monmouth, is not furnished with dates, nor with the exactness of a diary. Something might have occurred on a preceding day which had not reached him. Camden describes the death-bed scene of Elizabeth; by this authentic writer it appears that she had confided her state-secret of the succession to the lord admiral (the Earl of Nottingham); and when the earl found the queen almost at her extremity, he communicated her majesty's secret to the council, who commissioned the lord admiral, the lord keeper, and the secretary to wait on her majesty, and acquaint her that they came in the name of her best to learn her pleasure in reference to the succession. The queen was then very weak, and answered them with a faint voice, that she had already declared, that as she held a royal sceptre, so she desired no other than a royal successor. When the secretary requested her to explain herself, the queen said, 'I would have a king succeed me; and who should that be but my nearest kinsman, the king of Scots?' Here this state-conversation was put an end to by the interference of the archbishop advising her majesty to turn her thoughts to God. 'Never,' she replied, has my mind wandered from him.'

An historian of Camden's high integrity would hardly have forged a fiction to please the new monarch; yet Camden has not been referred to on this occasion by the exact Birch, who draws his information from the letters of the French ambassador, Villeroy; information which it appears the English ministers had confined to this ambassador; nor do we get any distinct ideas from Elizabeth's more recent popular historian, who could only transcribe the account of Cary. He had told us a fact which he could not be mistaken in, that the queen fell speechless on Wednesday, 23d of March, on which day, however, she called her council, and made that sign with her hand, which, as the lords chose to understand, for ever united the two kingdoms. But the noble editor of Cary's Memoirs (the Earl of Cork and Orrery,) has observed, that 'the speeches made for Elizabeth on her death-bed are all forged.' Echard, Rapin, and a long string of historians, make her say faintly (so faintly indeed that it could not possibly be heard,) 'I will that a king succeed me, and who should that be but my nearest kinsman the king of Scots?' A different account of this matter will be found in the following memoirs. 'She was speechless, and almost expiring, when the chief counsellors of state were called into her bed-chamber. As soon as they were perfectly convinced that she could not utter an articulate word, and scarce could hear or understand one, they named the king of Scots to her, a liberty they dared not to have taken if she had been able to speak; she put her hand to her head, which was probably at that time in agonizing pain. The lords, who interpreted her signs just as they pleased, were immediately convinced that the motion of her hand to her head was a declaration of James the Sixth as her successor. What was this but the unanimous interpretations of persons who were adoring the rising sun?

This is lively and plausible; but the noble editor did not recollect that 'the speeches made by Elizabeth on her death-bed,' which he deems 'forgeries,' in consequence of the circumstance he had found in Cary's Memoirs, originate with Camden, and were only repeated by Rapin and Echard, &c. I am now to confirm the narrative of the elder historian, as well as the circumstance related by Cary, describing the sign of the queen a little differently, which happened on Wednesday 23d. A hitherto unnoticed document pretends to give a fuller and more circumstantial account of this affair, which commenced on the preceding day, when the queen retained the power of speech; and it will be confessed that the language here used has all that loftiness and brevity which was the natural style of this queen. I have discovered a curious document in a manuscript volume formerly in the possession of Petyt, and seemingly in his own hand-writing. I do not doubt its authenticity, and it could only have come from some of the illustrious personages who were the actors in that solemn scene, probably from Cecil. This memorandum is entitled,

'Account of the last words of Queen Elizabeth about her Successor.'

'On the Tuesday before her death, being the twenty-third of March, the admiral being on the right side of her bed, the lord keeper on the left, and Mr Secretary Cecil (afterwards Earl of Salisbury) at the bed's feet, all standing, the lord admiral put her in mind of her speech concerning the succession had at Whitehall, and that they, in the name of all the rest of her council, came unto her to know her pleasure who should succeed; whereunto she thus replied:

'I told you my seat had been the seat of kings, and I will have no rascal to succeed me. And who should succeed me but a king?'

The lords not understanding this dark speech and looking one on the other; at length Mr Secretary boldly asked her what she meant by those words, that no rascal should succeed her. Whereunto she replied, that her meaning was, that a king should succeed: and who, quoth she, should that be but our cousin of Scotland?

'They asked her whether that were her absolute resolution? whereunto she answered, I pray you trouble me no more: for I will have none but him. With which answer they departed.

'Notwithstanding, after again, about four o'clock in the afternoon the next day, being Wednesday, after the Archbishop of Canterbury, and other divines, had been with her, and left her in a manner speechless, the three lords aforesaid repaired unto her again, asking her if she remained in her former resolution, and who should succeed her? but not being able to speak, was asked by Mr Secretary in this sort, 'We beseech your majesty, if you remain in your former resolution, and that you would have the king of Scots to succeed you in your kingdom, show some sign unto us: whereat, suddenly heaving herself upwards in her bed, and putting her arms out of bed, she held her hands jointly over her head in manner of a crown; whence, as they guessed, she signified that she did not only wish him the kingdom, but desire continuance of his estate: after which they departed, and the next morning she died. Immediately after her death, all the lords, as well of the council as other noblemen that were at the court, came from Richmond to Whitehall by six o'clock in the morning, where other noblemen that were in London met them. Touching the succession, after some speeches of divers competitors and matters of State, at length the admiral rehearsed all the aforesaid premises which the late queen had spoken to him, and to the lord keeper, and Mr Secretary (Cecil,) with the manner thereof; which they being asked, did affirm to be true upon their honour.'

Such is this singular document of secret history. I cannot but value it as authentic, because the one part is evidently alluded to by Camden, and the other is fully confirmed by Cary; and besides this, the remarkable expression of 'rascal' is found in the letter of the French ambassador. There were two interviews with the queen, and Cary appears only to have noticed the last on Wednesday, when the queen lay speechless. Elizabeth all her life had persevered in an obstinate mysteriousness respecting the succession, and it harassed her latest moments

The second interview of her ministers may seem to us quite supernumerary; but Cary's 'putting her hand to her head,' too meagrely describes the 'joining her hands in manner of a crown.'

JAMES THE FIRST, AS A FATHER AND A HUSBAND.

Calumnies and sarcasms have reduced the character of James the First to contempt among general readers; while the narrative of historians, who have related facts in spite of themselves, is in perpetual contradiction with their own opinions. Perhaps no sovereign has suffered more by that art, which is described by an old Irish proverb, of 'killing a man by lies.' The surmises and the insinuations of one party, dissatisfied with the established government in church and state; the misconceptions of more modern writers, who have not possessed the requisite knowledge; and the anonymous libels, sent forth at a particular period to vilify the Stuarts; all these cannot be treasured up by the philosopher as the authorities of history. It is at least more honourable to resist popular prejudice than to yield to it a passive obedience; and what we can ascertain, it would be a dereliction of truth to conceal. Much can be substantiated in favour of the domestic affections and habits of this pacific monarch; and those who are more intimately acquainted with the secret history of the times will perceive how erroneously the personal character of this sovereign is exhibited in our popular historians, and often even among the few, who with better information, have re-echoed their preconceived opinions.

Confining myself here to his domestic character, I shall not touch on the many admirable public projects of this monarch, which have extorted the praise, and even the admiration of some who have not spared their pens in his disparagement. James the First has been taxed with pusillanimity and foolishness; this monarch cannot, however, be reproached with having engendered them! All his children, in whose education their father was so deeply concerned, sustained through life a dignified character, and a high spirit. The short life of Henry was passed in a school of prowess, and amidst an academy of literature. Of the king's paternal solicitude, even to the hand and the letter-writing of Prince Henry when young, I have preserved a proof in the article of 'The History of Writing-masters.' Charles the First, in his youth more particularly designed for a studious life, with a serious character, was, however, never deficient in active bravery, and magnanimous fortitude. Of Elizabeth, the Queen of Bohemia, tried as she was by such vicissitudes of fortune, it is much to be regretted that the interesting story remains untold; her buoyant spirits rose always above the perpetual changes, of a princely to a private state—a queen to an exile! The father of such children derives some distinction for capacity, in having reared such a noble offspring; and the king's marked attention to the formation of his children's minds was such as to have been pointed out by Ben Jonson, who, in his 'Gipsies Metamorphosed,' rightly said of James, using his native term,

'You are an honest, good man, and have care of your Beams' (balms.)

Among the flouts and gibes so freely bestowing the personal character of James the First, is one of his coldness and neglect of his queen. It would, however, be difficult to prove by any known fact, that James was not as indulgent a husband, as he was a father. Yet even a writer so well informed as Daines Barrington, who, as a lawyer, could not refrain from lauding the royal rage during his visit to Denmark, on his marriage, for having borrowed three statutes from the Danish code, found the king's name so provocative of sarcasm, that he could not forbear observing, that James 'spent more time in those courts of judicature than in attending upon his destined consort.' 'Men of all sorts have taken a pride to gird at me,' might this monarch have exclaimed. But every thing has two handles, saith the ancient adage. Had an austere puritan chosen to observe that James the First, when abroad, had lived jovially; and had this historian then dropped silently the interesting circumstance of the king's 'spending his time in the Danish courts of judicature,' the fact would have borne him out in his reproach; and Francis Osborne, indeed, has censured James for giving marks of his survivance! There was no deficient gallantry in the conduct of James the First to his queen; the very circumstance, that when the Princess of Denmark was driven by a storm back to Norway, the king resolved to hasten to her, and consummate his marriage in Denmark, was itself as romantic an expedition as afterwards was that of his son's into Spain, and betrays no mark of that tame pusillanimity with which he stands overcharged.

The character of the queen of James the First is somewhat obscure in our public history, for in it she makes no prominent figure; while in secret history she is more apparent. Anne of Denmark was a spirited and enterprising woman; and it appears from a passage in Sully, whose authority should weigh with us, although we ought to recollect that it is the French minister who writes, that she seems to have raised a court faction against James, and inclined to favour the Spanish and catholic interests; yet it may be alleged as a strong proof of James's political wisdom, that the queen was never suffered to head a formidable party, though she latterly might have engaged Prince Henry in that court-opposition. The bon-homme of the king, on this subject expressed with a simplicity of style, which, though it may not be royal, is something better, appears in a letter to the queen, which has been preserved in the appendix to Sir David Dalrymple's collections. It is without date, but written when in Scotland to quiet the queen's suspicions, that the Earl of Mar, who had the care of Prince Henry, and whom she wished to take out of his hands, had insinuated to the king that her majesty was strongly disposed to any 'popish or Spanish course.' This letter confirms the representation of Sully; but the extract is remarkable for the manly simplicity of style which the king used.

'I say over again, leave these froward womanly apprehensions, for I thank God, I carry that love and respect unto you, which, by the law of God and nature, I ought to do to my wife, and mother of my children; but not for that ye are a king's daughter; for whether ye were a king's daughter, or a cook's daughter, ye must be all alike to me, since my wife. For the respect of your honourable birth and descent I married you; but the love and respect I now bear you is because that ye are my married wife, and so partaker of my honour, as of my other fortunes. I beseech you excuse my plainness in this, for casting up of your birth is a needless impertinent argument to me (that is, not pertinent.) God is my witness, I ever preferre you to (for) my bairns, much more than to a subject.'

In an ingenious historical dissertation, but one perfectly theoretical, respecting that mysterious transaction the Gowrie conspiracy, Mr Pinkerton has attempted to show that Anne of Denmark was a lady somewhat inclined to intrigue, and that 'the king had cause to be jealous.' He confesses that 'he cannot discover any positive charge of adultery against Anne of Denmark, but merely of coquetry.' To what these accusations amount it would be difficult to say. The progeny of James the First sufficiently bespeak their family resemblance. If it be true, that 'the king had ever reason to be jealous,' and yet that no single criminal act of the queen's has been recorded, it must be confessed that one or both of the parties were singularly discreet and decent; for the king never complained, and the queen was never accused, if we except this burden of an old Scottish ballad,

O the bonny Earl of Murray,
He was the queen's love.

Whatever may have happened in Scotland, in England the queen appears to have lived, occupied chiefly by the amusements of the court, and not to have interfered with the affairs of state. She appears to have indulged a passion for the elegancies and splendours of the age, as they were shown in those gorgeous court masques with which the taste of James harmonised, either from his gallantry for the queen, or his own poetic sympathy. But this taste for court masques could not escape the slur and scandal of the puritanic, and these 'high-flying fancies' are thus recorded by honest Arthur Wilson, whom we summon into court as an indubitable witness of the mutual cordiality of this royal couple. In the spirit of his party, and like Milton, he censures the taste, but likes it. He says, 'The court being a continued masquerade, where she (the queen) and her ladies, like so many sea-symphs or Nereides, appeared often in various dresses to the ravishment of the holders; the king himself not being a little delighted at such fluent elegancies as made the night more glorious than the day.' This is a direct proof that James was by no means cold or negligent in his attentions to his own; and the letter which has been given is the picture of his mind. That James the First was fondly indulgent to his queen, and could perform an act of chivalric gallantry with all the generosity of passion, and the ingenuity of elegant mind, a pleasing anecdote which I have discovered in an unpublished letter of the day will show. I re it in the words of the writer.

August, 1613.

'At their last, being at Theobald's, about a fortnight, the queen, shooting at a deer, mistook her mark, and killed Jewel, the king's most principal and special hound; which he stormed exceedingly awhile; but after he saw who did it, he was soon pacified, and with much modesty wished her not to be troubled with it, for he could love her never the worse: and the next day sent her a diamond worth two thousand pounds, as a legacy from his dead dog. Love and kindness increase daily between them.'

Such is the history of a contemporary living at court, very opposite to that representation of coldness and neglect with which the king's temper has been so freely asserted; and such too is the true portrait of James the First in domestic life. His first sensations were thoughtless and impetuous; and he would ungracefully thunder out an oath, which a puritan would set down in his 'tables,' while he omitted to note that this king's forgiveness and forgetfulness of personal injuries was sure to follow the selling they had excited.

THE MAN OF ONE BOOK.

Mr Maurice, in his animated memoirs, has recently acquainted us with a fact which may be deemed important to the life of a literary man. He tells us, 'We have been just informed that Sir Wm. Jones invariably read through every year the works of Cicero, whose life indeed was the great exemplar of his own.' The same passion for the works of Cicero has been participated by others. When he best means of forming a good style were inquired of by learned Arnauld, he advised the daily study of Cicero; but it was observed that the object was not to form a Latin, but a French style: 'In that case,' replied Arnauld, 'you must still read Cicero.'

A predilection for some great author, among the vast number which must transiently occupy our attention, seems to be the happiest preservative for our taste: accustomed to that excellent author whom we have chosen for our favourite, we may in this intimacy possibly resemble him. It is to be feared, that if we do not form such a permanent attachment, we may be acquiring knowledge, while our enervated taste becomes less and less lively. Taste enervates the knowledge which otherwise cannot preserve itself. He who has long been intimate with one great author, will always be found to be a formidable antagonist; he has saturated his mind with the excellencies of genius; he has shaped his faculties insensibly to himself by his model, and he is like a man who even sleeps in armour, ready at a moment! The old Latin proverb reminds us of this fact, Cave ab homine unius libri: be cautious of the man of one book!

Pliny and Seneca give very safe advice on reading; that we should read much, but not many books—but they had in 'monthly lists of new publications.' Since their days there have favoured us with 'Methods of Study,' and Catalogues of Books to be read.' Vain attempts to inscribe that invisible circle of human knowledge which is perpetually enlarging itself! The multiplicity of books is an evil for the many; for we now find an hellus of books, not only among the learned, but, with their parents, among the unlearned; for those who, even to the prejudice of their health, persist only in reading the incessant book-novelties of our own time, will after many years acquire a sort of learned ignorance. We are now want of an art to teach how books are to be read, rather than not to read them; such an art is practicable. But amidst this vast multitude still let us be 'the man of one book,' and preserve an uninterrupted intercourse with that great author with whose mode of thinking we sympathize, and whose charms of composition we can habitually re-

It is remarkable that every great writer appears to have a predilection for some favourite author; and with Alexander, had they possessed a golden casket, would have enshrined the works they so constantly turned over. Demosthenes felt such delight in the history of Thucydides, that to obtain a familiar and perfect mastery of his style, he re-copied his history eight times; while Brutus not only was constantly perusing Polybius even amidst the most busy periods of his life, but was abridging a copy of that author on the last awful night of his existence, when on the following day he was to try his fate against Antony and Octavius. Selim the Second had the Commentaries of Cæsar translated for his use; and it is recorded that his military ardour was heightened by the perusal. We are told that Scipio Africanus was made a hero by the writings of Xenophon. When Clarendon was employed in writing his history, he was in a constant study of Livy and Tacitus, to acquire the full and flowing style of the one, and the portrait-painting of the other: he records this circumstance in a letter. Voltaire had usually on his table the Athalie of Racine, and the Petit Cæcure of Massillon; the tragedies of the one were the finest model of French verse, the sermons of the other of French prose. 'Were I obliged to sell my library,' exclaimed Diderot, 'I would keep back Moses, Homer, and Richardson; and by the eloge which this enthusiastic writer composed on our English novelist, it is doubtful, had the Frenchman been obliged to have lost two of them, whether Richardson had not been the elected favourite. Monsieur Thomas, a French writer, who at times displays high eloquence and profound thinking, Hérault de Séchelles tells us, studied chiefly one author, but that author was Cicero; and never went into the country unaccompanied by some of his works. Fenelon was constantly employed on his Homer; he left a translation of the greater part of the Odyssey, without any design of publication, but merely as an exercise for style. Montesquieu was a constant student of Tacitus, of whom he must be considered a forcible imitator. He has, in the manner of Tacitus, characterized Tacitus: 'That historian,' he says, 'who abridged everything, because he saw every thing.' The famous Bourdaloue re-perused every year Saint Paul, Saint Chrysostom, and Cicero. 'These,' says a French critic, 'were the sources of his masculine and solid eloquence.' Grotius had such a taste for Lucan, that he always carried a pocket edition about him, and has been seen to kiss his hand-book with the rapture of a true votary. If this anecdote be true, the elevated sentiments of the stern Roman were probably the attraction with the Batavian republican. The diversified reading of Leibnitz is well known; but he still attached himself to one or two favourites: Virgil was always in his hand when at leisure, and Leibnitz had read Virgil so often, that even in his old age he could repeat whole books by heart; Barclay's Argenis was his model for prose; when he was found dead in his chair, the Argenis had fallen from his hands. Rabelais and Marot were the perpetual favourites of La Fontaine; from one he borrowed his humour, and from the other his style. Quevedo was so passionately fond of the Don Quixote of Cervantes, that often in reading that unrivalled work he felt an impulse to burn his own inferior compositions: to be a sincere admirer and a hopeless rival is a case of authorship the hardest imaginable. Few writers can venture to anticipate the award of posterity; yet perhaps Quevedo had not even been what he was, without the perpetual excitement he received from his great master. Horace was the friend of his heart to Malherbe; he laid the Roman poet on his pillow, took him in the fields, and called his Horace his breviary. Plutarch, Montaigne, and Locke, were the three authors constantly in the hands of Rousseau, and he has drawn from them the groundwork of his ideas in his Emilie. The favourite author of the great Earl of Chatham was Barrow; on his style he had formed his eloquence, and had read his great master so constantly, as to be able to repeat his elaborate sermons from memory. The great Lord Burleigh always carried Tully's Offices in his pocket; Charles V. and Eusebius had Machiavel frequently in their hands; and Davis was the perpetual study of Hampden: he seemed to have discovered in that historian of civil wars those which he anticipated in the hand of his fathers.

These facts sufficiently illustrate the recorded circumstance of Sir William Jones's invariable habit of reading his Cicero through every year, and exemplify the happy result for him, who, amidst the multiplicity of his authors, still continues in this way to be 'the man of one book.'

A BIBLIOGONISTE.

A startling literary prophecy, recently sent forth from our oracular literature, threatens the annihilation of Public Libraries, which are one day to moulder away!

Listen to the vaticinator! 'As conservatories of mental treasures, their value in times of darkness and barbarity was incalculable; and even in these happier days, when men are incited to explore new regions of thought, they command respect as depots of methodical and well-ordered references for the researches of the curious. But what in one state of society is invaluable, may at another be worthless; and the progress which the world has made within a very few centuries has considerably reduced the estimation which is due to such establishments. We will say more"—but enough! This idea of striking into dust 'the god of his idolatry,' the Dragon of his devotion, is sufficient to terrify the bibliographer, who views only a blind Samson pulling down the pillars of his temple!

This future universal inundation of books, this superfluity of knowledge, in billions and trillions, overwhelms the imagination! It is now about four hundred years since the art of multiplying books has been discovered; and an arithmetician has attempted to calculate the incalculable of these four ages of typography, which he discovers have actually produced 3,641,960 works! Taking each work at three volumes, and reckoning only each impression to consist of three hundred copies, which is too little, the actual amount from the presses of Europe will give to 1816—32,776,400 volumes! each of which being an inch thick, if placed on a line, would cover 6000 leagues! Leibnitz facetiously maintained that such would be the increase of literature, that future generations would find whole cities insufficient to contain their libraries. We are, however, indebted to the patriotic endeavours of our grocers and trunkmakers, alchemists of literature! they annihilate the gross bodies without injuring the finer spirits. We are still more indebted to that neglected race, the bibliographers!

The science of books, for so bibliography is sometimes dignified, may deserve the gratitude of a public, who are yet insensible of the useful zeal of those book-practitioners, the nature of whose labours is yet so imperfectly comprehended. Who is this vaticinator of the uselessness of public libraries? Is he a bibliogoniste, or a bibliographe, or a bibliomane, or a bibliophile, or a bibliotaph? A bibliothecaire, or a bibliopole, the prophet cannot be; for the bibliothecaire is too delightfully busied among his shelves, and the bibliopole is too profitably concerned in furnishing perpetual additions, to admit of this hyperbolic terror of annihilation!

Unawares, we have dropped into that professional jargon which was chiefly forged by one who, though seated in the 'scornful's chair,' was the Thaumaturgus of books and manuscripts. The Abbé Rive had acquired a singular taste and curiosity, not without a fermenting dash of singular charlatanerie, in bibliography: the little volumes he occasionally put forth are things which but few hands have touched. He knew well, that for some books to be noised about they should not be read: this was one of those recondite mysteries of his, which we may have occasion further to reveal. This bibliographical hero was librarian to the most magnificent of book-collectors, the Duke de la Vallière. The Abbé Rive was a strong but ungovernable brute, rabid, surly, but tres mordant. His master, whom I have discovered to have been the partner of the cur's tricks, would often pat him: and when the bibliogonistes and the bibliomanes were in the heat of contest, let his 'bull-dog' loose among them, as the duke affectionately called his librarian. The 'bull-dog' of bibliography appears, too, to have had the taste and appetite of the tiger of politics, but he hardly lived to join the festival of the guillotine. I judge of this by an expression he used to one complaining of his parish priest, whom he advised to give 'une messe dans sa ventre!' He had tried to exhaust his genius in La Chasse aux Bibliographes et aux Antiquaires mal avisés, and acted Cain with his brothers.

* Edinburgh Review, vol. xxiv.—384.

† Will this writer pardon me for ranking him, for a moment, among those 'generalisers' of the age who excel in what a critical friend has happily discriminated as ambitious writing; that is, writing on any topic, and not least strikingly, on that of which they know least; men otherwise of fine taste, and who excel in every charm of composition.

All Europe was to receive from him new ideas concerning books and manuscripts. Yet all his mighty project fumed away in projects; and though he appeared for a moment correcting the blunders of others, this French Rameau left enough of his own to afford them a choice of errors. His style of criticism was perfectly Ritsonian. He subscribes one of his rivals, as l'insolent et triomphant ennemi de Palmarach de Gotha, on the simple subject of the game of playing cards!

The Abbé Rive was one of those men of letters, of whom there are not a few, who pass all their lives in preparations. Mr Dibdin, since the above was written, has witnessed the confusion of the mind, and the genius industry, of our bibliogoniste, which consisted of many trunks full of memoranda. The description will show the reader to what hard hunting these book-hunters voluntarily doom themselves, with little hope of obtaining fame! 'In one trunk were about six thousand notices of MSS of all ages. In another were wedged about twelve thousand descriptions of books in all languages, except those of French and Italian; sometimes with critical notes. In a third trunk was a bundle of papers relating to the History of the Troubadours. In a fourth was a collection of memoranda and literary sketches connected with the invention of arts and sciences, with pieces exclusively bibliographical. A fifth trunk contained between two and three thousand cards, written upon each side, respecting a collection of prints. In a sixth trunk were contained his papers respecting earthquakes, volcanoes, and geographical subjects.' This Ajias Agagelister of the bibliographical tribe, who was, as Mr Dibdin observes, 'the terror of his acquaintance, and the pride of his patron,' used to have been in private a very different man from his public character: all which may be true, without allowing a shade of that public character. The French revolution showed how men, mild and even kind in domestic life, were sanguinary and ferocious in their public.

The rabid Abbé Rive gloried in terrifying, without enlightening his rivals; he exulted that he was devoting 'the rods of criticism and the laughter of Europe to the bibliopoles,' or dealers in books, who would not get by heart his 'Catechism' of a thousand and one questions and answers: it broke the slumbers of honest De Bar, who had found that life was already too short for his own 'Bibliographic Instructive.'

The Abbé Rive had contrived to catch the shades of the appellatives necessary to discriminate book-amateurs; and of the first term he is acknowledged to be the inventor.

A bibliogoniste, from the Greek, is one knowing in titles, pages and colophons, and in editions; the place and year when printed; the presses whence issued; and all the minutiae of a book.

A bibliophile is a describer of books and other literary arrangements.

A bibliomane is an indiscriminate accumulator, who blunders faster than he buys, cock-brained, and purse-heavy!

A bibliophile, the lover of books, is the only one in the class, who appears to read them for his own pleasure.

A bibliotaph buries his books by keeping them under lock, or framing them in glass-cases.

I shall catch our bibliogoniste in the hour of book-rapture! It will produce a collection of bibliographical writers, and show to the second-sighted Edinburgher what human contrivances have been raised by the art of more painful writers than himself—either to postpone the day of universal annihilation, or to preserve for our posterity three centuries hence, the knowledge which now so busily occupies us, and to transmit to them something more than what Bacon calls 'Inventories' of our literary treasures.

'Histories, and literary bibliothèques (or bibliothecae) will always present to us,' says La Rive, 'an immense harvest of errors, till the authors of such catalogues shall be fully impressed by the importance of their art; and as it were, reading in the most distant ages of the future the literary good and evil which they may produce, force a triumph from the pure devotion to truth, in spite of all the disgusts which their professional tasks involve; still patiently enduring the heavy chains which bind down those who give themselves up to this pursuit, with a passion which resembles herism.'

The catalogues of bibliothèques lres (or critical, historical, and classified accounts of writers) have engendered that enormous swarm of bibliographical errors, which have spread their roots, in greater or less quantities, in all

r bibliographers. He has here furnished a long list, which I shall preserve in the note.*

The list, though curious, is by no means complete. Such is the men of whom the Abbé Rive speaks with more respect than his accustomed courtesy. 'If such,' says he, 'cannot escape from errors, who shall? I have only asked them out to prove the importance of bibliographical history. A writer of this sort must occupy himself with more regard for his reputation than his own profit, and yield himself up entirely to the study of books.'

The mere knowledge of books, which has been called a erudition of title pages, may be sufficient to occupy the h of some; and while the wits and 'the million' are fulfilling these hunters of editions, who force their passage through secluded spots, as well as course in the open air, it will be found that this art of book-knowledge may run out to be a very philosophical pursuit, and that men of great name have devoted themselves to labours, more frequently contemned than comprehended. Apostolo Zeno, a poet, a critic, and a true man of letters, considered as so small portion of his glory, to have annotated Fontenini, who, himself an eminent prelate, had passed his life in forming his Bibliotheca Italica. Zeno did not consider that to correct errors, and to enrich by information his catalogue of Italian writers was a mean task. The enthusiasm of the Abbé Rive considered bibliography as a sublime pursuit, exclaiming on Zeno's Commentary on Fontenini:—'He chained together the knowledge of whole generations for posterity, and he read in future ages.'

There are few things by which we can so well trace the history of the human mind as by a classed catalogue, with dates of the first publication of books; even the relative prices of books at different periods, their decline and their rise, and again their fall, form a chapter in this history of the human mind; we become critics even by his literary chronology, and this appraisal of successors. The favourite book of every age is a certain picture of the people. The gradual depreciation of a great author marks a change in knowledge or in taste.

But it is imagined that we are not interested in the history of indifferent writers, and scarcely in that of the secondary ones. If none but great originals should claim our attention, in the course of two thousand years we should not count twenty authors! Every book whatever be its character, may be considered as a new experiment made in the human understanding; and as a book is a sort of individual representation, not a solitary volume exists but may be personified, and described as a human being.—Faint start discoveries: they are usually found in very different authors who could go no further; and the historian of obscure books is often preserving for men of genius indications of knowledge, which without his intervention, we should not possess! Many secrets we discover in bibliography. Great writers, unskilled in this science of books, have frequently used defective editions, as Hume did the castrated White Locke; or like Robertson, they are ignorant of even the sources of the knowledge they would give the public; or they compose on a subject which too late they discover had been anticipated. Bibliography will show what has been done, and suggest to our invention what is wanted. Many have often protracted their journey in a road which had already been worn out by the wheels which had traversed it: bibliography unrolls the whole map of the country we propose travelling over—the beaten roads, and the by-paths.

Every half century, indeed, the obstructions multiply: and the Edinburgh prediction, should it approximate to be event it has foreseen, may more reasonably terrify a distant posterity. Mazzuchelli declared after his laborious researches in Italian literature, that one of his late recent predecessors, who had commenced a similar work, had collected notices of forty thousand writers—and he adds, my work must increase that number to ten thousand more! Mazzuchelli said this in 1753; and the number of half a century must now be added, for the presses of Italy have not been inactive. But the literature of Germany, of France, and of England, has exceeded the multiplicity of the productions of Italy, and an appalling population of authors swarm before the imagination. Hail then the peaceful spirit of the literary historian, which sitting amidst the night of time, by the monuments of genius trims the sepulchral lamps of the human mind! Hail to the literary Reaumur, who by the clearness of his glasses makes even the minute interesting, and reveals to us the world of insects! These are guardian spirits, who at the close of every century standing on its ascent, trace out the old roads we have pursued, and with a lighter line indicate the new ones which are opening, from the imperfect attempts, and even the errors of our predecessors!

SECRET HISTORY OF AN ELECTIVE MONARCHY.

A Political Sketch.

Poland, once a potent and magnificent kingdom, when it sunk into an elective monarchy, became 'vocal thrice an age.' That country must have exhibited many a diplomatic scene of intricate intrigue, which although they could not appear in its public, have no doubt been often consigned to its secret history. With us the corruption of a rotten borough has sometimes exposed the guarded proffer of one party, and the dexterous chaffering of the other: but a master-piece of diplomatic finesse and political invention, electioneering viewed on the most magnificent scale, with a kingdom to be canvassed, and a crown to be won and lost, or lost and won in the course of a single day, exhibits a political drama, which, for the honour and happiness of mankind, is of rare and strange occurrence. There was one scene in this drama, which might appear somewhat too large for an ordinary theatre; the actors apparently were not less than fifty to a hundred thousand; twelve vast tents were raised on an extensive plain, a hundred thousand horses were in the environs—and palatines and castellans, the ecclesiastical orders, with the ambassadors of the royal competitors, all agitated by the ceaseless motion of different factions during the six weeks of the election, and of many preceding months of preconcerted measures and vacillating opinions, now were all solemnly assembled at the diet.—Once the poet, amidst his gigantic conception of a scene, resolved to leave it out;

'So vast a thing the stage can ne'er contain—

Then build a new, or act it in a plain.'

exclaimed 'La Mancha's knight,' kindling at a scene so novel and so vast!

Such an electioneering negotiation, the only one I am acquainted with, is opened in the 'Discours' of Choinis, the secretary of Montluc, bishop of Valence, the confidential agent of Catharine de Medicis, and who was sent to intrigue at the Polish diet, to obtain the crown of Poland for her son the Duke of Anjou, afterwards Henry III. This bold enterprise at the first seemed hopeless, and in its progress encountered growing obstructions; but Montluc was one of the most finished diplomatists that the genius of the Gallic cabinet ever sent forth. He was nicknamed in all the courts of Europe, from the circumstance of his limping, 'le Boiteux,' our political bishop was in cabinet intrigues the Talleyrand of his age, and sixteen embassies to Italy, Germany, England, Scotland, and Turkey, had made this 'Connoisseur en hommes' an extraordinary politician!

Catharine de Medicis was infatuated with the dreams of judicial astrology: by her pensioned oracles had declared that she should live to see each of her sons crowned, by which prediction probably they had only purposed to flatter her pride and her love of dominion. They, however, ended in terrifying the credulous queen; and she dreading to witness a throne in France, disputed perhaps by fratricides, anxiously sought for a separate crown for each of her three sons. She had been trifled with in her earnest negotiations with our Elizabeth; twice had she seen herself baffled in her views in the Dukes of Alençon and of Anjou. Catharine then projected a new empire for Anjou, by incorporating into one kingdom Algiers, Corsica, and Sardinia; but the other despot, he of Constantinople, Solim II, dissipated the brilliant speculation of our female Machiavel. Charles IX was sickly, jealous and desirous of removing from the court the Duke of Anjou, whom two victories had made popular, though he afterwards sunk into a Sardanapalus. Montluc penetrated into the secret wishes of Catharine and Charles, and suggested to them the possibility of encircling the brows of Anjou, with the diadem to Poland, the Polish monarch then being in a state of visible decline. The project was approved; and like a profound politician, the bishop prepared for an event which might be remote, and always problematical, by sending into Poland a natural son of his, Balagny, as a disguised agent; his youth, his humble rank, and his love of pleasure, would not create any alarm among the neighbouring powers, who were alike on the watch to snatch the expected spoil; but as it was necessary to have a more dexterous politician behind the curtain, he recommended his secretary Choinain as a travelling tutor to a youth who appeared to want one.

Balagny proceeded to Poland, where, under the veil of dissipation, and in the midst of splendid festivities, with his trusty adjutant, this hare-brained boy of revoly began to weave those intrigues which were afterwards to be knotted, or untied, by Montluc himself. He had contrived to be so little suspected, that the agent of the emperor had often disclosed important secrets to his young and amiable friend. On the death of Sigismund Augustus, Balagny, leaving Choinain behind to trumpet forth the virtues of Anjou, hastened to Paris to give an account of all which he had seen or heard. But poor Choinain found himself in a dilemma among those who had so long listened to his panegyrics on the humanity and meek character of the Duke of Anjou; for the news of St Bartholomew's massacre had travelled faster than the post; and Choinain complains that he was now treated as an impudent liar, and the French prince as a monster. In vain he assured them that the whole was an exaggerated account, a mere insurrection of the people, or the effects of a few private enmities, praying the indignant Poles to suspend their decision till the Bishop came: 'Attendez le Boiteux!' cried he in agony.

Meanwhile, at Paris, the choice of a proper person for this embassy had been difficult to settle. It was a business of intrigue, more than of form, and required an orator to make speeches and addresses in a sort of popular assembly; for though the people, indeed, had no concern in the Diet, yet the greater and the lesser nobles and gentlemen, all electors, were reckoned at one hundred thousand. It was supposed that a lawyer or who could negotiate in good Latin, and one, as the French proverb runs, who could aller et parler, would more effectually puzzle their heads, and satisfy their consciences in vote for his client. Catharine at last fixed on Montluc himself, from the superstitious prejudice, which however, in this case accorded with philosophical experience, 'that Montluc had ever been lucky in his negotiations.'

Montluc hastened his departure from Paris; and it appears that our political bishop had, by his skillful penetration into the French cabinet, foreseen the horrible catastrophe which occurred very shortly after he had left it; for he had warned the Count of Rochefoucault to absent himself; but this lord, like so many others, had no suspicions of the perfidious projects of Catharine and her cabinet. Montluc, however, had not long been on his journey, ere the news reached him, and it occasioned innumerable obstacles in his progress, which even his sagacity had not calculated on. At Strasburgh he had appointed to meet some able coadjutors, among whom was the famous Joseph Scaliger; but they were so terrified by les Maledictions Parisiennes, that Scaliger flew to Geneva, and would not budge out of that safe corner; and the others ran home, not imagining that Montluc would venture to pass through Germany, where the protestant indignation had made the roads too hot for a catholic bishop. But Montluc had set his cast on the die. He had already passed through several hair-breadth escapes from the stratagems of the Guise faction, who more than once attempted to hang or drown the bishop, whom they cried out was a Calvinist; the fears and jealousies of the Guises had been roused by this political mission. Among all these troubles and delays, Montluc was most affected by the rumour that the election was on the point of being made, and that the plague was universal throughout Poland; so that he must have felt that he might be too late for the one, and too early for the other.

At last Montluc arrived, and found that the whole weight of this negotiation was to fall on his single shoulders; and further, that he was to sleep every night on a pillow of thorns. Our bishop had not only to allay the ferment of the popular spirit of the evangelists, as the protestants were then called, but even of the more rational catholics of Poland. He had also to face those haughty and feudal lords, of whom each considered himself the equal of the sovereign whom he created, and whose avowed principle was, and many were incorrupt, that their choice of a sovereign should be regulated solely by the public interest; and it was hardly to be expected that the emperor, the czar, and the king of Sweden, would prove unsuccessful rivals to the cruel, and voluptuous, and bigoted duke of Anjou, whose political interests were too remote and novel to have raised any faction among these independent Poles.

The emperor had set to work the Abbé Cyrre in a sort of ambiguous character, an envoy for the nonce, to be acknowledged or disavowed as was convenient, and by his activity he obtained considerable influence among the Lithuanians, the Wallachians, and nearly all Prussia, in favour of the Arch-duke Ernest. Two Bohemians, who had the advantage of speaking the Polish language, had arrived with a state and magnificence becoming kings rather than ambassadors. The Moscovites had written letters full of golden promises to the nobility, and was supported by a palatine of high character; a perpetual peace between two such great neighbours was too inviting a project not to find advocates; and this party, Choinain observes, appeared at first the most to be feared. The King of Sweden was a close neighbour who had married the sister of their late sovereign, and his son urged his family claims as superior to those of foreigners. Among these parties was a patriotic one, who were desirous of a Pole for their monarch; a king of their father-land, speaking their mother-tongue, one who would not strike at the independence of his country, but preserve its integrity from the stranger. This popular party was even agreeable to several of the foreign powers themselves, who did not like to see a rival power strengthening itself by so strict a union with Poland; but in this choice of a sovereign from among themselves, there were at least thirty lords who equally thought that they were the proper wood of which kings should be carved out. The Poles therefore could not agree on the Pole who deserved to be a Piasie; an endearing title for a native monarch, which originated in the name of the family of the Piasie, who had reigned happily over the Polish people for the space of five centuries! The remembrance of their virtues existed in the minds of the honest Poles in this affectionate title, and their party were called the Piasie.

Montluc had been deprived of the assistance he had depended on from many able persons, whom the massacre of St Bartholomew had frightened away from every French political connexion. He found that he had himself only to depend on. We are told that he was not provided with the usual means which are considered most efficient in elections, nor possessed the interest nor the splendour of his powerful competitors: he was to derive all his resources from diplomatic finesse. The various ambassadors had fixed and distant residences, that they might not hold too close an intercourse with the Polish nobles. Of all things, he was desirous to obtain an easy access to these chiefs, that he might observe, and that they might listen. He who would seduce by his own ingenuity must come in contact with the object he would corrupt. Yet Montluc persisted in not approaching them without being sought after, which answered his purpose in the end. One favourite argument which our Talleyrand had set afloat, was to show that all the benefits which the different competitors had promised to the Poles were accompanied by other circumstances which could not fail to be ruinous to the country; while the offer of his master, whose interests were remote, could not be adverse to those of the Polish nation: so that much good might be expected from him, without any fear of accompanying evil. Montluc procured a clever Frenchman to be the bearer of his first despatch, in Latin, to the Diet; which had hardly assembled, ere suspicions and jealousies were already breaking out. The emperor's ambassadors had offended the pride of the Polish nobles by travelling about the country without leave, and resorting to the infants; and besides, as some intercepted letters the Polish nation was denominated as gens barbara et gens inepta. 'I do not think that the said letter was really written by the said ambassador, who were statesmen too politic to employ such unguarded language,' very ingeniously writes the secretary of Montluc. However, it was a blow levelled at the imperial ambassadors; while the letter of the French bishop, one posed 'in a humble and modest style,' began to melt their proud spirits, and two thousand copies of the French bishop's letter were eagerly spread.

'But this good fortune did not last more than four-and-twenty hours,' mournfully writes our honest secretary; 'for suddenly the news of the fatal day of St Bartholomew arrived, and every Frenchman was detested.'

Montluc, in this distress, published an apology for les Matinés Parisiennes, which he reduced to some excesses of the people, the result of a conspiracy plotted by the protestants; and he adroitly introduced as a personage his master Anjou, declaring that 'he scorned to oppress a party whom he had so often conquered with sword in hand.' This pamphlet, which still exists, must have cost the good bishop some invention; but in elections the lie of the moment serves a purpose; and although Montluc was in due time bitterly recriminated on, still the apology served to divide public opinion.

Montluc was a whole cabinet to himself: he dispersed another tract in the character of a Polish gentleman, in which the French interests were urged by such arguments, that the leading chiefs never met without disputing; and Montluc now found that he had succeeded in creating a French party. The Austrian then employed a real Polish gentleman to write for his party; but this was too genuine a production, for the writer wrote too much in earnest; and in politics we must not be in a passion.

The mutual jealousies of each party assisted the views of our negotiator; they would side with him against each other. The archduke and the czar opposed the Turk; the Muscovite could not endure that Sweden should be aggrandized by this new crown; and Denmark was still more uneasy. Montluc had discovered how every party had its vulnerable point, by which it could be managed. The cards had now got fairly shuffled, and he depended on his usual good play.

Our bishop got hold of a palatine to write for the French cause in the vernacular tongue; and appears to have held a more mysterious intercourse with another palatine, Albert Laskev. Mutual accusations were made in the open diet; the Poles accused some Lithuanian lords of having contracted certain engagements with the czar; these in return accused the Poles, and particularly this Laskev, with being corrupted by the gold of France. Another circumstance afterwards arose; the Spanish ambassador had forty thousand thalers sent to him, but which never passed the frontiers, as this fresh supply arrived too late for the election. 'I believe,' writes our secretary with great simplicity, 'that this money was only designed to distribute among the trumpeters and the tabourniers.' The usual expedient in contested elections was now evidently introduced; our secretary acknowledging that Montluc daily acquired new supporters, because he did not attempt to gain them over merely by promises—resting his whole cause on this argument, that the interest of the nation was concerned in the French election.

Still would ill fortune cross our crafty politician when every thing was proceeding smoothly. The massacre was refreshed with more damning particulars; some letters were forged, and others were but too true: all parties, with rival intrepidity, were carrying on a complete scene of deception. A rumour spread that the French king disavowed his accredited agent, and apologized to the emperor for having yielded to the importunities of a political speculator, whom he was now resolved to recall. This somewhat paralysed the exertions of those palatines who had involved themselves in the intrigues of Montluc, who was now forced patiently to wait for the arrival of a courier with renewed testimonials of his diplomatic character from the French court. A great odium was cast on the French in the course of this negotiation by a distribution of prints, which exposed the most inventive cruelties practised by the catholics on the reformed; such as women cleaved in half, in the act of attempting to snatch their children from their butchers; while Charles the Ninth and the Duke of Anjou, were hideously represented in their persons, and as spectators of such horrid tragedies, with words written in labels, complaining that the executioners were not zealous enough in this holy work. These prints, accompanied by libels and by horrid narratives, inflamed the popular indignation, and more particularly the women, who were affected to tears, as if these horrid scenes had been passing before their eyes.

Montluc replied to the libels as fast as they appeared,

while he skillfully introduced the most elaborate panegyrics on the Duke of Anjou; and in return for the caricatures, he distributed two portraits of the king and the duke, to show the ladies, if not the diet, that neither of these princes had such ferocious and inhuman faces. Such are the small means by which the politician condescends to work his great designs; and the very means by which his enemies thought they should ruin his cause, Montluc adroitly turned to his own advantage. Any thing of instant occurrence serves electioneering purposes, and Montluc eagerly seized this favourable occasion to exhaust his imagination on an ideal sovereign, and to hazard, with address, anecdotes, whose authenticity he could never have proved, till he perplexed even unwilling minds to be uncertain whether that intolerant and inhuman duke was not the most heroic and most merciful of princes. It is probable that the Frenchman abused even the license of the French eloge, for a noble Pole told Montluc that he was amplifying his duke with such ideal greatness, and attributing to him such immaculate purity of sentiment, that it was inferred there was no man in Poland who could possibly equal him; and that his declaration, that the duke was not desirous of reigning over Poland to possess the wealth and the grandeur of the kingdom, and that he was solely ambitious of the honour to be the head of such a great and virtuous nobility, had offended many lords, who did not believe that the duke sought the Polish crown merely to be the sovereign of a virtuous people.

These Polish statesmen appear, indeed, to have been more enlightened than the subtle politician perhaps calculated on; for when Montluc was over anxious to exculpate the Duke of Anjou from having been an actor in the Parisian massacre, a noble Pole observed, 'That he need not lose his time at framing any apologies; for if he could prove that it was the interest of the country that the duke ought to be elected their king, it was all that was required. His cruelty, were it true, would be no reason to prevent his election, for we have nothing to dread from it: once in our kingdom, he will have more reason to fear us than we him, should he ever attempt our lives, our property, or our liberty.'

Another Polish lord, whose scruples were as pious as his patriotism was suspicious, however observed that, in his conferences with the French bishop, the bishop had never once mentioned God, whom all parties ought to implore to touch the hearts of the electors in their choice of God's 'anointed.' Montluc might have felt himself unexpectedly embarrassed at the religious scruples of this lord, but the politician was never at a fault. 'Speaking to a man of letters, as his lordship was,' replied the French bishop, 'it was not for him to remind his lordship what he so well knew; but since he had touched on the subject, he would, however, say that were a sick man desirous of having a physician, the friend who undertook to procure one would not do his duty should he say it was necessary to call in one whom God had chosen to restore his health; but another who should say that the most learned and skilful is him whom God has chosen, would be doing the best for the patient, and evince most judgment. By a parity of reason we must believe that God will not send an angel to point out the man whom he would have his anointed; sufficient for us that God has given us a knowledge of the requisites of a good king; and if the Polish gentlemen choose such a sovereign, it will be him whom God has chosen.' This shrewd argument delighted the Polish lord, who repeated the story in different companies, to the honour of the bishop. 'And in this manner,' adds the secretary with great naïveté, 'did the sieur strengthened by good arguments, divulge his opinions, which were received by many, and run from hand to hand.'

Montluc had his inferior manoeuvres. He had to equipoise the opposite interests of the Catholics and the Evangelists, or the Reformed: it was mingling fire and water without suffering them to hiss, or to extinguish one another. When the imperial ambassadors gave finis to the higher nobility only, they consequently offended the lesser. The Frenchman gave no banquets, but his house was open to all at all times, who were equally welcome. 'You will see that the finis of the imperialists will do them more harm than good,' observed Montluc to his secretary.

Having gained over by every possible contrivance a number of the Polish nobles, and showered his courtesies on those of the inferior orders, at length the critical moment approached, and the finishing hand was to be put to the work. Poland, with the appearance of a popular government, was a singular aristocracy of a hundred thousand electors, consisting of the higher and the lower nobility, and the gentry; the people had no concern with the government. Yet still it was to be treated by the politician as a popular government, where those who possessed the greatest influence over such large assemblies were orators, and he who delivered himself with the utmost fluency, and the most pertinent arguments, would infallibly bend every heart to the point he wished. The French bishop depended greatly on the effect which his oration was to produce when the ambassadors were respectively to be heard before the assembled Diet; the great and concluding act of so many tedious and difficult negotiations—which had cost my master,' writes the ingenious secretary, 'six months' daily and nightly labours; he had never been assisted or comforted by any but his poor servants; and in the course of these six months had written ten reams of paper, a thing which for forty years he had not used himself to.'

Every ambassador was now to deliver an oration before the assembled electors, and thirty-two copies were to be printed to present one to each palatine, who, in his turn, was to communicate it to his lords. But a fresh difficulty occurred to the French negotiator; as he trusted greatly to his address influencing the multitude, and creating a popular opinion in his favour, he regretted to find that the imperial ambassador would deliver his speech in the Bohemian language, so that he would be understood by the greater part of the assembly; a considerable advantage over Montluc, who could only address them in Latin. The inventive genius of the French bishop resolved on two things which had never before been practised; first, to have his Latin translated into the vernacular idiom; and secondly, to print an edition of fifteen hundred copies in both languages, and thus to obtain a vast advantage over the other ambassadors with their thirty-two manuscript copies, of which each copy was used to be read 1200 persons. The great difficulty was to get it secretly translated and printed. This fell to the management of Choinnin, the secretary. He set off to the castle of the palatine, Solikotski, who was deep in the French interest; Solikotski despatched the version in six days. Hastening with the precious MS, to Cracow, Choinnin flew to a trusty printer, with whom he was connected: the sheets were deposited every night at Choinnin's lodgings, and at the end of the fortnight, the diligent secretary conducted the 1500 copies in secret triumph to Warsaw.

Yet this glorious labour was not ended; Montluc was in no haste to deliver his wonder-working oration, on which the fate of a crown seemed to depend. When his turn came to be heard he suddenly fell sick; for the fact was, that he wished to speak last, which would give him the advantage of replying to any objection raised by his rivals, and admit also of an attack on their weak points. He contrived to obtain copies of their harangues, and discovered five points which struck at the French interest. Our poor bishop had now to sit up through the night to re-write five leaves of his printed oration, and cancel five which had been printed; and worse! he had to get them by heart, and to have them translated and inserted, by employing twenty scribes day and night. 'It is scarcely credible what my master went through about this time,' saith the historian of his 'gestes.'

The council or diet was held in a vast plain. Twelve pavilions were raised to receive the Polish nobility and the ambassadors. One of a circular form was supported by a single mast, and was large enough to contain 6000 persons, without any one approaching the mast nearer than by twenty steps, leaving this space void to preserve silence; the different orders were placed around; the archbishops and the bishops, the palatines, the castellans, each according to their rank. During the six weeks of the sittings of the diet, 100,000 horses were in the environs, yet forage and every sort of provisions abounded. There were no disturbances, not a single quarrel occurred, although there wanted not in that meeting for enmities of long standing. It was strange, and even awful, to view such a mighty assembly preserving the greatest order, and every one seriously intent on this solemn occasion.

At length the elaborate oration was delivered: it lasted three hours, and Choinnin assured us not a single auditor felt weary. 'A cry of joy broke out from the tent, and was re-echoed through the plain, when Montluc ceased:

it was a public acclamation; and had the election been fixed for that moment, when all hearts were warm, and the duke had been chosen without a dissenting voice. Thus writes, in rapture, the ingenious secretary; and the spirit of the times communicates a delightful assurance attending this speech, by which evidently was foreseen its happy termination. 'Those who disdain all things will take this to be a mere invention of mine,' says Louis Choinnin; 'but true it is, that while the said seigneur delivered his harangue, a lark was seen all the while upon the mast of the pavilion, singing and warbling, which was remarked by a great number of lords, because the lark is accustomed only to rest itself on the earth: the most important confessed this to be a good augury.' Also it was observed, that when the other ambassadors were speaking a hare, and at another time a hog, ran through the tent, and when the Swedish ambassador spoke, the great seigneur fell half way down. This lark singing all the while, is no little good to our cause; for many of the nobles and gentry noted this curious particularity, because when a thing which does not commonly happen occurs in a public affair, such appearances give rise to hopes either of gain or of evil.'

The singing of this lark in favour of the Duke of Anjou is not so evident, as the cunning trick of the other French agent, the political bishop of Valence, who now reaped the full advantage of his 1500 copies over the thirty-two of his rivals. Every one had the French one in hand, and read it to his friends; while the others, in manuscript, were confined to a very narrow circle.

The period from the 10th of April to the 6th of May when they proceeded to the election, proved to be an interval of infinite perplexities, troubles, and activity: it is probable that the secret history of this period of the negotiations was never written. The other ambassadors were for protracting the election, perceiving the French interest prevalent; but delay would not serve the purpose of Montluc, he not being so well provided with friends and means on the spot as the others were. The public opinion which he had succeeded in creating, by some unforeseen circumstances might change.

During this interval, the bishop had to put several agents of the other parties hors de combat. He got rid of a formidable adversary in the cardinal Commendons, an agent of the pope's, whom he proved ought not to be present at the election, and the cardinal was ordered to take his departure. A bullying colonel was set upon the French negotiator, and went about from tent to tent with a list of the debts of the Duke of Anjou, to show that the nation could expect nothing profitable from a ruined spendthrift. The page of a Polish count flew to Montluc for protection, retreating permission to accompany the bishop on his return to Paris. The servants of the count pursued the page; but this young gentleman had so insinuated himself into the favour of the bishop, that he was suffered to remain. The next day the page desired Montluc would grant him the full liberty of his religion, being an evangelist; that he might communicate this to his friends, and thus fix them to the French party. Montluc was too penetrating for this young political agent, whom he discovered to be a spy, and the pursuit of his fellows to have been a farce: he sent the page back to his master, the evangelical count, observing, that such tricks were too gross to be played on one who had managed affairs in all the courts of Europe before he came into Poland.

Another alarm was raised by a letter from the grand vizier of Selim II, addressed to the diet, in which he requested that they would either choose a king from among themselves, or elect the brother of the king of France. Some zealous Frenchman at the Sublime Porte had officiously procured this recommendation from the enemy of Christianity; but an alliance with Mahometism did no service to Montluc, either with the catholics or the evangelists. The bishop was in despair, and thought that his hard-work of six months' toil and trouble was to be shook into pieces in an hour. Montluc being shown the letter, instantly insisted that it was a forgery, designed to injure his master the duke. The letter was attended by some suspicious circumstances; and the French bishop, quick

* Our honest secretary reminds me of a passage in Geoffrey of Monmouth, who says, 'at this place an eagle spoke while the wall of the town was building; and, indeed, I should not have failed transmitting the speech to posterity, had I thought it true as the rest of the history.'

expedients, snatch at an advantage which the politician knows how to lay hold of in the chapter of accidents. The letter was not sealed with the golden seal nor enclosed in a silken purse or cloth of gold; and farther, if they examined the translation,' he said, 'they would find that it was not written on Turkish paper.' This was a piece the sieur's good fortune, for the letter was not forged; owing to the circumstance that the boyar of Wallachia had taken out the letter, to send a translation with it which his vizier had omitted, it arrived without its usual accompaniments; and the courier, when inquired after, was kept out of the way: so that, in a few days, nothing more was heard of the great vizier's letter. 'Such was our fortunate escape,' says the secretary, 'from the friendly but fatal interference of the Sultan, than which the sieur dreaded nothing so much.'

Many secret agents of the different powers were spinning their dark intrigues; and often, when discovered or concerted, the creatures were again at their 'dirty work.' These agents were conveniently disavowed or acknowledged by their employers. The abbé Cyre was a active agent of the emperor's, and though not publicly accredited, was still hovering about. In Lithuania he had managed matters so well as to have gained over that important province for the archduke; and was passing through Russia to hasten to communicate with the emperor, but some honest men, 'quelques bons personnages,' says the French secretary, and, no doubt, some good friends of his master, 'took him by surprise, and laid him up safely in the castle of Marienburgh, where truly he was a little actively used by the soldiers, who rifled his portmanteau and sent us his papers, when we discovered all his foul practices.' The emperor, it seems, was angry at the result of his secret agent; but as no one had the power of releasing the abbé Cyre at that moment, what with receiving remonstrances and furnishing replies, the time passed away, and a very troublesome adversary was in his custody during the election. The dissensions between the catholics and the evangelists were always on the point of breaking out; but Montluc succeeded in quieting these aversate parties by terrifying their imaginations with imaginary civil wars, and invasions of the Turks and the Tartars. He satisfied the catholics with the hope that he would put an end to heresy, and the evangelists were glad to obtain a truce from persecution. The day before the election Montluc found himself so confident, that he dispatched a courier to the French court, and expressed himself in the true style of a speculative politician, that he deux tables du Damier nous en avons les Neufs noires.

There were preludes to the election; and the first was probably in acquiescence with a saturnalian humour prevalent in some countries, where the lower orders are only allowed to indulge their taste for the mockery of the great at stated times and on fixed occasions. A droll scene of mock election, as well as combat, took place between the numerous Polish pages, who, with the grave secretary, are still more mischievous than our own; these elected among themselves four competitors, made a senate a burlesque the diet, and went to loggerheads. Those who represented the archduke were well beaten; the Swede was hunted down, and for the Piastis, they seized a cart belonging to a gentleman, laden with provisions, broke it to pieces, and burnt the axle-tree, which in that country is called a piast, and cried out The piast is burnt! or would the senators at the diet that day command any order or silence. The French party wore white handkerchiefs in their hats, and they were so numerous, as to defeat the others.

The next day however opened a different scene; 'the nobles prepared to deliberate, and each palatine in his quarters was with his companions on their knees, and many with tears in their eyes chanting a hymn to the Holy Host: it must be confessed, that this looked like a work of God,' says our secretary, who probably understood the manoeuvring of the mock combat, or the mock prayers, much better than we may. Every thing tells at an election, burlesque or solemnity.

The election took place, and the Duke of Anjou was proclaimed king of Poland—but the troubles of Montluc did not terminate. When they presented certain articles for his signature, the bishop discovered that these had undergone material alterations from the proposals submitted to him before the proclamation; the alterations referred to a disavowal of the Parisian massacre; the punishment of its authors, and toleration in religion. Montluc refused to sign, and cross-examined his Polish friends about the original proposals; one party agreed that some things had been changed, but that they were too trivial to lose a crown for; others declared that the alterations were necessary to allay the fears, or secure the safety of the people. Our Gallic diplomatist was outwitted, and after all his intrigues and cunning, he found that the crown of Poland was only to be delivered on conditional terms.

In this dilemma, with a crown depending on a stroke of his pen,—remonstrating, entreating, arguing, and still delaying, like Pistol swallowing his lock, he witnessed with alarm some preparations for a new election, and his rivals on the watch with their protests. Montluc, in despair, signed the conditions—'assured, however,' says the secretary, who groans over this faute, 'that when the elected monarch should arrive, the states would easily be induced to correct them, and place things in status quo, as before the proclamation. I was not a witness, being then despatched to Paris with the joyful news, but I heard that the sieur esquisse it was thought would have died in this agony, of being reduced to the hard necessity either to sign, or to lose the fruits of his labours. The conditions were afterwards for a long while disputed in France.' De Thou informs us in lib. lvii. of his history, that Montluc after signing these conditions wrote to his master, that he was not bound by them, because they did not concern Poland in general, and that they had compelled him to sign, what at the same time he had informed them his instructions did not authorize. Such was the true Jesuitic conduct of a gray-haired politician, who at length found, that honest plain sense could embarrass and finally entrap the creature of the cabinet, the artificial genius of diplomatic finesse.

The secretary, however, views nothing but his master's glory in the issue of this most difficult negotiation; and the triumph of Anjou over the youthful archduke, whom the Poles might have moulded to their will, and over the King of Sweden, who claimed the crown by his queen's side, and had offered to unite his part of Livonia with that which the Poles possessed. He labours hard to prove that the palatines and the castellans were not praticques, i. e. had their votes bought up by Montluc, as was reported; from their number and their opposite interests, he confesses that the sieur esquisse slept little, while in Poland, and that he only gained over the hearts of men by that natural gift of God, which acquired him the title of the happy ambassador. He rather seems to regret that France was not prodigal of her purchase-money, than to affirm that all palatines were alike scrupulous of their honour.

One more fact may close this political sketch; a lesson of the nature of court gratitude! The French court affected to receive Choismin with favour, but their suppressed discontent was reserved for 'the happy ambassador.' Affairs had changed; Charles IX was dying, and Catharine de Medicis in despair for a son, to whom she had sacrificed all; while Anjou, already immersed in the wantonness of youth and pleasure, considered his elevation to the throne of Poland as an exile which separated him from his depraved enjoyments. Montluc was rewarded only by incurring disgrace; Catharine de Medicis and the Duke of Anjou now looked coldly on him, and expressed their dislike of his successful mission. 'The mother of kings,' as Choismin designates Catharine de Medicis, to whom he addresses his Memoirs, with the hope of awakening her recollections of the zeal, the genius, and the success of his old master, had no longer any use for her favourite; and Montluc found, as the commentator of Choismin expresses in few words, an important truth in political morality, that 'at court the interest of the moment as the measure of its affections and its hatreds.'*

BUILDINGS IN THE METROPOLIS, AND RESIDENCE IN THE COUNTRY.

Recently more than one of our learned judges from the bench have perhaps astonished their auditors by impressing them with an old-fashioned notion of residing more on their estates than the fashionable modes of life, and the esprit de société, now overpowering all other esprit, will ever admit. These opinions excited my attention to a curious circumstance in the history of our manners—the great anxiety of our government, from the days of Elizabeth till much later than those of Charles II, to preserve the kingdom from the evils of an overgrown metropolis. The people themselves indeed participated in the same alarm at the growth of the city; while, however, they themselves were perpetuating the grievance which they complained of.

* I have drawn up this article, for the curiosity of its subject and its details, from the 'Discours au vray de tout ce qui s'est fait et passé pour l'entière négociation de l'élection du Roi de Pologne, divisée en trois livres par Jehan Choismin de Chaligny, naguères secrétaire de M. le Evêque de Valence, 1734.'

It is amusing to observe, that although the government was frequently employing even their most forcible acts to restrict the limits of the metropolis, the suburbs were gradually incorporating with the city, and Westminster at length united itself with London. Since that happy marriage, their fertile progenies have so bleasted together, that little Londons are no longer distinguishable from the ancient parent; we have succeeded in spreading the capital into a county, and have verified the prediction of James the First, that 'England will shortly be London, and London England.'

'I think it a great object,' said Justice Best, in delivering his sentiments in favour of the Game Laws, 'that gentlemen should have a temptation to reside in the country, amongst their neighbours and tenantry, whose interests must be materially advanced by such a circumstance. The links of society are thereby better preserved, and the mutual advantages and dependence of the higher and lower classes on one another are better maintained. The baneful effects of our present system we have lately seen in a neighbouring country, and an ingenious French writer has lately shown the ill consequences of it on the Continent.*

These sentiments of a living luminary of the Law afford some reason of policy for the dread which our government long entertained on account of the perpetual growth of the metropolis; the nation, like an hypocondriac, was ludicrously terrified that their head was too monstrous for their body, and that it drew all the moisture of life from the middle and the extremities. Proclamations warned and exhorted; but the very interference of a royal prohibition seemed to render the crowded city more charming; in vain the statute against new buildings was passed by Elizabeth; in vain during the reigns of James the First, and both the Charleses, we find proclamations continually issuing to forbid new erections.

James was apt to throw out his opinions in these frequent addresses to the people, who never attended to them: his majesty notices 'those swarms of gentry, who through the instigation of their wives, or to new model and fashion their daughters, (who if they were unmarried, marred their reputations, and if married lost them), did neglect their country hospitality, and cumber the city, a general nuisance to the kingdom.'—He addressed the Star-chamber to regulate 'the exorbitancy of the new buildings about the city, which were but a shelter for those who, when they had spent their estates in coaches, lacqueys and fine clothes like Frenchmen, lived miserably in their houses like Italians; but the honour of the English nobility and gentry is to be hospitable among their tenants.' Once conversing on this subject, the monarch threw out that happy illustration, which has been more than once noticed, that 'Gentlemen resident on their estates were like ships in port; their value and magnitude were felt and acknowledged; but when at a distance, as their size seemed insignificant, so their worth and importance were not duly estimated.'

A manuscript writer of the times complains of the breaking up of old family establishments, all crowding to 'upstart London.'—'Every one strives to be a Diogenes in his house, and an emperor in the streets; not caring if they sleep in a tub, so they may be hurried in a coach: giving that allowance to horses and mares, that formerly maintained houses full of men; pinching many a belly to paint a few backs, and burying all the treasures of the kingdom into a few citizens' coffers; their woods into wardrobes, their leases into laces, and their goods and chattels into guarded coats and gaudy toys.' Such is the representation of an eloquent contemporary; and however contracted might have been his knowledge of the principles of political economy, and of that prosperity which a wealthy nation is said to derive from its consumption of articles of luxury, the moral effects have not altered, nor has the scene in reality greatly changed.

The government not only frequently forbade new buildings within ten miles of London, but sometimes ordered them to be pulled down—after they had been erected several years. Every six or seven years proclamations were issued. In Charles the First's reign, offenders were sharply prosecuted by a combined operation only against houses, but against persons.† Many nobility and gentry, in 1632, were informed against having resided in the city, contrary to the late prohibition. And the attorney-general was then busy in filing bills of indictment against them, as well as for staying in town. The following curious 'injunctions in the Star-chamber will serve our purpose.

The attorney-general informs his majesty, that Elizabeth and James, by several proclamations, had commanded that 'persons of livelihood and means should in their counties, and not abide or sojourn in the city of London, so that countries remain unserved.' These proclamations were renewed by Charles the First, who observed 'a greater number of nobility and gentry, aabler sort of people, with their families, had resorted to the cities of London and Westminster, residing there, contrary to the ancient usage of the English nation;—their abiding in their several counties where their manors arise, they would not only have served his majesty according to their ranks, but by their housekeeping in parts the meaner sort of people formerly were guided, rected, and relieved.' He accused them of wasting their estates in the metropolis, which would employ and relieve the common people in their several counties. The idle and disorderly people that follow them, living in and about the cities, are no numerous, that they are not easily governed by the ordinary magistrates: mendicants increase in great number—the prices of all commodities are heightened, &c. The king had formerly proclaimed that all nobles who were not connected with public officers, at the end of forty days' notice, should resort to their several counties and with their families continue their residence there. His majesty further warned them 'Not to put themselves to unnecessary charge in providing themselves to return in winter to the said cities, as it was the king's firm resolution to withstand such great and growing evil.' The proclamation concludes with a most copious list of offenders among whom are a great number of nobility, and lords and gentlemen, who were accused of having lived in London for several months after the given warning of forty days. It appears that most of them, to elude the grasp of the law, had contrived to make a show of quitting the metropolis, and after a short absence had again returned; 'and to the service of your majesty and your people in the several counties have been neglected and undone.'

Such is the substance of this curious information, which enables us, at least, to collect the ostensible motives for this singular prohibition. Proclamations had hitherto been considered little more than the news of the morning, and three days afterwards were as much read as the last week's newspapers. They were now, however, resorted to stretch forth the strong arm of law, and to terrify by example. The constables were commanded to bring in a list of the names of strangers, and the time they proposed to fix their residence in their parishes. A remarkable victim on this occasion was a Mr Palmer, a Sussex gentleman, who was brought ore tenus into the Star-chamber, for disobeying the proclamation for living in the country. Palmer was a squire of a 1000*l* per annum, then a considerable income. He appears to have been some rich bachelor; for in his defence he alleged that he had never been married, never was a housekeeper, and had no house fitting for a man of his birth to reside in, as his mansion in the country had been burnt down within two years. These reasons appeared to his judges to aggravate rather than extenuate his offence; and after a long reprimand for having deserted his tenants and neighbours, they heavily fined him in one thousand pounds.†

The condemnation of this Sussex gentleman struck a terror through a wide circle of sojourners in the metropolis. I find accounts, pathetic enough, of their 'packing away on all sides for fear of the worst,' and gentlemen 'grumbling that they should be confined to their houses; and this was sometimes backed too by a second proclamation, respecting 'their wives and families, and also widows,' which was 'divus sermo to the women. It is no-

pleasing to all,' says the letter writer, 'but least of all the women.' 'To encourage gentlemen to live willingly in the country,' says another letter writer, game-fowl, as pheasants, partridges, ducks, as also as, are this day by proclamation forbidden to be dressed in any inn.' Here we find realized the argument for Justice Best, in favour of the game-laws. It is evident that this severe restriction must have proved great inconvenience to certain persons who found a hence in London necessary for their pursuits. This we see from the manuscript diary of an honest antiquary, Symond D'Ewes: he has preserved an opinion, which, doubt, was spreading fast, that such prosecutions of the meyer-general were a violation of the liberty of the act. 'Most men wondered at Mr Noy, the attorney-at-law being accounted a great lawyer, that so strictly away men's liberties at one blow, confining them to rest at their own houses and not permitting them freedom here where they pleased within the king's dominions. As myself a little startled upon the first coming out of proclamation; but having first spoken with the Lord entry, lord keeper of the great seal, at Islington, when sided him; and afterwards with Sir William Jones, one of the king's justices of the bench, about my condition of residence at the said town of Islington, and they agreeing that I was not within the letter of the proclamation, nor the intention of it neither, I rested satisfied, thought myself secure, laying in all my provisions for sequestration for the year ensuing, and never imagined myself to be in danger, till this unexpected censure of Mr Noy passed in the Star-chamber: so, having advised my friends, I resolved for a remove, being much troubled not only with my separation from Records, but with myself, being great with child, fearing a winter journey might be dangerous for her.* He left Islington and the roads in the Tower to return to his country-seat, to the disturbance of his studies.

It is, perhaps, difficult to assign the cause of this marked policy of the government for the severe restriction of the rights of the metropolis, and the prosecution of the nobility and gentry to compel a residence on their estates.—Whatever were the motives, they were not peculiar to existing sovereigns, but remained transmitted from cabinet to cabinet, and were even renewed under Charles Second. At a time when the plague often broke out, here and growing metropolis might have been considered to be a great evil; a terror expressed by the manuscript text before quoted, complaining of 'this deluge of build; that we shall be all poisoned with breathing in one another's faces.' The police of the metropolis was long weak, notwithstanding their 'strong watches and mids' set at times; and bodies of the idle and the refractory often assumed some mysterious title, and were with fealty governed. We may conceive the state of the police, when 'London apprentices,' growing in number and silence, frequently made attempts on Bridewell, or led down houses. One day the citizens, in proving the ordinance, terrified the whole court of James the sixth with a panic, that there was a 'rising in the city.' It is possible that the government might have been induced to pursue this singular conduct for I do not know that it is paralleled, of pulling down new-built houses by the principle of political economy which remains to be planned, or ridiculed, by our modern adepts. It would hardly be supposed that the present subject might be enlivened by a poem, the elegance and freedom which may even now be admired. It is a great literary curiosity, and its length may be excused for several remarkable points.

AN ODE,

BY SIR RICHARD FANSHAW,

On Occasion of his Majesty's Proclamation in the year 1630, commanding the Gentry, to reside upon their Estates in the Country.

Now war is all the world about,
And every where Eyrnias reigns;
Or of the torch so late put out

The stench remains.

Holland for many years hath been
Of christian tragedies the stage,
Yet seldom hath she play'd a scene

Of bloodier rage:

And France that was not long compos'd,
With civil drums again resounds,
And ere the old are fully clos'd,
Receives new wounds.

The great Gustavus in the west
Plucks the imperial eagle's wing,
Than whom the earth did ne'er invest
A fiercer king.

Only the island which we sow,
A world without the world so far
From present wounds, it cannot show
An ancient scar.

White peace, the beautiful'st of things,
Seems here her everlasting rest
To fix, and spread the downy wings
Over the nest.

As when great Jove, usurping reign,
From the plagued world did her exile,
And tied her with a golden chain
To one blest isle,

Which in a sea of plenty swam,
And turtles sang on every bough,
A safe retreat to all that came,
As ours is now.

Yet we, as if some foe were here,
Leave the despised fields to clowns,
And come to save ourselves, as 'twere,
In walled towns.

Hither we bring wives, babes, rich clothes,
And gems—till now my sovereign
The growing evil doth compose:
Counting in vain,

His care preserves us from annoy
Of enemies his realms to invade,
Unless he force us to enjoy
The peace he made.

To roll themselves in envied leisure;
He therefore sends the landed heirs,
Whilst he proclaims not his own pleasure
So much as theirs.

The sap and blood of the land, which fled
Into the root, and chok'd the heart,
Are bid their quick'ning power to spread
Through every part.

O 'twas an act, not for my muse
To celebrate, nor the dull age,
Until the country air infuse
A purer rage.

And if the fields as thankful prove
For benefits receiv'd, as seed,
They will be 'quite so great a love
A virginal breed.

Nor let the gentry grudge to go
Into those places whence they grew,
But think them blest they may do so.
Who would pursue

The smoky glory of the town,
That may go till his native earth,
And by the shining fire sit down

Of his own hearth,
Free from the griping scriveners' bands,
And the more biting mercers' books;
Free from the bait of oiled hands,
And painted looks?

The country too even chops for rain
You that exhale it by your power,
Let the fat drops fall down again
In a full shower.

And you bright beauties of the time,
That waste yourselves here in a blaze,
Fix to your orb and proper clime
Your wandering rays

Let no dark corner of the land
Be unimbellish'd with one gem,
And those which here too thick do stand
Sprinkle on them.

Believe me, ladies you will find
In that sweet life more solid joys,
More true contentment to the mind
Than all town-towns.

* Harl. MSS. 4, 6, 182.

Nor Cupid there less blood doth spill,
But heads his shafts with chaster love,
Not feather'd with a sparrow's quill,
But of a dove.

There you shall hear the nightingale,
The harmless syren of the wood,
How prettily she tells a tale
Of rape and blood.

Thy lyric lark with all beside
Of nature's feather'd quire, and all
The commonwealth of flowers in 'tis pride,
Behold you shall.

The lily queen, the royal rose,
The gillyflower, prince of the blood !
The courtier tulip, gay in cloths,
The regal bud ;

The violet purple senator,
How they do mock the pomp of state,
And all that at the surly door
Of great ones wait.

Plant trees you may, and see them shoot
Up with your children, to be served
To your clean boards, and the fairest fruit
To be preserved :

And learn to use their several gums ;
'Tis innocence in the sweet blood
Of cherry, apricocks, and plums,
To be imbrued,

ROYAL PROCLAMATIONS.

The satires and the comedies of the age have been consulted by the historian of our manners, and the features of the times have been traced from those amusing records of folly. Daines Barrington enlarged this field of domestic history, in his very entertaining 'Observations on the Statutes.' Another source, which to me seems not to have been explored, is the Proclamations which have frequently issued from our sovereigns, and were produced by the exigencies of the times.

These proclamations, or royal edicts, in our country were never armed with the force of laws—only as they enforce the execution of laws already established ; and the proclamation of a British monarch may become even an illegal act, if it be in opposition to the law of the land. Once, indeed, it was enacted, under the arbitrary government of Henry the Eighth, by the sanction of a pusillanimous parliament, that the force of acts of parliament should be given to the king's proclamations ; and at a much later period, the chancellor Lord Ellesmere was willing to have advanced the king's proclamations into laws, on the sophistical maxim, that 'all precedents had a time when they began ;' but this chancellor argued ill, as he was told with spirit by Lord Coke, in the presence of James the First, 'who probably did not think so ill of the chancellor's logic. Blackstone, to whom on this occasion I could not fail to turn, observes, on the statute under Henry the Eighth, that it would have introduced the most despotic tyranny, and must have proved fatal to the liberties of this kingdom had it not been luckily repealed in the minority of his successor, whom he elsewhere calls an amiable prince—all our young princes, we discover, were amiable ! Blackstone has not recorded the subsequent attempt of the Lord Chancellor, under James the First, which tended to raise proclamations to the nature of an ukase of the autocrat of both the Russias. It seems that our national freedom, notwithstanding our ancient constitution, has had several narrow escapes.

Royal proclamations, however, in their own nature are innocent enough ; for since the manner, time, and circumstances of putting laws into execution must frequently be left to the discretion of the executive magistrate, a proclamation that is not adverse to existing laws need not create any alarm ; the only danger they incur is that they seem never to have been attended to, and rather testified the wishes of the government than the compliance of the subjects. They were not laws, and were therefore considered as sermons or pamphlets, or any thing forgotten in a week's time.

These proclamations are frequently alluded to by the letter-writers of the times, among the news of the day, but usually their royal virtue hardly kept them alive beyond the week. Some on important subjects are indeed noticed in our history. Many indications of the state of affairs, the feelings of the people, and the domestic history of our nation, may be drawn from these simple cords. I have never found them to exist in any other form, and they have been probably only accidentally served.

The proclamations of every sovereign would characterize his reign, and open to us some of the interior operations of the cabinet. The despotic will, yet rational conduct of Henry the Eighth, towards the church of Rome, may be traced in a proclamation to abolish translation of the scriptures, and even the reading of bibles by the people ; commanding all printers of books and pamphlets to affix their names to them, forbidding the sale of any English books printed abroad. When the people were not suffered to publish their opinions at home, all the opposition flew to foreign countries, and their writings were then smuggled into the country, which they ought to have been printed. Hence many volumes printed in a foreign type at this period are found in our collections. The king shrunk in dismay from a spirit of reformation which had only been a party-battle with him, and making himself a pope, decided that nothing should be learnt but what he himself designed to teach !

The antipathies and jealousies, which our popes were long indulged by their incivilities to all foreigners, are characterized by a proclamation issued by Mary, commanding her subjects to behave themselves peaceably towards the strangers coming with King Philip ; that nobles and gentlemen should warn their servants to refrain from 'strife and contention, either by outward deeds, names, words, unseemly countenance, by misnicking them, &c. The punishment not only 'her grace's displeasure, but be committed to prison without bail or mainprize.'

The proclamations of Edward the Sixth curiously exhibit the unsettled state of the reformation, where the rites and ceremonies of catholicism were still practised by the new religionists, while an opposite party, resolutely bent on eternal separation from Rome, were avowing doctrines which afterwards consolidated themselves into puritanism, and while others were hatching up that demoralizing fanaticism, which subsequently shocked the nation with their monstrous sects, the indelible disgrace of our country ! One proclamation the king denounces to the people 'them who despise the sacrament by calling it idol, or such other vile name.' Another is against such 'as innovate any ceremony,' and who are described as 'certain proud preachers and other laicemen who rashly attempt of their own and singular wit and mind, not only to persuade the people from the old and accustomed rites and ceremonies, but also themselves bring in new and strange orders according to their phantasies. The which, as it is an evident token of pride and arrogance, so it tendeth both to confusion and disorder.' Another proclamation, to press 'a godly conformity throughout his realm,' where we learn the following curious fact, of 'divers unlearned and indiscreet priests of a devilish mind and intent, teaching that a man may forsake his wife and marry another, his first wife yet living ; likewise that the wife may do the same to the husband. Others that a man may have two wives or more at once, for that these things are not prohibited by God's law, but by the Bishop of Rome's law ; so that by such evil and phantastical opinions some have not been afraid indeed to marry and keep two wives.' Here, as in the last, we may unfold those subsequent scenes of our story, which spread out in the following century ; the branching out of the non-conformists into their various sects ; and the insistent haste of our reformed priesthood, who, in their zeal to cast off the yoke of Rome, desperately submitted to the liberty of having 'two wives or more !' There is a proclamation to abstain from flesh on Fridays and Saturdays ; exhorted on the principle, not only that 'men should abstain on those days, and forbear their pleasures and the meats wherein they have more delight, to the intent to reduce their bodies to the soul and spirit, but also for worldly policy. To use flesh for the benefit of the commonwealth, and profit of many who be fishers and men using that trade, unto the which this realm, in every part environed with the seas, and so plentiful of fresh waters, be increased the nourishment of the land by saving flesh.' It did not seem to occur to the king in council that the butchers might have had cause to petition against this monopoly of two days in the week granted to the fishermen ; and much less, that it was better to let the people eat flesh of as suited their convenience. In respect to the rite itself, it was evidently not considered as an essential point of faith, since the king enforces it on the ciple 'for the profit and commodity of his realm.' net has made a just observation on religious fasts.* proclamation against excess of apparel, in the reign Elizabeth, and renewed many years after, shows the ery of dress, which was indeed excessive: I shall short- notice it in another article. There is a curious one ist the iconoclasts, or image-breakers and picture-de- yers, for which the antiquary will hold her in high re- mance. Her majesty informs us, that 'several persons, rant, malicious, or covetous, of late years, have spoiled broken ancient monuments, erected only to show a ury to posterity, and not to nourish any kind of super- suasion.' The queen laments, that what is broken and led would be now hard to recover, but advises her good ple to repair them; and commands them in future to nt from committing such injuries.' A more extraordi- y circumstance than the proclamation itself was the ifestation of her majesty's zeal, in subscribing her se with her own hand to every proclamation dispersed oughout England! These image-breakers first appeared Elizabeth's reign; it was afterwards that they flourished ill the perfection of their handicraft, and have contrived t these monuments of art shall carry down to posterity memory of their shame and of their age. These image- akers, so famous in our history, had already appeared her Henry the Eighth, and continued their practical t, in spite of proclamations and remonstrances, till they accomplished their work. In 1641, an order was pub- lished by the commons, that they should 'take away all adulous pictures out of churches: but more was in- ded than was expressed; and we are told that the peo- dle did not at first carry their barbarous practice against Art, to the lengths which they afterwards did, till they re instructed by private information! Dowling's Jour- nal has been published, and shows what the order meant. was their giant-destroyer! Such are the Machiavelian ets of revolutionary governments; they give a public her in moderate words, but the secret one, for the deeds, that of extermination! It was this sort of men who dis- garded their prisoners by giving a secret sign to lead them their execution!

The proclamations of James the First, by their number, e said to have sunk their value with the people. He is fond of giving them gentle advice, and it is said by 'leas that there was an intention to have this king's lated proclamations bound up in a volume, that bet- notice might be taken of the matters contained in them. here is more than one to warn the people against 'speak- g too freely of matters above their reach,' prohibiting all adulous speeches.' I suspect that many of these pro- clamations are the composition of the king's own hand; he as often his own secretary. There is an admirable one pmet private duels and challenges. The curious one ppecting Cowell's 'Interpreter' is a sort of royal review some of the arcana of state: I refer to the quotation.† I will preserve a passage of a proclamation 'against ex- cess of lavish and licentious speech.' James was a king 'words!

'Although the commixture of nations, confluence of an- nunciators, and the relation which the affairs of our king- dom have had towards the business and interests of foreign ates, have caused, during our regiment (government,) a eater openness and liberty of discourse, even concerning affairs of state (which are no themes or subjects fit for vulgar persons or common meetings) then hath been in former mes used or permitted; and although in our own nature ad judgment we do well allow of convenient freedom of neck, esteeming any over-curious or restrained hands urried in that kind rather as a weakness, or else over- uch severity of government than otherwise; yet for as uch as it is come to our ears, by common report, that ere is at this time a more licentious passage of lavish leasures and bold censures in matters of state than is fit to be offered: We give this warning, &c., to take heed how by intermeddle by pen or speech with causes of state and tates of empire, either at home or abroad, but contain themselves within that modest and reverent regard of mat- ters above their reach and calling; nor to give any man- ner of applause to such discourse, without acquainting one f our private council within the space of twenty-four hours.'

* History of the Reformation, vol. ii, p. 95, folio.

† I have noticed it in Calamities of Authors, ii. 246.

It seems that 'the bold speakers,' as certain persons were then denominated, practised an old artifice of laud- ing his majesty, while they severely arraigned the counsels of the cabinet; on this James observes, 'Neither let any man mistake us so much as to think that by giving fair and specious attributes to our person, they cover the scandals which they otherwise lay upon our government, but con- ceive that we make no other construction of them but as fine and artificial glosses, the better to give passage to the rest of their imputations and scandals.'

This was a proclamation in the eighteenth year of his reign; he repeated it in the nineteenth, and he might have proceeded to 'the crack of doom' with the same effect!

Rushworth, in his second volume of Historical Collections, has preserved a considerable number of the procla- mations of Charles the First, of which many are remark- able; but latterly they mark the feverish state of his reign. One regulates access for cure of the king's evil—by which his majesty, it appears, 'hath had good success therein;' but though ready and willing as any king or queen of this realm ever was to relieve the distresses of his good subjects, 'his majesty commands to change the seasons for his "sacred touch" from Easter and Whitsuntide to Easter and Michaelmas, as times more convenient for the temperature of the season, &c. Another against 'departure out of the realm without licence.' One to erect an office 'for the suppression of cursing and swearing,' to receive the for- feitures; against 'libellous and seditious pamphlets and discourses from Scotland,' framed by factious spirits, and re-published in London—this was in 1640; and Charles, at the crisis of that great insurrection in which he was to be at once the actor and the spectator, fondly imagined that the possessors of these 'scandalous' pamphlets would bring them, as he proclaimed, 'to one of his majesty's jus- tices of peace, to be by him sent to one of his principal secretaries of state!'

On the Restoration, Charles the Second had to court his people by his domestic regulations. He early issued a remarkable proclamation, which one would think reflected on his favourite companions, and which strongly marks the moral disorders of those depraved and wretched times. It is against 'vicious, debauched, and profane persons' who are thus described:

'A sort of men of whom we have heard much, and are sufficiently aghamed; who spend their time in taverns, tipling-houses and debauches; giving no other evidence of their affection to us but in drinking our health, and inveigh- ing against all others who are not of their own dissolute temper; and who, in truth, have more discredited our cause, by the licence of their manners and lives, than they could ever advance it by their affection or courage. We hope all persons of honour, or in place and authority, will so far assist us in discountenancing such men, that their discre- tion and shame will persuade them to reform what their conscience would not; and that the displeasure of good men towards them may supply what the laws have not, and, it may be, cannot well provide against; there being by the licence and corruption of the times, and the depraved nature of man, many enormities, scandals, and im- pieties in practice and manners, which laws cannot well describe, and consequently not enough provide against, which may, by the example and severity of virtuous men, be easily discountenanced, and by degrees suppressed.'

Surely the gravity and moral severity of Clarendon dictated this proclamation! which must have afforded some mirth to the gay, debauched circle, the loose cronies of royalty!

It is curious that in 1660 Charles the Second issued a long proclamation for the strict observance of Lent, and alleges for it the same reason as we found in Edward the Sixth's proclamation, 'for the good it produces in the employment of fishermen.' No ordinaries, taverns, &c., to make any supper on Friday nights, either in Lent or out of Lent.

Charles the Second issued proclamations 'to repress the excess of gilding of coaches and chariots,' to restrain the waste of gold, which, as they supposed, by the ex- cessive use of gilding, had grown scarce. Against 'the ex- portation and the buying and selling of gold and silver at higher rates than in our mint,' alluding to a statute made in the ninth year of Edward the Third, called the Statute of Money. Against building in and about London and Westminster in 1661: 'The inconveniences daily grow- ing by increase of new buildings are, that the people in- creasing in such great numbers, are not well to be governeby the wonted officers; the prices of victuals are enhanced; the health of the subject inhabiting the cities much endangered, and many good towns and boroughs unpeopled, and in their trades much decayed—frequent fires occasioned by timber-buildings. It orders to build with brick and stone, which would beautify, and make an uniformity in the buildings; and which are not only more durable and safe against fire, but by experience are found to be of little more if not less charge than the building with timber.' We must infer that by the general use of timber, it had considerably risen in price, while brick and stone not then being generally used, became as cheap as wood!

The most remarkable proclamations of Charles the Second are those which concern the regulations of coffee-houses, and one for putting them down; to restrain the spreading of false news, and licentious talking of state and government, the speakers and the hearers were made alike punishable. This was highly resented as an illegal act by the friends of civil freedom; who, however, succeeded in obtaining the freedom of the coffee-houses, under the promise of not sanctioning treasonable speeches. It was urged by the court lawyers, as the high Tory, Roger North tells us, that the retailing coffee might be an innocent trade, when not used in the nature of a common assembly to discourse of matters of state news and great persons, as a means 'to disconcert the people;' on the other side Kennet asserted that the discontents existed before they met at the coffee-houses, and that the proclamation was only intended to suppress an evil which was not to be prevented. At this day we know which of those two historians exercised the truest judgment. It was not the coffee-houses which produced political feeling, but the reverse. Whenever government ascribes effects to a cause quite inadequate to produce them, they are only seeking means to hide the evil which they are too weak to suppress.

TRUE SOURCES OF SECRET HISTORY.

This is a subject which has been hitherto but imperfectly comprehended even by some historians themselves; and has too often incurred the satire, and even the contempt, of those volatile spirits who play about the superficies of truth, wanting the industry to view it on more than one side; and those superficial readers who imagine that every tale is told when it is written.

Secret history is the supplement of History itself, and is its greatest corrector; and the combination of secret with public history has in itself a perfection, which each taken separately has not. The popular historian composes a plausible rather than an accurate tale; researches too fully detailed would injure the just proportions, or crowd the bold design of the elegant narrative; and facts, presented as they occurred, would not adapt themselves to those theoretical writers of history who arrange events not in a natural, but in a systematic, order. But in secret history we are more busied in observing what passes than in being told of it. We are transformed into the contemporaries of the writers, while we are standing on 'the vantage ground' of their posterity; and thus what to them appeared ambiguous, to us has become unquestionable; what was secret to them has been confided to us. They mark the beginnings, and we the ends. From the fullness of their accounts we recover much which had been lost to us in the general views of history, and it is by this more intimate acquaintance with persons and circumstances that we are enabled to correct the less distinct, and sometimes the fallacious appearances in the page of the popular historian. He who only views things in masses will have no distinct notion of any one particular; he may be a fanciful or a passionate historian, but he is not the historian who will enlighten while he charms.

But as secret history appears to deal in minute things, its connexion with great results is not usually suspected. The circumstantiality of its story, the changeable shadows of its character, the redundancy of its conversations, and the many careless superfluities which egotism or vanity may throw out, seem usually confounded with that small-talk familiarly termed gossiping. But the gossiping of a profound politician, or a vivacious observer, in one of their letters, or in their memoirs, often, by a spontaneous stroke, reveals the individual, or by a simple incident unriddles a mysterious event. We may discover the value of these pious of human nature, with which secret history abounds, by an observation which occurred between two statesmen in office. Lord Raby, our ambassador, apologized to Lord Bolingbroke, then secretary of state, for troubling him with the minute circumstances which occurred in his conferences; in reply, the minister to the ambassador to continue the same manner of conversation, and alleges an excellent reason. 'Those minute details give very great light to the general course and sign of the persons negotiated with. And I own the thing pleases me more in that valuable collection Cardinal D'Ossat's letters, than the maise de vie which he gives of the looks, gestures, and even the voice, of the persons he conferred with.' I regret that to record to the opinions of another noble author recently has through out some degrading notions of secret history, and particularly of the historians. I have silently passed by a vulgar writer, superficial, undisciplined, and uninformed; but as so many are yet destitute of correct notions of secret history, it is but justice the representative should be heard before they are condemned.

His lordship says, that 'Of late the appetite for means of all kinds has surprisingly increased.' Repeated by the Duchess of Portsmouth's waiting-woman to Lord Rochester's valet forms a subject of interest for a philosophical historian: and you may hear an assembly of scholars and authors discussing the value of a piece of scandal invented by a maid of honour than two centuries ago, and repeated to an obscure by Queen Elizabeth's house-keeper. It is a matter of greatest interest to see the letters of every busy man. Yet who does not laugh at such men? This is a task! but as if some half-truths, like light through a cranny in a dark room, had just darted in a stream of atoms over this scoff of secret history, he now views his object with a very different appearance—justly concludes that 'It must be confessed, however, knowledge of this kind is very entertaining; and here there among the rubbish we find hints that may give the philosopher a clue to important facts, and afford the moralist a better analysis of the human mind than a library of metaphysics!' The philosopher may well all intercourse with wits! because the faculty of wit is usually quiescent with them; and in their moments they furiously decry what in their sober senses they eagerly laud! Let me inform his lordship, that 'the waiting-woman and the valet' of eminent persons, are sometimes no unimportant personages in history. By the Memoirs de Mons. De La Porte, premier valet de chambre de Louis XIV. we learn what before 'the valet' wrote had been known—the shameful arts which Mazarine used to be practised, to give a bad education to the prince, and to manage him by depraving his tastes. Madame Motteville in her Memoirs, the waiting lady of our Henrietta, has preserved for our own English history as facts which have been found so essential to the narrative that they are referred to by our historians. In Guise the humble dependent of Cardinal De Retz, we find an unconscious, but a useful commentator on the Memoirs of his master; and the most affecting personal secrets of Charles the First have been preserved by Thomas Herbert, his gentleman in waiting; Clery, the valet of Louis XIV, with pathetic faithfulness has shown us the man, the monarch whom he served!

Of secret history there are obviously two species; the positive, or it is relative. It is positive, when the facts first given to the world; a sort of knowledge which can be drawn from our own personal experience, or from the contemporary documents preserved in their mass state in public or in private collections; or it is relative, proportion to the knowledge of those to whom it is communicated, and will be more or less valued, according to acquisitions of the reader; and this inferior species of secret history is drawn from rare and obscure books; other published authorities, often as scarce as manuscripts. Some experience I have had in those literary researches where curiosity, ever-wakeful and vigilant, discerns among contemporary manuscripts new facts; illustrative of old ones; and sometimes detects, not merely by conjecture, the concealed causes of many events; often of a scene in which some well-known personage is established in a new character; and thus penetrates beyond the generalising representations which satisfy the superficial, and often cover the page of history with delusion and fiction.

only since the later institutions of national libraries; these immense collections of manuscripts have been; with us they are an undecipherable variety, usually under the vague title of 'State-papers.' The inmates of ambassadors, but more particularly their own; charters and chronicles brown with antiquity, preserve a world which had been else lost for us, some before the deluge; series upon series of private correspondence, among which we discover the most vital communications, designed by the writers to be destroyed by the hand which received them; some of individuals by themselves or by their friends, are now published by the pomp of vanity, or the smugness of their possessors; and the miscellaneous ones formed by all kinds of persons, characteristic of parties and of all eras, materials for the history of—records of the force, or of the feebleness of the human understanding, and still the monuments of their pasoriginal collectors of these dispersed manuscripts a race of ingenious men; silent benefactors of mankind to whom justice has not yet been fully awarded; their fervour of accumulation, every thing in a manuscript bore its spell; acquisition was the sole point at which our early collectors, and to this these searchers sacrificed their fortunes, their ease, and their life; but life would have been too short to have decided the intrinsic value of the manuscripts flowing in a stream of collectors; and suppression, even of the disjointed ones of madmen, or the sensible madness of projectors, have been indulging a capricious taste, or what has done more injurious to historical pursuits, that party-feeling which has frequently annihilated the memorials of their series.*

These manuscript collections now assume a formidable appearance. A toilsome march over these 'Alps rising Alps' a voyage in a sea without a shore! has led away most historians from their severer duties; who have grasped at early celebrity have been satisfied to have given a new form to, rather than contributed to new matter of history. The very sight of these seas of history has terrified some modern historians. One Pere Daniel undertook a history of France, the good Boivin, the king's librarian, opened for his inspection an immense treasure of charters, and another of royal-topograph letters, another of private correspondence; sure, reposing in fourteen hundred folios! The most historian passed two hours impatiently looking over it, but frightened at another plunge into the gulf, this view of history would not immolate himself for his duty! He wrote a civil letter to the librarian for his perfunctory kindness, but insinuated that he could do a very readable history without any further aid of his papermasses or 'paper-rubbish.' Pere Daniel, therefore, quietly sat down to his history; copying others—a compliment which was never returned by any one: but so was this striking novelty in his 'readable history,' according to the accurate computation of Count Bouavilliers, Pere Daniel's history of France contains ten thousand blunders! The same circumstance has been done by a living historian of the late Gilbert Stuart; so, on some manuscript volumes of letters being pointed out to him when composing his history of Scotland, concluded that 'what was already printed was more than he was able to read! and thus much for his theoretical history; written to run counter to another theoretical history, the Stuart versus Robertson! They equally depend on a simplicity of their readers, and the charms of style! Another historian, Anquetil, the author of L'Esprit de la Ligue, has described his embarrassment at an inspection of the contemporary manuscripts of that period. After sixteen years of researches to glean whatever secret history printed books afforded, the author, residing in the country, resolved to visit the royal library at Paris, Monsieur Miot receiving him with that kindness, which is one of the official duties of the public librarian towards the tedious, opened the cabinets in which were deposited the treasures of French history.—'This is what you require! come here at all times, and you shall be attended!' said the librarian to the young historian, who stood by with a tert of shudder, while he opened cabinet after cabinet. The intrepid investigator repeated his visits, looking over the mass as chance directed, attacking one side, and then flying to another. The historian, who had felt no weariness during thirteen years among printed books, discovered that he was now engaged in a task, apparently always beginning, and never ending! The Esprit de la Ligue was however enriched by labours, which at the moment appeared so barren.

The study of these papermasses is not perhaps so disgusting as the impatient Pere Daniel imagined; there is a literary fascination in looking over the same papers which the great characters of history once held and wrote on; catching from themselves their secret sentiments; and often detecting so many of their unrecorded actions! By habit the toil becomes light; and with a keen inquisitive spirit, even delightful! For what is more delightful to the curious, than to make fresh discoveries every day? Addison has a true and pleasing observation on such pursuits. 'Our employments are converted into amusements, so that even in those objects which were indifferent, or even displeasing to us, the mind not only gradually loses its aversion, but conceives a certain fondness and affection for them.' Addison illustrates this case by one of the greatest geniuses of the age, who by habit took incredible pleasure in searching into rolls, and records, till he preferred them to Virgil and Cicero! The faculty of curiosity is as ferid, and even as refined in its search after Truth, as that of Taste in the objects of Imagination, and the more it is indulged, the more exquisitely it is enjoyed!

The popular historians of England and of France have, in truth, made little use of manuscript researches. Life is very short for long histories; and those who rage with an avidity of fame or profit will gladly taste the fruit which they cannot mature. Researches too remotely sought after, or too slowly acquired, or too fully detailed, would be so many obstructions in the smooth texture of a narrative. Our theoretical historians write from some particular and pre-conceived result; unlike Livy, and De Thou, and Machiavel, who describe events in their natural order, these cluster them together by the fanciful threads of some political or moral theory, by which facts are distorted, displaced, and sometimes altogether omitted! One single original document has sometimes shaken into dust their palladian edifice of history. At the moment Hume was sending some sheets of his History to press, Murdin's State Papers appeared. And we are highly amused and instructed by a letter of our historian to his rival, Robertson, who probably found himself often in the same forlorn situation. Our historian discovered in that collection what compelled him to retract his pre-conceived system—he hurries to stop the press, and paints his confusion and his anxiety with all the ingenuous simplicity of his nature. 'We are all in the wrong!' he exclaims. Of Hume I have heard, that certain manuscripts at the state paper office had been prepared for his inspection during a fortnight, but he never could muster courage to pay his promised visit. Satisfied with the common accounts, and the most obvious sources of history, when librarian at the Advocates' Library, where yet may be examined the books he used, marked by his hand; he spread the volumes about the sofa, from which he rarely rose to pursue obscure inquiries, or delay by fresh difficulties the page which every day was growing under his charming pen. A striking proof of his careless happiness I discovered in his never referring to the perfect edition of Whitelock's Memorials of 1732, but to the old truncated and faithless one of 1682.

Dr Birch was a writer with no genius for composition, but to whom British history stands more indebted than to any superior author; his incredible love of labour, in transcribing with his own hand a large library of manuscripts from originals dispersed in public and in private repositories, has enriched the British Museum by thousands of the most authentic documents of genuine secret history. He once projected a collection of original historical letters, for which he had prepared a preface, where I find the following passage. 'It is a more important service to the public to contribute something not before known to the general fund of history, than to give new form and colour to what we are already possessed of, by superadding refinement and ornament, which too often tend to disguise the real state of the facts; a fault not to be atoned for by the pomp of style, or even the fine eloquence of the historian.' This was an oblique stroke aimed at Robertson, to whom Birch had generously opened the stores of history, for the Scotch historian had needed all his charity; but Robertson's attractive inventions, and highly-finished composition, seduce the public; and we may forgive the latent spark of envy in the honest feelings of the man, who was profoundly skilled in delving in the native beds of ore, but not in fashioning it; and whose own neglected historical works, constructed on the true principle of secret history, we may often turn over to correct the erroneous, the prejudiced, and the artful accounts of those who have covered their faults by 'the pomp of style, and the eloquence of the historian.'

The large manuscript collections of original documents, from whence may be drawn what I have called positive secret history, are, as I have observed, comparatively of modern existence. Formerly they were widely dispersed in private hands; and the nature of such sources of historic discovery but rarely occurred to our writers. Even had they sought them, their access must have been partial and accidental. Lord Hardwicke has observed, that there are still many untouched manuscript collections within these kingdoms, which, through the ignorance or inattention of their owners, are condemned to dust and obscurity; but how valuable and essential they may be to the interests of authentic history and of sacred truth, cannot be more strikingly demonstrated than in the recent publications of the Marlborough and the Shrewsbury papers by Archdeacon Coxe.* The editor was fully authorized to observe: 'It is singular that those transactions should either have been passed over in silence, or imperfectly represented by most of our national historians.' Our modern history would have been a mere political romance, without the astonishing picture of William and his ministers, exhibited in those unquestionable documents. Burnet was among the first of our modern historians who showed the world the preciousness of such materials, in his History of the Reformation, which he largely drew from the Cottonian Collection. Our earlier historians only repeated a tale ten times told. Milton, who wanted not for literary diligence, had no fresh stories to open for his History of England; while Hume despatches, comparatively in a few pages, a subject which has afforded to the fervent diligence of my learned friend Sharon Turner, volumes precious to the antiquary, the lawyer, and the philosopher.

To illustrate my idea of the usefulness, and of the absolute necessity of secret history, I fix first on a public event, and secondly on a public character; both remarkable in our own modern history, and both serving to expose the fallacious appearances of popular history by authorities indisputably genuine. The event is the restoration of Charles the Second: and the character is that of Mary the queen of William the Third.

In history, the Restoration of Charles appears in all its splendour—the king is joyfully received at Dover, and the shore is covered by his subjects on their knees—crowds of the Great hurry to Canterbury—the army is drawn up, in number and with a splendour that had never been equalled—his enthusiastic reception is on his birth-day, for that was the lucky day fixed on for his entrance into the metropolis—in a word, all that is told in history describes a monarch the most powerful and the most happy. One of the tracts of the day, entitled 'England's Triumph,' in the mean quaintness of the style of the time tells us, that 'The soldiery, who had hitherto made clubs trump, resolved now to enthrone the king of hearts.' Turn to the faithful memorialist, who so well knew the secrets of the king's heart, and who was himself an actor behind the curtain; turn to Clarendon, in his own life; and we shall find that the power of the king was then as dubious as when he was in exile; and his feelings were so much racked, that he had nearly resolved on a last flight.

Clarendon, in noticing the temper and spirits of that time, observes, 'Whoever reflects upon all this composition of contradictory wishes and expectations, must con-

* Whenever that vast collection, which from their former possessor, may be called the 'Conway papers,' shall be given to the public, from what I have already been favoured with the sight of, I may venture to predict that our history will receive a new form, and our literature an important accession. They are now in the possession of John Wilson Croker, Esq. M. P. and Secretary of the Admiralty, and placed at his disposal by the Marquis of Hertford, with a view of making a selection for the use of the public. The reader may find a lively summary of the contents of these papers, in Horace Walpole's account of his visit to Razley, in his letter to George Montague, 30th August, 1756. Mr Croker is also so fortunate as to be the possessor of the Thomkmorton papers of which the reader may likewise observe a particular notice in Sir Henry Wootton's will, in Isaac Walton's Lives.

less that the king was not yet the master of the king nor his authority and security such as the general noise acclamation, the bells and the bonfires, proclaimed it to be! 'The first mortification the king met with was as soon he arrived at Canterbury, within three hours after he landed at Dover.' Clarendon then relates how many they found there, who while they waited with joy to kiss his hand, also came with importunate solicitations for the king; forced him to give them present audience, in which they reckoned up the insupportable losses under which themselves or their fathers; demand some grant, or promise of such offices; some even for more! 'pressing two or three with such confidence and importunity, with such tedious discourses, that the king was extremely nauseated with their suits, though his modesty knew how to break from them; that he no sooner got into his chamber, which for some hours he was not able to do, than he lamented the condition to which he found he must be in; and did, in truth, from that minute, contract such prejudice against some of those persons.' But a great mortification was to follow, and one which had nearly thrown the king into despair.

General Monk had from the beginning to this acted very mysteriously, never corresponding with his sovereign a letter of the king's, so that his majesty was frequently doubtful whether the general designed to tell himself or for the king: an ambiguous conduct which attribute to the power his wife had over him, who was the opposite interest. The general in his rough way, presented him a large paper, with about seventy names for a privy council, of which not more than two were acceptable. 'The king,' says Clarendon, 'was in more than ordinary confusion, for he knew not well what to think of the general, in whose absolute power he was—so that at that moment his majesty was almost alarmed at the demands appearance of things.' The general afterwards told this unfavourable appearance, by acknowledging that the list was drawn up by his wife, who had made him promise to present it; but he permitted his majesty to act as he thought proper. At that moment General Monk was more King than Charles.

We have not yet concluded. When Charles met his army at Blackheath, 50,000 strong, 'he knew well the constitution of the army, the distemper and murmurs that was in it, and how many diseases and convulsions their infant loyalty was subject to; that how united were their inclinations and acclamations seemed to be at Blackheath, their affections were not the same—and the countenances there of many officers, as well as soldiers, sufficiently manifest that they were drawn thither to service they were not delighted in. The old soldiers had little regard for their new officers; and it quickly appeared by the select and affected mixtures of sullen and melancholic parties of officers and soldiers.'—And the the chancellor of human nature adds, 'And in this sullen cholic and perplexed condition the king and all his household, when he appeared most gay and cheerful, and was pleasantness in his face that became him, and looked like a full assurance of his security as was possible to put on. It is imagined that Louis the Eighteenth would be the ablest commentator on this piece of secret history, and of another twin to Pierre de Saint Julian's 'Généalogie des Parvies,' an old French treatise of histories which resemble one another; a volume so scarce, that I have not met with it.

Burnet informs us, that when Queen Mary held the administration of government during the absence of William, it was imagined by some, that as 'every woman's sense loved to be meddling, they concluded that she had but a small portion of it, because she lived so abstracted from all affairs. He praises her exemplary behavior 'regular in her devotions, much in her closet, read a great deal, was often busy at work, and seemed to employ her time and thoughts in any thing rather than matters of state. Her conversation was lively and obliging; every thing she said was easy and natural. The King told the Earl of Shrewsbury, that though he could not hit on the right way of pleasing England, he was confident she would, and that we should all be very happy under her.' Such is the signature of the queen which Burnet offers; we see nothing but her tranquillity, her simplicity, and her carelessness, amidst the important transactions passing under her eye; but I lift the curtain from a longer picture. The distressed state amidst which the queen lived, the various, the secret sorrows, the agonies and the despair of Mary is ance of William, nowhere appears in history! and, so, escaped the ken of the Scotch bishop! They served for the curiosity and the instruction of posterity and were found by Dalrymple, in the letters of a her husband, in King William's cabinet. It will to place under the eye of the reader the suppressed this afflicted queen, at the time when every thing was so easy and natural, employing her time and in any thing rather than matters of state—often work.

I do not dwell on the pangs of the queen for the fate of her husband—or her deadly suspicions that many were un- about her: a battle lost might have been fatal; a racy might have undone what even a victory had ad; the continual terrors she endured were such, e might be at a loss to determine who suffered most, who had been expelled from, or those who had as- the throne.

far was the queen from not 'employing her thoughts' matters of state, that every letter, usually written de evening, chronicles the conflicts of the day; she is not only events, but even dialogues and personal cteristics; hints her suspicions, and multiplies her: her attention was incessant.—I never write but I think others do not; and her terrors were as cease-—I pray God, send you back quickly, for I see all ing out into all flames.' The queen's difficulties were ased by a single confidential intercourse. On one oc- she observes, 'As I do not know what I ought to t, and when not, I am as silent as can be.'—I ever not doing well, and trust to what nobody says but —It seems to me that every one is afraid of them-—I am very uneasy in one thing, which is want of obdy to speak my mind freely to, for it's a great con- int to think and be silent; and there is so much matter, I am one of Solomon's fools, who am ready to burst.' ust tell you again how Lord Monmouth endeavours righten me, and indeed things have but a melancholy spect. She had indeed reason to fear Lord Mon- uth, who, it appears, divulged all the secrets of the al council to Major Wildman, who was one of our republicans; and, to spread alarm in the privy council, weyed in lemon-juice all their secrets to France, often the very day they had passed in council! They dis- dered the fact, and every one suspected the other as the tor! Lord Lincoln even once assured her, that 'the rd President and all in general, who are in trust, were ples.' Her council was composed of factions, and the en's suspicions were rather general than particular: 'she observes on them, 'Till now I thought you had ven me wrong characters of men; but now I see they swer my expectation of being as little of a mind as of a dy.'—For a final extract, take this full picture of royal ury.—I must see company on my set days; I must ay twice a week; nay, I must laugh and talk, though ver so much against my will; I believe I dissemble very to those who know me: at least, it is a great constraint myself, yet I must endure it. All my motions are so ighed, and all I do so observed, that if I eat less, or eak less, or look more grave, all is lost in the opinion of e world; so that I have this misery added to that of your heence, that I must grin when my heart is ready to break, ad talk when my heart is so oppressed that I can scarce eath. I go to Kensington as often as I can for air; but hen I never can be quite alone, neither can I complain: hat would be some ease; but I have nobody whose hu- our and circumstances agree with mine enough to speak y mind freely to. Besides, I must hear of business, which being a thing I am so new in, and so unfit for, does ut break my brains the more, and not ease my heart.

Thus different from the representation of Burnet was the actual state of Queen Mary; and I suspect that our urn and vehement bishop had but little personal know- ledge of her majesty, notwithstanding the elaborate cha- racter of the queen which he has given in her funeral odium.—He must have known that she did not always sympathize with his party-feelings: for the queen writes, 'The bishop of Salisbury has made a long thundering sermon this morning, which he has been with me to desire he print; which I could not refuse, though I should not have ordered it, for reasons which I told him.' Burnet whom I am very far from calling what an inveterate Tory, Edward Earl of Oxford, does in one of his manu- script notes, that lying Scot, unquestionably has told many truths in his garrulous page; but the cause in which he stood so deeply engaged, coupled to his warm sanguine temper, may have sometimes dimmed his sagacity, so as to have caused him to have mistaken, as in the present case, a mask for a face, particularly at a time when almost every individual appears to have worn one!

Both these causes of Charles the Second and Queen Mary show the absolute necessity of researches into secret history, to correct the appearances and the fallacies which so often deceive us in public history.

'The appetite for Remains,' as the noble author whom I have already alluded to calls it, may then be a very wholesome one, if it provides the only materials by which our popular histories can be corrected, and since it often infuses a freshness into a story which, after having been copied from book to book, inspires another to tell it for the tenth time! Thus are the sources of secret history unexpected by the idler and the superficial, among those masses of untouched manuscripts—that subterraneous history!—which indeed may terrify the indolent, bewilder the inexperienced, and confound the injudicious, if they have not acquired the knowledge which not only decides on facts and opinions, but on the authorities which have furnished them. Popular historians have written to their readers; each with different views, but all alike form the open documents of history; like feed advocates, they declaim, or like special pleaders, they keep only on one side of their case: they are seldom zealous to push on their cross-examinations; for they come to gain their cause, and not to hazard it!

Time will make the present age as obsolete as the last, for our sons will cast a new light over the ambiguous scenes which distract their fathers; they will know how some things happened, for which we cannot account; they will bear witness to how many characters we have mistaken; they will be told many of those secrets which our contemporaries hide from us; they will pause at the ends of our beginning; they will read the perfect story of man, which can never be told while it is proceeding. All this is the possession of posterity, because they will judge with- out our passions; and all this we ourselves have been enabled to possess, by the secret history of the last two ages!*

LITERARY RESIDENCES.

Men of genius have usually been condemned to com- pose their finest works, which are usually their earliest ones, under the roof of a garret; and few literary charac- ters have lived, like Pliny and Voltaire, in a villa or chateau of their own. It has not therefore often hap- pened, that a man of genius could raise local emotions by his own intellectual suggestions. Ariosto, who built a palace in his verse, lodged himself in a small house, ar- roud that stanzas and stanzas were not put together at the same rate: old Montaigne has left a description of his library; 'over the entrance of my house, where I view my court-yards, and garden, and at once survey all the operations of my family!'

There is, however, a feeling among literary men, of building up their own elegant fancies, and giving a per- manency to their own tastes: we dwell on their favourite scenes as a sort of portraits, and we eagerly collect these few prints, which are their only vestiges. A collection might be formed of such literary residences chosen for their amenity and their retirement, and adorned by the objects of their studies; from that of the younger Pliny, who called his villa of literary leisure by the endearing term of villula, to that of Cassiodorus, the prime minister of Theodoric, who has left so magnificent a description of his literary retreat, where all the elegances of life were at hand; where the gardeners and the agriculturists laboured on scientific principles; and where, amidst gardens and

* Since this article has been sent to press, I rise, from reading one in the Edinburgh Review on Lord Oxford's and Lord Waldegrave's Memoirs. This is one of the very rare articles which could only come from the hand of a master, long ex- ercised in the studies he criticises. The critic, or rather the his- torian, observes, that 'of a period remarkable for the esta- blishment of our present system of government, no authentic materials had yet appeared. Events of public notoriety are to be found, though often inaccurately told, in our common histories; but the secret springs of action, the private views and motives of individuals, &c., are as little known to us, as if the events to which they relate had taken place in China or Japan.' The clear, connected, dispassionate, and circumstan- tial narrative, with which he has enriched the stores of Eng- lish history, is drawn from the sources of secret history: from published memoirs and contemporary correspondence.

parks, stood his extensive library, with scribes to multiply his manuscripts:—From Tycho Brahe's, who built a magnificent astronomical house on an island, which he named after the sole objects of his musings, Uraniburg, or the castle of the Heavens;—to that of Evelyn, who first began to adorn Wotton, by building 'a little study,' till many years after he dedicated the ancient house to contemplation, among the 'delicious streams and venerable woods, the gardens, the fountains, and the groves most tempting for a great person and a wanton purse; and indeed gave one of the first examples to that elegance since so much in vogue.' From Pope, whose little garden seemed to multiply its scenes by a glorious union of nobility and literary men conversing in groups;—down to lonely Shenstone, whose 'rural elegance,' as he entitles one of his odes, compelled him to mourn over his hard fate, when

We have all by heart the true and delightful reflection of Johnson on local associations, when the scene we tread suggests to us the men or the deeds, which have left their celebrity to the spot. We are in the presence of their fame, and feel its influence!

A literary friend, whom a hint of mine had induced to visit the old tower in the garden of Buffon, where the sage retired every morning to compose, passed so long a time in that lonely apartment, as to have raised some solicitude among the honest folks of Montbar, who having seen 'the Englishman' enter, but not return, during a heavy thunder-storm which had occurred in the interval, informed the good mayor, who came in due form, to notify the ambiguous state of the stranger. My friend is, as is well known, a genius of that cast, who could pass two hours in the Tower of Buffon, without being aware that he had been all that time occupied by suggestions of ideas and reveries, which in some minds such a locality may excite. He was also busied with his pencil; for he has favoured me with two drawings of the interior and the exterior of this old tower in the garden: the nakedness within can only be compared to the solitude without. Such was the studying room of Buffon, where his eye resting on no object, never interrupted the unity of his meditations on Nature.

In return for my friend's kindness, it has cost me, I think, two hours, in attempting to translate the beautiful picture of this literary retreat, which Vicé D'Azyr has finished with all the warmth of a votary. 'At Montbar, in the midst of an ornamented garden, is seen an antique tower; it was there that Buffon wrote the History of Nature, and from that spot his fame spread through the universe. There he came at sunrise, and no one, however importunate, was suffered to trouble him. The calm of the morning hour, the first warbling of the birds, the varied aspect of the country, all at that moment which touched the senses, recalled him to his model. Free, independent, he wandered in his walks; there was he seen with quickened or with slow steps, or standing rapt in thought, sometimes with his eyes fixed on the heavens in the moment of inspiration, as if satisfied with the thought that so profoundly occupied his soul; sometimes, collected within himself, he sought what would not always be found; or at the moments of producing, he wrote, he effaced, and re-wrote, to efface once more; thus he harmonized, in silence, all the parts of his composition, which he frequently repeated to himself, till, satisfied with his corrections, he seemed to repay himself for the pains of his beautiful prose, by the pleasure he found in declaiming it aloud. Thus he engraved it in his memory, and would recite it to his friends, or induce some to read it to him. At those moments he was himself a severe judge, and would again compose it, desirous of attaining to that perfection which is denied to the impatient writer.'

A curious circumstance, connected with local associations, occurred to that extraordinary oriental student Fourmont. Originally he belonged to a religious community, and never failed in performing his offices; but he was expelled by the superior for an irregularity of conduct, not likely to have become contagious through the brotherhood—he frequently prolonged his studies far into the night, and it was possible that the house might be burnt by such superfluity of learning. Fourmont retreated to the college of Montagna, where he occupied the very chambers which had formerly been those of Erasmus; a circumstance which contributed to excite his emulation, and to his studies. He who smiles at the force of such associations only proves that he has not experienced what are so substantial as the scene itself—for those who are united in them. Pope, who had far more enthusiasm in his local disposition than is generally understood, was extremely susceptible of the literary associations with localities; the volumes of his Homer was begun and finished in an old tower over the chapel at Stanton Harcourt; it has perpetuated the event, if not consecrated the place, by scratching with a diamond on a pane of stained glass an inscription:

*In the year 1718,
Alexander Pope*

Finished HERE

*The 5th volume of Homer.

It was the same feeling which induced him one day, taking his usual walk with Harte in the Haymarket, to sire Harte to enter a little shop, where going up two of stairs into a small room, Pope said, 'In this garret I wrote his Campaign!' Nothing less than a feeling impelled the poet to ascend this garret—a consecrated spot to his eye; and certainly a confirmation of the power of genius contrasted with its localities! Addison, whose mind had fought through 'campaigns' in a garret, could he have called about 'the pleasures of imagination,' had probably placed a house of literary repose, where all parts would have been in harmony with his mind.

Such residence of men of genius have been enjoyed some; and the vivid descriptions which they have conveyed something of the delightfulness which characterizes studious repose.

The Italian Paul Jovius has composed more than a hundred concise eulogies of statesmen, warriors, and literary men of the fourteenth, fifteenth and sixteenth centuries; but the occasion which induced him to compose is perhaps more interesting than the compositions.

Jovius had a country-house, situated on a peninsula bordered by the lake of Como. It was built on the site of the villa of Pliny, and in his time the foundations were still visible. When the surrounding lake was calm, sculptured marbles, the trunks of columns, and the fragments of those pyramids which had once adorned the bosom of the friend of Trajan, were still viewed in its bosom. Jovius was the enthusiast of literature, and of leisure which it loves. He was an historian, with the imagination of a poet, and though a christian preacher almost a worshipper of the sweet fictions of pagan mythology; and when his pen was kept pure from satire, adulation, to which it was too much accustomed, it became a pencil. He paints with rapture his gardens bathed in the waters of the lake; the shade and freshness of the woods; his green slopes, his sparkling fountains, the deep silence and calm of his solitude! A statue was raised in his gardens to Nature! In his hall stood a fine statue of Apollo, and the Muses around, with their attributes. His library was guarded by a Mercury, and there was an apartment adorned with Doric columns, and with pictures of the most pleasing subjects, dedicated to the Graces! Such was the interior! Without, the transparent lake here spread its broad mirror, and there was seen luminously winding by banks covered with olives and laurels; in the distance, towns, promontories, hills rising in an amphitheatre, blushing with vines, and the first elevation of the Alps, covered with woods and pasture, and sprinkled with herds and flocks.

It was in a central spot of this enchanting habitation that a cabinet or gallery was erected, where Jovius had collected, with prodigal cost, the portraits of celebrated men; and it was to explain and describe the characteristics of those illustrious names that he had composed his eulogies. This collection became so remarkable, that the great men, his contemporaries, presented our literary collector with their own portraits, among whom the renowned Fernandez Cortes sent Jovius his before he died, and probably others who were less entitled to enlarge the collection; but it is equally probable that our caustic Jovius would throw them aside. Our historian had often to describe men more famous than virtuous; sovereigns, politicians, sets, and philosophers, men of all ranks, countries, and ages, formed a crowded scene of men of genius or of celebrity: sometimes a few lines compress their character, and sometimes a few pages excite his fondness. If he sometimes adulates the living, we may pardon the illusions of a contemporary; but he has the honour of satirizing some by the honest freedom of a pen which occasionally broke out into premature truths.

* On a late inquiry it appears that this consecrated pane has been removed—and the relief is said to be preserved at Nuremberg.

Such was the inspiration of literature and leisure which had embellished the abode of Jovius, and had raised in the midst of the lake of Como a cabinet of portraits; a noble tribute to those who are 'the salt of the earth.'

We possess prints of Rubens's house at Antwerp. That rinceps artist perhaps first contrived for his studie the irregular apartment with a dome, like the rotunda of the Pantheon, where the light descending from an aperture of a window at the top, sent down a single equal light,—that perfection of light which distributes its magical effects on be objects beneath. Bellori describes it, *una stans rotunda cum un solo oculo in cima; the solo oculo is what the French term *l'œil de bœuf; we ourselves want this single eye in our technical language of art. This was his precious museum, where he had collected a vast number of books, which were intermixed with his marbles, statues, cameos, intaglios, and all that variety of the riches of art which he had drawn from Rome: but the walls did not yield in value; for they were covered by pictures of his own composition, or copies by his own hand, made at Venice and Madrid, of Titian and Paul Veronese. No foreigners, men of letters, or lovers of the arts, or even princes, would pass through Antwerp without visiting the house of Rubens, to witness the animated residence of genius, and the great man who had conceived the idea. Yet, great as was his mind, and splendid as were the habits of his life, he could not resist the entreaties, of the hundred thousand florins of our Duke of Buckingham, to dispose of this studio. The great artist could not, however, abandon for ever the delightful contemplations he was deriving himself of; and as substitutes for the miracles of art he had lost, he solicited and obtained leave to replace them by casts, which were scrupulously deposited in the places where the originals had stood.

Of this feeling of the local residences of genius, the Italians appear to have been, not perhaps more susceptible than other people, but more energetic in their enthusiasm. Florence exhibits many monuments of this sort. In the neighbourhood of Santa Maria Novella, Zimmerman has noticed a house of the celebrated Viviani, which is a singular monument of gratitude to his illustrious master Galileo. The front is adorned with the bust of this father of science, and between the windows are engraven accounts of the discoveries of Galileo: it is the most beautiful biography of genius! Yet another still more eloquently excites our emotions—the house of Michael Angelo: his pupils, in perpetual testimony of their admiration and gratitude, have ornamented it with all the leading features of his life; the very soul of this vast genius put in action: this is more than biography!—it is living as with a contemporary!

WHETHER ALLOWABLE TO RUIN ONESELF?

The political economist replies that it is!

One of our old dramatic writers, who witnessed the singular extravagance of dress among the modellers of fashion, our nobility, condemns their 'superfluous bravery,' echoing the popular cry,

'There are a sort of men, whose coining heads
Are mints of all new fashions, that have done
More hurt to the kingdom, by superfluous bravery
Which the foolish gentry imitate, than a war
Or a long famine. All the treasure by
This foul excess is got into the merchants',
Embroiders', silk-mens', jewellers', tailors' hands,
And the third part of the land too; the nobility
Engrossing titles only.'

Our poet might have been startled at the reply of our political economist. If the nobility, in follies such as these, only preserved their 'titles,' while their 'lands' were dispossessed among the industrious classes, the people were not sufferers. The silly victims ruining themselves by their excessive luxury, or their costly dress, as it appears some did, was an evil which, left to its own course, must check itself; if the rich did not spend, the poor would starve.—

Luxury is the cure of that unavoidable evil in society—great inequality of fortune! Political economists therefore tell us, that any regulations would be ridiculous which, as Lord Bacon expresses it, should serve for the repressing of waste and excess by sumptuary laws. Adam Smith is not only indignant at 'sumptuary laws,' but asserts, with a democratic insolence of style, that 'it is the highest impertinence and presumption in kings and ministers to pretend to watch over the economy of private people, and to restrain their expense by sumptuary laws. They are themselves always the greatest spendthrifts in the society: let them look well after their own expense, and they may safely trust private people with theirs. If their own extravagance does not ruin the state, that of their subjects never will.' We must therefore infer, that governments, by extravagance, may ruin a state, but that individuals enjoy the remarkable privilege of ruining themselves, without injuring society! Adam Smith afterwards distinguishes two sorts of luxury; the one, exhausting itself in 'durable commodities, as in buildings, furniture, books, statues, pictures,' will increase 'the opulence of a nation'; but of the other, wasting itself in dress and equipages, in frivolous ornaments, jewels, baubles, trinkets, &c, he acknowledges 'no trace or vestige would remain; and the effects of ten or twenty years' profusion would be as completely annihilated as if they had never existed.' There is, therefore a greater or lesser evil in this important subject of the opulent, unrestricted by any law, ruining his whole generation.

Where 'the wealth of nations' is made the solitary standard of its prosperity, it becomes a fertile source of errors in the science of morals; and the happiness of the individual is then too frequently sacrificed to what is called the prosperity of the state. If an individual, in the pride of luxury and selfishness, annihilates the fortunes of his whole generation, untouched by the laws as a criminal, he leaves behind him a race of the discontented and the seditious, who having sunk in the scale of society, have to reascend from their degradation by industry and by humiliation; but for the work of industry their habits have made them inept; and to humiliation, their very rank presents a perpetual obstacle.

Sumptuary laws, so often enacted, and so often repealed, and always eluded, were the perpetual, but ineffectual, attempts of all governments to restrain what, perhaps, cannot be restrained—criminal folly! And to punish a man for having ruined himself would usually be to punish a most contrite penitent!

It is not surprising that before 'private vices were considered as public benefits,' the governors of nations instituted sumptuary laws—for the passion for pageantry, and an incredible prodigality in dress, were continually impoverishing great families—more equality of wealth has now rather subdued the form of private ruin than laid this evil domestic spirit. The incalculable expenditure, and the blaze of splendour, of our ancestors, may startle the incredulity of our Elegantes. We find men of rank exhausting their wealth and pawning their castles, and then desperately issuing from them, heroes for a crusade, or brigades for their neighbourhood!—and this frequently from the simple circumstance of having for a short time maintained some gorgeous chivalric festival on their own estates, or from having melted thousands of acres into a cloth of gold; their sons were left to beg their bread on the estates which they were to have inherited.

It was when chivalry still charmed the world by the remains of its seductive splendours, towards the close of the fifteenth century, that I find an instance of this kind occurring in the Pas de Sandricourt, which was held in the neighbourhood of the sieur of that name. It is a memorable affair, not only for us curious inquirers after manners and morals, but for the whole family of the Sandricourts; for though the said sieur is now receiving the immortality we bestow on him, and la dame, who presided in that magnificent piece of chivalry, was infinitely gratified, yet for ever after was the lord of Sandricourt ruined—and all for a short, romantic three months!

This story of the chivalric period may amuse. A pas d'armes, though consisting of military exercises and deeds of gallantry, was a sort of festival distinct from a tournament. It signified a pas or passage to be contested by one or more knights against all comers. It was necessary that the road should be such that it could not be passed without encountering some guardian knight. The chevaliers who disputed the pas hung their blazoned shields on trees, pales, or posts raised for this purpose. The aspirants after chivalric honours would strike with their lance one of these shields, and when it rung it instantly summoned the owner to the challenge. A bridge or a road would sometimes serve for this military sport, for such it was intended to be, whenever the heat of the rivals proved not too earnest. The sieur of Sandricourt was a fine-dreamer of feasts of chivalry, and in the neighbourhood of his castle he fancied that he saw the very spot adapted for every game: there was one admirably fitted for the barrier of a tilting-match; another embellished by a solitary pine-tree; another which was called the meadow of the thorn; there was a carrefour, where, in four roads, four knights might meet; and, above all, there was a forest called devoiyable, having no path, so favourable for errant knights, who might there enter for strange adventures, and, as chance directed, encounter others as bewildered as themselves. Our chivalric Sandricourt found nine young seigneurs of the court of Charles the Eighth of France, who answered all his wishes. To sanction this glorious feat it was necessary to obtain leave from the king, and a herald of the Duke of Orleans to distribute the cartel or challenge all over France, announcing that from such a day, ten young lords would stand ready to combat, in those different places, in the neighbourhood of Sandricourt's chateau. The names of this flower of chivalry have been faithfully registered, and they were such as instantly to throw a spark into the heart of every lover of arms! The world of fashion, that is, the chivalric world, were set in motion. Four bodies of assailants soon collected, each consisting of ten combatants. The herald of Orleans having examined the arms of these gentlemen, and satisfied himself of their ancient lineage, and their military renown, admitted their claims to the proffered honour. Sandricourt now saw with rapture, the numerous shields of the assailants placed on the sides of his portals and corresponding with those of the challengers which hung above them. Ancient lords were elected judges of the feasts of the knights, accompanied by the ladies, for whose honour only the combatants declared they engaged.

The herald of Orleans tells the history in no very intelligible verse; but the burden of his stanza is still

Du pas d'armes du chateau Sandricourt.

He sings, or says,

'Onques, depuis le temps du roi Artus,
Ne furent tant les armes exalces—
Maint chevaliers et preux entreprenans—
Princes plusieurs ont terre délaçées
Pour y venir donner coups, et pousées
Qui ont été là tenus si de court,
Que par force n'ont prises et passées
Les barrières, entrées, et passées
Du pas des armes du chateau Sandricourt.'

Doubtless, there, many a Roland met with his Oliver, and could not pass the barriers. Cased as they were in steel, de pied en cap, we presume that they could not materially injure themselves; yet, when on foot, the ancient judges discovered such symptoms of peril, that on the following day they advised our knights to satisfy themselves by fighting on horseback. Against this prudent counsel for some time they protested, as an inferior sort of glory. However, on the next day, the horse combat was appointed in the carrefour, by the pine-tree. On the following day they tried their lances in the meadow of the thorn; but, though on horseback, the judges deemed their attacks were so fierce, that this assault was likewise not without peril; for some horses were killed, and some knights were thrown, and lay bruised by their own mail; but the barbed horses, wearing only des champignons, head-pieces magnificently caparisoned, found no protection in their ornaments. The last days were passed in combats of two to two, or in a single encounter, a-foot, in the forest devoiyable. These jousts passed without any accident, and the prizes were awarded in a manner equally gratifying to the claimants. The last day of the festival was concluded with a most sumptuous banquet. Two noble knights had undertaken the humble office of maîtres d'hôtel; and while the knights were parading in the forest devoiyable, seeking adventures, a hundred servants were seen at all points, carrying white and red hypocras, and juleps, and sirap de violiers, sweetmeats, and other spices, to comfort these wanderers, who on returning to the chateau, found a grand and plentiful banquet. The tables were crowded in the court-apartment, where some held one hundred and twelve gentlemen, not including the dames and the damoselles. In the halls, and outside of the chateaux, were other tables. At that festival more than two thousand persons were magnificently entertained free of every expense; their attendants, their armourers, their plasmassiers, and others, were also present. La Dame de Sandricourt, 'fut mesme aise d'avoir donné dans son chateau si belle, si magnifique, et gorgiasse fete.' Historians are apt to describe their personages as they appear, not as they are: if the lady of the Sieur Sandricourt really was 'moult aise' during these gorgeous days, one cannot but sympathize with the lady, when her loyal knight and spouse confessed to her, after the departure of the mob of two thousand visitors, neighbours, soldiers, and courtiers,—the knights challengers, and the knights assailants, and the fee scenes at the pine-tree; the barrier in the meadow of the thorn; and the horse-combat at the carrefour; and the jousts in the forest devoiyable; the carousals in the castle-halls; the jollity of the banquet-tables, the morris-dances danced till they were reminded 'How the waning night grew old?'—in a word, when the costly dream had vanished,—that he was a ruined man forever, by immortalizing his name in one grand chivalric festival! The Sieur de Sandricourt, like a great torch, had consumed himself in his own brightness; and the very land on which the famous Pas de Sandricourt was held—had passed away with it! Thus one man sinks generations by that wastefulness, which a political economist would assure as was committing no injury to society!—The moral evil goes for nothing in financial statements!

Similar instances of ruinous luxury we may find in the prodigal costliness of dress through the reign of Elizabeth, James the First, and Charles the First. Not only in their many grandeur they outweighed us, but the accumulation and variety of their wardrobe displayed such a gusty of fancy in their colours and their ornaments, that the drawing-room in those days must have blazed at their presence, and changed colour as the crowd moved. But if we may trust to royal proclamations, the ruin was general among some classes. Elizabeth issued more than one proclamation against 'the excess of apparel' and among other evils which the government imagined this passion for dress occasioned, it notices 'the wasting and undoing of a great number of young gentlemen, otherwise serviceable; and that others, seeking by show of apparel to be esteemed as gentlemen, and allured by the vain show of these things, not only consume their goods and lands, but also run into such debts and shifts, as they cannot live out of danger of laws, without attempting of unlawful acts.' The queen bids her own household 'to look unto it for good example to the realm; and all noblemen, archbishops and bishops, all mayors, justices of peace, &c., should see them executed in their private households.' The greatest difficulty which occurred to regulate the wear of apparel was ascertaining the incomes of persons, or, in the words of the proclamation, 'finding that it is very hard for any man's state of living and value to be truly understood by other persons.' They were to be regulated, as they appear 'seemed in the subsidy books.' But if persons chose to be more magnificent in their dress, they were allowed to justify their means: in that case, if allowed, her majesty would not be the loser; for they were to be rated in the subsidy books according to such values as they themselves offered as a qualification for the splendour of their dress!

In my researches among manuscript letters of the times, I have had frequent occasion to discover how persons of considerable rank appear to have carried their acres on their backs, and with their ruinous and fantastical luxuries sadly pinched their hospitality. It was this which so frequently cast them into the nets of 'the gold-smiths,' and other trading usurers. At the coronation of James the First, I find a simple knight whose cloak cost him five hundred pounds; but this was not uncommon. At the marriage of Elizabeth, the daughter of James the First, Lady Wotton had a gown of which the embroidery cost fifty pounds a yard. The Lady Arabella made four gowns, one of which cost 1500*l*. The Lord Montacute (Montague) bestowed 1500*l* in apparel for his two daughters. One lady, under the rank of baroness, was furnished with jewels exceeding one hundred thousand pounds; and the Lady Arabella goes beyond her,' says the letter-writer. 'All this extreme cost and riches makes us all poor,' as he imagined! I have been amazed in observing grave writers of state-despatches jocular on any misanthropy or mortification to which persons are liable, whose happiness entirely depends on their dress. Sir Dudley Car-na, our minister at Venice, communicates, as an article worth transmitting, the great disappointment incurred by Sir Thomas Glover, 'who was just come hither, and had appeared one day like a comet, all in crimson velvet and eaten gold, but had all his expectations marred on a sudden, by the news of Prince Henry's death.'

A similar mischance, from a different cause, was the lot of Lord Hay, who made great preparations for his embassy to France, which, however, were chiefly confined to his dress. He was to remain there twenty days; and the siter-writer maliciously observes, that 'He goes with twenty special suits of apparel for so many days' abode, besides his travelling robes; but news is very lately come that the French have lately altered their fashion, whereby a suit needs be out of countenance, if he be not set out for the last edition? To find himself out of fashion, with twenty suits for twenty days, was a mischance his lordship had no right to count on!

'The glass of fashion' was unquestionably held up by so very eminent characters, Rawleigh and Buckingham; and the authentic facts recorded of their dress, will sufficiently account for the frequent 'Proclamations' to control that servile herd of imitators—the smaller gentry!

There is a remarkable picture of Sir Walter, which will at least serve to convey an idea of the gaiety and splendour of his dress. It is a white satin pinked vest, close sleeved to the wrist; over the body a brown doublet, finely flowered and embroidered with pearl. In the feather of his hat a large ruby and pearl drop at the bottom of the sprig, in lace of a button; his trunk or breeches, with his stockings and ribbon garters, fringed at the end, all white, and his shoes with white ribbon. Oldys, who saw this picture, as thus described the dress of Rawleigh. But I have some important additions; for I find that Rawleigh's shoes on great court days were so gorgeously covered with precious stones, as to have exceeded the value of six thousand in hundred pounds; and that he had a suit of armour of solid silver, with sword and belt blazing with diamonds, rubies, and pearls; whose value was not so easily calculated. Rawleigh had no patrimonial inheritance; at this moment he had on his back a good portion of a Spanish ragoon, and the profits of a monopoly of trade he was carrying on with the newly-discovered Virginia. Probably he dashed all his hopes in his dress! The virgin queen, when he issued proclamations against 'the excess of apparel,' adorned, by her looks, that promise of a mine which blazed a Rawleigh's; and, parsimonious as she was, forgot the three thousand changes of dresses, which she herself left in the royal wardrobe.

Buckingham could afford to have his diamonds tacked so loosely on, that when he chose to shake a few off on the ground, he obtained all the fame he desired from the pick-up, who were generally les dames de la cour: for our lake never condescended to accept what he himself had dropped. His cloaks were trimmed with great diamond buttons, and diamond hat-bands, cockades, and ear-rings studded with great ropes and knots of pearls. This was however, but for ordinary dances. 'He had' twenty-seven suits of clothes made, the richest that embroidery, lace, silk, velvet, silver, gold, and gems, could contribute; one of which was a white uncut velvet, set all over, both suit and cloak, with diamonds valued at fourscore thousand pounds, besides a great feather, stuck all over with diamonds, as were also his sword girdle, hat, and spurs.* In his masques and banquets with which Buckingham entertained the court, he usually expended, for the evening, from one to five thousand pounds. To others I leave to calculate the value of money; the sums of this gorgeous wastefulness, which must be recollected, occurred before this million age of ours.

If, to provide the means for such enormous expenditure, Buckingham multiplied the grievances of monopolies; if he pillaged the treasury for his eighty thousand pounds' coat; if Rawleigh was at length driven to his last desperate enterprise, to relieve himself of his creditors, for a pair of six thousand pounds' shoes—in both these cases, as in that of althrice Sandricourt, the political economist may perhaps acknowledge, that there is a sort of luxury highly criminal. All the arguments he may urge, all the statistical accounts he may calculate, and the healthful state of his circulating medium among 'the merchants, embroiderers, silken, and jewellers'—will not alter such a moral evil.

* The Jesuit Drexelius, in one of his religious dialogues, touches the fact; but I am referring to an Harleian manuscript, which confirms the information of the Jesuit.

which leaves an eternal taint in 'the wealth of nations! It is the principle that 'private vices are public benefits, and that men may be allowed to ruin their generations without committing any injury to society.

DISCOVERIES OF SECLUDED MEN.

Those who are unaccustomed to the labours of the closet are unacquainted with the secret and silent triumphs obtained in the pursuits of studious men. That aptitude, which in poetry is sometimes called inspiration, in knowledge we may call sagacity; and it is probable, that the vehemence of the one does not excite more pleasure than the still tranquillity of the other: they are both, according to the strict signification of the Latin term from whence we have borrowed ours of invention, a finding out. The result of a combination which no other has formed but ourselves.

I will produce several remarkable instances of the felicity of this aptitude of the learned in making discoveries which could only have been effectuated by an uninterrupted intercourse with the objects of their studies, making things remote and dispersed familiar and present.

One of ancient date is better known to the reader than those I am preparing for him. When the magistrates of Syracuse were showing to Cicero the curiosities of the place, he desired to visit the tomb of Archimedes; but, to his surprise, they acknowledged that they knew nothing of any such tomb, and denied that it ever existed. The learned Cicero, convinced by the authorities of ancient writers, by the verses of the inscription which he remembered, and the circumstance of a sphere with a cylinder being engraven on it, requested them to assist him in the search. They conducted the illustrious but obstinate stranger to their most ancient burying ground: amidst the number of sepulchres, they observed a small column overhung with brambles—Cicero, looking on while they were clearing away the rubbish, suddenly exclaimed, 'Here is the thing we are looking for!' His eyes had caught the geometrical figures on the tomb, and the inscription soon confirmed his conjecture. Cicero long after exulted in the triumph of this discovery.—'Thus' he says, 'one of the noblest cities of Greece, and once the most learned, had known nothing of the monument of its most deserving and ingenious citizen, had it not been discovered to them by a native of Arpinum!'

The great French antiquary Peiresec exhibited a singular combination of learning, patient thought, and luminous sagacity, which could restore an 'airy nothing' to 'a local habitation and a name.' There was found an amethyst, and the same afterwards occurred on the front of an ancient temple, a number of marks, or indents, which had long perplexed inquiry; more particularly as similar marks or indents were frequently observed in ancient monuments. It was agreed on, as no one could understand them, and all would be satisfied, that they were secret hieroglyphics. It occurred to Peiresec, that these marks were nothing more than holes for small nails, which had formerly fastened little laminae, which represented so many Greek letters. This hint of his own suggested to him to draw lines from one hole to another; and he beheld the amethyst reveal the name of the sculptor, and the frieze of the temple the name of the God! This curious discovery has been since frequently applied; but it appears to have originated with this great antiquary, who by his learning and sagacity explained a supposed hieroglyphic, which had been locked up in the silence of seventeen centuries.*

Learned men, confined to their study; have often rectified the errors of travellers; they have done more, they have found out paths for them to explore, or opened seas for them to navigate. The situation of the vale of Tempe had been mistaken by modern travellers; and it is singular, observes the Quarterly Reviewer, yet not so singular as it appears to that elegant critic, that the only good directions for finding it had been given by a person who was never in Greece. Arthur Browne, a man of letters of Trinity College, Dublin—it is gratifying to quote an Irish philosopher and man of letters, from the extreme rarity of the character—was the first to detect the inconsistencies of Pococke and Busching, and to send future travellers to look for Tempe in its real situation, the defiles between Ossa and Olympus: a discovery subsequently realized.

* The curious reader may view the marks, and the manner in which the Greek characters were made out, in the preface to Hearne's 'Curious Discoveries.' The amethyst proved more difficult than the frieze, from the circumstance, that in engraving on the stone the letters must be reversed.

When Dr Clarke discovered an inscription purporting that the pass of Tempe had been fortified by Cassius Longinus, Mr Walpole, with equal felicity, detected, in Caesar's History of the Civil War, the name and the mission of this very person.

A living geographer, to whom the world stands deeply indebted, does not read Herodotus in the original; yet, by the exercise of his extraordinary aptitude, it is well known that he has often corrected the Greek historian, explained obscurities in a text which he never read, by his own happy conjectures, and confirmed his own discoveries by the subsequent knowledge which modern travellers have afforded.

Gray's perseverance in studying the geography of India and of Persia, at a time when our country had no immediate interests with those ancient empires, would have been placed by a cynical observer among the curious idleness of a mere man of letters. These studies were indeed prosecuted, as Mr Mathias observes, 'on the disinterested principles of liberal investigation, not on those of policy, nor of the regulation of trade, nor of the extension of empire, nor of permanent establishments, but simply and solely on the grand view of what is, and of what is past. They were the researches of a solitary scholar in academical retirement.' Since the time of Gray, these very pursuits have been carried on by two consummate geographers, Major Rennel and Dr Vincent, who have opened to the classical and the political reader all he wished to learn, at a time when India and Persia had become objects interesting and important to us. The fruits of Gray's learning, long after their author was no more, became valuable!

The studies of the 'solitary scholar' are always useful to the world, although they may not always be timed to its present wants; with him, indeed, they are not merely designed for this purpose. Gray discovered India for himself; but the solitary pursuits of a great student, shaped to a particular end, will never fail being useful to the world; though it may happen, that a century may elapse between the periods of the discovery and its practical utility.

Halley's version of an Arabic MS on a mathematical subject, offers an instance of the extraordinary sagacity I am alluding to; it may also serve as a demonstration of the peculiar and supereminent advantages possessed by mathematicians, observes Mr Dugald Stewart, in their fixed relations, which form the objects of their science, and the correspondent precision in their language and reasonings:—as matter of literary history, it is highly curious. Dr Bernard accidentally discovered in the Bodleian library an Arabic version of Apollonius de Sectione Rationis, which he determined to translate in Latin, but only finished about a tenth part. Halley, extremely interested by the subject, but with an entire ignorance of the Arabic language, resolved to complete the imperfect version! Assisted only by the manuscript which Bernard had left, it served him as a key for investigating the sense of the original; he first made a list of those words wherever they occurred, with the train of reasoning in which they were involved, to decipher, by these very slow degrees, the import of the context; till at last Halley succeeded in mastering the whole work, and in bringing the translation, without the aid of any one, to the form in which he gave it to the public; so that we have here a difficult work translated from the Arabic, by one who was in no manner conversant with the language, merely by the exertion of his sagacity!

I give the memorable account, as Boyle has delivered it, of the circumstances which led Harvey to the discovery of the circulation of the blood.

'I remember that when I asked our famous Harvey, in the only discourse I had with him, which was but a little while before he died, what were the things which induced him to think of a circulation of the blood? he answered me, that when he took notice that the valves in the veins of so many parts of the body were so placed that they gave free passage to the blood towards the heart, but opposed the passage of the venal blood the contrary way, he was invited to think that so provident a cause as nature had not placed so many valves without design; and no design seemed more probable than that, since the blood could not well, because of the interposing valves, be sent by the veins to the limbs, it should be sent by the arteries and return through the veins, whose valves did not oppose its course that way.'

The reason here ascribed to Harvey seems now so very natural and obvious, that some have been disposed to question his claim to the high rank commonly assigned to him among the improvers of science! Dr William Ham has said, that after the discovery of the valves in the veins which Harvey learned while in Italy from his master, Fabricius ab Aquapendente, the remaining step might easily have been made by any person of common abilities. 'The discovery,' he observes, 'set Harvey to work upon the use of the heart and vascular system in animals; and the course of some years, he was so happy as to discover and to prove beyond all possibility of doubt, the circulation of the blood.' He afterwards expresses his astonishment that this discovery should have been left for Harvey, though he acknowledges it occupied 'a course of years,' adding that 'Providence meant to reserve it for him, and would not let men see what was before them, nor understand what they read.' It is remarkable that when great discoveries are effected, their simplicity always seems to detract from their originality; on these occasions we are reminded of the egg of Columbus!

It is said that a recent discovery, which ascertains that the Niger empties itself into the Atlantic Ocean, was really anticipated by the geographical acumen of a student at Glasgow, who arrived at the same conclusion by a persevering investigation of the works of travellers and geographers, ancient and modern, and by an examination of African captives; and had actually constructed, for the inspection of government, a map of Africa, on which he had traced the entire course of the Niger from the interior.

Franklin conjectured the identity of lightning and of electricity, before he had realized it by decisive experiment. The kite being raised, a considerable time elapsed before there was any appearance of its being electrified. One very promising cloud had passed over it without any effect. Just as he was beginning to despair of his contrivance, he observed some loose threads of the tempest string to stand erect, and to avoid one another, just as if they had been suspended on a common conductor. Struck with this promising appearance, he immediately presented his knuckle to the key! And let the reader judge of the exquisite pleasure he must have felt at that moment when the discovery was complete! We owe to Priestley this admirable narrative—the strong sensation of delight which Franklin experienced as his knuckle touched the key, and at the moment when he felt that a new world was opening, might have been equalled, but it was probably not surpassed, when the same hand signed the long-disputed independence of his country!

When Leibnitz was occupied in his philosophical reasonings on his Law of Continuity, his singular sagacity enabled him to predict a discovery which afterwards was realized—he imagined the necessary existence of the syllogism!

It has been remarked of Newton, that several of his slight hints, some in the modest form of queries, have been ascertained to be predictions, and among others that of the inflammability of the diamond; and many have been eagerly seized upon as indisputable axioms. A hint at the close of his optica, that 'If natural philosophy should be continued to be improved in its various branches, the bounds of moral philosophy would be enlarged also,' is, perhaps, among the most important of human discoveries—it gave rise to Hartley's Physiological Theory of the Mind. The queries, the hints, the conjectures of Newton, display the most creative sagacity; and demonstrate in what manner the discoveries of retired men, while they bequeath their legacies to the world, afford to themselves a frequent source of secret and silent triumphs.

SENTIMENTAL BIOGRAPHY.

A periodical critic, probably one of the juniors, has thrown out a startling observation. 'There is,' says the literary senator, 'something melancholy in the study of biography, because it is—a history of the dead.' A truism and a falsity mixed up together, in the temptation with some modern critics to commit that darling sin of their—novelty and originality! But we really cannot comb with the readers of Plutarch for their deep melancholy: we who feel our spirits refreshed amidst the mediocrity of society, when we are recalled back to the men and women who were illustrious in every glory! Biography with us is a re-union with human existence in its most exalted state; and we find nothing dead in the past, while we retain the sympathies which only require to be awakened.

It would have been more reasonable had the critic discovered that our country has not yet had her Plutarch; and that our biography remains still little more than a mass of compilation.

In this study of biography there is a species which has not yet been distinguished—biographies composed by some domestic friend, or by some enthusiast who works with awe. A term is unquestionably wanted for this distinct class. The Germans seem to have invented a platonic sense, drawn from the Greek, psyché, or the soul; for they call this the psychological life. Another attempt has been made, by giving it the scientific term of idiosyncrasy, to denote a peculiarity of disposition. I would call it sentimental biography!

It is distinct from a chronological biography, for it searches for the individual's feelings amidst the ascertained facts of his life; so that facts, which occurred remotely from each other, are here brought at once together. The detail of events which completes the chronological biography contains many which are not connected with the peculiarity of the character itself. The sentimental is also distinct from the auto-biography, however it may seem a part of it. Whether a man be entitled to lavish his panegyric on himself, I will not decide; but it is certain that he risks every thing by appealing to a solitary and suspected witness.

We have two lives of Dante, one by Boccaccio, and the other by Leonardo Aretino, both interesting; but Boccaccio's is the sentimental life!

Aretino, indeed, finds fault, but with all the tenderness possible, with Boccaccio's affectionate sketch, Origine, Vita, Studi e Costumi del clarissimo Dante, &c. 'Origin, Life, Studies, and Manners, of the illustrious Dante,' &c. 'It seems to me,' he says, 'that our Boccaccio, delicissimo e suavissimo uomo, sweet and delightful man! has written the life and manners of this sublime poet, as if he had been composing the Filocolo, the Filostato, or the Fioretta! the romances of Boccaccio—for all his breathes of love and sighs, and is covered with warm tears, as if a man were born in this world only to live among the enamoured ladies and the gallant youths of the ten amorous days of his hundred novels.'

Aretino, who wanted not all the feeling requisite for the delightful 'costumi e studi' of Boccaccio's Dante, modestly requires that his own life of Dante should be considered as a supplement to, not as a substitute for, Boccaccio's. Pathetic with all the sorrows, and eloquent with all the remonstrances of a fellow-citizen, Boccaccio while he wept, hung with anger over his country's shame in its apathy for the honour of its long-injured exile. Catching inspiration from the breathing pages of Boccaccio, it inclines one to wish that we possessed two biographies of an illustrious favourite character; the one strictly and fully historical, the other fraught with those very feelings of the departed, which we may have to seek in vain for, in the circumstantial and chronological biographer. Boccaccio, indeed, was overcome by his feelings. He either knew not, or he omits the substantial incidents of Dante's life; while his imagination throws a romantic tinge on occurrences raised on slight, perhaps on no foundation. Boccaccio narrates a dream of the mother of Dante so fancifully poetical, that probably Boccaccio forgot that none but a dreamer could have told it. Seated under a high laurel-tree, by the side of a vast fountain, the mother dreamed that she gave birth to her son; she saw him nourished by its fruit, and refreshed by the clear waters; she soon beheld him a shepherd; approaching to pluck the boughs, she saw him fall! When he rose he had ceased to be a man, and was transformed into a peacock! Disturbed by her admiration, she suddenly awoke; but when the father found that he really had a son, in allusion to the dream he called him Dante—or gives! e meritamente; perocchè ottimamente, siccome si vedrà procedendo, segna al nome l'effetto; 'and deservedly! for greatly, as we shall see, the effect followed the name.' At nine years of age, on a May-day, whose joyous festival Boccaccio beautifully describes, when the softness of the heavens re-adorning the earth with its mingled flowers, waved the green boughs, and made all things smile, Dante mixed with the boys and girls in the house of the good citizen who on that day gave the feast, beheld little Brice, as she was familiarly called, but named Beatrice. The little Dante might have seen her before, but he loved her then, and from that day never ceased to love; and thus Dante nella pargoletta era fatto d'amore ferventissimo servidore; so fervent a servant to Love, in an age of childhood! Boccaccio appeals to Dante's own account of his long passion, and his constant sighs, in the Vita Nuova. No look, no word, no sign, sullied the purity of his passion; but in her twenty-fourth year died 'la bellissima Beatrice.' Dante is then described as more than inconsolable; his eyes were long two abundant fountains of tears; careless of life, he let his beard grow wildly, and to others appeared a savage meagre man, whose aspect was so changed, that while this weeping life lasted, he was hardly recognised by his friends; all looked on a man so entirely transformed, with deep compassion. Dante, won over by those who could console the inconsolable, was at length solicited by his relations to marry a lady of his own condition in life; and it was suggested that as the departed lady had occasioned him such heavy griefs, the new one might open a source of delight. The relations and friends of Dante gave him a wife that his tears for Beatrice might cease.

It is supposed that this marriage proved unhappy. Boccaccio, like a pathetic lover rather than biographer, exclaims, 'Oh menti cieche! Oh tenebrosi intelletti! Oh argomenti oasi di molti mortali quante sono le ruscie in asai cose contrarie a' nostri avvisi! &c. Oh blind men! Oh dark minds! Oh vain arguments of most mortals, how often are the results contrary to our advice! Frequently it is like leading one who breathes the soft air of Italy to refresh himself in the eternal shades of the Rhodopean mountains. What physician would expose a burning fever with fire, or put in the shivering marrow of the bones snow and ice? So certainly shall it fare with him, who, with a new love, thinks to mitigate the old. Those who believe this know not the nature of love, nor how much a second passion adds to the first. In vain would we assist or advise this forceful passion, if it has struck its root near the heart of him who long has loved.'

Boccaccio has beguiled my pen for half an hour with all the loves and fancies which sprang out of his own affectionate and romantic heart. What airy stuff has he woven into the 'Vita' of Dante! this sentimental biography! Whether he knew but little of the personal history of the great man whom he idolized, or whether the dream of the mother—the May-day interview with the little Brice, and the rest of the children—and the effusions on Dante's marriage, were grounded on tradition, one would not harshly reject such tender incidents.* But let it not be imagined that the heart of Boccaccio was only susceptible to amorous impressions—bursts of enthusiasm and eloquence, which only a man of genius is worthy of receiving, and only a man of genius is capable of bestowing—kindle the masculine patriotism of this bold, indignant spirit!

Half a century had elapsed since the death of Dante, and still the Florentines showed no sign of repentance for their ancient hatred to their persecuted patriot, nor any sense of the memory of the creator of their language, whose immortality had become a portion of their own glory. Boccaccio, impassioned by all his generous nature, though he regrets he could not raise a statue to Dante has sent down to posterity more than marble, in the 'life. I venture to give the lofty and bold apostrophe to his fellow-citizens; but I feel that even the genius of our language is tame by the side of the harmonized eloquence of the great votary of Dante!

'Ungrateful country! what madness urged thee, when thy dearest citizen, thy chief benefactor, thy only poet, with unaccustomed cruelty was driven to flight. If this had happened in the general terror of that time, coming from evil counsels, thou mightest stand excused; but when the passions ceased, didst thou repent? didst thou recall him? Bear with me, nor deem it irksome from me, who am thy son, that thus I collect what just indignation prompts me to speak, as a man more desirous of witnessing your amendment, than of beholding you punished! Seems it to you glorious, proud of so many titles and o, such men, that the one whose like no neighbouring city can show, you have chosen to chase from among you?

* 'A Comment on the Divine Comedy of Dante,' in English, printed in Italy, has just reached me. I am delighted to find that this biography of Love, however romantic, is true! In his ninth year, Dante was a lover and a poet! The tender sonnet, free from all obscurity, which he composed on Beatrice, is preserved in the above singular volume. There can be no longer any doubt of the story of Beatrice; but the sonnet and the passion must be 'classed among curious natural phenomena,' or how far apocryphal, remains for future inquiry.

With what triumphs, with what valorous citizens are you splendid? Your wealth is a removable and uncertain thing; your fragile beauty will grow old; your delicacy is shameful and feminine; but these make you noticed by the false judgments of the populace! Do you glory in your merchants and your artists? I speak imprudently; but the one are tenaciously avaricious in their servile trades; and Art, which once was so noble, and became a second nature struck by the same avarice, is now as corrupted, and nothing worth! Do you glory in the baseness and the lustlessness of those idlers, who, because their ancestors are remembered, attempt to raise up among you a nobility to govern you, ever by robbery, by treachery, by falsehood! Ah! miserable mother! open thine eyes; cast them with some remorse on what thou hast done, and blush, at least, reputed wise as thou art, to have had in your errors so fatal a choice! Why not rather imitate the acts of those cities who so keenly disputed merely for the honour of the birth-place of the divine Homer? Mantua, our neighbour, counts as the greatest fame which remains for her, that Virgil was a Mantuan! and holds his very name in such reverence, that not only in public places, but in the most private, we see his sculptured image! You only, while you were made famous by illustrious men, you only have shown no care for your great poet. Your Dante Alighieri died in exile, to which you unjustly, envious of his greatness, destined him! A crime not to be remembered, that the mother should bear an envious malignity to the virtues of a son! Now cease to be unjust! He cannot do you that, now dead, which living, he never did do to you! He lies under another sky than yours, and you never can see him again, but on that day, when all your citizens shall view him, and the great Remunerator shall examine, and shall punish! If anger, hatred, and enmity, are buried with a man, as it is believed, begin then to return to yourself; begin to be ashamed to have acted against your ancient humanity; begin, then, to wish to appear a mother, and not a cold negligent step-dame. Yield your tears to your son; yield your maternal piety to him whom once you repulsed, and, living, cast away from you! At least think of possessing him dead, and restore your citizenship, your award, and your grace, to his memory. He was a son who held you in reverence, and though long an exile, he always called himself, and would be called, a Florentine! He held you ever above all others; ever he loved you! What will you then do? Will you remain obstinate in inquiry? Will you practise less humanity than the barbarians? You wish that the world should believe that you are the sister of famous Troy, and the daughter of Rome; assuredly the children should resemble their fathers and their ancestors. Priam, in his misery, bought the corpse of Hector with gold; and Rome would possess the bones of the first Scipio, and removed them from Linturnum, those bones, which, dying, so justly he had denied her. Seek then to be the true guardian of your Dante, claim him! show this humane feeling, claim him! you may securely do this: I am certain he will not be returned to you; but thus at once you may betray some mark of compassion, and, not having him again, still enjoy your ancient cruelty! Alas! what comfort am I bringing you! I almost believe, that if the dead could feel, the body of Dante would not rise to return to you, for he is lying in Ravenna, whose hallowed soil is every where covered with the ashes of saints. Would Dante quit this blessed company to mingle with the remains of those hatreds and iniquities which gave him no rest in life? The relics of Dante, even among the bodies of emperors and of martyrs, and of their illustrious ancestors, is prized as a treasure, for there his works are looked on with admiration; those works of which you have not yet known to make yourselves worthy. His birth-place, his origin, remains for you, spite of your ingratitude! and this, Ravenna envies you, while she glories in your honours which she has snatched from you through ages yet to come!

Such was the deep emotion which opened Boccaccio's heart in this sentimental biography, and which awoke even shame and confusion in the minds of the Florentines; they blushed for their old hatreds, and, with awakened sympathies, they hastened to honour the memory of their great bard. By order of the city, the Divina Commedia was publicly read and explained to the people. Boccaccio, then sinking under the infirmities of age, roused his departing genius: still was there marrow in the bones of the aged man, and he engaged in the task of composing his celebrated Commentaries on the Divina Commedia.

In this class of sentimental biography I would place species which the historian Carte noticed in his luxury travels on the continent, in pursuit of his historical dream. He found, preserved among several ancient families of France, their domestic annals. 'With a warm, patient spirit, worthy of imitation, they have often carefully preserved in their families the acts of their ancestors.' This delight and pride of the modern Gauls in the great and good deeds of their ancestors, preserved in domestic archives, will be ascribed to their folly or their vanity; yet a that folly there may be so much wisdom, and in that vanity there may be so much greatness, that the one will amply redeem the other.

This custom has been rarely adopted among ourselves; we have, however, a few separate histories of some ancient families, as those of Mordaunt, and of Warren. One of the most remarkable is 'a genealogical history of the House of Yvery, in its different branches of Yvery, Lord, Percival, and Gournay.' Two large volumes, closely printed,* expatiating on the characters and events of a single family with the grave pomp of a herald, but more particularly the idolatry of the writer for ancient nobility; and his contempt for that growing rank in society whom he designates as 'New Men,' provoked the ridicule at least of the aspersed.† This extraordinary work, notwithstanding its absurdities in its general result, has left behind a deep impression. Drawn from the authentic family records, it is not without interest that we tread through its copious pages; we trace with a romantic sympathy the fortunes of the descendants of the House of Yvery, from that not-forgotten hero le vaillant Percival chevalier de la Table Ronde, to the Norman Baron Amelin, surnamed the Wolf, for his bravery or his ferocity; thence to the Cavalier of Charles the First, Sir Philip Percival, who having gloriously defended his castle, was at length deprived of his lordly possessions, but never of his loyalty, and died obscurely in the metropolis, of a broken heart, till we reach the Polish Nobleman, the Lord Egmont of the Georges.

The nation has lost many a noble example of men and women acting a great part on great occasions, and then retreating to the shade of privacy; and we may be content that many a name has not been inscribed on the roll of national glory only from wanting a few drops of ink! Such domestic annals may yet be viewed in the family records at Appleby Castle! Anne, Countess of Pembroke, was a glorious woman the descendant of two potent northern families, the Veneripots and the Cliffords.—She lived in a state of regal magnificence and independence, inhabiting five or seven castles; yet though her magnificent spirit poured itself out in her extended charities, and though her independence mated that of monarchs, yet she herself, in her domestic habits, lived as a hermit in her own castles; and though only acquainted with her native language, she had cultivated her mind in many parts of learning; and as Donne, in his way, observes, 'she knew how to converse of every thing; from predestination to sea-silk.' Her favorite design was to have materials collected for the history of those two potent northern families to whom she was allied; and at a considerable expense she employed learned persons to make collections for this purpose, from the records in the Tower, the Rolls, and other repositories of manuscripts; Gilpin had seen three large volumes fairly transcribed. Anecdotes of a great variety of characters, who had exerted themselves on very important occasions, compose these family records—and induce one to wish that the public were in possession of

* This work was published in 1742, and the scarcity of these volumes was felt in Grange's day, for they obtained then the considerable price of four guineas; some time ago a few copies were sold for thirty at a sale, and a cheap copy was offered to me at twelve guineas. These volumes should contain seventeen portraits. The first was written by Mr Anderson, who, dying before the second appeared, Lord Egmont, from the materials Anderson had left, concluded his family history—con amor.

† Mr Anderson, the writer of the first volume, was a feudal enthusiast: he has thrown out an odd notion that the commercial, or the wealthy class, had intruded on the dignity of the ancient nobility; but as wealth has raised such high prices for labour, commodities, &c, it had reached its ne plus ultra, and commerce could be carried on no longer! He has ventured on this amusing prediction. 'As it is, therefore, evident that new men will never rise again in any age with such advantages of wealth, at least in considerable numbers, their party will gradually decrease.'

the annals of the domestic life of heroes and of sages, so have only failed in obtaining an historian! A biographical monument of this nature, which has spread through the press, will sufficiently prove the utility of this class of sentimental biography. It is the life of Robert Price, a Welsh lawyer, and an ancestor of the statesman whose ingenuity, in our days, has refined the principles of the Picturesque in Art. This life is announced 'printed by the appointment of the family'; but it is not to be considered merely as a tribute of private affection; and how we are at this day interested in the career of a Welsh lawyer in the reign of William the Third, whose name has probably never been consigned to the page of history, remains to be told.

Robert Price, after having served Charles the Second, edd latterly in the eventful times of William the Third—he is probably of Tory principles, for on the arrival of the Dutch prince, he was removed from the attorney-generalship of Glamorgan. The new monarch has been accused of favouritism, and of an eagerness in showering exorbitant grants on some of his foreigners, which soon raised a formidable opposition in the jealous spirit of Englishmen. The grand favourite, William Bentinck, after being raised to the Earldom of Portland, had a grant bestowed on him of three lordships, in the county of Denbigh. The patriot of his native country—a title which the Welsh had already conferred on Robert Price—then rose to assert the rights of his father-land, and his speeches are as admirable for their knowledge as their spirit. 'The submitting of 1500 shelders to the will of a Dutch lord was,' as he sarcastically declared, 'putting them in a worse posture than their former estate, when under William the Conqueror as his Norman lords. England must not be tributary to strangers—we must, like patriots, stand by our country—otherwise, when God shall send us a Prince of Wales, he may have such a present of a crown made him, as a Pope did to King John, who was surnamed some terre, and was by his father made Lord of Ireland, which grant was consumed by the Pope, who sent him a crown of peacock's feathers, in derogation of his power, and the poverty of his country.' Robert Price asserted that the king could not, by the Bill of Rights, alien or give away the inheritance of Prince of Wales, without the consent of parliament. He concluded a copious and patriotic speech, by proposing that an address be presented to the king to put an immediate stop to the grant now passing to the Earl of Portland or the lordships, &c.

This speech produced such an effect, that the address was carried unanimously; and the king, though he highly resented the speech of Robert Price, sent a civil message to the commons, declaring that he should not have given Lord Portland those lands, had he imagined the House of Commons could have been concerned; 'I will therefore recall the grant!' On receiving the royal message, Robert Price drew up a resolution to which the house assented, that 'to procure or pass exorbitant grants by any member of the privy council, &c. was a high crime and misdemeanor.' The speech of Robert Price contained truths too numerous and too bold to suffer the light during that reign; but his speech against foreigners was printed the year after King William's death, with this title 'Gloia Cambria, or the speech of a bold Briton in parliament, against the Dutch prince of Wales,' with this motto, Opus est Victi. Such was the great character of Robert Price, that he was made a Welsh judge by the very sovereign whose favourite plans he had so patriotically thwarted.

Another marked event in the life of this English patriot was a second noble stand he made against the royal authority, when in opposition to the public good. The secret history of a quarrel between George the First and the Prince of Wales, afterwards George the Second, on the birth of a son, appears in this life; and when the prince in disgrace left the palace, his royal highness proposed asking his children and the princess with him; but the king retained the children, claiming the care of the royal offspring as a royal prerogative. It now became a legal point to ascertain 'whether the education of his majesty's grandchildren, and the care of their marriages, &c. belonged of right to his majesty as king of this realm, or not?' Ten of the judges obsequiously allowed of the prerogative to the full. Robert Price and another judge decided that the education, &c. was the right of the father, although the marriages was that of his majesty as king of this realm, yet not exclusive of the prince, their father. He assured the king, that the ten obsequious judges had no authority to support their precipitate opinion; all the books and precedents cannot form a prerogative for the king of this realm to have the care and education of his grandchildren during the life and without the consent of their father—a prerogative unknown to the laws of England! He pleads for the rights of a father, with the spirit of one who feels them, as well as with legal science, and historical knowledge.

Such were the two great incidents in the life of this Welsh judge! Yet had the family not found one to commemorate these memorable events in the life of their ancestor, we had lost the noble picture of a constitutional interpreter of the laws, an independent country gentleman, and an Englishman jealous of the excessive predominance of ministerial or royal influence.

Cicero, and others, have informed us that the ancient history of Rome itself was composed out of such accounts of private families, to which, indeed, we must add those annals or registers of public events which unquestionably were preserved in the archives of the Temples by the Priests. But the history of the individual may involve public interest, whenever the skill of the writer combines with the importance of the event. Messala, the orator, gloried in having composed many volumes of the genealogy of the Nobility of Rome; and Atticus wrote the genealogy of Brutus, to prove him descended from Junius Brutus the expulser of the Tarquins, and founder of the Republic, near five hundred years before.

Another class of this sentimental biography was projected by the late Elizabeth Hamilton. This was to have consisted of a series of what she called comparative biography, and an ancient character was to have been paralleled by a modern one. Occupied by her historical romance with the character of Agrippina, she sought in modern history for a partner of her own sex, and 'one who, like her, had experienced vicissitudes of fortune'; and she found no one better qualified than the princess palatine, Elizabeth the daughter of James the First. Her next life was to have been that of Seneca, with the scenes and persons of which her life of Agrippina had familiarized her; and the contrast or the parallel was to have been Locke; which, well managed, she thought, would have been sufficiently striking. It seems to me, that it would rather have afforded an evidence of her invention! Such a biographical project reminds one of Plutarch's Parallels, and might incur the danger of displaying more ingenuity than truth. The sage of Cheronea must often have racked his invention to help out his parallels, bending together to make them similar, the most unconnected events and the most distinct feelings; and, to keep his parallels in two straight lines, he probably made a free use of augmentatives and diminutives to help out his pair, who might have been equal, and yet not alike!

Our Father-land is prodigal of immortal names, or names which might be made immortal; Gibbon once contemplated with complacency, the very ideal of Sentimental Biography, and we may regret that he has only left the project! I have long revolved in my mind a volume of biographical writing; the lives or rather the characters of the most eminent persons in arts and arms, in church and state, who have flourished in Britain, from the reign of Henry the Eighth to the present age. The subject would afford a rich display of human nature and domestic history, and powerfully address itself to the feelings of every Englishman.

LITERARY PARALLELS.

An opinion on this subject in the preceding article has led me to a further investigation. It may be right to acknowledge that so attractive is this critical and moral amusement of comparing great characters with one another, that, among others, Bishop Hurd once proposed to write a book of Parallels, and has furnished a specimen in that of Petrarch and Rousseau, and intended for another that of Erasmus with Cicero. It is amusing to observe how a lively and subtle mind can strike out resemblances, and make contraries accord, and at the same time it may show the pinching difficulties through which a parallel is pushed, till it ends in a paradox.

Hurd says of Petrarch and Rousseau—'Both were impelled by an equal enthusiasm, though directed towards different objects: Petrarch's towards the glory of the Roman name, Rousseau's towards his idol of a state of nature; the one religious, the other an esprit fort; but may not Petrarch's spite to Babylon be considered, in his time, as a species of free-thinking?—and concludes, that 'both were mad, but of a different nature.' Unquestionably there were features much alike, and almost peculiar to these two literary characters; but I doubt if Hurd has comprehended them in the parallel.

I now give a specimen of those parallels which have done so much mischief in the literary world, when drawn by a hand which covertly leans on one side. An elaborate one of this sort was composed by Longolius or Longueil, between Budæus and Erasmus.* This man, though of Dutch origin, affected to pass for a Frenchman, and, to pay his court to his chosen people, gives the preference obliquely to the French Budæus; though, to make a show of impartiality, he acknowledges that Francis the First had awarded it to Erasmus; but probably he did not infer that kings were the most able reviewers! This parallel was sent forth during the lifetime of both these great scholars, who had long been correspondents, but the publication of the parallel interrupted their friendly intercourse. Erasmus returned his compliments and thanks to Longolius; but at the same time insinuates a gentle hint that he was not over-pleased. 'What pleases me most,' Erasmus writes, 'is the just preference you have given Budæus over me; I confess you are even too economical in your praise of him, as you are too prodigal in mine. I thank you for informing me what it is the learned desire to find in me; my self-love suggests many little excuses, with which, you observe, I am apt to favour my defects. If I am careless, it arises partly from my ignorance, and more from my indolence; I am so constituted, that I cannot conquer my nature; I precipitate rather than compose, and it is far more irksome for me to revise than to write.'

This parallel between Erasmus and Budæus, though the parallel itself was not of a malignant nature, yet disturbed the quiet, and interrupted the friendship of both. When Longolius discovered that the Parisian surpassed the Hollander in Greek literature and the knowledge of the civil law, and wrote more learnedly and laboriously, how did this detract from the finer genius and the varied erudition of the more delightful writer? The parallel compares Erasmus to 'a river swelling its waters and often overflowing its banks; Budæus rolled on like a majestic stream, ever restraining its waves within its bed. The Frenchman has more nerve and blood, and life, and the Hollander more fullness, freshness, and colour.'

This taste for biographical parallels must have reached us from Plutarch; and there is something malicious in our nature which inclines us to form comparative estimates, usually with a view to elevate one great man at the cost of another, whom we would secretly depreciate. Our political parties at home have often indulged in these fallacious parallels, and Pitt and Fox once balanced the scales, not by the standard weights and measures which ought to have been used, but by the adroitness of the hand that pressed down the scale. In literature these comparative estimates have proved most prejudicial. A finer model exists not than the parallel of Dryden and Pope, by Johnson; for without designing any undue preference, his vigorous judgment has analyzed them by his contrasts, and has rather shown their distinctness than their similarity. But literary parallels usually end in producing parties; and, as I have elsewhere observed, often originate in undervaluing one man of genius, for his deficiency in some eminent quality possessed by the other man of genius; they not unfrequently proceed from adverse tastes, and are formed with the concealed design of establishing some favourite one. The world of literature has been deeply infected with this folly. Virgil probably was often vexed in his days by a parallel with Homer, and the Homerians combated with the Virgilians. Modern Italy was long divided into such literary sects: a perpetual skirmishing is carried on between the Aristotelians and the Tassoists; and feuds as dire as those between two Highland clans were raised concerning the Petrarchists and the Chabrierists. Old Cornelle lived to bow his venerable genius before a parallel with Racine; and no one has suffered more unjustly by such arbitrary criticisms than Pope, for a strange unnatural civil war has often been renewed between the Drydenists and the Popeists. Two men of great genius should never be depreciated by the misapplied ingenuity of parallel; on such occasions we ought to conclude, that they are magis parvi quam similes.

* It is noticed by Jordis, in his Life of Erasmus, vol. I, p. 160.

THE PEARL BIBLES, AND SIX THOUSAND ERRATA

As a literary curiosity, I notice a subject which may rather enter into the history of religion. It relates to an extraordinary state of our English Bibles, which were some time suffered to be so corrupted that no books were yet swarmed with such innumerable errata!

These errata unquestionably were in great part voluntary commissions, passages interpolated, and mangled for certain purposes; sometimes to sanction a new creed of a half-hatched sect, and sometimes with intention to destroy all scriptural authority by a confusion or an omission of texts—the whole was left open to the option or the malignity of the editors, who, probably, by certain ingenious wine-merchants, contrived to accommodate 'the waters of life' to their customers' peculiar taste. They had also a project of printing Bibles as cheaply as in a form as contracted as they possibly could for the common people; and they proceeded till it nearly ended with having no bible at all: and, as Fuller, in his Mixt Contemplations on better Times, alluding to this circumstance with not one of his lucky quibbles, observes, 'The same price of the Bible hath caused the small pricing of a Bible.'

This extraordinary attempt on the English Bible began even before Charles the First's dethronement, and probably arose from an unusual demand for Bibles, as the sectarian fanaticism was increasing. Printing of English Bibles, was an article of open trade; every one printed; the lowest price, and as fast as their presses would allow. Even those who were dignified as 'his Majesty's Printers' were among these manufacturers; for we have an account of a scandalous omission by them of the important negative in the seventh commandment! the printers were summoned before the court of High Commission, and this was served to bid them in a fine of three thousand pounds. A prior circumstance, indeed, had occurred, which induced the government to be more vigilant on the Bible press. The learned Usher, one day hastening to read at Paul's Cross, entered the shop of one of the stations as booksellers were then called, and inquiring for a Bible of the London edition, when he came to look for his text to his astonishment and his horror, he discovered that the verse was omitted in the Bible! This gave the first occasion of complaint to the king of the insufferable negligence and incapacity of the London press; and, says the same script writer of this anecdote, first bred that great contest which followed, between the University of Cambridge as the London stationers, about the right of printing Bibles.

The secret bibliographical history of these times will show the extraordinary state of the press in this new trade of Bibles. The writer of a curious pamphlet exposes the combination of those called the king's printers, with their contrivances to keep up the prices of Bibles; their correspondences with the book-sellers of Scotland and Dublin by which means they retained the privilege in their own hands; the king's London printers got Bibles printed cheaper at Edinburgh. In 1623, when folio Bibles were wanted, the Cambridge printers sold them at ten shillings in quires; on this the Londoners set six printing houses to work, and, to annihilate the Cambridgers printed a similar folio Bible, but sold with it five hundred quarts of Rhenish Bibles, and five hundred quarto English, at five shillings a book; which proved the ruin of the folio Bibles, by keeping them down under the cost price. Another competition arose among those who printed English Bibles in Holland, in duodecimo, with an English colophon, for half the price even of the lowest in London. Twelve times and of these duodecimo Bibles, with notes, fabricated in Holland, usually by our fugitive sectarians, were sold by the king's printers, as contrary to the statute.† Such was this shameful war of Bibles—folio, quarto, and duodecimo, even in the days of Charles the First. The pest spirit of the rising sects was the real occasion of these increased demands for Bibles.

During the civil wars they carried on the same open sale and competition, besides the private ventures of the smuggled Bibles. A large impression of these Dutch English Bibles were burnt by order of the Assembly of Divines, for these three errors:—

Gen. xxi. 24.—This is that ass that found rulers in the wilderness—for snare.

Ruth iv, 13.—The Lord gave her corruption—for conception.

Luke xxi, 28.—Look up and lift up your hands, for your redemption draweth nigh—for redemption.

These errors were none of the printers; but, as a writer of the times expresses it, 'egregious blasphemies, and unnauseable errata' of some sectarian, or some Bellamy editor of that day!

The printing of Bibles at length was a privilege conceded to one William Bentley; but he was opposed by Hills and Field; and a paper war arose, in which they mutually recriminated on each other, with equal truth.

Field printed in 1663 what was called the Pearl Bible; Bading, I suppose, to that diminutive type in printing, for it could not derive its name from its worth. It is a twenty-twoers; but to contract the mighty book into this dwarfishness, all the original Hebrew texts prefixed to the Psalms, explaining the occasion and the subject of their composition, is wholly expunged. This Pearl Bible, which may be suspected among the great collection of our English Bibles at the British Museum, is set off by many notable errata, of which these are noticed:—

Romans vi, 13.—Neither yield ye your members as instruments of righteousness unto sin—for unrighteousness. First Corinthians vi, 9.—Know ye not the unrighteous shall inherit the kingdom of God?—for shall not inherit.

This erratum served as the foundation of a dangerous doctrine; for many libertines urged the text from this corrupt Bible, against the reproofs of a divine.

This Field was a great forger; and it is said that he received a present of 1500*l* from the independents to corrupt a text in Acts vi, 3, to sanction the right of the people to appoint their own pastors. The corruption was the easiest possible; it was only to put a ye instead of a we; so that the right in Field's Bible emanated from the people, not from the apostles. The only account I recollect of this extraordinary state of our Bibles is a happy allusion in a line of Butler:—

Religion spawn'd a various rout
Of pestilant, capricious sects,
The maggots of corrupted texts.

In other Bibles by Hills and Field we may find such abundant errata, reducing the text to nonsense or to blasphemy, making the Scriptures contemptible to the multitude, who came to pray, and not to scorn.

It is affirmed, in the manuscript account already referred to, that one Bible swarmed with six thousand faults! Indeed, from another source we discover that 'Sterne, a solid scholar, who was the first who summed up the three thousand and six hundred faults, that were in our printed Bibles of London.* If one book can be made to contain near four thousand errors, little ingenuity was required to reach to this thousand; but perhaps this is the first time so remarkable an incident in the history of literature has ever been chronicled. And that famous edition of the Vulgate by Pope Sixtus the Fifth, a memorable book of blunders, which commands such high prices, ought now to fall in value, before the Pearl Bible, in twenty-four, of Messrs Hills and Field!

Mr Field, and his worthy coadjutor, seem to have carried the favour of the reigning powers over their opponents; for I find a piece of their secret history. They engaged to pay 500*l* per annum to some, 'whose names I forbear to mention,' warily observes the manuscript writer; and above 100*l* per annum to Mr Marchmont Needham and his wife, out of the profits of the sales of their Bibles; dividing, insulting, and triumphing over others, out of their confidence in their great friends and purse, as if they were lawless and free, both from offence and punishment.† This Marchmont Needham is sufficiently notorious, and his secret history is probably true; for in a Mercurius Politicus of this unprincipled Cobbett of his day, I found an elaborate puff of an edition, published by the annuity-grantor to this Worthy and his Wife!

* G Gerrard's Letter to the Earl of Strafford, Vol. I, p. 28.

† Harl. MS. 7590.

Not only had the Bible to suffer these indignities of size and price, but the Prayer-book was once printed in an illegible and worn out type; on which the printer being complained of, he stoutly replied, that 'it was as good as the price afforded; and being a book which all persons ought to have by heart, it was no matter whether it was read or not, so that it was worn out in their hands.' The puritans seem not to have been so nice about the source of purity itself.

These hand-bibles of the sectarists, with their six thousand errata, like the false Deucalia, covered their crafty deformity with a fair raiment; for when the great Selden, in the assembly of divines, delighted to confute them in their own learning, he would say, as Whitelock reports, when they had cited a text to prove their assertion, 'Perhaps in your little pocket-bible with gilt leaves,' which they would often pull out and read, 'the translation may be so, but the Greek or the Hebrew signifies this.'

While these transactions were occurring, it appears that the authentic translation of the Bible, such as we now have it, by the learned translators in James the First's time, was suffered to lie neglected. The copies of the original manuscript were in the possession of two of the king's printers, who, from cowardice, consent, and connivance, suppressed the publication; considering that a Bible full of errata, and often, probably, accommodated to the notions of certain sectarists, was more valuable than one authenticated by the hierarchy! Such was the state of the English Bible till 1660.*

The proverbial expression of chapter and verse seems peculiar to ourselves, and, I suspect, originated in the puritanic period, probably just before the civil wars under Charles the First, from the frequent use of appealing to the Bible on the most frivolous occasions, practised by those whom South calls 'those mighty men at chapter and verse.' With a sort of religious coquetry, they were vain of perpetually opening their gilt pocket Bibles; they perked them up with such self-sufficiency and perfect ignorance of the original, that the learned Selden found considerable amusement in going to their 'assembly of divines,' and puzzling or confuting them, as we have noticed. A ludicrous anecdote on one of these occasions is given by a contemporary, which shows how admirably that learned man amused himself with this 'assembly of divines.' They were discussing the distance between Jerusalem and Jericho, with a perfect ignorance of sacred or of ancient geography; one said it was twenty miles, another ten, and at last it was concluded to be only seven, for this strange reason, that fish was brought from Jericho to Jerusalem market! Selden observed, that 'possibly the fish in question was salted,' and silenced these acute disputants.

It would probably have greatly discomposed these 'chapter and verse' men, to have informed them that the Scriptures had neither chapter nor verse! It is by no means clear how the holy writings were anciently divided, and still less how quoted or referred to. The honour of the invention of the present arrangement of the Scriptures is ascribed to Robert Stephens, by his son, in the preface to his Concordance, a task which he performed during a journey on horseback from Paris to London, in 1551; and whether it was done as Yorick would in his Shandean manner lounging on his mule, or at his intermediate baits, he has received all possible thanks for this employment of his time. Two years afterwards he concluded with the Bible. But that the honour of every invention may be disputed, Sanctus Pagninus's Bible, printed at Lyons in 1527, seems to have led the way to these convenient divisions; Stephens however improved on Pagninus's mode of paragraphical marks and marginal verses; and our present 'chapter and verse,' more numerous and more commodiously numbered, were the project of this learned printer, to recommend his edition of the Bible; trade and learning were once combined! Whether in this arrangement any disturbance of the continuity of the text has followed, is a subject not fitted for my inquiry.

VIEW OF A PARTICULAR PERIOD OF THE STATE OF RELIGION IN OUR CIVIL WARS.

Looking over the manuscript diary of Sir Symonds D'Ewes, I was struck by a picture of the domestic religious life which at that period was prevalent among families. Sir Symonds was a sober antiquary, heated with no fanaticism, yet I discovered in his Diary that he was a visionary in his constitution, macerating his body by private fasts, and spiritualizing in search of secret signs. These ascetic penances were afterwards succeeded in the nation, by an era of hypocritical sanctity; and we may trace this last stage of insanity and of immorality, closing with impiety. This would be a dreadful picture of religion, if for a moment we supposed that it were religion; that consolatory power which has its source in our feelings, and according to the derivation of its expressive term, binds men together. With us it was sectarianism, whose origin and causes we shall not now touch on, which broke out into so many monstrous shapes, when every pretended reformer was guided by his own peculiar fancies: we have lived to prove that folly and wickedness are rarely obsolete.

* See the London Printers' Lamentation on the Press oppressed, Harl. Coll. III. 990.

The age of Sir Symonds D'Ewes, who lived through the times of Charles the First, was religious; for the character of this monarch had all the seriousness and piety not found in the bonhomie, and careless indecorums of his father, whose manners of the Scottish court were moulded on the gaieties of the French, from the ancient intercourse of the French and Scottish governments. But this religious age of Charles the First presents a strange contrast with the licentiousness which subsequently prevailed among the people; there seems to be a secret connexion between a religious and an irreligious period; the levity of popular feeling is driven to and fro by its reaction; when man has been once taught to contemn his mere humanity, his abstract fancies open a secret by-path to his presumed salvation; he wanders till he is lost—he trembles till he dotes in melancholy—he raves till Truth itself is no longer immutable. The transition to a very opposite state is equally rapid and vehement. Such is the history of man when his Religion is founded on misdirected feelings, and such too is the reaction so constantly operating in all human affairs.

The writer of this diary did not belong to those non-conformists who arranged themselves in hostility to the established religion and political government of our country. A private gentleman and a phlegmatic antiquary, Sir Symonds withal was a zealous Church-of-England protestant. Yet amidst the mystical allusions of an age of religious controversies, we see these close in the scenes we are about to open, and find this quiet gentleman tormenting himself and his lady, by watching for 'certain evident marks and signs of an assurance for a better life'; with I know not how many distinct sorts of 'Graces.'

I give an extract from the manuscript diary.

'I spent this day chiefly in private fasting, prayer, and other religious exercises. This was the first time that I ever practised this duty, having always before declined it, by reason of the papists' superstitious abuses of it. I had partaken formerly of public fasts, but never knew the use and benefit of the same duty performed alone in secret, or with others of mine own family in private. In these particulars, I had my knowledge much enlarged by the religious converse I enjoyed at Albury-Lodge, for there also I shortly after entered upon framing an evidence of marks and signs for my assurance of a better life.

'I found much benefit of my secret fasting, from a learned discourse on fasting by Mr Henry Mason, and observed his rule, that Christians ought to sit sometimes apart for their ordinary humiliation and fasting, and so intend to continue the same course as long as my health will permit me. Yet did I vary the times and duration of my fasting. At first, before I had finished the marks and signs of my assurance of a better life, which scrutiny and search cost me some three-score days of fasting, I performed it some times twice in the space of five weeks, then once each month, or a little sooner or later, and then also I sometimes ended the duties of the day, and took some little food about three of the clock in the afternoon. But for divers years last past, I constantly abstained from all food the whole day. I fasted till supper-time, about six in the evening, and spent ordinarily about eight or nine hours in the performance of religious duties; one part of which was prayer and confession of sins, to which end I wrote down a catalogue of my known sins, orderly. These were all sins of infirmity; for, through God's grace, I was so far from allowing myself in the practice and commission of any actual sin, as I durst not take upon me any controversial sins, as usury, carding, dicing, mixt dancing, and the like, because I was in mine own judgment persuaded they were unlawful. Till I had finished my assurance first in English and afterwards in Latin, with a large and elaborate preface in Latin also to it; I spent a great part of the day at that work, &c.

'Saturday, December 1, 1627. I devoted my whole course of secret fasting, and drew divers signs of my assurance of a better life, from the grace of repentance, being before gone through the graces of knowledge, faith, hope, love, zeal, patience, humility, and joy; and drew several marks from them on like days of humiliation to the greater part. My dear wife beginning also to find most certain signs of her own future happiness after due from several graces.

'January 19, 1628.—Saturday I spent in secret humiliation and fastings, and finished my whole assurance to a better life, consisting of three score and four signs, or marks drawn from several graces. I made some small alterations in those signs afterwards; and when I turned them into the Latin tongue, I enriched the margin with further proofs and authorities. I found much comfort and refreshment of spirit from them, which shows the devilish sophisms of the papists, anabaptists, and pseudo-Lutherans, and profane atheistical men, who say that assurance brings forth presumption, and a careless wicked life. Thus when men pretend to the end, and not use the means.

'My wife joined with me in a private day of fasting and drew several signs and marks by my help and assistance, for her assurance to a better life.'

This was an era of religious diaries, particularly among the non-conformists; but they were, as we see, used by others. Of the Countess of Warwick, who died in 1631, we are told, that 'She kept a diary, and took counsel with two persons, whom she called her soul's friends.' She called prayers heart's ease, for, such she found them. Her own lord, knowing her hours of prayers, once conveyed a goodly minister into a secret place within her house, who, being a man very able to judge, much admired her humble fervency; for in praying she prayed; but when she did not with an audible voice, her sighs and groans might be heard at a good distance from the closet. We are not surprised to discover this practice of religious diaries among the more puritanic sort; what they were we may gather from this description of one. Mr John Jauway kept a diary, in which he wrote down every evening what the frame of his spirit had been all that day; he took notice what incomes he had, what profit he received in his spiritual traffic; what returns came from that far country; what answers of prayer, what deadness and faintness of spirit, &c. And so we find of Mr John Carter, that 'He kept a day-book and cast up his accounts with God every day.'* To such wordly notions had they humiliated the spirit of religion; and this style, and this mode of religion, has long been continued among us, even among men of superior acquisitions; as witness the 'Spiritual Diary and Soliloquies' of a learned physician within our own times, Dr. Rutty, which is a great curiosity of the kind.

Such was the domestic state of many well meaning families they were rejecting with the utmost abhorrence every resemblance to what they called the idolatry of Rome, while, in fact, the gloom of the monastic cell was settling over the houses of these melancholy puritans. Private fasts were more than ever practised; and a lady said to be eminent for her genius and learning, who outlived this era, declared that she had nearly lost her life through a prevalent notion that no fat person could get to Heaven; and thus spoiled and wasted her body through excessive fastings. A quaker, to prove the text that 'Man shall not live by bread alone, but by the word of God,' persisted in refusing his meals. The literal text proved for him a dead letter, and this practical commentator died by a metaphor. This quaker, however was not the only victim to the letter of the text; for the famous Origen, by interpreting in too literal a way the 12th verse of the 19th of St Matthew, which alludes to those persons who become eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven with his own hands armed himself, against himself, as is sufficiently known. 'Retournons nos moutons?' The parliament afterwards had both periodical and occasional fasts; and Charles the First opposed 'the hypocritical fast of every Wednesday in the month by appointing one for the second Friday;' the two unhapparties, who were hungering and thirsting for each other's blood, were fasting in spite one against the other! Without inquiring into the causes, even if we thought we could ascertain them, of that frightful dissolution of religion which so long prevailed in our country, and of which the very corruption it has left behind still breeds in monstrous shapes, it will be sufficient to observe, that the destruction of the monarchy and the ecclesiastical order was a moral earthquake, overturning all minds, and opening all changes. A theological logomachy was substituted for the sullen and proud ascetics who ascended into power, and, without proving themselves, wearied all others, and triumphed over each other by their mutual obscurity. Two great giants in this theological war were the famous Richard Baxter and Dr Owen. They both wrote a variety of books; but the endless controversy between them was the extraordinary and incomprehensible subject, whether the death of Christ was satis pro quodam, or only satis pro omnibus; that is, whether it was a payment of the very wage, which by law we ought to have paid, or of something held by God to be equivalent. Such was the point which this debate between Owen and Baxter, lasted about end.

Yet these metaphysical absurdities were harmless, compared to what was passing among the more hot fanatics, who were for acting the wild fancies which their melancholy brains engendered; men, who from the places into which they had thrust themselves, might now be called the higher orders of society.* These two parties alike set forth an evil spirit to walk among the multitude.—very one would become his own law-maker, and even a own prophet; the meanest aspired to give his name to a sect. All things were to be put into motion according to the St. Vitus's dance of the last new saint. 'Away with the Law! which cuts off a man's legs and then bids him walk!' cried one from his pulpit. 'Let believers sin as fast as they will, they have a fountain open to wash them,' declared another teacher. We had the Brownists, on Robert Brown, the Vaneites, from Sir Harry Vane, then we sink down to Mr Traske, Mr Wilkinson, Mr Robinson, and H. N., or Henry Nicholas, of the Family of Love, besides Mrs Hutchinson, and the Grindletonian family, who preferred 'motions to motives,' and conveniently assumed, that 'their spirit is not to be tried by the Scripture, but the Scripture by their spirit.' Edwards, the author of 'Gangrenas,' the adversary of Milton, whose work may still be preserved for its curiosity, though immortalized by the scourge of genius, has furnished a list of about two hundred of such sects in these times. A divine of the Church of England observed to a great secretary, 'You talk of the idolatry of Rome; but each of you, whenever you have made and set up a calf, will dance about it.'

This confusion of religions, if, indeed, these pretended notions of faith could be classed among religions, disturbed the consciences of good men, who read themselves in and out of their vacillating creed. It made, at last, even one of the puritans themselves, who had formerly complained that they had not enjoyed sufficient freedom under the bishops, cry out against 'this cursed intolerable intolerance.' And the fact is, that when the presbyterians had fixed themselves into the government, they published several treatises against toleration! The parallel between these wild notions of reform, and those of another character, run closely together. About this time well-meaning persons, who were neither enthusiasts from the ambition of founding sects, nor of covering their immorality by their impiety, were infected with the religious insanias. One case may stand for many. A Mr Greswold, a gentleman of Warwickshire, whom a Brownist had by degrees enticed from his parish church, was afterwards persuaded to return to it—but he returned with a troubled mind, and lost in the prevalent theological contests. A horror of his future existence shut him out, as it were, from his present ease; retiring into his own house, with his children, he ceased to communicate with the living world. He had his food put in at the window; and when his children lay sick, he admitted no one for their relief. His house, at length, was forced open; and they found two children dead, and the father confined to his bed. He had mangled his bible, and cut out the titles, contents, and every thing but the very text itself; for it seems that he thought that every thing human was sinful, and he conceived that the titles of the books and the contents of the chapters, were to be cut out of the sacred Scriptures, as having been composed by men.*

More terrible it was when the insanity, which had hitherto been more confined to the better classes, burst forth among the common people. Were we to dwell minutely on this period, we should start from the picture with horror: we might, perhaps, console ourselves with a disbelief of its truth; but the drug though bitter in the mouth we must sometimes digest. To observe the extent to which the populace can proceed, disfranchised of law and religion, will always leave a memorable recollection.

What occurred in the French revolution had happened here—an age of impiety! Society itself seemed dissolved, for every tie of private affection and of public duty was unloosed. Even nature was strangely violated! From the first opposition to the decorous ceremonies of the national church, by the simple puritans, the next stage was that of ridicule, and the last of obloquy. They began by calling the surplice a linen rag on the back; baptism a Christ-cross on a baby's face; and the organ was likened to the bellow, the grunt, and the barking of the respective animals. They actually baptized horses in churches at the fountains; and the jest of that day was, that the Reformation was now a thorough one in England, since our horses went to church.† St Paul's cathedral was turned into a market, and the aisles, the communion table, and the altar, served for the foulest purposes. The liberty which every one now assumed of delivering his own opinions led to acts so execrable, that I can find no parallel for them except in the mad times of the French Revolution. Some maintained that there existed no distinction between moral good and moral evil; and that every man's actions were prompted by the Creator. Prostitution was professed as a religious act; a glazier was declared to be a prophet, and the woman he cohabited with was said to be ready to lie in of the Messiah. A man married his father's wife. Murders of the most extraordinary nature were occurring; one woman crucified her mother, another in imitation of Abraham sacrificed her child; we hear, too, of parricides. Amidst the slaughters of civil wars, spoil and blood had accustomed the people to contemplate the most horrible scenes. One mad-man of the many, we find drinking a health on his knees, in the midst of a town, 'to the devil! that it might be said that his family should not be extinct without doing some infamous act.' A Scotchman, one Alexander Agnew, commonly called 'Jock of broad Scotland,' whom one cannot call an atheist, for he does not seem to deny the existence of the Creator, nor a future state, had a shrewdness of local humour in his strange notions. Omitting some offensive things, others as strange may exhibit the state to which the reaction of a hypocritical system of religion had driven the common people. Jock of broad Scotland said he was nothing in God's common, for God had given him nothing; he was no more obliged to God than to the devil, for God was very greedy. Neither God nor the devil gave him the fruits of the ground; the wives of the country gave him his meat. When asked wherein he believed, he answered, 'He believed in white meal, water, and salt. Christ was not God, for he came into the world after it was made, and died as other men.' He declared that 'he did not know whether God or the devil had the greatest power, but he thought the devil was the greatest. When I die, let God and the devil strive for my soul, and let him that is strongest take it.' He no doubt had been taught by the presbytery to mock religious rites; and when desired to give God thanks for his meat, he said, 'Take a sackful of prayers to the mill and grind them, and take your breakfast of them.' To others he said, 'I will give you a two-pence, to pray until a boll of meal, and one stone of butter, fall from heaven through the house rigging to you.' When bread and cheese were laid on the ground

† There is a pamphlet which records a strange fact. 'News from Powles: or the new Reformation of the Army, with a true Relation of a Colt that was fabled in the Cathedral Church of St Paul, in London, and how it was publicly baptized, and the name (because a bald Colt) was called Baal-Rex 1640.' The water they sprinkled from the soldier's helmet on this occasion is described. The same occurred elsewhere. See Foulie's History of the Plots, &c. of our pretended Saints. These men who baptized horses and pigs in the name of the Trinity, sang Psalms when they marched. One cannot easily comprehend the nature of fanaticism, except when we learn that they refused to pay rents! Digitized by Google by him, he said, 'If I leave this, I will long cry to God before he give it me again.' To others he said, 'Take a bannock, and break it in two, and lay down one half thereof, and you will long pray to God before he put the other half to it again!' He seems to have been an anti-trinitarian. He said he received every thing from nature, which had ever reigned and ever would. He would not conform to any religious system, nor name the three Persons.—'At all these things I have long shaken my cap,' he said. Jock of broad Scotland seems to have been one of those who imagine that God should have furnished them with bannocks ready baked.

The extravagant fervour then working in the minds of the people is marked by the story told by Clement Walker of the soldier who entered a church with a lantern and a candle burning in it, and in the other hand four candles not lighted. He said he came to deliver his message from God, and show it by these types of candles. Driven into the churchyard, and the wind blowing strong, he could not kindle his candles, and the new prophet was awkwardly compelled to conclude his five documents, abolishing the Sabbath, tithes, ministers, magistrates, and, at last, the Bible itself, without putting out each candle, as he could not kindle them; observing, however, each time—'And now I should put out the first light, but the wind is so high that I cannot kindle it.'

A perfect scene of the effects which this state of irreligious society produced among the lower orders, I am enabled to give from the manuscript life of John Shaw, vicar of Rotherham, with a little tediousness, but with infinite naïveté, what happened to himself. This honest divine was puritanically inclined, but there can be no exaggeration in these unvarnished facts. He tells a remarkable story of the state of religious knowledge in Lancashire, at a place called Cartmel: some of the people appeared desirous of religious instruction, declaring that they were without any minister, and had entirely neglected every religious rite, and therefore pressed him to quit his situation at Lymm for a short period. He may now tell his own story.

'I found a very large spacious church, scarce any seats in it; a people very ignorant, and yet willing to learn; so as I had frequently some thousands of hearers. I catechised in season and out of season. The churches were so thronged at nine in the morning, that I had much ado to get to the pulpit. One day an old man about sixty, sensible enough in other things, and living in the parish of Cartmel, coming to me on some business, I told him that he belonged to my care and charge, and I desired to be informed in his knowledge of religion. I asked him how many Gods there were? He said he knew not. I informed him, asked again how he thought to be saved? He answered he could not tell. Yet thought that was a harder question than the other. I told him that the way to salvation was by Jesus Christ, God-man, who as he was man shed his blood for us on the cross, &c. Oh, sir, said he, I think I heard of that man you speak of once in a play at Kendal, called Corpus-Christi's play, where there was a man on a tree and blood run down, &c. And afterwards he professed he could not remember that he ever heard of salvation by Jesus, but in that play.'

The scenes passing in the metropolis, as well as in the country, are opened to us in one of the choralizing poems of George Withers. Our sensible Rhimer wrote in November 1652, 'a Dark Lanthorne' on the present subject.

After noticing that God, to mortify us, had sent preachers from 'the shop-board and the plough,'

—Such as we seem justly to condemn,
As making truths abhorred, which come from them:

he seems, however, inclined to think, that these self-taught 'Teachers and Prophets' in their darkness might hold a certain light within them.

—Children, fools,

Women and madmen, we do often meet
Preaching, and threatening judgment in the street,
Yea by strange actions, postures, tones, and cries
Themselves they offer to our ears and eyes
As signs unto this nation.—

They act as men in ecstasies have done—
Striving their cloudy visions to declare,
Till they have lost the notions which they had,
And want but few degrees of being mad.

Such is the picture of the folly and of the wicked which after having been preceded by the piety of a glorious age, were succeeded by a dominion of hypocritical sanctity, and then closed in all the horrors of fanaticism and impiety. The parliament at length issued their ordinances for 'punishing blasphemous and erroneous opinions,' and this was enforced with greater than the slighted proclamations of James and Charles, but the curious wording is a comment on our present subject. The preamble notices that 'men and women had lately discovered monstrous opinions, even as tended to the dissolution of human society, and abused, and turned into licentiousness, the liberty of matters of religion.' It punishes any person not descended in his brains, who shall maintain any mere creature God; or that all acts of unrighteousness are not forbidden in the Scriptures; or that God approves of them; or that there is no real difference between moral good and evil,' &c.

To this disordered state was the public mind reduced for this proclamation was only describing what was going among the people! The view of this subject reaches more than one point, which I leave for the meditation of the politician, as well as of the religionist.

BUCKINGHAM'S POLITICAL COQUETRY WITH THE PURITANS.

Buckingham, observes Hume, 'in order to fortify himself against the resentment of James'—on the conduct the duke in the Spanish match, when James was lately hearing every day Buckingham against Bristol, and Bristol against Buckingham—'had affected popularity, and entered into the cabals of the puritans; but afterwards, being secure of the confidence of Charles, he had since abandoned this party; and on that account was the more exposed to their hatred and resentment.'

The political coquetry of a minister coalescing with an opposition party, when he was on the point of being disgraced, would doubtless open an involved scene of intrigue and what one exacted, and the other was content to yield towards the mutual accommodation, might add one more example to the large chapter of political infirmity. But workmen attempting to convert each other into tools by first trying their respective malleability on the anvil, are liable to be disconcerted by even a slight accident, whenever that proves to perfect conviction, how little they can depend on each other, and that each party comes to cheat, and not to be cheated!

This piece of secret history is in part recoverable from good authority. The two great actors were the Duke of Buckingham and Dr Preston, the master of Emmanuel College, and the head of the puritan party.

Dr Preston was an eminent character, who from his youth was not without ambition. His scholastic learning the subtlety of his genius, and his more elegant accomplishments, had attracted the notice of James, at whose table he was perhaps more than once honoured as a guest; his suspicion of his puritanic principles was perhaps the only obstacle to his court preferment; yet Preston unquestionably designed to play a political part. He retained the favour of James by the king's hope of withdrawing the doctor from the opposition party; and commanded the favour of Buckingham by the fears of that minister; when to employ the quaint style of Hacket, the duke foresaw that 'he might come to be tried in the furnace of the next session of parliament, and he had need to make the reformers his friends: most of these 'refiners' were the puritanic opposition party. Appointed one of the chaplains of Prince Charles, Dr Preston had the advantage of being in frequent attendance; and as Hacket tells us, 'this politic man felt the pulse of the court, and wanted not the intelligence of all dark mysteries through the Scotch in his highest bed-chamber.' A close communication took place between the duke and Preston, who, as Hacket describes, was 'a good crow to smell carrion.' He obtained an easy admission to the duke's closet at least thrice a week, and in these notable conferences Buckingham appears to have communicated to his confidential friends. Preston, intent on conveying all his points, skillfully commenced with the smaller ones. He winded the duke circuitously,—he worked at him subterraneously. This wary politician was so cautious to propose what he had at heart—the extirpation of the hierarchy! The thunder of James's voice, 'no talk no king" in the conference at Hampton-Court, still sed in the ear of the puritan. He assured the duke the love of the people was his only anchor, which could only be secured by the most popular measures. A sort of reformation was easy to execute. Cathedrals, collegiate churches maintained by vast wealth, and the life of the chapter, only fed 'fat, lazy, and unprofitable men.' The dissolution of the foundations of monasteries would open an ample source to pay the king's debts, and scatter the streams of patronage. 'You would become the darling of the commonwealth; I give the reins as I find them in Hackett. 'If a crum stick in the seat of any considerable man that attempts an opposition, will be easy to wash it down with manors, woods, royalties, tithes, &c.' It would be furnishing the wants of a number of gentlemen, and be quoted a Greek proverb, 'that on a great oak falls, every neighbour may scuffle for a got.'

Dr Preston was willing to perform the part which Knox acted in Scotland! He might have been certain of a way to maintain this national violation of property; for who calls out? Plunder!! will ever find a gang. These acts of national injustice, so much desired by revolutionaries, are never beneficial to the people; they never parry the spoliation, and the whole terminates in the confiscation of private rapacity.

It was not, however, easy to obtain such perpetual access to the minister, and at the same time escape from the watchful Archbishop Williams, the lord keeper, got sufficient hints from the king; and in a tedious conference with the duke, he wished to convince him that Preston had only offered him 'stinted milk, out of which he should suck nothing!' The duke was, however, smitten by the new project and made a remarkable answer: 'You lose yourself in generalities: make it out to me in particular, you can, that the motion you pick at will find repulse, and be baffled in the house of commons. I know not how our bishops may struggle, but I am much deluded if a great array of the knights and burgesses would not be glad to see an alteration.' We are told on this, that Archbishop Williams took out a list of the members of the house of commons, and convinced the minister that an overwhelming majority would oppose this projected revolution, and that in consequence the duke gave it up.

But this anterior decision of the duke may be doubtful, since Preston still retained the high favour of the minister, after the death of James. When James died at Theobalds, where Dr Preston happened to be in attendance, he had the honour of returning to town in the new king's coach with the Duke of Buckingham. The doctor's servile adulation of the minister gave even great offence to the over-zealous puritans. That he was at length disordered is certain; but this was owing not to any deficient obsequy on the side of our politician, but to one of those unlucky circumstances which have often put an end to temporary political connexions, by enabling one party to discover what the other thinks of him.

I draw this curious fact from a manuscript narrative in the hand-writing of the learned William Wotton. When he puritanic party foolishly became jealous of the man who seemed to be working at root and branch for their purposes, they addressed a letter to Preston, remonstrating with him for his servile attachment to the minister; on which he confidentially returned an answer, assuring them that he was as fully convinced of the vileness and profligacy of the Duke of Buckingham's character as any man could be, but that there was no way to come at him but by the lowest flattery, and that it was necessary for the glory of God, that such instruments should be made use of as could be had: and for that reason, and that alone, he showed that respect to the reigning favourite, and not for any real honour that he had for him. This letter proved fatal; some officious hand conveyed it to the duke! When Preston came as usual, the duke took his opportunity of asking him what he had ever done to disoblige him, that he should describe him in such black characters to his own party? Preston, in amazement denied the fact, and poured forth professions of honour and gratitude. The duke showed him his own letter. Dr Preston instantaneously felt a political apoplexy: the labours of some years were set in a single morning. The baffled politician was turned out of Wallingford House, never more to see the enraged minister. And from that moment Buckingham wholly abandoned the Puritans, and cultivated the friendship of Laud. This happened soon after James the First's death. Wotton adds, 'This story I heard from one who was extremely well versed in the secret history of the time.'²

SIR EDWARD COKE'S EXCEPTIONS AGAINST THE HIGH SHERIFF'S OATH.

A curious fact will show the revolutionary nature of human events, and the necessity of correcting our ancient statutes, which so frequently hold out punishments and penalties for objects which have long ceased to be criminal; as well as for persons against whom it would be barbarous to allow some unrepented statute to operate.

When a political stratagem was practised by Charles the First to keep certain members out of the house of commons, by pricking them down as sheriffs in their different counties, among them was the celebrated Sir Edward Coke whom the government had made High Sheriff for Bucks. It was necessary, perhaps, to be a learned and practised lawyer to discover the means he took, in the height of his resentment to elude the insult. 'This great lawyer, who himself, perhaps, had often administered the oath to the sheriffs, which had, century after century, been usual for them to take, to the surprise of all persons, drew up Exceptions against the Sheriff's oath, declaring that no one could take it. Coke sent his Exceptions to the attorney-general, who by an immediate order in council, submitted them to 'all the judges of England.' Our legal luminary had condescended only to some ingenious cavilling in three of his exceptions; but the fourth was of a nature which could not be overcome. All the judges of England assented, and declared, that there was one part of this ancient oath which was perfectly irreligious, and must ever hereafter be left out! This article was, 'That you shall do all your pain and diligence to destroy and make to cease all manner of heresies, commonly called Lollaries, within your bailiwick, &c.'† The Lollards were the most ancient of protestants, and had practised Luther's sentiments—it was, in fact condemning the established religion of the country! An order was issued from Hampton-Court, for the abrogation of this part of the oath; and at present all high sheriffs owe this obligation to the resentment of Sir Edward Coke, for having been pricked down as Sheriff of Bucks, to be kept out of parliament! The merit of having the oath changed, instantly, he was allowed; but he was not excused taking it, after it was accommodated to the conscientious and lynx-eyed detection of our enraged lawyer.

SECRET HISTORY OF CHARLES I, AND HIS FIRST PARLIAMENTS.

The reign of Charles the First, succeeded by the commonwealth of England, forms a period unparalleled by any preceding one in the annals of mankind. It was for the English nation the great result of all former attempts to ascertain and to secure the just freedom of the subject. The prerogative of the sovereign, and the rights of the people, were often imagined to be mutual encroachments; and were long involved in contradiction, in an age of unsettled opinions and disputed principles. At length the conflicting parties of monarchy and democracy, in the weakness of their passions, discovered how much each required the other for its protector. This age offers the finest speculations in human nature, it opens a protracted scene of glory and of infamy; all that elevates, and all that humiliates our kind, wrestling together, and expiring in a career of glorious deeds, of revolting crimes, and even of ludicrous infirmities!

The French Revolution is the commentary of the English; and a commentary at times more important than the text which it elucidates. It has thrown a freshness over the antiquity of our own history; and, on returning to it, we seem to possess the feelings, and to be agitated by the interests, of contemporaries. The circumstances and the persons which so many imagine had passed away, have been reproduced under our own eyes. In other histories we except the knowledge of the characters and the incidents on the evidence of the historian; but here we may take them from our own conviction, since to extinct names and to past events, we can apply the reality which we ourselves have witnessed.

Charles the First had scarcely ascended the throne, ere he discovered, that in his new parliament he was married to a sullen bride; the youthful monarch, with the impatience of a lover, warm with hope and glory, was ungraciously repulsed even in the first favours! The prediction of his father remained, like the hand-writing on the wall; but, seated on the throne, Hope was more congenial to youth than Prophecy.

As soon as Charles the First could assemble a parliament, he addressed them with an earnestness, in which the simplicity of words and thoughts strongly contrasted with the oratorical harangues of the late monarch. It cannot be alleged against Charles the First, that he preceded the parliament in the war of words. He courted their affections; and even in his manner of reception, amidst the dignity of the regal office, studiously showed his exterior respect by the marked solemnity of their first meeting. As yet uncrowned, on the day on which he first addressed the Lords and Commons, he wore his crown, and veiled it at the opening, and on the close of his speech; a circumstance to which the parliament had not been accustomed. Another ceremony gave still greater solemnity to the meeting; the king would not enter into business till they had united in prayer. He commanded the doors to be closed, and a bishop to perform the office. The suddenness of this unexpected command disconcerted the catholic lords, of whom the less rigid knelt, and the moderate stood: there was one startled papist who did nothing but cross himself!*

The speech may be found in Rushworth; the friendly tones must be shown here.

'I hope that you do remember that you were pleased to employ me to advise my father to break off the treaties (with Spain.) I came into this business willingly and freely, like a young man, and consequently rashly, but it was by your interest—your engagement. I pray you remember, that this being my first action, and begun by your advice and entreaty, what a great dishonour it were to you and me that it should fail for that assistance you are able to give me!'

This effusion excited no sympathy in the house. They voted not a seventh part of the expenditure necessary to proceed with a war, into which, as a popular measure, they themselves had forced the king.

At Oxford the king again reminded them that he was engaged in a war 'from their desires and advice.' He expresses his disappointment at their insufficient grant, 'far short to set forth the navy now preparing.' The speech preserves the same simplicity.

Still no echo of kindness responded in the house. It was, however, asserted, in a vague and quibbling manner, that 'though a former parliament did engage the king in a war, yet (if things were managed by a contrary design, and the treasure misemployed) this parliament is not bound by another parliament;' and they added a cruel mockery, that 'the king should help the cause of the Palatinate with his own money! this foolish war, which James and Charles had so long bore their reproaches for having avoided as hopeless, but which the puritanic party as well as others, had continually urged as necessary for the maintenance of the protestant cause in Europe.

Still no supplies! but protestations of duty, and petitions about grievances, which it had been difficult to specify. In their 'Declaration' they style his Majesty 'Our dear and dread sovereign,' and themselves 'his poor Commons!' but they concede no point—they offer no aid! The king was not yet disposed to quarrel, though he had in vain pressed for despatch of business, lest the season should be lost for the navy; again reminding them that 'it was the first request that he ever made unto them!' On the pretence of the plague at Oxford, Charles prorogued parliament, with a promise to reassemble in the winter.

There were a few whose hearts had still a pulse to vibrate with the distresses of a youthful monarch, perplexed by a war which they themselves had raised. But others of a more republican complexion, rejected 'Necessity, as a dangerous counsellor, which would be always furnishing arguments for supplies. If the king was in danger and necessity, those ought to answer for it who have put both king and kingdom into this peril: and if the state of things would not admit a redress of grievances, there cannot be so much necessity for money.'

* From a manuscript letter of the times.

The first parliament abandoned the king!

Charles now had no other means to despatch the army and fleet, in a bad season, but by borrowing money on private seals: these were letters, where the loan exacted was as small as the style was humble. They specified, that 'this loan, without inconvenience to any, is only intended for the service of the public. Such private helps for public services, which cannot be deferred, the king's premises had been often resorted to; but this 'being the first time that we have required any thing in this kind, we require but that sum which few men would deny a friend.' As far as I can discover, the highest sum assessed from great personages was twenty pounds! The king was willing to suffer any mortification, even that of a charitable solicitation, rather than endure the obdurate insults of parliament! All donations were received, from ten pounds to five shillings: this was the mockery of an alms-besket! Yet, with contributions and savings so trivial, and exacted with such a warm appeal to their feelings, was the king to send out a fleet with ten thousand men—to take Cadix!

This expedition, like so many similar attempts from the days of Charles the First to those of the great Lord Chatham, and to our own—concluded by a nullity! Charles, disappointed in this predatory attempt, in despair, called his second parliament—as he says, 'In the midst of his necessity—and to learn from them how he was to frame his course and councils!'

The Commons, as dutifully as ever, profess that 'No king was ever dearer to his people; and that they really intend to assist his majesty in such a way, as may make him safe at home, and feared abroad—but it was to be on condition, that he would be graciously pleased to accept 'the information and advice of parliament in discovering the causes of the great evils, and redress their grievances. The king accepted this 'as a satisfactory answer;' but Charles comprehended their drift—'You specially aim at the Duke of Buckingham; what he hath done to change your minds I wot not.' The style of the king now first betrays angered feelings; the secret cause of the uncomplaining conduct of the Commons was hatred of the favourite, but the king saw that they designed to control the executive government, and he could ascribe their antipathy to Buckingham but to the capriciousness of popular favour; for not long ago he had heard Buckingham hailed as 'their saviour.' In the zeal and firmness of his affections, Charles always considered that he himself was aimed at in the person of his confidant, his companion, and his minister!

Some of 'the bold speakers,' as the heads of the opposition are frequently designated in the manuscript letters, had now risen into notice. Sir John Elliot, Dr Turner, Sir Dudley Digges, Mr Clement Coke, poured themselves forth in a vehement, not to say seditious style, with invectives more daring than had ever before thundered in the House of Commons! The king now told them, 'I come to show your errors, and, as I may call it, unparliamentary proceedings of parliament.' The lord keeper then assured them that 'when the irregular humours of some particular persons were settled, the king would hear and answer all just grievances; but the king would have them also to know, that he was equally jealous to the contempt of his royal rights, which his majesty would not suffer to be violated by any pretended course of parliamentary liberty. The king considered the parliament as his council; but there was a difference between counselling and controlling, and between liberty and the abuse of liberty.' He finished, by noticing their extraordinary proceedings in their impeachment of Buckingham. The king, resuming his speech, remarkably reproached the parliament.

Now that you have all things according to your wishes, and that I am so far engaged that you think there is no retreat, now you begin to set the dice, and make your own game. But I pray you be not deceived; it is not a parliamentary way, nor is it a way to deal with a king. Mr Clement Coke told you, "It was better to be eaten up by a foreign enemy than to be destroyed at home." Indeed, I think it more honour for a king to be invaded and almost destroyed by a foreign enemy than to be despised by his own subjects.'

The king concluded by asserting his privilege, to call or to forbid parliaments.

The style of 'the bold speakers' appeared at least as early as in April; I trace their spirit in letters of the times, which furnish facts and expressions that do not appear in our printed documents.

Among the earliest of our patriots, and finally the great gem of his exertions, was Sir John Elliot, vice-admiral of Devonshire. He, in a tone which 'rolled back to Jove's own bolts,' and startled even the writer, who was himself biassed to the popular party, 'made a resolute, I omit whether a timely, speech.' He adds, Elliot asserted that 'They came not thither either to do what the king would command them, nor to abstain when he forbade them; they came to continue constant, and to maintain their privileges. They would not give their posterity a cause to curse them for losing their privileges by restraint, which their forefathers had left them.'¹²

On the eighth of May, the impeachment of the duke was opened by Sir Dudley Digges, who compared the duke to a meteor exhaled out of putrid matter. He was followed by Glanville, Selden, and others. On this day the duke sat out facing his accusers and out-braving their accusations, which the more highly exasperated the house. On the following day the duke was absent, when the epilogue to this mighty piece was elaborately delivered by Sir John Elliot, with a force of declamation, and a boldness of personal allusion, which have not been surpassed in the invectives of modern Junius.

Elliot, after expatiating on the favourite's ambition in acquiring and getting into his hands the greatest offices of wealth and power in the kingdom, and the means by which he had obtained them, drew a picture of 'the inward character of the duke's mind.' The duke's plurality of offices reminded him 'of a chimerical beast called by the ancients Stellionatus, so blurred, so spotted, so full of all lines, that they knew not what to make of it! In setting up himself he hath set upon the kingdom's revenues, the fountain of supply, and the nerves of the land—He stereotypes, consumes, and exhausts the revenues of the town; and, by emptying the veins the blood should run in, he hath cast the kingdom into a high consumption.'—He descends to criminate the duke's magnificent tastes; who had something of a congenial nature for Elliot was man of fine literature. 'Infinite sums of money, and use of land exceeding the value of money, and contributions, in parliament have been heaped upon him; and how have they been employed? Upon costly furniture, sumptuous feasting, and magnificent building, the visible richness of the expense exhausting of the state!'

Elliot eloquently closes—

'Your lordships have an idea of the man, what he is in himself, what in his affections! You have seen his power, and some, I fear have felt it. You have known his practices and have heard the effects. Being such, what is his reference to king and state; how compatible or incompatible with either? In reference to the king, he must be styled the canker in his treasure; in reference to the state, he is moth of all goodness. I can hardly find him a parallel; but none were so like him as Sejanus, who is described by Tacitus, Audax, sui obsequens, in aliis criminalior, justus adulter et superbus. Sejanus's pride was so excessive, as Tacitus saith, that, he neglected all councils, mixed his business and service with the prince, seeming to confound his actions, and was often styled Imperatoris laborum socius. Dost not this man the like? Ask England, Scotland and Ireland—and they will tell you! How lately and how often hath this man commixed his actions in discourses his actions of the king's! My Lords! I have done—do see the man!'

The parallel of the duke with Sejanus electrified the house; and, as we shall see, touched Charles on a convulsive nerve.

The king's conduct on this speech was the beginning of his troubles, and the first of his more open attempts to resist the popular party. In the House of Lords the king defended the duke, and informed them, 'I have thought fit to take order for the punishing some insolent speeches, lately spoken.' I find a piece of secret history enclosed a letter, with a solemn injunction that it might be burnt. The king this morning complained of Sir John Elliot for comparing the duke to Sejanus, in which he said, implicitly he must intend me for Tiberius! On that day the eulogist and the epilogue orators, Sir Dudley Digges, who had opened the impeachment against the duke, and Sir John Elliot, who had closed it, were called out of the house by two messengers, who showed their warrants for committing them to the Tower.†

On this memorable day a philosophical politician might have precisely marked the seed-plots of events, which not many years afterwards were apparent to all men. The passions of kings are often expatiated; but, in the present anti-monarchical period, the passions of parliaments are not imaginable! The democratic party in our constitution, from the meanness of motives, from their egotism, their vanity, and their audacity, hate kings; they would have an abstract being, a chimerical sovereign on the throne—like a statue, the mere ornament of the place it fills,—and insensible, like a statue, to the invectives they would heap on its pedestal!

The commons, with a fierce spirit of reaction for the king's punishing some insolent speeches, at once sent up to the lords for the commitment of the duke! But when they learnt the fate of the patriots, they instantaneously broke up! In the afternoon they assembled in Westminster-hall, to interchange their private sentiments on the fate of the two imprisoned members, in sadness and indignation.

The following day the commons met in their own house. When the speaker reminded them of the usual business, they all cried out, 'Sit down! sit down!' They would touch on no business till they were 'righted in their liberties!'¹⁴ An open committee of the whole house was formed, and no member suffered to quit the house; but either they were at a loss how to commence this solemn conference, or expressed their indignation by a sullen silence. To soothe and subdue 'the bold speakers' was the unfortunate attempt of the vice-chamberlain, Sir Dudley Carleton, who had long been one of our foreign ambassadors; and who, having witnessed the despotic governments on the continent, imagined that there was no deficiency of liberty at home. 'I find,' said the vice-chamberlain, 'by the great silence in this house, that it is a fit time to be heard, if you will grant me the patience.' Alluding to one of the king's messages, where it was hinted that, if there was 'no correspondence between him and the parliament, he should be forced to use new counsels,' 'I pray you consider what these new counsels are and may be: I fear to declare those I conceive.' However, Sir Dudley plainly hinted at them, when he went on observing, that 'when monarchs began to know their own strength, and saw the turbulent spirit of their parliaments, they had overthrown them in all Europe, except here only with us.' Our old ambassador drew an amusing picture of the effects of despotic governments in that of France—'If you knew the subjects in foreign countries as well as myself, to see them look, not like our nation, with store of flesh on their backs, but like so many ghosts and not men, being nothing but skin and bones, with some thin cover to their nakedness, and wearing only wooden shoes on their feet, so that they cannot eat meat, or wear good clothes, but they must pay the king for it; this is a misery beyond expression, and that which we are yet free from.' A long residence abroad had deprived Sir Dudley Carleton of any sympathy with the high tone of freedom, and the proud jealousy of their privileges, which, though yet unascertained, undefined, and still often contested, was breaking forth among the commons of England. It was fated that the celestial spirit of our national freedom should not descend among us in the form of the mystical dove!

Hume observes on this speech, that 'these imprudent suggestions rather gave warning than struck terror.' It was evident that the event which implied 'new counsels,' meant what subsequently was practised—the king governing without a parliament! As for 'the ghosts who wore wooden shoes,' to which the house was congratulated that they had not yet been reduced, they would infer that it was the more necessary to provide against the possibility of so strange an occurrence! Hume truly observes, 'The king reaped no further benefit from this attempt than to exasperate the house still further.' Some words, which the duke persisted in asserting had dropped from Digges, were explained away, Digges, declaring that they had not been of dates. They all equally copy Rushworth, the only source of our history of this period. Even Hume is involved in the obscurity. The king's speech was on the eleventh of May. As Rushworth has not furnished dates, it would seem that the two orators had been sent to the Tower before the king's speech to the lords.

used by him; and it seems probable that he was suffered to eat his words. Elliot was made of 'sterner stuff'; he abated not a jot of whatever he had spoken of 'that man,' as he affected to call Buckingham.

The commons whatever might be their patriotism, seem at first to have been chiefly moved by a personal hatred of the favourite; and their real charges against him amounted to little more than pretences and aggravations. The king, whose personal affections were always strong, considered his friend innocent; and there was a warm, romantic feature in the character of the youthful monarch, which scorned to sacrifice his faithful companion to his own interests, and to immolate the minister to the clamours of the commons. Subsequently, when the king did this in the memorable case of the guiltless Strafford, it was the only circumstance which weighed on his mind at the hour of his own sacrifice! Sir Robert Cotton told a friend, on the day on which the king went down to the House of Lords, and committed the two patriots, that 'he had of late been often sent for to the king and duke, and that the king's affection towards him was very admirable and no whit lessened. Certainly, he added, 'the king will never yield to the duke's fall, being a young man, resolute, magnanimous, and tenderly and firmly affectionate where he takes.*' This authentic character of Charles the First by that intelligent and learned man, to whom the nation owes the treasures of its antiquities, is remarkable. Sir Robert Cotton, though holding no rank at court, and in no respect of the duke's party, was often consulted by the king, and much in his secrets. How the king valued the judgment of this acute and able adviser, acting on it in direct contradiction and to the mortification of the favourite, I shall probably have occasion to show.

The commons did not decline in the subtle spirit with which they had begun; they covertly aimed at once to subjugate the sovereign, and to expel the minister! A remonstrance was prepared against the levying of tonnage and poundage, which constituted half of the crown revenues; and a petition, 'equivalent to a command,' for removing Buckingham from his majesty's person and councils.† The remonstrance is wrought up with a high spirit of invective against 'the unbridled ambition of the duke,' whom they class, 'among those vipers and pests to their king and commonwealth, as so expressly styled by your most royal father.' They request that 'he would be pleased to remove this person from access to his sacred presence, and that he would not balance this one man with all these things, and with the affairs of the Christian world.'

The king hastily dissolved this second parliament; and when the lords petitioned for its continuance, he warmly and angrily exclaimed, 'Not a moment longer!' It was dissolved in June, 1626.

The patriots abandoned their sovereign to his fate, and retreated home sullen, indignant, and ready to conspire among themselves for the assumption of their disputed or their defrauded liberties. They industriously dispersed their remonstrance, and the king replied by a declaration; but an attack is always more vigorous than a defence. The declaration is spiritless, and evidently composed under suppressed feelings, which, perhaps, knew not how to shape themselves. The 'Remonstrance' was commanded every where to be burnt; and the effect which it produced on the people we shall shortly witness.

The king was left amidst the most pressing exigencies. At the dissolution of the first parliament, he had been compelled to practise a humiliating economy. Hume has alluded to the numerous wants of the young monarch; but he certainly was not acquainted with the king's extreme necessities. His coronation seemed rather private than a public ceremony. To save the expenses of the procession from the Tower through the city to Whitehall, that customary pomp was omitted; and the reason alleged was 'to save the charges for more noble undertakings;' that is, for means to carry on the Spanish war without supplies! But now the most extraordinary changes appeared at court. The king mortgaged his lands in Cornwall to the aldermen and companies of London. A rumour spread that the small pension list must be revoked; and the royal distress was carried so far, that all the tables at court were laid down, and the courtiers put on board wages! I have seen a letter which gives an account of

* Manuscript letter

† Rushworth, I. 400. Hume VI, 231, who enters widely into the views and feelings of Charles

'the funeral supper at Whitehall, whereat twenty-three tables were buried, being from henceforth converted to board-wages;' and there I learn, that 'since this dissolving of house-keeping, his majesty is but slenderly attending.' Another writer who describes himself to be only a looker-on, regrets, that while the men of the law spent ten thousand pounds on a single masque, they did not rather make the king rich; and adds, 'I see a rich commonwealth, a rich people, and the crown poor!' This strange poverty of the court of Charles seems to have escaped the notice of our general historians. Charles was now to vital his feet with the savings of the board wages! for this 'surplusage' was taken into account.

The fatal descent on the Isle of Rhé sent home Buckingham discomfited, and spread dismay through the nation. The best blood had been shed from the wanton bravery of an unskilful and romantic commander, who, forced to retreat, would march, but not fly, and was the very last man to quit the ground which he could not occupy. In the eagerness of his hopes, Buckingham had once dropped, as I learn, that 'before Midsummer he should be more honoured and beloved of the commons than ever was the Earl of Essex;' and thus he rocked his own and his master's imagination in cradling fancies. This volatile hero, who had felt the capriciousness of popularity, thought that it was as easily regained as it was easily lost; and that a chivalric adventure would return to him that favour which at this moment might have been deemed to all the wisdom, the policy, and the arts of an experienced statesman.

The king was now involved in more intricate and desperate measures; and the nation was thrown into a state of agitation, of which the page of popular history yields but a faint impression.

The spirit of insurrection was stalking forth in the metropolis and in the country. The scenes which I am about to describe occurred at the close of 1626: an inattentive reader might easily mistake them for the revolutionary scenes of 1640. It was an unarmed rebellion.

An army and a navy had returned unpaid, and sore with defeat. The town was scourged by mutinous seamen and soldiers, roving even into the palace of the sovereign. Soldiers without pay form a society without laws. A band of captains rushed into the duke's apartment as he sat at dinner; and when reminded by the duke of a late proclamation, forbidding all soldiers coming to court in troops, on pain of hanging, they replied, that 'Whole companies were ready to be hanged with them! that the king might do as he pleased with their lives; for that their reputation was lost, and their honour forfeited, for want of their salary to pay their debts.' When a petition was once presented, and it was inquired who was the composer of it? a vast body tremendously shouted, 'All! all!' A multitude, composed of seamen, met at Tower-hill, and set a lad on a scaffold, who, with an 'O yes!' proclaimed that King Charles had promised their pay, or the duke had been on the scaffold himself! These, at least were the grievances more apparent to the sovereign than those vague ones so perpetually repeated by his unfaithful commons. But what remained to be done? It was only a choice of difficulties between the disorder and the remedy. At the moment, the duke got up what he called 'The council of the sea'; was punctual at the first meeting, and appointed three days in a week to sit—but broke his appointment the second day—they found him always otherwise engaged; and 'the council of the sea' turned out to be one of those shadowy expedients which only lasts while it acts on the imagination. It is said that thirty thousand pounds would have quieted these disorganized troops; but the exchequer could not supply so mean a sum. Buckingham, in despair, and profuse of life, was planning a fresh expedition for the siege of Rochelle; a new army was required. He swore, 'If there was money in the kingdom it should be had!'

Now began that series of contrivances and artifices and persecutions to levy money. Forced loans, or pretended free-gifts, kindled a resisting spirit. It was urged by the court party, that the sums required were, in fact, much less in amount than the usual grants of subsidies, but the cry, in return for 'a subsidy,' was always 'A Parliament!' Many were heavily fined for declaring, that 'They knew no law, besides that of Parliament, to compel men to give away their own goods.' The king ordered, that those who would not subscribe to the loans should not is forced; but it seems there were orders in council to specify those householders' names who would not subscribe; and it further appears, that those who would not say in purse should in person. Those who were pressed were sent to the depot; but either the soldiers would not receive these good citizens, or they found easy means to return. Every mode which the government invented seems to have been easily frustrated, either by the intrepidity of the parties themselves, or by that general understanding which enabled the people to play into one another's hands. When the common council had consented that an imposition should be laid, the citizens called the Guild-hall the Yield-stall! And whenever they levied a distress, in consequence of refusal to pay it, nothing was to be found but 'Old ends, such as nobody cared for.' Or if a severer officer seized the commodities, it was in vain to offer penny-worths where no customer was to be had. A wealthy merchant, who had formerly been a cheesemonger, was summoned to appear before the privy council, and required to lend the king two hundred pounds, or else to go himself to the army, and serve it with cheese. It was not supposed that a merchant, so aged and wealthy, would submit to resume his former mean trade; but the old man, in the spirit of the times, preferred the hard alternative, and balked the new project of finance, by shipping himself with his cheese. At Hicks's Hall the duke and the Earl of Dorset sat to receive the loans; but the duke threatened, and the earl affected to treat with levity, men who came before them, with all the suppressed feelings of popular indignation. The Earl of Dorset asking a fellow, who pleaded inability to lend money, of what trade he was, and being answered 'a tailor,' said: 'Put down your name for such a sum; one whip will make amends for all!' The tailor quoted scripture abundantly, and shook the bench with laughter or with rage by his anathemas, till he was put fast into a messenger's hands. This was one Ball, renowned through the parish of St Clements; and not only a tailor, but a prophet. Twenty years after tailors and prophets employed messengers themselves!*

These are instances drawn from the inferior classes of society; but the same spirit actuated the country gentlemen: one instance represents many. George Catesby, of Northamptonshire, being committed to prison as a loan-recusant, alleged, among other reasons for his non-compliance, that 'he considered that this loan might become a precedent; and that every precedent, he was told by the lord president, was a flower of the prerogative.' The lord president, told him that 'he lied.' Catesby shook his head, observing, 'I come not here to contend with your lordship, but to suffer!' Lord Suffolk then interposing, entreated the lord president would not too far urge his kinsman, Mr Catesby. This country gentleman waived any kindness he might owe to kindred, declaring, that 'he would remain master of his own purse.' The prisons were crowded with these loan-recusants, as well as with those who had sinned in the freedom of their opinions. The country gentlemen insured their popularity by their committals; and many stout resistors of the loans were returned in the following parliament against their own wishes.† The friends of these knights and country gentlemen flocked to their prisons; and when they petitioned for more liberty and air during the summer, it was policy to grant their request. But it was also policy that they should not reside in their own counties; this relaxation was only granted to those who, living in the south, consented to sojourn in the north; while the dwellers in the north were to be lodged in the south!

In the country the disturbed scenes assumed even a more alarming appearance than in London. They not only would not provide money, but when money was offered by government, the men refused to serve; a conscription was not then known: and it became a question, long debated in the privy council, whether those who would not accept press-money should not be tried by martial law. I preserve in the note a curious piece of secret information.* The great novelty and symptom of the times was the scattering of letters. Sealed letters, addressed to the leading men of the country, were found hanging on bushes; anonymous letters were dropped in shops and streets, which gave notice, that the day was fast approaching, when 'Such a work was to be wrought in England, as never was the like, which will be for our good.' Addresses multiplied 'To all true-hearted Englishmen.' A groom detected in spreading such seditious papers, and brought into the inexorable star-chamber, was fined three thousand pounds! The leniency of the punishment was rather regretted by two bishops; if it was ever carried into execution, the unhappy man must have remained a groom who never after crossed a horse!

There is one difficult duty of an historian, which is too often passed over by the party writer; it is to pause whenever he feels himself warming with the passions of the multitude, or becoming the blind apologist of arbitrary power. An historian must transform himself into the characters which he is representing, and throw himself back into the times which he is opening; possessing himself of their feelings and tracing their actions, he may then at least hope to discover truths which may equally interest the honourable men of all parties.

This reflection, has occurred from the very difficulty in to which I am now brought. Shall we at once condemn the king for these arbitrary measures? It is, however, very possible that they were never in his contemplation! Involved in inextricable difficulties, according to his feelings, he was betrayed by parliament; and he scorned to barter their favour by that vulgar traffic of treachery—the immolation of the single victim who had long attached his personal affections; a man at least as much envied as hated! That hard lesson had not yet been inculcated on a British sovereign, that his bosom must be a blank for all private affection; and had that lesson been taught, the character of Charles was destitute of all aptitude for it. To reign without a refractory parliament, and to find among the people themselves subjects more loyal than their representatives, was an experiment—and a fatal one! Under Charles, the liberty of the subject, when the necessities of the state pressed on the sovereign, was matter of discussion, disputed as often as assumed; the divines were proclaiming as rebellious those who refused their contributions to avoid the government;* and the law-sages al-pudding! a pudding! and others—'A lie! a lie! a lie!—' This Westminster election of nearly two hundred years ago, ended as we have seen some others; they rejected all who had urged the payment of the loans; and passing by such men as Sir Robert Cotton, and their last representative they fixed on a brewer and a grocer for the two members for Westminster.*

* Extract from a manuscript letter.—'On Friday last I hear but as a secret, that it was debated at the council table, whether our Essex-men, who refused to take press-money, should not be punished by martial-law, and hanged up on the next tree to their dwellings, for an example of terror to others. My lord keeper, who had been long silent, when in conclusion, it came to his course to speak, told the lords, that as far as he understood the law, none were liable to martial law, but martial men. If these had taken press-money, and afterwards run from their colours, they might then be punished in that manner; but yet they were no soldiers, and refused to be secondly, he thought a subsidy, new by law, could not be pressed against his will for a foreign service; it being supposed in law, the service of his purse excused that of his person, unless his own country were in danger; and he appealed to my lord treasurer, and my lord president, whether it was not so, who both assented it was so, though some of them feebly, as unwilling to have been urged to such an answer. So it is thought that proposition is dashed; and it will be tried what may be done in the Star-Chamber against these refractories.'

* The Radicals of that day differed from ours in the means, though not in the end. They at least referred to their Bible, and rather more than was required; but superstition is as mad as atheism! Many of the puritans confused their brains with the study of the Revelations; believing Prince Henry to be prefigured in the Apocalypse; some prophesied that he should overthrow 'the beast.' Ball our tailor, was this very prophet; and was so honest as to believe in his own prophecy. Osborn tells, that Ball put out money on adventure; i. e. to receive it back, double or treble, when King James should be elected pope! So that though he had no money for a loan, he had to spare for a prophecy.

This Ball has been confounded with a more ancient radical, Ball a priest, and a principal mover in Wat Tyler's insurrection. Our Ball must have been very notorious, for Jonson has noticed his 'admitted discourses.' Mr Gifford, without any knowledge of my account of this tailor-prophet, by his ardent sagacity has rightly indicated him.—See Jonson's Works, vol. V, p. 241.

† It is curious to observe, that the Westminster elections, in the fourth year of Charles's reign, were exactly of the same turbulent character as those which we witness in our days. The duke had counted by his interest to bring in Sir Robert Fye. The contest was severe, but accompanied by some of those ludicrous electioneering scenes, which still amuse the mob. Whenever Sir Robert Fye's party cried—'A Fye! a Fye! a Fye!' the adverse party would cry—'A pudding! a leged precedents for raising supplies in the manner which Charles had adopted. Selden, whose learned industry was as vast as the amplitude of his mind, had to seek for the freedom of the subject in the dust of the records of the Tower—and the omnipotence of parliaments, if any human assembly may be invested with such supernatural greatness, had not yet awakened the hoar antiquity of popular liberty.

A general spirit of insurrection, rather than insurrection itself, had suddenly raised some strange appearances through the kingdom. 'The remonstrance' of parliament had unquestionably quickened the feelings of the people; but yet the lovers of peace and the reverencers of royalty were not a few: money and men were procured to send out the army and the fleet. More concealed causes may be suspected to have been at work. Many of the heads of the opposition were pursuing some secret machinations: about this time I find many mysterious stories—indications of secret societies—and other evidences of the intrigues of the popular party.

Little matters, sometimes more important than they appear, are suitable to our minute sort of history. In November, 1628, a rumour spread that the king was to be visited by an ambassador from 'the President of the Society of the Rosy-cross.' He was indeed an heteroclitc ambassador, for he is described 'as a youth with never a hair on his face'; in fact, a child who was to conceal the mysterious personage which he was for a moment to represent. He appointed Sunday afternoon to come to court, attended by thirteen coaches. He was to proffer to his majesty, provided the king accepted his advice, three millions to put into his coffers; and by his secret councils he was to unfold matters of moment and secrecy. A Latin letter was delivered to 'David Ramsay of the clock' to hand over to the king; a copy of it has been preserved in a letter of the times; but it is so unmeaning, that it could have had no effect on the king, who, however, declared that he would not admit him to an audience, and that he could tell where 'the President of the Rosy-cross' was to be found, unless he made good his offer, he would hang him at the court-gates. This served the town and country for talk till the appointed Sunday had passed over, and no ambassador was visible! Some considered this as the plotting of crazy brains, but others imagined it to be an attempt to speak with the king in private, on matters respecting the duke. There was also discovered, by letters received from Rome, 'a whole parliament of Jesuits sitting, in 'a fair-hanged vault' in Clerkenwell: Sir John Cooke would have alarmed the parliament, that on St Joseph's day these were to have occupied their places;

* A member of the House, in James the First's time called this race of divines 'Spaniels to the court and wolves to the people.'—Dr Mainwaring, Dr Sibthorpe, and Dean Bargeave were seeking for ancient precedents to maintain absolute monarchy, and to inculcate passive obedience. Bargeave had this passage in his sermon: 'It was the speech of a man renowned for wisdom in our age, that if he were commanded to put forth to sea in a ship that had neither mast nor tackling, he would do it; and being asked what wisdom that were, replied, 'The wisdom must be in him that hath power to command, not in him that conscience binds to obey.' Sibthorpe, after he published his sermon, immediately had his house burnt down. Dr Mainwaring, says a manuscript letter-writer, 'sent the other day to a friend of mine, to help him to all the ancient precedents he could find, to strengthen his opinion (for absolute monarchy,) who answered him he could help him in nothing but only to hang him, and that if he lived till a parliament, or &c, he should be sure of a halter.' Mainwaring afterwards submitted to parliament; but after the dissolution got to a free pardon. The panic of popery was a great evil. The divines, under Laud, appeared to approach to catholicism; but it was probably only a project of reconciliation between the two churches, which Elizabeth, James, and Charles equally wished. Mr Cosins, a letter-writer, censures for 'superstition' in this bitter style: 'Mr Cosins has impudently made three editions of his prayer book, and one which he gives away in private, different from the published ones. An audacious fellow, whom my Lord of Durham greatly admireth. I doubt if he be a sound protestant: he was so blind at even-song on Candlemas-day, that he could not see to read prayers in the minister with less than three hundred and forty candles, whereas sixty he caused to be placed about the high altar; besides he caused the picture of our Saviour, supported by two angels, to be set in the choir. The committee is very hot against him, and no matter if they trounce him.' This was Cosins who survived the revolution, and returning with Charles the Second was raised to the see of Durham; the charitable instructions he has left are most munificent.

ministers are supposed sometimes to have conspired in 'the nonce.' Sir Dudley Digges, in the opposition, as usual, would not believe in any such political accretions; but such a party were discovered; Cooke will have insinuated that the French ambassador had persuaded Louis, that the divisions between Charles and his people had been raised by his ingenuity, and was reviled for the intelligence; this is not unlikely. After all his parliament of Jesuits might have been a secret college of the order; for, among other things seized on, was a considerable library.

When the parliament was sitting, a sealed letter was thrown under the door, with this superscription, Come to the man that finds this letter, and delivers it not to the House of Commons. The serjeant at arms delivered it to the speaker, who would not open it till the House had chosen a committee of twelve members to inform them whether it was fit to be read. Sir Edward Cooke, after having read two or three lines, stopped, and, according to my authority, 'durst not go further, but immediately sealing it, the committee thought fit to send it to the king, who they say, on reading it through, cast it into the fire and sent the House of Commons thanks for their wisdom in not publishing it, and for the discretion of the committee in so far testifying his honour, as not to read it out, when they once perceived that it touched his majesty.*

Others besides the freedom of speech, introduced another form, 'A speech without doors,' which was distributed to the members of the House. It is in all respects remarkable one, occupying ten folio pages in the first volume of Rushworth.

Some in office appear to have employed extraordinary proceedings of a similar nature. An intercepted letter written from the Arch-duchess to the King of Spain was delivered by Sir H. Martyn at the council-board on New-year's day, who found it in some papers relating to the navy. The duke immediately said he would show it to the king; and, accompanied by several lords, went into his majesty's closet. The letter was written in French; it advised the Spanish court to make a sudden war with England, for several reasons; his Majesty's want of skill to govern of himself; the weakness of his council in not daring to acquit him with the truth; want of money; disunion of the subjects' hearts from their prince, &c. The king only observed, that the writer forgot that the Arch-duchess writes to the King of Spain in Spanish, and sends her letters overland.

I have to add an important fact. I find certain evidence that the heads of the opposition were busily active in thwarting the measures of government. Dr Samuel Turner, the member for Shrewsbury, called on Sir John Cage, and desired to speak to him privately; his errand was to entreat him to resist the loan, and to use his power with others to obtain this purpose. The following information comes from Sir John Cage himself. Dr Turner 'being desired to stay, he would not a minute, but instantly took horse, saying he had more places to go to, and time pressed; that there was a company of them had divided themselves into all parts, every one having had a quarter assigned to him, to perform this service for the commonwealth.' This was written in November, 1628. The unquestionably amounts to a secret confederacy watching out of parliament as well as in; and those strange appearances of popular defection exhibited in the country, which I have described, were in great part the consequences of the machinations and active intrigues of the popular party.†

The king was not disposed to try a third parliament. The favourite, perhaps to regain that popular favour which his greatness had lost him, is said in private letters to have been twice on his knees to intercede for a new one. The elections however forebode no good; and a letter-writer

* I deliver this fact as I find it in a private letter, but it is noticed in the Journal of the House of Commons, 23 Jan. 1628. Caroll Regie. 'Sir Edward Coke reporteth that they find that, enclosed in the letter, to be writ for any subject's ear to hear. Read but one line and a half of it, and could not endure to read more of it. It was ordered to be sealed and delivered into the king's hands by eight members, and to acquaint his majesty with the place and time of finding it; particularly that upon the reading of one line and a half at most, they would read no more, but sealed it up, and brought it to the House.

† I have since discovered, by a manuscript letter, that Sir Dr Turner was held in contempt by the King; that he was ridiculed at court which he humbled, for his want of vanity, in a word, that he was a disappointed courtier.

connected with the court, in giving an account of them, apothetically declared, 'we are without question undone!' The king's speech opens with the spirit which he himself felt, but which he could not communicate.

'The times are for action; wherefore, for example's sake, I mean not to spend much time in words!—If you, high God forbid, should not do your duties in contributing what the state at this time needs, I must, in discharge of my conscience, use those other means which God hath put into my hands, to save that, which the follies of some articular men may otherwise hazard to lose.' He added, 'with the loftiness of ideal majesty'—'Take not this as a threatening, for I scorn to threaten any but my equals; as an admonition from him, that both out of nature and duty, hath most care of your preservations and prosperities; and in a more friendly tone he requested them, To remember a thing to the end that we may forget it. You may imagine that I come here with a doubt of success, remembering the distractions of the last meeting; but I assure you that I shall very easily forget and forgive that is past.'—

A most crowded house now met, composed of the wealthiest men; for a lord, who probably considered that property was the true balance of power, estimated that they were able to buy the upper house, his majesty only excepted! The aristocracy of wealth had already begun to be felt. Some ill omens of the parliament appeared. Sir Robert Phillips moved for a general fast: 'we had one in the plague which it pleased God to deliver us from, and we have now so many plagues of the commonwealth about his majesty's person, that we have need of such an act of humiliation.' Sir Edward Coke held it most necessary, 'because there are, I fear, some devils that will not be cast out but by fasting and prayer.'

Many of the speeches in 'this great council of the kingdom' are as admirable pieces of composition as exist in the language. Even the court-party were moderate, attenuating rather than pleading for the late necessities. But the evil spirit of party, however veiled, was walking amidst them all. A letter-writer represents the natural state of feelings: 'Some of the parliament talk desperately; while others, of as high a course to enforce money, if they held out.' Such is the perpetual action and re-action of public opinion; when one side will give too little, the other sure to desire too much!

The parliament granted subsidies—Sir John Cooke having brought up the report to the king, Charles expressed great satisfaction, and declared that he felt now more happy than any of his predecessors. Inquiring of Sir John how many voices he had carried it? Cooke replied, 'but by one!—at which his majesty seemed appalled, and asked how many were against him? Cooke answered None! the unanimity of the House made all but one voice.' at which his majesty wept!¹² If Charles shed tears, or as Cooke himself expresses it, in his report to the house, 'was much affected,' the emotion was profound: for on all sudden emergencies Charles displayed an almost unparalleled command over the exterior violence of his feelings.

The favourite himself sympathized with the tender joy of his royal master; and, before the king, voluntarily offered himself as a peace-sacrifice. In his speech at the council table, he entreates the king that he who had the honour to be his majesty's favourite, might now give up that title to them.—'A warm genuine feeling probably prompted these words.

'To open my heart, please to pardon me a word more; I must confess I have long lived in pain, sleep hath given me no rest, favours and fortunes no content; such have been my secret sorrows, to be thought the man of separation; and that divided the king from his people, and them from him; but I hope it shall appear they were some mistaken minds that would have made me the evil spirit that walketh between a good master and a loyal people.'¹³

Buckingham added, that for the good of his country he was willing to sacrifice his honours; and since his plurality of offices had been so strongly excepted against, that he was content to give up the master of the horse to Marquis Hamilton, and the warden of the Cinque Ports to the Earl of Carlisle; and was willing that the parliament should appoint another admiral for all services at sea.

It is as certain as human evidence can authenticate, that on the king's side all was grateful affection; and that on Buckingham's there was a most earnest desire to win the favours of parliament; and what are stronger than all human evidence, those unerring principles in human nature itself, which are the secret springs of the heart, were working in the breasts of the king and his minister; for neither were tyrannical. The king undoubtedly sighed to meet parliament with the love which he had at first professed; he declared, that 'he should now rejoice to meet with his people often.' Charles had no innate tyranny in his constitutional character; and Buckingham at times was susceptible of misery amidst his greatness, as I have elsewhere shown.* It could not have been imagined that the luckless favourite, on the present occasion, should have served as a pretext to set again in motion the chaos of evil! Can any candid mind suppose, that the king or the duke meditated the slightest insult on the patriotic party, or would in the least have disturbed the apparent reconciliation! Yet it so happened! Secretary Cooke, at the close of his report of the king's acceptance of the subsidies, mentioned that the duke had fervently beseeched the king to grant the house all their desires! Perhaps the mention of the duke's name was designed to ingratiate him into their toleration.

Sir John Elliot caught fire at the very name of the duke, and vehemently checked the secretary for having dared to introduce it; declaring, that 'they knew of no other distinction but of king and subjects. By intermingling a subject's speech with the king's message, he seemed to derogate from the honour and majesty of a king. Nor would it become any subject to bear himself in such a fashion, as if no grace ought to descend from the king to the people, nor any loyalty ascend from the people to the king, but through him only.'

This speech was received by many with acclamations; some cried out, 'Well spoken, Sir John Elliot!' It marks the heated state of the political atmosphere, where even the lightest coruscation of a hated name made it burst into flames!

I have often suspected that Sir John Elliot, by his vehement personality, must have borne a personal antipathy to Buckingham. I have never been enabled to ascertain the fact; but I find that he has left in manuscript a collection of satires, or 'Vernes, being chiefly invectives against the Duke of Buckingham, to whom he bore a bitter and most inveterate enmity.' Could we sometimes discover the motives of those who first head political revolutions, we should find how greatly personal hatreds have actuated them in deeds which have come down to us in the form of patriotism, and how often the revolutionary spirit disguises its private passions by its public conduct.†

But the supplies, which had raised tears from the fervent gratitude of Charles, though voted, were yet with-

‡ Modern history would afford more instances than perhaps some of us suspect. I cannot pass over an illustration of my principle, which I shall take from two very notorious politicians—Wat Tyler, and Sir William Walworth!

Wat, when in servitude, had been beaten by his master, Richard Lyons, a great merchant of wines, and a sheriff of London. This chastisement, working on an evil disposition, appears never to have been forgiven; and when this Radical assumed his short-lived dominion, he had his old master beheaded, and his head carried behind him on the point of a spear! So Grafton tells us, to the eternal obloquy of this arch-jacobin, who 'was a crafty fellow, and of an excellent wit, but wanting grace.' I would not sully the glory of the patriotic blow which ended the rebellion with the rebel; yet there are secrets in history! Sir William Walworth, 'the ever-famous mayor of London,' as Stowe designates him, has left the immortality of his name to one of our suburbs; but when I discovered in Stowe's survey that Walworth was the landlord of the stews on the Bank-side, which he farmed out to the Dutch wrens, and which Wat had pulled down. I am inclined to suspect that private feeling first knocked down the saucy rascal, and then thrust him through and through with his dagger. and that there was as much of personal vengeance as patriotism, which crushed the demolisher of so much valuable property!

held. They resolved that grievances and supplies go hand in hand. The commons entered deeply into constitutional points of the highest magnitude. The curious erudition of Selden and Coke was combined with the ardour of patriots who merit no inferior celebrity, though, not having consecrated their names by their laborious literature, we only discover them in the obscure annals of parliament. To our history, composed by writers of different principles, I refer the reader for the arguments of lawyers, and the spirit of the commons. My secret history is only its supplement.

The king's prerogative, and the subject's liberty, were points hard to distinguish, and were established but by contest. Sometimes the king imagined that 'the house pressed not upon the abuses of power, but only upon power itself.' Sometimes the commons doubted whether they had any thing of their own to give; while their property and their persons seemed equally insecure. Despotism seemed to stand on one side, and Faction on the other—Liberty trembled!

The conference of the commons before the lords, on the freedom and person of the subject, was admirably conducted by Selden and by Coke. When the king's attorney affected to slight the learned arguments and precedents, pretending to consider them as mutilated out of the records, and as proving rather against the commons than for them; Sir Edward Coke rose, affirming to the house, upon his skill in the law, that 'it lay not under Mr Attorney's cap to answer any one of their arguments.' Selden declared that he had written out all the records from the Tower, the Exchequer, and the King's Bench, with his own hand; and 'would engage his head, Mr Attorney should not find in all these archives a single precedent omitted.' Mr Littleton said, that he had examined every one syllabum, and whoever said they were mutilated spoke false! Of so ambiguous and delicate a nature was then the liberty of the subject, that it seems they considered it to depend on precedents!

A startling message, on the 12th of April, was sent by the king, for despatch of business. The house, struck with astonishment, desired to have it repeated. They remained sad and silent. No one cared to open the debate. A whimsical politician, Sir Francis Nethersole,* suddenly started up, entreating leave to tell his last night's dream. Some laughing at him, he observed, that 'kingdoms had been saved by dreams!' Allowed to proceed, he said, 'he saw two good pastures; a flock of sheep was in the one, and a bell-wether alone in the other; a great ditch was between them, and a narrow bridge over the ditch.'

He was interrupted by the Speaker, who told him that it stood not with the gravity of the house to listen to dreams; but the house was inclined to hear him out.

'The sheep would sometimes go over to the bell-wether, or the bell-wether to the sheep. Once both met on the narrow bridge, and the question was who should go back, since both could not go on without danger. One sheep gave counsel that the sheep on the bridge should lie on their bellies, and let the bell-wether go over their backs. The application of this dilemma he left to the house.'† It must be confessed that the bearing of the point was more ambiguous than some of the important ones that formed the subjects of fierce contention. Davus eum, non Oedipus! It is probable that this fantastical politician did not vote with the opposition; for Elliott, Wentworth, and Coke, protested against the interpretation of dreams in the house!

When the attorney-general moved that the liberties of the subject might be moderated, to reconcile the differences between themselves and the sovereign, Sir Edward Coke observed, that 'the true mother would never consent to the dividing of her child.' On this, Buckingham swore that Coke intimated that the king, his master, was the prostitute of the state. Coke protested against the misinterpretation. The dream of Nethersole, and the metaphor of Coke, were alike dangerous in parliamentary discussion. In a manuscript letter it is said that the House of Commons sat four days without speaking or doing any thing. On the first of May, Secretary Cooke delivered a message, asking, whether they would rely upon the king's word? This question was followed by a long silence. Several speeches are reported in the letters of the times, which are not in Rushworth. Sir Nathaniel Rich observed, that 'confident as he was of the royal word, what did any indefinite word ascertain?' Pym said, 'We have his Majesty's coronation oath to maintain the laws of England; what need we then take his word? He proposed to move 'Whether we should take the king's word or no.' This was resisted by Secretary Cooke; 'What would they say in foreign parts, if the people of England would not trust their king?' He desired the house to call Pym to order; on which Pym replied, 'Truly, Mr Speaker, I am just of the same opinion I was; viz, that the king's oath was as powerful as his word.' Sir John Elliot moved that it be put to the question, 'because they that would have it, do urge us to that point.' Sir Edward Coke on this occasion made a memorable speech, of which the following passage is not given in Rushworth.

* I have formed my idea of Sir Francis Nethersole from some strange incidents in his political conduct, which I have read in some contemporary writers. He was, however, a man of some eminence, had been Orator for the University of Cambridge, Agent for James I, with the Princess of the Union in Germany, and also Secretary to the Queen of Bohemia. He founded and endow'd a Free-school at Folesworth in Warwickshire.

'We sit now in parliament, and therefore must take his majesty's word no otherwise than in a parliamentary way; that is, of a matter agreed on by both houses—his majesty sitting on his throne in his robes, with his crown on his head, and sceptre in his hand, and in full parliament; and his royal assent being entered upon record, in perpetuum rei memoriam. This was the royal word of a king in parliament, and not a word delivered in a chamber, and out of the mouth of a secretary at the second hand; therefore I motion, that the House of Commons, more majestically, should draw a petition, de droit, to his majesty; which, being confirmed by both houses, and assented unto by his majesty, will be as firm an act as any. Not that I distrust the king, but that I cannot take his trust but in a parliamentary way.'

In this speech of Sir Edward Coke we find the first mention, in the legal style, of the ever-memorable 'Petition of Right,' which two days after was finished. The reader must pursue its history among the writers of opposite parties.

On Tuesday, June 5, a royal message announced, that on the 11th the present sessions would close. This utterly disconcerted the commons. Religious men considered it as a judicial visitation for the sins of the people; others raged with suppressed feelings; they counted up all the disasters which had of late occurred, all which, were charged to one man: they knew not, at a moment so urgent, when all their liberties seemed at stake, whether the commons should fly to the lords, or to the king. Sir John Elliot said, that as they intended to furnish his majesty with money, it was proper that he should give them time to supply him with counsel: he was renewing his old attacks on the duke, when he was suddenly interrupted by the speaker, who, starting from the chair, declared, that he was commanded not to suffer him to proceed; Elliot sat down in sullen silence. On Wednesday Sir Edward Coke broke the ice of debate. 'That man,' said he of the duke, 'is the grievance of grievances! As for going to the lords,' he added 'that is not via regia; our liberties are impeached—it is our concern!'

On Thursday the vehement cry of Coke against Buckingham was followed up; as, says a letter-writer, when one good bound recovers the scent, the rest come in with a full cry. A sudden message from the king absolutely forbade them to asperse any of his majesty's ministers, otherwise his majesty would instantly dissolve them.

This fell like a thunderbolt; it struck terror and alarm, and at the instant, the House of Commons was changed into a scene of tragical melancholy! All the opposite passions of human nature—all the national evils which were one day to burst on the country, seemed, on a sudden, concentrated in this single spot; Some were seen weeping, some were expostulating, and some, in awful prophecy, were contemplating the future ruin of the kingdom; while others, of more ardent daring, were reproaching the timid, quieting the terrified, and infusing resolution into the despairing. Many attempted to speak, but were so strongly affected that their very utterance failed them. The venerable Coke, overcome by his feelings when he rose to speak, found his learned eloquence falter on his tongue; he sat down, and tears were seen on his aged weeks. The name of the public enemy of the kingdom as repeated, till the speaker, with tears covering his face, declared he could no longer witness such a spectacle of woe to the commons of England, and requested leave of absence for half an hour. The speaker hastened to the king, to inform him of the state of the house. They were repairing a vote against the duke, for being an arch-traitor and arch-enemy to king and kingdom, and were busied on their 'Remonstrance,' when the speaker, on his return, delivered his majesty's message, that they should adjourn till he next day.

This was an awful interval of time; many trembled for the issue of the next morning: one letter-writer calls it, 'that black and doleful Thursday!' and another, writing before the house met, observes, 'What we shall expect this morning, God of heaven knows; we shall meet timely.'*

Charles probably had been greatly affected by the report of the speaker, on the extraordinary state into which the whole house had been thrown; for on Friday the royal message imported, that the king had never any intention of 'barring them from their right, but only to avoid scandal, that his ministers should not be accused for their counsel to him; and still he hoped that all christendom might notice a sweet parting between him and his people.' This message quieted the house, but did not suspend their preparations for a 'Remonstrance,' which they had begun on the day they were threatened with a dissolution.

On Saturday, while they were still occupied on the 'Remonstrance,' unexpectedly, at four o'clock, the king came to parliament, and the commons were called up. Charles spontaneously came to reconcile himself to parliament. The king now gave his second answer to the 'Petition of Right.' He said, 'My maxim is, that the people's liberties strengthen the king's prerogative; and the king's prerogative is to defend the people's liberties. Read your petition, and you shall have an answer that I am sure will please you.'† They desired to have the ancient form of their ancestors, 'Sost droit fait come il est desiré,' and not as the king had before given it, with any observation on it. Charles now granted this; declaring that his second answer to the petition in nowise differed from his first; 'but you now see how ready I have shown myself to satisfy your demands; I have done my part; wherefore, if this parliament have not a happy conclusion, the sin is yours,—I am free from it.'‡

Popular gratitude is, at least, as vociferous as it is sudden. Both houses returned the king acclamations of joy; every one seemed to exult at the happy change which a few days had effected in the fate of the kingdom. Every where the bells rung, bonfires were kindled, an universal holiday was kept through the town, and spread to the country: but an ominous circumstance has been registered by a letter-writer; the common people, who had caught the contagious happiness, imagined that all this public joy was occasioned by the king's consenting to commit the duke to the Tower.

Charles has been censured, even by Hume, for his 'evasions and delays,' in granting his assent to the 'Petition of Right;' but now, either the parliament had conquered the royal unwillingness, or the king was zealously inclined on reconciliation. Yet the joy of the commons did not outlast the bonfires in the streets; they resumed their debates as if they had never before touched on the subjects; they did not account for the feelings of the man whom they addressed as the sovereign. They sent up a 'Remonstrance' against the duke,§ and introduced his mother into it, as a patroness of Popery. Charles declared, that after having granted the famous 'Petition,' he had not expected such a return as this 'Remonstrance.' 'How acceptable it is,' he afterwards said, 'every man may judge: no wise man can justify it.' After the reading of the Remonstrance, the duke fell on his knees, desiring to answer for himself; but Charles no way relaxed in showing his personal favour.¶

The duke was often charged with actions and with expressions of which, unquestionably, he was not always guilty; and we can more fairly decide on some points, relating to Charles and the favourite, for we have a clearer notion of them than his contemporaries. The active spirits in the commons were resolved to hunt down the game to the death; for they now struck at, as the king calls it,

'one of the chief maintenances of my crown,' in tonnage and poundage, the levying of which, they now declared, was a violation of the liberties of the people. This subject again involved legal discussions, and another 'Remonstrance.' They were in the act of reading it, when the king suddenly came down to the house, sent for the speaker, and prorogued the parliament. 'I am forced to end this session,' said Charles, 'some few hours before I meant, being not willing to receive any more Remonstrances, to which I must give a harsh answer.' There was at least, as much of sorrow as of anger, in this closing speech.

Buckingham once more was to offer his life for the honour of his master—and to court popularity! It is well known with what exterior fortitude Charles received the news of the duke's assassination; this imperturbable majesty of his mind—insensibility it was not—never deserted him on many similar occasions. There was no indecision—no feebleness in his conduct; and that extraordinary event was not suffered to delay the expedition. The king's personal industry astonished all the men in office. One writes, that the king had done more in six weeks than in the duke's time had been done in six months. The death of Buckingham caused no change; the king left every man to his own charge, but took the general direction into his own hands.* In private, Charles deeply mourned the loss of Buckingham; he gave no encouragement to his enemies: the king called him 'his martyr,' and declared, 'the world was greatly mistaken in him; for it was thought that the favourite had ruled his majesty, but it was far otherwise; for that the duke had been to him a faithful and an obedient servant.†' Such were the feelings and ideas of the unfortunate Charles the First, which it is necessary to become acquainted with to judge of; few have possessed the leisure or the disposition to perform this historical duty, involved, as it is, in the history of our passions. If ever the man shall be viewed, as well as the monarch, the private history of Charles the First will form one of the most pathetic of biographies.‡

All the Foreign expeditions of Charles the First, were alike disastrous; the vast genius of Richelieu, at its meridian, had paleed our ineffectual star! The dreadful surrender of Rochelle had sent back our army and navy baffled and disgraced; and Buckingham had timely perished, to be saved from having one more reproach, one more political crime, attached to his name. Such failures did not improve the temper of the times; but the most brilliant victory would not have changed the fate of Charles, nor allayed the fiery spirits in the commons, who, as Charles said, 'not satisfied in hearing complainers, had erected themselves into inquisitors after complainers.'

Parliament met. The king's speech was conciliatory. He acknowledged that the exaction of the duties of the customs was not a right which he derived from his hereditary prerogative, but one which he enjoyed as the gift of his people. These duties as yet had not indeed been formally confirmed by parliament, but they had never been refused to the sovereign. The king closed with a fervent ejaculation, that the session, begun with confidence, might end with a mutual good understanding.

The shade of Buckingham was no longer cast between Charles the First and the commons. And yet we find that 'their dread and dear sovereign' was not allowed any repose on the throne.

A new demon of national discord, Religion, in a metaphysical garb, reared its distracted head. This evil spirit had been raised by the conduct of the court divines, whose political sermons, with their attempts to return to the more solemn ceremonies of the Romish church, alarmed some tender consciences; it served as a masked battery for the patriotic party to change their ground at will, without slackening their fire. When the king urged for the duties of his customs, he found that he was addressing a committee sitting for religion. Sir John Elliot threw out a singular expression. Alluding to some of the bishops, whom he called 'masters of ceremonies,' he confessed that some ceremonies were commendable, such as 'that we should stand up at the repetition of the creed, to testify the resolution of our hearts to defend the religion we profess, and in some churches they did not only stand upright, but with their swords drawn.' His speech was a spark that fell into a well-laid train; scarcely can we conceive the enthusiastic temper of the House of Commons, at that moment, when, after some debate, they entered into a vow to preserve 'the articles of religion established by parliament, in the thirteenth year of our late Queen Elizabeth' and this vow was immediately followed up by a petition to the king for a fast for the increasing miseries of the reformed churches abroad. Parliaments are liable to have their passions! Some of these enthusiasts were struck by a panic, not perhaps warranted by the danger of 'Jesuits and Arminians.' The king answered them in good humour; observing, however, on the state of the reformed abroad, 'that fighting would do them more good than fasting.' He granted them their fast, but they would now grant no return; for now they presented 'a Declaration to the king, that tonnage and poundage must give precedence to religion! The king's answer still betrays no ill temper. He confessed that he did not think that 'religion was in so much danger as they affirmed.' He reminds them of tonnage and poundage; 'I do not so much desire it out of greediness of the thing, as out of a desire to put an end to those questions that arise between me and some of my subjects.'

Never had the king been more moderate in his claims, or more tender in his style; and never had the commons been more fierce, and never, in truth, so utterly inexorable! Often kings are tyrannical, and sometimes are parliaments, a body corporate, with the infection of passion, may perform acts of injustice equally with the individual who abuses the power with which he is invested. It was insisted that Charles should give up the receivers of the customs who were denounced as capital enemies to the king and kingdom, while those who submitted to the duties were declared guilty as accessories. When Sir John Elliot was pouring forth invectives against some courtiers—however they may have merited the blast of his eloquence—he was sometimes interrupted and sometimes cheered, for the stinging personalities. The timid speaker refusing to put the question, suffered a severe reprimand from Selden; 'If you will not put it, we must sit still, and thus we shall never be able to do any thing!' The house adjourned in great heat; the dark prognostic of their next meeting, which Sir Symonds D'Ewes has marked in his diary as 'the most gloomy, sad, and dismal day for England that happened for five hundred years!'

On this fatal day,* the speaker still refusing to put the question, and announcing the king's command for an adjournment, Sir John Elliot stood up! The speaker attempted to leave the chair, but two members, who had placed themselves on each side forcibly kept him down—Elliot, who had prepared 'a short Declaration,' flung down a paper on the floor, crying out that it might be read! His party vociferated for the reading—others that it should not. A sudden tumult broke out; Coriton, a fervent patriot, struck another member, and many laid their hands on their swords.† 'Shall we,' said one, 'be sent home as we were last sessions, turned off like scattered sheep?' 'The weeping, trembling speaker, still persisting in what he held to be his duty, was dragged to and fro by opposite parties; but neither he nor the clerk would read the paper, though the speaker was bitterly reproached by his kinsman, Sir Peter Hayman, 'as the disgrace of his country, and a blot to a noble family. Elliot, finding the house so strongly divided, undauntedly snatching up the paper, said, 'I shall then express that by my tongue which this paper should have done.' Denzil Holles assumed the character of speaker, putting the question: it was returned by the acclamations of the party. The doors were locked, and the keys laid on the table. The king sent for the sergeant and mace, but the messenger could obtain no admittance—the usher of the black-rod met no more regard. The king then ordered out his guard—in the meanwhile the protest was completed—the door was flung open, the rush of the members was so impetuous that the crowd carried away among them the sergeant and the usher, in the confusion and riot. Many of the members were struck by horror amidst this conflict, it was a sad image of the future! Several of the patriots were committed to the tower. The king on dissolving this parliament which was the last, till the memorable 'Long Parliament,' gives us, at least, his idea of it. 'It is far from me to judge all the house alike guilty, for there are there as dutiful subjects as any in the world; it being but some few vipers among them that did cast this mist of untruthfulness over most of their eyes.'

Thus have I traced, step by step, the secret history of Charles the First and his early parliaments. I have entered into their feelings, while I have supplied new facts, to make every thing as present and as true as my faithful diligence could repeat the tale. It was necessary that I should sometimes judge of the first race of our patriots as some of their contemporaries did; but it was impossible to avoid correcting these notions by the more enlarged views of their posterity. This is the privilege of an historian and the philosophy of his art. There is no apology for the king, nor no declamation for the subject. Were we only to decide by the final results of this great conflict, of which what we have here narrated is but the faint beginning, we should confess that Sir John Elliot and his party were the first fathers of our political existence; and we should not withhold from them the inexpressible gratitude of a nation's freedom! But human infirmity mortifies us in the noblest pursuits of man; and we must be taught this penitential and chastising wisdom. The story of our patriots is involved: Charles appears to have been lowering those high notions of his prerogative, which were not peculiar to him, and was throwing himself on the bosom of his people. The severe and unrelenting conduct of Sir John Elliot, his prompt eloquence and bold invective, well fitted him for the leader of a party. He was the loadstone, drawing together the looser particles of iron. Never sparing in the Monarch, the errors of the Man, never relinquishing his royal prey, which he had fastened on, Elliot, with Dr Turner and some others, contributed to make Charles disgusted with all parliaments. Without any dangerous concessions, there was more than one moment when they might have reconciled the sovereign to themselves, and not have driven him to the fatal resource of attempting to reign without a parliament!

THE RUMP.

Text and commentary! The French revolution abounds with wonderful 'explanatory notes' on the English. It has cleared up many obscure passages—and in the political history of Man, both pages must be read together.

The opprobrious and ludicrous nickname of The Rump, stigmatized a faction which played the same part as the English Revolution as the 'Mistake' of the Jacobins did in the French. It has been imagined that our English Jacobins were impelled by a principle different from that of their modern rivals; but the madness of avowed atheism, and the frenzy of hypocritical sanctity, in the circle of crimes meet at the same point. Their history forms one of those useful parallels where, with truth unerring as mathematical demonstration, we discover the identity of human nature. Similarity of situation, and certain principles, producing similar personages and similar events, finally settle in the same results. The Rump, as long as human nature exists, can be nothing but the Rump, however it may be thrown uppermost.

The origin of this political by-name has often been inquired into; and it is somewhat curious, that though all parties consent to reprobate it, each assigns for it a different allusion. In the history of political factions there is always a mixture of the ludicrous with the tragic; but, except their modern brothers, no faction, like the present, ever excited such a combination of extreme contempt and extreme horror.

Among the rival parties in 1659, the loyalists and the presbyterians acted, as we may suppose the Tories and

* At the time many undoubtedly considered that it was a mere faction in the house Sir Symonds D'Ewes was certainly no politician—but, unquestionably, his ideas were not peculiar to himself. Of the last third parliament he delivered this opinion in his Diary. 'I cannot deem but the greater part of the house were morally honest men; but these were the least guilty of the fatal breath, being only misled by some other Machiavellian politics, who seemed zealous for the liberty of the commonwealth, and by that means, in the moving of their outward freedom, drew the votes of those good men to their side.'

Whigs would in the same predicament; a secret reconciliation had taken place, to bury in oblivion their former jealousies, that they might unite to rid themselves of that tyranny of tyrannies, a hydra-headed government; or, as Hume observes, that 'all efforts should be made for the overthrow of the Rump; so they called the Rump, in allusion to that part of the animal body,' so sarcasm of the allusion seemed obvious to our polished scorian; yet, looking more narrowly for its origin, we all find how indistinct were the notions of this nick-name among those who lived nearer the times. Evelyn says, that 'the Rump Parliament was so called, as retaining few rotten members of the other.' Roger Coke describes it thus: 'You must now be content with a piece the Commons called "The Rump."' And Carte calls 'the Rump' the carcass of a House, and seems not properly aware of the contemptuous allusion. But how do rotten members, and 'a carcass,' agree with the notion 'a Rump?' Recently the editor of the Life of Colonel Hutchinson has conveyed a novel origin. 'The number the members of the Long Parliament having been by session, death, &c, very much reduced,'—a remarkable, eh, this! by which our editor seems adroitly to throw a veil over the forcible transportation by the Rumpers of two hundred members at one swoop,—'the remainder was compared to the rump of a fowl which was left, all the rest being eaten.' Our editor even considers this to be 'a strange emblem;' yet 'the rump of a fowl' could hardly offend even a lady's delicacy! Our editor, probably, was somewhat anxious not to degrade too lowly the anti-monarchical party, designated by this opprobrious term. Perhaps it is pardonable in Mrs Macaulay, an historical lady, and a 'Rumper,' for she calls 'the Levellers' 'a brave and virtuous party,' to have passed over in her history any mention of the offensive term at all, as well as the ridiculous catastrophe which they underwent in the political revolution, which however we must beg leave not to pass by. This party-coinage has been ascribed to Clement Walker, our bitter antagonist; who, having sacrificed no inconsiderable fortune to the cause of what he considered constitutional liberty, was one of the violently ejected members of the Long Parliament, and perished in prison, a victim to honest unshining principles. His 'History of Independency' is a rich legacy bequeathed to posterity, of all their great misdoings, and their petty villanies, and, above all, of their secret history: one likes to know of what blocks the idols of the people are sometimes carved out.

Clement Walker notices 'the votes and acts of this rag ed; this Rump of a Parliament, with corrupt maggots in it.' This hideous, but descriptive image of 'The Rump,' and, however, got forward before: for the collector of 'the Rump Songs' tells us, 'If you ask who named it Rump, now 'twas so styled in an honest sheet of prayer, called "The Bloody Rump," written before the trial of our late sovereign; but the word obtained not universal notice, till it flew from the mouth of Major-General Brown, at a public assembly in the days of Richard Cromwell.' Thus it appears that a stinging nick-name has been frequently applied to render a faction eternally odious; and the chance expression of a wit, when adopted on some public occasion, circulates among a whole people. The present nick-name originated in derision on the expulsion of the majority of the Long Parliament, by the usurping minority. It probably slept; for who would have stirred it through the Protectorate? and finally awakened at 'Richard's restored, but rotting, Rump,' to witness its own ridiculous extinction.

Our story passed through three stages in its political progress. Preparatory to the trial of the sovereign, the antimonarchical party constituted the minority in 'the Long Parliament;' the very by name by which this parliament is recognized seemed a grievance to an impatient people, vacillating in chimerical projects of government, and now accused from a wild indefinite notion of political equality, to pull down all existing institutions. Such was temper of the times, that an act of the most violent injustice, openly performed, served only as the jest of the day, a jest which has passed into history. The forcible expulsion of two hundred of its brother members, by those who afterwards were saluted as 'The Rump,' was called 'Pride's Purge,' from the policy of a colonel of that name, a military adventurer, who was only the blind and brutal instrument of his party; when he stood at the door of the commons, holding a paper with the names of the members, he did not personally know one! And his 'Purge' might have operated a quite opposite effect, administered by his own unskilful hand, had not Lord Grey of Groley, and the doorkeeper,—worthy dispersers of a British senate!—pointed out the obnoxious members, on whom our colonel laid his hand, and sent off by his men to be detained, if a bold member, or to be deterred from sitting in the house, if a frightened one. This colonel had been a day-man; and the contemptible knot of the Commons, reduced to fifty or sixty confederates, which assembled after his 'Purge,' were called 'Col. Pride's Dray-horses!'

It was this Rump which voted the death of the sovereign, and abolished the regal office, and the house of peers!—as unnecessary, burdensome, and dangerous! 'Every office in parliament seemed 'dangerous' but that of the 'Custodes libertatis Angliæ,' the keepers of the liberties of England! or rather 'the gaolers!' 'The legislative half-quarter of the House of Commons' indignantly exclaims Clement Walker—the 'Montagne' of the French revolutionists!

'The Red-coats,' as the military were nick-named, soon taught their masters, 'the Rumpers,' silence and obedience: the latter having raised one colossal man for their own purpose, were annihilated by him at a single blow. Cromwell, five years after, turned them out of their house, and put the keys into his pocket. Their last public appearance was in the fleeting days of Richard Cromwell, when the comic-tragedy of 'the Rump' concluded by a catastrophe as ludicrous as that of Tom Thumb's tragedy!

How such a faction used their instruments to gather in the common spoil, and how their instruments at length converted the hands which held them, into instruments themselves, appears in their history. When 'the Long Parliament' opposed the designs of Cromwell and Ireton, these chiefs cried up 'the liberty of the people,' and denied 'the authority of parliament;' but when they had effectuated their famous 'purge,' and formed a house of commons of themselves, they abolished the House of Lords, crying up the supreme authority of the House of Commons, and crying down the liberty of the people. Such is the history of political factions, as well as of statesmen! Charles the Fifth alternately made use of the pope's authority to subdue the rising spirit of the protestants of Germany, or raised an army of protestants to imprison the pope! who branded his German allies by the novel and odious name of Lutherans. A chain of similar facts may be framed out of modern history.

The 'Rump,' as they were called by every one but their own party, became a whetstone for the wits to sharpen themselves on; and we have two large collections of 'Rump Songs,' curious chronicles of popular feeling! Without this evidence we should not have been so well informed respecting the phases of this portentous phenomenon. 'The Rump' was celebrated in verse, till at length it became 'the Rump of a Rump of a Rump!' as Foulis traces them to their dwindled and grotesque appearance. It is portrayed by a wit of the times—

'The Rump's an old story, if well understood,
'Tis a thing dressed up in a parliament's hood,
And like it—but the tail stands where the head should!
'Twould make a man scratch where he does not itch!
They say 'tis good luck when a body rises
With the Rump upwards; but he that advises
To live in that posture is none of the wisest.

Cromwell's hunting them out of the house by military force is alluded to—

'Our politic doctors do us teach,
That a blood-sucking red coat's as good as a leech
To relieve the head, if applied to the breach.'

In the opening scene of the Restoration, Mrs Hutchinson, an honest republican, paints with dismay a scene otherwise very ludicrous. 'When the town of Nottingham, as almost all the rest of the island, began to grow mad, and declared themselves in their desires of the king?' or, as another of the opposite party writes, 'When the soldiery, who had hitherto made clubs trumps, resolved now to turn up the king of hearts in their affections,' the rabble in town and country vied with each other in burning the 'Rump,' and the literal emblem was hung by chains on gallowses, with a bonfire underneath, while the cries of 'Let us burn the Rump! Let us roast the Rump!' were echoed every where. The suddenness of this universal change, which was said to have maddened the wise, and to have sobered the mad, must be ascribed to the joy at escaping from the yoke of a military despotism; perhaps, too, it marked the rapid transition of hope to a restoration which might be supposed to have implanted gratitude even in a royal breast! The feelings of the people expected to find an echo from the throne.

'The Rump,' besides their general resemblance to the French anarchists, had also some minuter features of ugliness, which Englishmen have often exulted have not marked an English revolution—sanguinary proscriptions! We had thought that we had no revolutionary tribunals! no Septemberists! no Noyades! no moreorable guillotines awaiting for carts loaded with human victims! no infuriated republican urging, in a committee of public safety, the necessity of a salutary massacre!

But if it be true that the same motives and the same principles were at work in both nations, and that the like characters were performing in England the parts which they did afterwards in France, by an argument a priori we might be sure that the same revolting crimes and chimerical projects were alike suggested at London as at Paris. Human nature even in transactions which appear unparalleled, will be found to preserve a regularity of resemblance not always suspected.

The first great tragic act was closely copied by the French; and if the popular page of our history appears unstained by their revolutionary axe, this depended only on a slight accident; for it became a question of 'yea' and 'nay' and was only carried in the negative by two voices in the council! It was debated among 'the bloody Rump,' as it was hideously designated, 'whether to massacre and put to the sword all the king's party.'* Cromwell himself listened to the suggestion; and it was only put down by the coolness of political calculation—the dread that the massacre would be too general!† One of the Rump not obtaining the blessedness of a massacre, still clung to the happiness of an immolation; and many petitions were presented, that 'two or three principal gentlemen of the royal party in EACH COUNTY might be sacrificed to justice, whereby the land might be saved from blood-guiltiness.'‡ Sir Author Haslerigg, whose 'passionate fondness of liberty' has been commended,§ was one of the committee of safety in 1647—I too, would commend 'a passionate lover of liberty,' whenever I do not discover that this lover is much more intent on the dower than on the bride. Haslerigg, 'an absurd bold man,' as Clarendon at a single stroke, reveals his character, was resolved not to be troubled with king or bishop, or with any power in the state superior to 'the Rump's.' We may safely suspect the patriot who can cool his vehemence in spoliation. Haslerigg would have no bishops, but this was not from any want of reverence for church-lands, for he heaped for himself such wealth as to have been nick-named 'the bishop of Durham.' He is here noticed for a political crime different from that of plunder. When, in 1647, this venerable radical found the parliament resisting his views, he declared, that 'Some heads must fly off!' adding, 'the parliament cannot save England; we must look another way';—threatening, what afterwards was done, to bring in the army! It was this 'passionate lover of liberty' who, when Dorislaus, the parliamentary agent, was assassinated by some Scotchmen in Holland, moved in the house, that 'Six royalists of the best quality' should be immediately executed! When some northern counties petitioned the Commons for relief against a famine in the land, our Marxist observed, that 'this want of food would best defend those counties from Scottish invasion!‡ The slaughter of Drogheda by Cromwell, and his frightening all London by what Walker calls 'a butchery of apprentices,' when he cried out to his soldiers, to kill man, woman, and child, and fire the city!§ may be placed among those crimes which are committed to open a reign of terror—but Hugh Peter's soloma thanksgiving to Heaven that 'none were spared!' was the true expression of the true feeling of these political demons. Cromwell was cruel from politics, others from constitution. Some were willing to be cruel without 'blood-guiltiness.' One Alexander Rigby, a radical lawyer, twice moved in the Long Parliament, that those lords and gentlemen who were 'malignants,' should be sold as slaves in the Bay of Algiers, or sent off to the new plantations in the West Indies. He had all things prepared; for it is added that he had contracted with two merchants to throw them off.* There was a most bloody-minded 'mad washing-balls,' as one John Durant is described, applied a lecturer by the House of Commons, who always out of the Lord's prayer, 'As we forgive them that sin against us,' and substituted, 'Lord, since thou hast now drawn out thy sword, let it not be sheathed again; it be glutted in the blood of the malignants.'† I find many enormities of this kind. 'Cursed be he that does the work of the Lord negligently, and keepeth back sword from blood!' was the cry of the wretch, who, as a celebrated actor and royalist sued for quarter, gave another reply than that of 'sitting the action to the law.' Their treatment of the Irish may possibly be admired by true Machiavelists: 'they permitted forty thousand of Irish to enlist in the service of the kings of Spain in France—in other words, they expelled them at a which, considering that our Rumpers affected such a horror of tyranny, may be considered as an act of mercy:‡ satisfying themselves only with dividing the Irish lands of the aforesaid forty thousand among their party by lot and other means. An universal confession after all, is a bloodless massacre. They used the Scot soldiers, after the battles of Dunbar and Worcester, all differently—but equally efficaciously—for they sold Scotch prisoners for slaves to the American planters!§

The Robespierres and the Marats were as necessary beings, and in some respects the Frenchmen as working on a more enlarged scheme. These discredited, that 'the generation which had witnessed the preceding one would always regret it; and for the security the Revolution, it was necessary that every person was thirty years old in 1788 should perish on the scaffold. The anarchists were intent on reducing the French people to eight millions, and on destroying the great cities of France.¶

Such monstrous persons and events are not credible but this is no proof that they have not occurred.—No incredible things will happen!

Another disorganizing feature in the English Rump was also observed in the Sans-culottes—their hatred literature and the arts. Hebert was one day directing satellites towards the bibliothèque nationale, to put as to all that human knowledge collected for centuries on centuries—in one day! alleging of course some good reason. This hero was only diverted from the enterprise by his persuaded to postpone it for a day or two, when luckily guillotine intervened: the same circumstance occurred to the burning of the records in the Tower was certain proposed; a speech of Selden's, which I cannot immediately turn to, put a stop to these incendiaries. It was debated in the Rump parliament, when Cromwell was general, whether they should dissolve the universities? It concluded that no university was necessary; that there were no ancient examples of such education, and that scholars in other countries did study at their own cost charges, and therefore they looked on them as unnecessary, and thought them fitting to be taken away for the public use!—How these venerable asylums escaped from being sold with the king's pictures, as stone and timber, and if their rich endowments were not shared among such a venerate ignorance and remorseless spoliation, might be some inquiry.

The Abbé Morellet, a great political economist, imagined that the source of all the crimes of the French Revolution was their violation of the sacred rights of property. The perpetua. invectives of the Sans-culottes France against proprietors and against property proceed from demoralized beings, who formed panegyrics on crimes; crimes, to explain whose revolutionary terms, new dictionary was required. But even these anarchy in their mad expressions against property, and in the set notions of their 'égalité,' have not gone beyond hating of our own 'Rumpers!'

Those revolutionary journals of the parliament of 1793, which in spirit so strongly resemble the diurnal or homalid effusions of the redoubtable French Hebert, at, and others of that stamp, one of the most remarkable is 'The Moderate,' impartially communicating marvellous affairs to the kingdom of England; the monarchical our commonwealth-men had not yet had time enough bliterate from their colloquial style. This writer called self in his barbarous English, The Moderate! It is hard to conceive the meanness and illiteracy to which the English language was reduced under the pens of the rabble-writers of these days, had we not witnessed the present time a parallel to their compositions. 'The Moderate!' was a little assumed on the principle on which Marat denominated himself 'l'ami du peuple.' It is curious, that the most ferocious politicians usually exert their moderation. Robespierre, in his justification, declares 'm'a souvent accusé de Moderantisme.' The actors, playing the same parts, may be always paralysed in their language and their deeds. This 'Moderate' edily pursued one great principle—the overthrow of all property. Assuming that property was the original cause sin! an exhortation to the people for this purpose is the object of the present paper: 'the illustration of his principle is as striking as the principle itself.

It is an apology for, or rather a defence of robbery! Some moon-troopers had been condemned to be hanged, practising their venerable custom of gratuitously suppling themselves from the flocks and herds of their weaker neighbours: our 'Moderate' ingeniously discovers, that the loss of these men's lives is to be attributed to nothing at property. They are necessitated to offend the laws, in order to obtain a livelihood!

On this he descants; and the extract is a political curiosity, in the French style! 'Property is the original cause of sin between party and party as to civil transactions. And since the tyrant is taken off, and the government lered in nomme, so ought it really to redound to the good of the people in specie; which though they cannot expect in a few years, by reason of the multiplicity of the gentry a authority, command, &c, who drive on all designs for support of the old government, and consequently their own interest and the people's slavery, yet they doubt not, but in time the people will herein discern their own blindness and folly.'

In September, he advanced with more depth of thought. 'Wars have even been clothed with the most gracious pretences—viz., reformation of religion, the laws of the land, and the liberty of the subject, &c; though the effects hereof have proved most destructive to every nation; making the sword, and not the people, the original of all authorities for many hundred years together, taking away such man's birthright, and settling upon a few a cursed property; the ground of all civil offences, and the greatest cause of most sins against the heavenly Deity. This tyranny and oppression running through the veins of many of our predecessors, and being too long maintained by the sword upon a royal foundation, at last became so customary, as to the vulgar it seemed most natural—the only reason why the people of this time are so ignorant of their birth-right, their only freedom,' &c.

'The birth-right' of citizen Egalité to a cursed property settled on a few, was not even among the French jacobins, urged with more amazing force. Had things proceeded according to our 'Moderate's' plan, 'the people's slavery' had been something worse. In a short time the nation would have had more proprietors than property. We have a curious list of the spoiliations of those members of the House of Commons, who, after their famous self-denying ordinances, appropriated among themselves sums of money, offices, and lands, for services 'done or to be done.'

The most innocent of this new government of 'the Majesty of the People,' were those whose talents had been limited by Nature to peddle and purloin; puny mechanics, who had suddenly dropped their needles, their hammers, and their lasts, and slunk out from behind their shop-counters; those who had never aspired beyond the constable of their parish, were now seated in the council of state; where, as Milton describes them, 'they fell u suckster the commonwealth:' there they met a more rabid race of obscure lawyers, and discontented men of family, of blasted reputations; adventurers, who were to command the militia and navy of England,—governors of the three kingdoms! whose votes and ordinances resounded with nothing else but new impositions, new taxes, excises, yearly, monthly, weekly sequestrations, compositions, and universal robbery!

Baxter vents one deep groan of indignation, and presciently announces one future consequence of Reform! 'In all this appeared the severity of God, the mutability of worldly things, and the fruits of error, pride, and selfishness, to be charged hereafter upon reformation and religion.' As a statesman, the sagacity of this honest prophet was narrowed by the horizon of his religious views; for he ascribes the whole as 'prepared by Satan to the injury of the protestant cause, and the advantage of the papists!' But dropping his particular application to the devil and the papists, honest Richard Baxter is perfectly right in his general principle concerning 'Rumpers,'—'Sans-culottes,'—and 'Radicals.'

LIFE AND HABITS OF A LITERARY ANTIQUARY—OLDWY AND HIS MANUSCRIPTS.

Such a picture may be furnished by some unexpected materials which my inquiries have obtained of Oldwy. This is a sort of personage little known to the wits, who write more than they read, and to their volatile votaries, who only read what the wits write. It is time to vindicate the honours of the few whose laborious days enrich the stores of national literature, not by the duplicates but the supplements of knowledge. A literary antiquary is that idler whose life is passed in a perpetual voyage autour de ma chambre; fervent in sagacious diligence, instinct with the enthusiasm of curious inquiry, critical as well as erudite; he has to arbitrate between contending opinions, to resolve the doubtful, to clear up the obscure, and to grasp at the remote; so busied with other times, and so interested for other persons than those about him, that he becomes the inhabitant of the visionary world of books. He counts only his days by his acquisitions, and may be said by his original discoveries to be the creator of facts; often exciting the gratitude of the literary world, while the very name of the benefactor has not always descended with the inestimable labours.

Such is the man whom we often find, leaving, when he dies, his favourite volumes only an incomplete project! and few of this class of literary men have escaped the fate reserved for most of their brothers. Voluminous works have been usually left unfinished by the death of the authors; and it is with them as with the planting of trees, of which Johnson has forcibly observed, 'There is a frightful interval between the seed and timber.' And he admirably remarks, what I cannot forbear applying to the labours I am now to describe; 'He that calculates the growth of trees has the remembrance of the shortness of life driven hard upon him. He knows that he is doing what will never benefit himself; and when he rejoices to see the stem rise, is disposed to repine that another shall cut it down.' The days of the patriotic Count Mazzuchelli were freely given to his national literature; and six invaluable folios attest the gigantic force of his immense erudition; yet these only carry us through the letters A and B: and though Mazzuchelli had finished for the press other volumes, the torpor of his descendants has defrauded Europe of her claims. The Abbé Goujet, who had designed a classified history of his national literature, in the eighteen volumes we possess, could only conclude that of the translators and commence that of the poets; two other volumes in manuscript have perished. That great enterprise of the Benedictines, the 'Histoire Littéraire de la France,' now consists of twelve large quartos, and the industry of its successive writers have only been able to carry it to the twelfth century. David Clement designed the most extensive bibliography which had ever appeared; but the diligent life of the writer could only proceed as far as H. The alphabetical order, which so many writers of this class have adopted, has proved a mortifying memento of human life! Tiraboschi was so fortunate as to complete his great national history of Italian literature. But, unhappily for us, Thomas Warton, after feeling his way through the darker ages of our poetry, in planning the map of the beautiful land, of which he had only a Pisgah-sight, expired amidst his volumes. The most precious portion of Warton's history is but the fragment of a fragment.

Oldys, among this brotherhood, has met perhaps with a harder fate; his published works, and the numerous ones to which he contributed, are now highly appreciated by the lovers of books; but the larger portion of his literary labours have met with the sad fortune of dispersed, and probably of wasted manuscripts. Oldys's manuscripts, or o. m. as they are sometimes designated, are constantly referred to by every distinguished writer on our literary history. I believe that not one of them could have given us any positive account of the manuscripts themselves! They have indeed long served as the solitary sources of information—but like the well at the way-side, too many have drawn their waters in silence.

Oldys is chiefly known by the caricature of the facetious Grose, a great humorist, both with pencil and with pen: it is in a posthumous scrap-book, where Grose deposited his odds and ends, and where there is perhaps not a single story which is not satirical. Our lively antiquary, who cared more for rusty armour than for rusty volumes, would turn over these flams and quips to some confidential friend, to enjoy together a secret laugh at their literary intimates. His eager executor, who happened to be his book-seller, served up the poignant hash to the public as 'Grose's Olio!' The delineation of Oldys is sufficiently overcharged for 'the nonce.' One prevalent infirmity of honest Oldys, his love of companionship over too social a glass, sends him down to posterity in a grotesque attitude; and Mr Alexander Chalmers, who has given us the fullest account of Oldys, has inflicted on him something like a sermon, on 'a state of intoxication.'

Alas!—Oldys was an outcast of fortune, and the utter simplicity of his heart was guiltless as a child's—ever open to the designing. The noble spirit of the Duke of Norfolk once rescued the long-lost historian of Rawleigh from the confinement of the Fleet, where he had existed probably forgotten by the world for six years. It was by an act of grace that the duke safely placed Oldys in the Herald's College as Norroy King of Arms.* But Oldys, like all shy and retired men, had contracted peculiar habits and close attachments for a few; both these he could indulge at no distance. He liked his old associates in the purlieus of the Fleet, whom he facetiously dignified as 'his Rulers,' and there, as I have heard, with the grotesque whim of a herald, established 'The Dragon Club.' Companionship yields the poor man unpurchased pleasures. Oldys, busied every morning among the departed wits and the learned of our country, reflected some image from them of their wit and learning to his companions: a secret history as yet untold, and ancient wit, which, cleared of the rust, seemed to him brilliant as the modern!

It is hard, however, for a literary antiquary to be caricatured, and for a herald to be ridiculed about an 'unseemly reeling, with the coronet of the Princess Caroline, which looked unsteady on the cushion, to the great scandal of a's brethren.' A circumstance which could never have occurred at the burial of a prince or a princess, as the coronet is carried by Clarencieux, and not by Norroy. Oldys's deep potations of ale, however, give me an opportunity of bestowing on him the honour of being the author of a popular Anacreontic song. Mr Taylor informs me that 'Oldys always asserted that he was the author of the well known song—

'Busy, curious, thirsty fly!'

* Mr John Taylor, the son of Oldys's intimate friend, has furnished me with this interesting anecdote. 'Oldys, as my father informed me, was many years in quiet obscurity in the Fleet-prison, but at last was spirited up to make his situation known to the Duke of Norfolk of that time, who received Oldys's letter while he was at dinner with some friends. The duke immediately communicated the contents to the company, observing that he had long been anxious to know what had become of an old, though an humble friend, and was happy by that letter to find that he was alive. He then called for his gentleman (a kind of humble friend whom noblemen used to retain under that name in those days,) and desired him to go immediately to the Fleet, to take money for the immediate need of Oldys, to procure an account of his debts and discharge them. Oldys was, soon after, either by the duke's gift or interest, appointed Norroy King of Arms: and I remember that his official regalia came into my father's hands at his death.'

In the Life of Oldys, by Mr A. Chalmers, the date of this promotion is not found. My accomplished friend the Rev J. Dallaway has obligingly examined the records of the college, by which it appears that Oldys had been Norfolk herald extraordinary, but not belonging to the college, was appointed ver salum Norroy King of Arms by patent, May 5th, 1733.

and as he was a rigid lover of truth, I doubt not that he wrote it.' My own researches confirm it; I have traced this popular song through a dozen of collections since the year 1740, the first in which I find it. In the later collections an original inscription has been dropped, which the accurate Ritson has restored, without, however, being able to discover the writer. In 1740 it is said to have been 'Made extempore by a gentleman, occasioned by a fly drinking out of his cup of ale;'—the accustomed poem of poor Oldys!†

Grose, however, though a great joker on the peculiarities of Oldys, was far from insensible to the extraordinary acquisitions of the man. 'His knowledge of English books has hardly been exceeded.' Grose too was struck by the delicacy of honour, and the unswerving veracity which so strongly characterised Oldys, of which he gives a remarkable instance. We are concerned in ascertaining the moral integrity of the writer, whose main business is with history.

At a time when our literary history, excepting in the solitary labour of Anthony Wood, was a forest, without road nor pathway, Oldys fortunately placed in the library of the Earl of Oxford, yielded up his entire days to researches concerning the books and the men of the preceding age. His labours were then valueless, their very nature not yet ascertained, and when he opened the treasures of our ancient lore, in 'The British Librarian,' it was closed for want of public encouragement. Our writer then struggling to create an age of genius of their own, forgot that they had had any progenitors; or while they were acquiring new modes of excellence, that they were long others, to which their posterity or the national genius might return. To know, and to admire only, the literature and the tastes of our own age, is a species of elegant barbarism.† Spenser was considered nearly as obsolete as Chaucer; Milton was veiled by oblivion, and Shakespeare's dramas were so imperfectly known, that in looking over the play-bills of 1711, and much later, I find that whenever it chanced that they were acted, they were always announced to have been written by Shakespeare. Massinger was unknown; and Jonson, though called 'immortal' in the old play-bills, lay entombed in his two folios. The poetical era of Elizabeth, the eloquent age of James the First, and the age of wit of Charles the Second, were blanks in our literary history. Bysse compiling an art of Poetry, in 1718, passed by in his collections 'Spenser and the poets of his age, because their language is now become so obsolete, that most readers of our age have no ear for them, and therefore Shakespeare himself is so rarely cited in my collection.' The best English poets were considered to be the modern; a taste which is always obstinate!

All this was nothing to Oldys; his literary curiosity anticipated by half a century the fervour of the present day. This energetic direction of all his thoughts was sustained by that life of discovery, which in literary researches is starting novelties among old and unremembered things contemplating some ancient tract as precious as a manuscript, or revelling in the volume of a poet, whose passport of fame was yet delayed in its way; or disinterring

* The beautiful simplicity of this Anacreontic has met the unusual fate of entirely losing its character, by an additional and incongruous stanza in the modern editions, by a gentleman who has put into practice the unallowable liberty of altering the poetical and dramatic compositions of acknowledged genius to his own notion of what he deems 'morality'; but a work of genius whatever is dull ceases to be moral. 'The Fly' of Oldys may stand by 'The Fly' of Gray for melancholy tenderness of thought; it consisted only of these two stanzas:

Busy, curious, thirsty fly!
Drink with me, and drink as I!
Freely welcome to my cup,
Couldst thou sip and sip it up;
Make the most of life you may;
Life is short and wears away!

2
Both alike are mine and thine,
Hastening quick to thy decline!
Thine's a summer, mine no more,
Though repeated to threescore!
Threescore summers when they're gone,
Will appear as short as one!

† We have been taught to enjoy the two ages of Genius and of Taste. The literary public are deeply indebted to the editorial care, and the taste and the enthusiasm of Mr Singer, for exquisite reprints of some valuable writers.

be treasure of some secluded manuscript, whence he drew virgin extract; or raising up a sort of domestic intimacy with the eminent in arms, in politics, and in literature, in his visionary life, life itself with Oldys was insensibly gliding away—its cares almost unfelt!

The life of a literary antiquary partakes of the nature of those who, having no concerns of their own, busy themselves with those of others. Oldys lived in the back-ages of England; he had crept among the dark passages of time, till, like an old gentleman-usher, he seemed to be sporting the secret history of the courts which he had red in. He had been charmed among their masques and wels, had eyed with astonishment their cumbrous magnificence, when knights and ladies carried on their mantles at their cloth of gold ten thousand pounds' worth of ropes of pearls, and buttons of diamonds; or, descending to the court of the second Charles, he tattled merry tales, as that of the first he had painfully watched, like a patriot, a loyalist, a distempered era. He had lived so constantly with these people of another age, and had so deeply interested himself in their affairs, and so loved the wit and the learning which are often bright under the rust of antiquity, that his own uncourtly style is embrowned with a taint of a century old. But it was this taste and curiosity which alone could have produced the extraordinary dome of Sir Walter Rawleigh's life; a work richly interlarded with the most curious facts and the juxta-position of a most remote knowledge; to judge by its fulness of narrative, it would seem rather to have been the work of a temporary.*

It was an advantage in this primeval era of literary curiosity, that those volumes which are now not even to be found in our national library, where certainly they are perpetually wanted, and which are now so excessively appreciated, were exposed on stalls, through the reigns of Anne and the two Georges.† Oldys encountered no competitor, and in the invulnerable mail of his purse, to dispute his session of the rarest volume. On the other hand, our sty collector did not possess our advantages; he could not fly for instant aid to a 'Biographia Britannica,' he did not have history of our poetry, nor even of our drama. Oldys could tread in no man's path, for every soil about him was unbroken ground. He had to create every thing for his purposes. We gather fruit from our trees which others have planted, and too often we but 'pluck and eat.'

Nulla dies sine linea was his sole hope while he was accumulating masses of notes; and as Oldys never used his pen from the weak passion of scribbling, but from the urgency of preserving some substantial knowledge, or planning some future inquiry, he amassed nothing but what he wished to remember. Even the minutest pleasures of setting a date, or classifying a title-page, were enjoyments to a incessant pen. Every thing was acquisition. This never-ending business of research appears to have absorbed his powers, and sometimes to have dulled his conceptions. No one more aptly exercised the tact of discovery; he knew, where to feel in the dark: but he was tiring of the race—that race indeed had not yet appeared to us—who could melt into their Corinthian brass, the aged treasures of Research, Imagination and Philosophy!

We may be curious to inquire where our literary antiquary deposited the discoveries and curiosities which he so incessantly acquiring. They were dispersed on any fly-leaf in occasional memorandum-books; in amarginal notes on his authors—they were sometimes torn into what he calls his 'parchment budgets' or 'Bags Biography—of Botany—of Obituary,—of Books relative to London' and other titles and bags, which he was very day filling. Sometimes his collections seem to have been intended for a series of volumes, for he refers to 'My Volume of Tables of the eminent Persons celebrated English Poets,—to another of 'Poetical Characteristics.' Among those manuscripts which I have seen, I find one mentioned, apparently of a wide circuit, under the name of 'My biographical Institutions. Part third; containing a Catalogue of all the English Lives, with historical and critical Observations on them. 'But will our curious or our whimsical collectors of the present day endure, without impatience, the loss of a quarto manuscript, which bears this rich coudiment for its title—Of London Libraries; with Anecdotes of Collectors of Books; Remarks on Booksellers; and on the first Publishers of Catalogues?' Oldys left ample annotations on 'Fuller's Worthies,' and 'Winstanley's Lives of the Poets,' and on 'Langbaine's Dramatic Poets.' The late Mr Boswell showed me a Fuller in the Malone collection, with Steevens's transcription of Oldys's notes, which Malone purchased for 43*l* at Steevens's sale; but where is the original copy of Oldys? The 'Winstanley,' I think, also reposes in the same collection. The 'Langbaine' is far famed, and is preserved in the British Museum, the gift of Dr Birch; it has been considered so precious, that several of our eminent writers have cheerfully passed through the labour of a minute transcription of its numberless notes. In the history of the fate and fortune of books, that of Oldys' Langbaine is too curious to omit. Oldys may tell his own story, which I find in the Museum copy, p. 330, and which copy appears to be a second attempt; for of the first Langbaine we have this account:

'When I left London, in 1724, to reside in Yorkshire, I left in the care of the Rev. Mr Burridge's family, with whom I had several years lodged, among many other books, goods, &c, a copy of this Langbaine, in which I had wrote several notes and references to further knowledge of these poets. When I returned to London, 1730, I understood my books had been dispersed; and afterwards becoming acquainted with Mr. T. Coxeter, I found that he had bought my Langbaine of a bookseller who was a great collector of plays and poetical books this must have been of service to him, and he has kept it so carefully from my sight, that I never could have the opportunity of transcribing into this I am now writing in, the Notes I had collected in that.*'

This first Langbaine, with additions by Coxeter, was bought, at the sale of his books, by Theophilus Cibber: on the strength of these notes, he prefixed his name to the first collection of the 'Lives of our Poets,' which appeared in weekly numbers, and now form five volumes, written chiefly by Shiels, an amanuensis of Dr Johnson. Shiels has been recently castigated by Mr Gifford.

These literary jubburs nowhere distinguish Coxeter's and Oldys's curious matter from their own. Such was the fate of the first copy of Langbaine, with Oldys's notes; but the second is more important. At an auction of some of Oldys's books and manuscripts, of which I have seen a printed catalogue, Dr. Birch purchased this invaluable copy for three shillings and sixpence.† Such was the value attached to these original researches concerning our poets, and of which,

* At the Bodleian library, I learn by a letter with which I am favoured by the Rev Dr Bliss, that there is an interleaved 'Gildon's Lives and Characters of the Dramatic Poets,' with corrections, which once belonged to Coxeter, who appears to have intended a new edition. Whether Coxeter transcribed into his Gildon the notes of Oldys's first Langbaine, is worth inquiry. Coxeter's conduct, though he had purchased Oldys's first Langbaine, was that of an ungenerous miser, who will quarrel with a brother, rather than share in any acquisition he can get into his own hands. To Coxeter we also owe much; he suggested Doddsley's Collection of Old Plays, and the first tolerable edition of Massinger.

There is a remarkable word in Oldys's note above. He could not have been employed in Lord Oxford's library, as Mr Chalmers conjectures, about 1726; for here he mentions that he was in Yorkshire from 1724 to 1730. This period is a remarkable blank in Oldys's life. If he really went to Yorkshire, he departed in sudden haste, for he left all his books at his lodgings; and six years of rustication must have been an intolerable estate for a lover of old books. It has sometimes occurred to me, that for Yorkshire we must understand the Fleet. There we know he was; but the circumstance perhaps was so hateful to record, that he preferred to tell it, while writing, for the second time, his Notes on Langbaine; he confesses on his return to his lodgings, that he found that he had lost every thing which he had left there.

† This copy was lent by Dr Birch to the late bishop of Dromore, who with his own hand carefully transcribed the notes into an interleaved copy of Langbaine, divided into four volumes, which, as I am informed, narrowly escaped the flames, and was injured by the water, at a fire at Northumberland House. His lordship, when he went to Ireland left this copy with Mr Nichols, for the use of the projected editions of the Tatler, the Spectator, and the Guardian, with notes and illustrations; of which I think the Tatler only has appeared and to which his lordship contributed some valuable communications.

to obtain only a transcript, very large sums have since been cheerfully given. The Museum copy of Langbaine, is in Oldys's hand-writing, not interleaved, but overflowing with notes, written in a very small hand about the margins, and inserted between the lines: nor may the transcriber pass negligently even its corners, otherwise he is here assured that he will lose some useful date, or the hint of some curious reference. The enthusiasm and diligence of Oldys, in undertaking a repetition of his first lost labour, proved to be infinitely greater than the sense of his unrequited labours. Such is the history of the escapes, the changes, and the fate of a volume, which forms the groundwork of the most curious information concerning our elder poets, and to which we must still frequently refer.

In this variety of literary arrangements, which we must consider as single works in a progressive state, or as portions of one great work on our modern literary history, it may, perhaps, be justly suspected that Oldys in the delight of perpetual acquisition, impeded the happier labour of unity of design, and completeness of purpose. He was not a Tiraboschi—nor even a Nicéron! He was sometimes chilled by neglect, and by 'vanity and vexation of spirit,' else we should not now have to count over a barren list of manuscript works; masses of literary history, of which the existence is even doubtful.

In Kippis's Biographia Britannica, we find frequent references to O. M. Oldys's manuscripts. Mr. John Taylor, the son of the friend and executor of Oldys, has greatly obliged me with all his recollections of this man of letters; whose pursuits, however, were in no manner analogous to his, and whom he could only have known in youth. By him I learn, that on the death of Oldys, Dr Kippis, editor of Biographia Britannica, looked over these manuscripts at Mr. Taylor's house. He had been directed to this discovery by the late Bishop of Dromore, whose active zeal was very remarkable in every enterprise to enlarge our literary history. Kippis was one who, in some degree, might have estimated their literary value; but, employed by commercial men, and negotiating with persons who neither comprehended their nature, or ascribed any value to them, the editor of the Biographia found Oldys's manuscripts an easy purchase for his employer, the late Mr. Cadell; and the twenty guineas, perhaps, served to bury their writer! Mr. Taylor says, 'The manuscripts of Oldys were not so many as might be expected from so indefatigable a writer. They consisted chiefly of short extracts from books, and minutes of dates, and were thought worth purchasing by the doctor. I remember the manuscripts well; though Oldys was not the author, but rather recorder.' Such is the statement and the opinion of a writer, whose effusions are of a gayer sort. But the researches of Oldys must not be estimated by this standard: with him a single line was the result of many a day of research, and a leaf of scattered hints would supply more original knowledge than some octavos, fashioned out by the hasty gilders and varnishers of modern literature. These discoveries occupy small space to the eye; but large works are composed out of them. This very lot of Oldys's manuscripts was, indeed, so considerable to the judgment of Kippis, that he has described them as 'a large and useful body of biographical materials, left by Mr. Oldys.' Were these the 'Biographical Institutes' Oldys refers to among his manuscripts? 'The late Mr. Malone,' continues Mr. Taylor, 'told me that he had seen all Oldys's manuscript; so I presume they are in the hands of Cadell and Davies; Have they met with the fate of sucked oranges?—and how much of Malone may we owe to Oldys?'

This information enabled me to trace the manuscripts of Oldys to Dr. Kippis; but it cast me among the book-sellers, who do not value manuscripts which no one can print. I discovered, by the late Mr. Davies, that the direction of that hapless work in our literary history, with its whole treasure of manuscripts, had been consigned, by Mr. Cadell, to the late George Robinson: and that the successor of Dr. Kippis had been the late Dr. George Gregory. Again I repeat, the history of voluminous works is a melancholy office; every one concerned with them no longer can be found! The esteemed relic of Doctor Gregory, with a friendly promptitude, gratified my anxious inquiries, and informed me, that 'She perfectly recollects a mass of papers, such as I described, being returned, on the death of Dr. Gregory, to the house of Wilkie and Robinson, in the early part of the year 1809.' I applied to this house, who, after some time, referred me to Mr. John Robinson, the representative of his late father, and with whom all the papers of the former partnership were deposited. But Mr. John Robinson has terminated my inquiries, by his civility in promising to comply with them, and his pertinacity in not doing so. He may have injured his own interest in not trading with my curiosity.* It was fortunate for the nation, that George Vertue's mass of manuscripts escaped the fate of Oldys; had the possessor proved as indolent, Horace Walpole would not have been the writer of his most valuable work, and we should have lost the 'Anecdotes of Painting,' of which Vertue had collected the materials.

Of a life consumed in such literary activity we should have known more had the Diaries of Oldys escaped destruction. 'One habit of my father's old friend, William Oldys,' says Mr. Taylor, 'was that of keeping a diary, and recording in it every day all the events that occurred, and all his engagements, and the employment of his time. I have seen piles of these books, but know not what became of them.' The existence of such diaries is confirmed by a sale catalogue of Thomas Davies, the literary bookseller, who sold many of the books and some manuscripts of Oldys, which appears to have been dispersed in various libraries. I find Lot 13627, Mr Oldys's Diary, containing several observations relating to books, characters &c.: a single volume, which appears to have separated from the 'pieces' which Mr. Taylor once witnessed. The literary diary of Oldys would have exhibited the mode of his pursuit, and the results of his discoveries. One of these volumes I have fortunately discovered, and a singularity in this writer's feelings throws a new interest over such diurnal records. Oldys was apt to give utterance with his pen to his most secret emotions. Querulous or indignant, his honest simplicity confided to the paper before him such extemporaneous soliloquies, and I have found him hiding in the very corners of his manuscripts his 'secret sorrows.'

A few of these slight memorials of his feelings will exhibit a sort of Silhouette likeness traced by his own hand, when at times the pensive man seems to have contemplated his own shadow. Oldys would throw down a verse, whose humility or quaintness indicates their origin, or by some pithy adage, or apt quotation, or recording anecdote, his self-advice, or his self-regrets!

Oppressed by a sense of tasks so unprofitable to himself, while his days were often passed in trouble and in pain; he breathes a self-reproach in one of these profound reflections of melancholy which so often startle the man of study, who truly discovers that life is too limited to acquire real knowledge, with the ambition of dispensing it to the world.

'I say, who too long in these cobwebs lurks,
Is always whetting tools, but never works.'

In one of the corners of his note-books I find this curious but sad reflection:—

'Alas! this is but the apron of a fig-leaf—but the curtain of a cobweb.'

Sometimes he seems to have anticipated the fate of this obscure diligence, which was pursuing discoveries reserved for others to use.

'He heath up riches, and knoweth not who shall gaze there.'

'Fond treasurer of these stores, behold thy fate
In Psalm the thirty-ninth, 6, 7, and 8.'

Sometimes he checks the eager ardour of his pen, and reminds himself of its repose, in Latin, Italian, and English.

— Non vi, sed sepe cadendo.

Aasal presto di fu quel che si fa bene.

'Some respite best recovers what we need,
Discreetly bating gives the journey speed.'

There was a thoughtless kindness in honest Oldys; and his simplicity of character, as I have observed, was practised on by the artful or the ungenerous. We regret

* I know that not only this lot of Oldys's manuscript, but great quantity of original contributions of whole lives, sent in for the Biographia Britannica, must lie together, when they have been destroyed as waste-paper. These biographical and literary curiosities were often supplied by the families or friends of eminent persons. Some may, perhaps, have been reclaimed by their owners. I am informed there was among them an interesting collection of the correspondence of Locke; and I could mention several lives which were preserved.

and the following entry concerning the famous collector, James West.

'I gave above threescore letters of Dr Davenant to his son, who was envoy at Frankfurt in 1705 to 1708, to Mr James West,* with one hundred and fifty more, about Christmas, 1746: but the same fate they found as grain that is sowed in barren ground.'

Such is the plaintive record by which Oldys relieved himself of a groan! We may smile at the simplicity of his following narrative, where poor Oldys received manuscripts in lieu of money!

'Old Counsellor Fane, of Colchester, who, in forma imperis, deceived me of a good sum of money which he owed me, and not long after set up his chariot, gave me a parcel of manuscripts, and promised me others, which he never gave me, nor any thing else, besides a barrel of cyters, and a manuscript copy of Randolph's poems, an original, as he said, with many additions, being devolved on him as the author's relation.'

There was no end to his aids and contributions to every author or bookseller who applied to him; yet he had reason to complain of both while they were using his invaluable, but not valued, knowledge. Here is one of these journal entries:

'I lent the tragical lives and deaths of the famous pirates, Ward and Dansiker, 4to, London, 1612, by Robt. Daborn, alias Dabourne, to Mr T. Lediard, when he was writing his naval History, and he never returned it. See Jowell's Letters of them.'

In another, when his friend T. Hayward was collecting, for his 'British Muse,' the most exquisite common-places of our old English dramatists, a compilation which must not be confounded with ordinary ones, Oldys not only assisted in the labour, but drew up a curious introduction, with a knowledge and love of the subject which none but himself possessed. But so little were these researches then understood, that we find Oldys, in a moment of vexatious recollection, and in a corner of one of the margins of his Langbaine, accidentally preserving an extraordinary circumstance attending this curious dissertation. Oldys having completed this elaborate introduction, 'the pensive publisher insisted on leaving out one third part, which happened to be the best matter in it, because he could have it contracted into one sheet!' Poor Oldys never could forget the fate of this elaborate Dissertation on all the Collections of English poetry: I am confident that I have seen some volume which was formerly Oldys's, and afterwards Thomas Warton's, in the possession of my intelligent friend Mr Douce. In the fly-leaf of which Oldys has expressed himself in these words:—'In my historical and critical review of all the collections of this kind, it could have made a sheet and a half or two sheets; but hey for sordid gain, and to save a little expense in print and paper, got Mr John Campbell to cross it and cram it, and play the devil with it, till they squeezed it into less compass than a sheet. This is a loss which we may never recover. The curious book-knowledge of this singular man of letters, those stores of which he was the fond treasurer, as he says with such tenderness for his pursuits, were always ready to be cast into the forms of a dissertation or an introduction; and when Morgan published his Collection of rare Tracts, the friendly hand of Oldys furnished a Dissertation upon Pamphlets, in a Letter to a Nobleman; probably the Earl of Oxford, a great literary curiosity; and in the Harleian Collection he has given a Catalogue Raisonné of six hundred. When Mrs Cooper attempted 'The Muse's Library,' the first essay which influenced the national taste to return to our deserted seats in our most poetical age, it was Oldys who only could have enabled this lady to perform that task so well. When Curl, the publisher, to help out one of his hasty compilations, a 'History of the Stage,' repaired, like all the world, to Oldys, whose kindness could not resist the importunity of this busy publisher, he gave him a life of Nell Gwynn; while at the same moment Oldys could not avoid noticing, a one of his usual entries, an intended work on the stage, which we seem never to have had, Dick Leveridge's His-

* This collection, and probably the other letters, have come down to us, no doubt, with the manuscripts of this collector, purchased for the British Museum. The correspondence of Dr Davenant, the political writer, with his son, the envoy, turns on one perpetual topic, his sons and his own advancement in the state.

tory of the Stage and Actors in his own Time, for these forty or fifty years past, as he told me he had composed, is likely to prove, whenever it shall appear, a more perfect work.' I might proceed with many similar gratuitous contributions with which he assisted his contemporaries. Oldys should have been constituted the reader for the nation. His comptes rendus of books and manuscripts are still held precious; but his useful and curious talent had sought the public patronage in vain! From one of his 'Diaries,' which had escaped destruction, I transcribe some interesting passages ad verbum.

The reader is here presented with a minute picture of those invisible occupations which pass in the study of a man of letters. There are those who may be surprised, as well as amused, in discovering how all the business, even to the very disappointments and pleasures of active life, can be transferred to the silent chamber of a recluse student; but there are others who will not read without emotion to the secret thoughts of him, who, loving literature with its purest passion, scarcely repines at being defrauded of his just fame, and leaves his stores for the after-age of his more gifted heirs. Thus we open one of Oldys's literary days:

'I was informed this day by Mr Tho. Odell's daughter, that her father, who was deputy-inspector and licenser of the plays, died 24 May, 1749, at his house in Chappell-street, Westminster, aged 58 years. He was writing a history of the characters he had observed, and conferences he had had with many eminent persons he knew in his time. He was a great observer of every thing curious in the conversations of his acquaintance, and his own conversation was a living chronicle of the remarkable intrigues, adventures, sayings, stories, writings, &c., of many of the quality, poets and other authors, players, booksellers, &c., who flourished especially in the present century. Had been a popular man at elections, and sometime master of the playhouse in Goodman's Fields, but latterly was forced to live reserved and retired by reason of his debts. He published two or three dramatic pieces, one was the Patron, on the story of Lord Romney.

'Q. of his da. to restore me Eustace Budgell's papers, and to get a sight of her father's.

'Have got the one, and seen the other.

'July 31.—Was at Mrs Odell's; she returned me Mr Budgell's papers. Saw some of her husband's papers, mostly poems in the favour of the ministry, and against Mr. Pope. One of them, printed by the late Sir Robert Walpole's encouragement, who gave him ten guineas for writing, and as much for the expense of printing it; but through his advice it was never published, because it might hurt his interest with Lord Chesterfield, and some other noblemen, who favoured Mr Pope for his fine genius. The tract I liked best of his writings was the history of his play-house in Goodman's Fields. (Remember that which was published against that play-house, which I have entered in my London Catalogue. Letter to Sir Richard Brocas, lord mayor, &c, 8vo. 1730.)

Saw nothing of the history of his conversations with ingenious men; his characters, tales, jests, and intrigues of them, of which no man was better furnished with them. She thinks she has some papers of these, and promises to look them out, and also to inquire after Mr Griffin of the lord chamberlain's office, that I may get a search made about Spencer.'

So intent was Oldys on these literary researches, that we see, by the last words of this entry, how in hunting after one sort of game, his undivided zeal kept its eye on another. One of his favourite subjects was realizing of original discoveries respecting Spencer and Shakespeare; of whom, perhaps, to our shame, as it is to our vexation, it may be said that two of our master-poets are those of whom we know the least! Oldys once flattered himself that he should be able to have given the world a life of Shakespeare. Mr John Taylor informs me, that 'Oldys had contracted to supply ten years of the life of Shakespeare unknown to the biographers, with one Walker, a bookseller in the Strand; and as Oldys did not live to fulfil the engagement, my father was obliged to return to Walker twenty guineas which he had advanced on the work.' That interesting narrative is now hopeless for us. Yet, by the solemn contract into which Oldys had entered, and from his strict integrity, it might induce one to suspect that he had made positive discoveries which are now irrecoverable.

We may observe the manner of his anxious inquiries about Spencer.

'Ask Sir Peter Thompson if it were improper to try if Lord Effingham Howard would procure the pedigree in the Herald's office, to be seen for Edward Spenser's parentage or family? or how he was related to Sir John Spenser of Althorpe, in Northamptonshire? to three of whose daughters, who all married nobility, Spenser dedicates three of his poems.

'Of Mr Vertue, to examine Stowe's memorandum-book. Look more carefully for the year when Spenser's monument was raised, or between which years the entry stands—1623 and 1626.

'Sir Clement Cottrell's book about Spenser.

'Capt Power, to know if he has heard from Capt. Spenser about my letter of inquiries relating to Edward Spenser.

'Of Whiston, to examine if my remarks on Spenser are complete as to the press.—Yes.

'Remember when I see Mr W. Thomson, to inquire whether he has printed in any of his works any character of our old poets than those of Spenser and Shakespeare;* and to get the liberty of a visit at Kenish Town, to see his Collection of Robert Green's Works, in about four large volumes in quarto. He commonly published a pamphlet every term, as his acquaintance Tom Nash informs us.

Two or three other memoranda may excite a smile at his peculiar habits of study, and unceasing vigilance to draw from original sources of information.

'Dryden's dream at Lord Exeter's, at Burleigh, while he was translating Virgil, as Signior Verrio, then painting there, related it to the Yorkshire painter, of whom I had it, lies in the parchment book in quarto, designed for his life.'

At a subsequent period Oldys inserts, 'Now entered therein.' Malone quotes this very memorandum, which he discovered in Oldys's Langbaine, to show that Dryden had some confidence in Oneirocriticism, and supposed that future events were sometimes prognosticated by dreams. Malone adds, 'Where either the loss prophetic leaf, or the parchment book now is, I know not.'

Unquestionably we have incurred a great loss of Oldys's collection for Dryden's life, which were very extensive; such a mass of literary history cannot have perished unless by accident; and I suspect that many of Oldys's manuscripts are in the possession of individuals who are not acquainted with his hand-writing, which may be easily verified.

'To search the old papers in one of my large deal boxes for Dryden's letter of thanks to my father, for some communication relating to Plutarch, while they and others were publishing a translation of Plutarch's Lives, in five volumes, 8vo, 1683. It is copied in the yellow book for Dryden's Life, in which there are about 150 transcriptions in prose and verse, relating to the life, character, and writings of Mr. Dryden.—Is England's Remembrancer extracted out of my obit. (obituary) into my remarks on him in the poetical bag?'

'My extracts in the parchment budget about Donham's seat and family in Surrey.'

'My white vellum pocket-book, bordered with gold, for the extracts from "Groans of Great Britain" about Butler.'

'See my account of the great yew in Tankersley's park while Sir R. Fanshawe was prisoner in the lodge there; especially Talbot's yew, which a man on horseback might turn about in, in my botanical budget.'

'This Donald Lupton I have mentioned in my catalogue of all the books and pamphlets relative to London in folio, begun anno 1740, and which I have now, 1748, entered between 300 and 400 articles, besides remarks, &c. Now, in June, 1748, between 400 and 500 articles. Now, in October, 1750, six hundred and thirty-six.*'

*William Thompson, the poet of 'Sickness,' and other poems; a warm lover of elder bards, and no vulgar imitator of Spenser. He was the reviewer of Bishop Hall's Satires, in 1758, by an edition which had been more fortunate if conducted by his friend Oldys, for the text is unskilful, though the edition followed was one borrowed from Lord Oxford's library, probably by the aid of Oldys.

† Malone's Life of Dryden, p. 420.

‡ This is one of Oldys's manuscripts; a thick folio of titles, which has been made to do its duty, with small thanks from those who did not care to praise the service which they derived from it. It passed from Dr Berkenhout to George Steevens, who lent it to Gough. It was sold for five guineas. The

There remains to be told an anecdote, which shows Mr Pope greatly regarded our literary antiquary. 'Oldys,' says my friend, 'was one of the librarians of the Earl of Oxford, and he used to tell a story of the credit which he obtained as a scholar, by setting Pope right in a Latin quotation, which he made at the earl's table. He did so, however, as I remember, boast of having been admitted as a guest at the table, but as happening to be in the room! Why might not Oldys, however, have been seated, at least, below the salt! It would do no honour to either party to suppose that Oldys stood among the monks. The truth is, there appears to have existed a confidential intercourse between Pope and Oldys; and of this I shall give a remarkable proof. In those fragments of Oldys preserved as 'additional anecdotes of Shakespeare,' in Steevens's and Malone's editions, Oldys mentions a story of Davenant, which he adds, 'Mr. Pope told me at the Earl of Oxford's table.' And further relates a convention which passed between them. Nor in this all; for in Oldys's Langbaine he put down this memorandum in the article of Shakespeare—'Remember what I observed to my Lord Oxford for Mr. Pope's use out of Cowley's preface.' Malone appears to have discovered this observation of Cowley's, which is curious enough and very ungrateful to that commentator's ideas; it is 'to prune and lop away the old withered branches' in the new editions of Shakespeare and other ancient poets! 'Pope adopted,' says Malone, 'this very unwarrantable idea; Oldys was the person who suggested to Pope the singular course he pursued in his edition of Shakespeare.' Without touching on the felicity or the danger of this new system of republishing Shakespeare, one may say that if many passages were struck out, Shakespeare would not be injured, for many of them were never composed by that great bard! There not only existed a literary intimacy between Oldys and Pope, but our poet adopting his suggestions on so important an occasion, evinces how highly he esteemed his judgment; and unquestionably Pope had often been delighted by Oldys with the history of his predecessor, and the curiosities of English poetry.

I have now introduced the reader to Oldys sitting amidst his 'poetical bags,' his 'parchment biographical budgets,' his 'catalogues,' and his 'diaries,' often wearing a solitary groan, or active in some fresh inquiry. Such is the Silhouette of this prodigy of literary curiosity!

The very existence of Oldys's manuscripts constitutes a be of an ambiguous nature, referred to, quoted, and transcribed, when he has attempted to embody his multiplied inquiries, and to finish his scattered designs, has found that the labor aequat laborem, 'the labour void of labour,' as the inscription on the library of Florence finely describes the researches of literature, has dissolved his days in the voluptuousness of his curiosity; and that too often he the hunter in the heat of the chase, while he devoured the prey which lay before him, he was still stretching onwards to catch the fugitive!

Oldys affords one more example how life is often closed amidst discoveries and acquisitions. The literary antiquary, when he has attempted to embody his multiplied inquiries, and to finish his scattered designs, has found that the labor aequat laborem, 'the labour void of labour,' as the inscription on the library of Florence finely describes the researches of literature, has dissolved his days in the voluptuousness of his curiosity; and that too often he the hunter in the heat of the chase, while he devoured the prey which lay before him, he was still stretching onwards to catch the fugitive!

Transvolat in medio posita, et fugientis capiti.

At the close of every century, in this growing world of books, may an Oldys be the reader for the nation: Should he be endowed with a philosophical spirit, and combine the genius of his own times with that of the preceding, he will hold in his hand the chain of human thoughts, and, like another Bayle, become the historian of the human mind!

Useful work of ten years of attention given to it! The antiquary Gough alludes to it with his usual discernment. 'Among these titles of books and pamphlets about London are many purely historical, and many of too low a kind to rank under the head of topography and history.' Thus the design of Oldys in forming this elaborate collection, is condemned by trying it by the limited object of the topographer's view. The catalogue remains a desideratum, were it printed entire as collected by Oldys, not merely for the topography of the metropolis, but for its relation to its manners, domestic events, and persons connected with its history.

THE LITERARY CHARACTER.
ILLUSTRATED
BY THE
HISTORY OF MEN OF GENIUS.
DRAWN FROM THEIR OWN FEELINGS AND CONFESSIONS.

PREFACE.

I Published, in 1795, "an Essay on the Literary Character;" to my own habitual and inherent defects, were superadded those of my youth; the crude production was, however, not ill received, for the edition disappeared; and the subject was found to be more interesting than the writer.

During the long interval which has elapsed since the first publication, the little volume was often recalled to my recollection, by several, and by some who have since obtained celebrity; they imagined that their attachment to literary pursuits had been strengthened even by so weak an effort. An extraordinary circumstance has occurred with these opinions;—a copy which has accidentally fallen into my hands, formerly belonged to the great poetical genius of our times; and the singular fact that it was twice read by him in two subsequent years, at Athens, in 1810 and 1811, instantly convinced me that the volume deserved my attention. I tell this fact assuredly, not from any little vanity which it may appear to betray for the truth is, were I not as liberal and as candid in respect to my own productions, as I hope I am to others, I could not have been gratified by the present circumstance; for the marginal notes of the noble writer convey no flattery—but amidst their pungency and sometimes their truth, the circumstance that a man of genius could, and did read, this slight effusion at two different periods of his life, was a sufficient authority, at least for an author, to return it once more to the anvil; more knowledge, and more maturity of thought, I may hope, will now fill up the rude sketch of my youth; its radical defects, those which are inherent in every author, it were unwise for me to hope to remove by suspending the work to a more remote period.

It may be thought that men of genius only should write on men of genius; as if it were necessary that the physician should be infected with the disease of his patient. He is only an observer, like Sydenham who confined himself to vigilant observation, and the continued experience of tracing the progress of actual cases (and in his department, but not in mine) in the operation of actual remedies. He beautifully says—"Whoever describes a violet exactly as to its colour, taste, smell, form, and other properties, will find the description agree in most particulars with all the violets in the universe."

Nor do I presume to be any thing more than the historian of genius; whose humble office is only to tell the virtues and the infirmities of his heroes. It is the fashion of the present day to raise up dazzling theories of genius ; to reason a priori ; to promulgate abstract paradoxes ; to treat with levity the man of genius, because he is only a man of genius. I have sought for facts, and have often drawn results unsuspected by myself, I have looked into literary history for the literary character. I have always had in my mind an observation of Lord Bolingbroke : " Abstract, or general propositions, though never so true, appear obscure or doubtful to us very often till they are explained by examples ; when examples are pointed out to us, there is a kind of appeal, with which we are flattered, made to our senses, as well as to our understandings. The instruction comes then from our authority ; we yield to fact when we resist speculation." This will be truth long after the encyclopedic geniuses of the present age, who write on all subjects, and with most spirit on those they know least about, shall have passed away ; and time shall extricate truth from the deadly embrace of sophistry.

THE LITERARY CHARACTER, &c.

CHAPTER I.

ON LITERARY CHARACTERS.

SINCE the discovery of that art which multiplies at will productions of the human intellect, and spreads them r the universe in the consequent formation of libraries, ass or order of men has arisen, who appear throughout rope to have derived a generic title in that of literary racters ; a denomination which, however vague, defines pursuits of the individual, and serves, at times, to se- rate him from other professions.

Formed by the same habits, and influenced by the same tives, notwithstanding the difference of talents and tem- ra, the opposition of times and places, they have always served among themselves the most striking family re- blance. The literary character, from the objects in ich it concerns itself, is of a more independent and per- nent nature than those which are perpetually modified he change of manners, and are more distinctly nation- . Could we describe the medical, the commercial, or e legal character of other ages, this portrait of antiquity ould be like a perished picture ; the subject itself would ve altered its position in the revolutions of society. It is so with the literary character. The passion for study ; e delight in books ; the desire of solitude and celebrity ; e obstructions of life ; the nature of their habits and pur- sits ; the triumphs and the disappointments of literary lory ; all these are as truly described by Cicero and the onger Pliny, as by Petrarch and Erasmus, and as they ave been by Hume and Gibbon. The passion for collect- ing together the treasures of literature and the miracles of rt, was as insatiable a thirst in Atticus as in the French eirace, and in our Cracherodes and Townleys. We ace the feelings of our literary contemporaries in all ages, nd every people who have deserved to rank among polish- d nations. Such were those literary characters who ave stamped the images of their minds on their works, nd that other race, who preserve the circulation of this ntellectual coinage ;

Gold of the Dead,
Which Time does still disperse, but not devour.

D'Avenant's Gondibert, c. v. s. 38.

These literary characters now constitute an important xdy, diffused over enlightened Europe, connected by e secret links of congenial pursuits, and combining often nsuently to themselves in the same common labours. At London, at Paris, and even at Madrid, these men eel the same thirst, which is allayed at the same foun- taine ; the same authors are read, and the same opinions are formed.

Contemporains de tous les hommes,
Et citoyens de tous les lieux.

De la Mothe.

Thus an invisible brotherhood is existing among us, and those who stand connected with it are not always sensible of this kindred alliance. Once the world was made uneasy by rumours of the existence of a society, founded by that extraordinary German, Rosicrucius, designed for the search of truth and the reformation of the sciences. Its statutes were yet but partially promulgated but many a great principle in morals, many a result of science in the concentrated form of an axiom ; and every excellent work which suited the views of the author to preserve anonymous, were mysteriously traced to the president of the Rosicrucians, and not only the society became celebrated, but abused. Descartes, when in Germany, gave himself much trouble to track out the society, that he might consult the great searcher after Truth, but in vain ! It did not occur to the young reformer of science in this visionary pursuit, that every philosophical inquirer was a brother, and that the extraordinary and mysterious personage, was indeed himself ! for a genius of the first order is always the founder of a society, and, wherever he may be, the brotherhood will delight to acknowledge their master.

These Literary Characters are partially described by Johnson, not without a melancholy colouring. 'To talk in private, to think in solitude, to inquire or to answer inquiries, is the business of a scholar. He wanders about the world without pomp or terror, and is neither known nor valued but by men like himself.' But eminent Genius accomplishes a more ample design. He belongs to the world as much as to a nation ; even the great writer himself, at that moment, was not conscious that he was devoting his days to cast the minds o his own contemporaries, and of the next age, in the mighty mould of his own, for he was of that order of men whose individual genius often becomes that of a people. A prouder conception rose in the majestic mind of Milton, of 'that lasting fame and perpetuity of praise, which God and good men have consented shall be the reward of those whose published labours advance the good of mankind.'

Literature has in all ages, encountered adversaries from causes sufficiently obvious ; but other pursuits have been rarely liable to discover enemies among their own votaries. Yet many literary men openly, or insidiously, would lower the Literary character, are eager to confuse the ranks in the republic of letters, wanting the virtue which knows to pay its tribute to Cæsar : while they maliciously confer the character of author on that "Ten Thousand," whose recent list is not so much a muster roll of heroes, as a table of population.*

We may allow the political economist to suppose that an author is the manufacturer of a certain ware for "a very paltry recompense," as their seer Adam Smith has calculated. It is useless to talk to people who have nothing but millions in their imagination, and whose choicest works of art are spinning jennies ; whose principle of 'labour' would have all men alike die in harness ; or, in their carpentry of human nature, would convert them into wheels and screws, to work the perplexed movements of that ideal machinery called 'capital'—these may reasonably doubt of 'the utility' of this 'unproductive' race. Their heated heads and temperate hearts may satisfy themselves that 'that unprosperous race of men, called men of letters,' in a system of political economy, must necessarily occupy their present state in society, much as formerly when 'a scholar and a beggar seem to have been terms very nearly synonymous.† But whenever the political economists shall feel,—a calculation of time which who would dare to furnish them with ?—that the happiness and prosperity of a people include something more permanent and more evident than 'the wealth of a nation,' they may form another notion of the literary character.

A more formidable class of ingenious men who derived their reputation and even their fortune in life from their literary character, yet are cold and heartless to the interests of literature—men who have reached their summit and reject the ladder: for those who have once placed themselves high, feel a sudden abhorrence of climbing. These have risen through the gradations of politics into office, and in that busy world view every thing in a cloud of passions and politics—they who once commanded us by their eloquence would now drive us by the single force of despotism; like Adrian VI, who obtaining the Pontificate as the reward of his studies, yet possessed of the Tiara, persecuted students; he dreaded, say the Italians, lest his brothers might shake the Pontificate itself. It fares worse with authors when minds of this cast become the arbiters of the public opinion; when the literary character is first systematically degraded and then sported with, as elephants are made to dance on hot iron; or the bird plucked of its living feathers is exhibited as a new sort of creature to invite the passengers! Whatever such critics may plead to mortify the vanity of authors, at least it requires as much to give effect to their own polished effrontery. Lower the high self-reverence, the lofty conception of Genius, and you deprive it of the consciousness of its powers with the delightfulness of its character; in the blow you give the musical instrument, the invisible soul of its tone is for ever lost.

A lighter class reduce literature to a mere curious amusement; a great work is likened to a skillful game of billiards, or a piece of music finely executed—and curious researches, to charade making and Chinese puzzles. An author with them is an idler who will not be idle, amusing, or fatiguing others, who are completely so. We have been told that a great genius should not therefore 'ever allow himself to be sensible to his own celebrity, nor deem his pursuits of much consequence, however important or successful.' Catholic doctrine to mortify an author into a saint; Lent all the year, and self-flagellation every day! This new principle, which no man in his senses would contend with, had been useful to Buffon and Gibbon, to Voltaire and Pope,—who assuredly were too 'sensible to their celebrity, and deemed their pursuits of much consequence,' particularly when 'important and successful.' But this point may be adjusted when we come to examine the importance of an author, and the privilege he may possess of a little anticipating the public, in his self-praise.

Such are the domestic treasuries of the literary character against literature—'et tu, Brute!'—but a hero of literature falls not though struck at: he outlives his assassins—and might address them in that language of poetry and tenderness with which a Mexican king reproached his traitorous counsellors: "You were the feathers of my wings, and the eyelids of my eyes."

Every class of men in society have their peculiar sorrows and enjoyments, as they have their habits and their characteristics. In the history of men of genius, we may often open the secret story of their minds; they have, above others, the privilege of communicating their own feelings, and it is their talent to interest us, whether by their pen they talk of themselves, or paint others.

In the history of men of genius let us not neglect those who have devoted themselves to the cultivation of the fine arts; with them genius is alike insulated in their studies; they pass through the same permanent discipline. The histories of literature and art have parallel epochs; and certain artists resemble certain authors. Hence Milton, Michael Angelo, and Handel! One principle unites the intellectual arts, for in one principle they originate, and thus it has happened that the same habits and feelings, and the same fortunes have accompanied men who have sometimes, unhappily, imagined that their pursuits were not analogous. In the 'world of ear and eye,' the poet, the painter, and the musician are kindled by the same inspiration. Thus all is Art and all are artists! This approximation of men apparently of opposite pursuits is so natural, that when Gesner, in his inspiring letter on landscape-painting, recommends to the young painter a constant study of poetry and literature, the impatient artist is made to exclaim, 'Must we combine with so many other studies those which belong to literary men? Must we read as well as paint?' 'It is useless to reply to this question,' says Gesner, 'for some important truths must be instinctively felt, perhaps the fundamental ones in the arts.' A truly imaginative artist, whose enthusiasm was never absent when he meditated on the art he loved, Barry, thus vehemently broke forth—'Go home from the Academy; light up your lamps, and exercise yourselves in the creative part of your art, with Homer, with Livy; and all the great characters, ancient and modern, for your companions and counsellors.'

Every life of a man of genius, composed by himself, presents us with the experimental philosophy of the mind. By living with their brothers, and contemplating on their masters, they will judge from consciousness less erroneously than from discussion; and in forming comparative views and parallel situations, they will discover certain habits and feelings, and find these reflected in themselves.

CHAPTER II.

YOUTH OF GENIUS.

Genius, that creative part of art which individualises the artist, belonging to him and to no other,—is it an inherent faculty in the constitutional dispositions of the individual, or can it be formed by the patient acquisitions of art?

Many sources of genius have indeed been laid open to us, but if these may sometimes call it forth, have they ever supplied its wants? Could Spenser have struck out a poet in Cowley, Richardson a painter in Reynolds, and Descartes a metaphysician in Mallebranche, had they not borne that vital germ of nature, which, when endowed with its force, is always developing itself to a particular character of genius? The accidents related of these men have occurred to a thousand, who have run the same career; but how does it happen, that the multitude remain a multitude, and the man of genius arrives alone at the goal?

The equality of minds in their native state is as monstrous a paradox, or a term as equivocal in metaphysics, as the equality of men in the political state. Both come from the French school in evil times; and ought, therefore, as Job said, 'to be eschewed.' Nor can we trust to Johnson's definition of genius, 'as a mind of general powers accidentally determined by some particular direction,' as this rejects any native aptitude, while we must infer on this principle that the reasoning Locke, without an ear or an eye, could have been the musical and fairy Spenser.

The automatic theory of Reynolds stirs the puppet artist by the wires of pertinacious labour. But industry without genius is tethered; it has stimulated many drudges in art, while it has left us without a Corregio or a Raphael.

Akenside in that fine poem which is itself a history of genius, in tracing its source, first sang,

From heaven my strains begin, from heaven descend
The flame of genius to the human breast.

but in the final revision of that poem he left many years after, the bard has vindicated the solitary and independent origin of genius by the mysterious epithet the chosen breast. The veteran poet was perhaps lessened by the vicissitudes of his own poetical life, and those of some of his brothers.

But while genius remains still wrapt up in its mysterious bud, may we not trace its history in its votaries? Let us compare although we may not always decide. If nature in some of her great operations has kept her last secrets, and even Newton, in the result of his reasoning, has religiously abstained from penetrating into her occult connections, is it nothing to be her historian although we cannot be her legislator?

Can we trace in the faint lines of childhood, an unsteady outline of the man? In the temperament of genius may we not reasonably look for certain indications, or prognostics announcing the permanent character? Will not great sensibility be borne with its susceptible organization; the deep retired character cling to its musings; and the unalterable being of intrepidity and fortitude, full of confidence, be commanding even in his sports, a daring leader among his equals.

The virtuous and contemplative Boyle imagined that he had discovered in childhood that disposition of mind which indicated an instinctive ingenuousness; an incident which he relates, evinced as he thought, that even then he preferred aggravating his fault, rather than consent to suppress any part of the truth, an effort which had been unnatural to his mind. His fanciful, yet striking illustration may open our inquiry. 'This trivial passage'—the little story alluded to—I have mentioned now, not that I think that in itself it deserves a relation, but because as the sun is seen best at his rising and his setting, so men's native dispositions are clearest perceived whilst they are children, and when they are dying. These little sudden actions are the greatest discoverers of men's true humours.'

that the dispositions of genius in early life presage its future character, was long the feeling of antiquity. Isocrates, after much previous observation of those who attended his lectures, would advise one to engage in political studies, shunted another to compose history, elected some to be poets, and some to adopt his own profession. He thought that nature had some concern in forming a man of genius; and he tried to guess at her secret by detecting the first æsthetic inclination of the mind. This principle guided the Jesuits.

In the old romance of King Arthur, when a cowardly comes to the king to request he would make his son a knight—'It is a great thing thou askest,' said Arthur, who enquired whether this entreaty proceeded from him or his son? The old man's answer is remarkable.—'Of my son, or of me; for I have thirteen sons, and all these will fall to that labour I put them; but this child will not labour for me, for any thing that I and my wife will do; but always he will be shooting and casting darts, and glad for to see battles, and to behold knights, and always day and night he desireth of me to be made a knight.' The king commanded the cowardly to fetch all his sons; they were all hapen much like the poor man; but Tor was not like one of them in shape and in countenance, for he was much more than any of them. And so Arthur knighted him. This simple tale is the history of genius—the cowardly's twelve sons were like himself, but the unhappy genius in the family who perplexed and plagued the coward and his wife and his twelve brothers, was the youth verse to labour, but active enough in performing knightly exercises; and dreaming on chivalry amidst a herd of swine.

A man of genius is thus dropt among the people, and as first to encounter the difficulties of ordinary men derived of that feeble ductility which adapts itself to the common destination. Parents are too often the victims of the decided propensity of a son to a Virgil or an Euclid; and the first step into life of a man of genius is disobedience and grief. Lilly, our famous astrologer, has described the frequent situation of such a youth, like the cowardly's son who would be a knight. Lilly proposed to his father that he should try his fortune in the metropolis, where he expected that his learning and his talents would prove serviceable to him; the father, quite incapable of discovering the latent genius of his son in his studious dispositions, very willingly consented to get rid of him, for, as Lilly proceeds, 'I could not work, drive the plough, or endure any country labour; my father oft would say I was good for nothing,'—words which the fathers of so many men of genius have repeated.

In reading the memoirs of a man of genius we often upbraid the domestic persecutions of those who opposed his inclinations. No poet but is moved with indignation at the recollection of the Port Royal Society thrice burning the romance which Racine at length got by heart; no poetician but bitterly inveighs against the father of Pascal for not suffering him to study Euclid, which he at length understood without studying. The father of Petrarch in a barbarous rage burnt the poetical library of his son amidst the shrieks, the groans, and the tears of his youth. Yet this neither converted Petrarch into a sober lawyer, nor deprived him of the Roman laurel. The uncle of Alfieri for more than twenty years suppressed the poetical character of this noble bard; he was a poet without moving to write a verse, and Nature, like a hard creditor, exacted with redoubled interest, all the genius which the uncle had so long kept from her. Such are the men whose inherent impulse no human opposition, and even no adverse education, can deter from being great men.

Let us, however, be just to the parents of a man of genius; they have another association of ideas concerning him than we; we see a great man, they a disobedient child; we track him through his glory, they are wearied by the sullen resistance of his character. The career of genius is rarely that of fortune or happiness; and the father, who may himself be not insensible to glory, dreads that his son be found among that obscure multitude, that populace of mean artists, who must expire at the barriers of mediocrity.

The contemplative race, even in their first steps towards nature, are receiving that secret instruction which no master can impart. The boy of genius flies to some favourite haunt to which his fancy has often given a name; he populates his solitude; he takes all shapes in it, he finds all places in it; he converses silently with all about him—he is a hermit, a lover, a hero. The fragrance and blush of the morning; the still hush of the evening; the mountain, the valley, and the stream; all nature opening to him, he sits brooding over his first dim images, in that train of thought we call reverie, with a restlessness of delight, for he is only the being of sensation, and has not yet learnt to think; then comes that tenderness of spirit, that first shade of thought colouring every scene, and deepening every feeling; this temperament has been often mistaken for melancholy. One truly inspired, unfolds the secret story—

'Indowed with all that nature can bestow,
The child of fancy oft in silence bends
O'er the mixt treasures of his pregnant breast
With conscious pride. From them he oft resolves
To frame he knows not what excellent things,
And win he knows not what sublime reward
Of praise and wonder!—

This delight in reverie has been finely described by Boyle: 'When the intermission of my studies allowed me leisure for recreation,' says Boyle, 'I would very often steal away from all company and spend four or five hours alone in the fields and think at random, making my delighted imagination the busy scene where some romance or other was daily acted.' This circumstance alarmed his friends, who imagined that he was overcome with melancholy.*

It is remarkable that this love of repose and musing is retained throughout life. A man of fine genius is rarely enamoured of common amusements or of robust exercises; and he is usually unadroit where dexterity of hand or eye, or trivial elegancies, are required. This characteristic of genius was discovered by Horace in that Ode which school boys often versify. Beattie has expressly told us of his Minstrel—

'The exploit, of strength, dexterity, or speed
To him nor vanky, nor joy could bring.'

Alfieri said he could never be taught by a French dancing-master, whose Art made him at once shudder and laugh. If we reflect that as it is now practised it seems the art of giving affectation to a puppet, and that this puppet is a man, we can enter into this mixed sensation of degradation and ridicule. Horace, by his own confession, was a very awkward rider; and the poetical rider could not always secure a seat on his mule; Metastasio humorously complains of his gun; the poetical sportsman could only frighten the hares and partridges; the truth was, as an elder poet sings,

'Instead of hounds that make the wooded hills
Talk in a hundred voices to the rills;
I like the pleasing cadence of a line
Struck by the concert of the sacred Nine.'

Brown's Brit. Past. B. ii, Song 4.

And we discover the true 'humour' of the indolent contemplative race in their great representatives Virgil and Horace. When they accompanied Mæcenas into the country, while the minister amused himself at tennis, the two bards reposed on a vernal bank amidst the freshness of the shade. The younger Pliny, who was so perfect a literary character, was charmed by the Roman mode of hunting, or rather fowling by nets, which admitted him to sit a whole day with his tablets and stylus, that, says he, 'should I return with empty nets my tablets may at least be full.' Thomson was the hero of his own Castle of Indolence.

The youth of genius will be apt to retire from the active sports of his mates. Beattie paints himself in his own Minstrel,

* An unhappy young man who recently forfeited his life to the laws for forgery appears to have given promises of genius.—He had thrown himself for two years into the studious retirement of a foreign university. Before his execution he sketched an imperfect auto-biography, and the following passage is descriptive of young genius:

'About this time I became uncommonly reserved, withdrawing by degrees from the pastimes of my associates, and was frequently observed to retire to some solitary place alone.—Ruined castles, bearing the vestiges of ancient broils, and the impairing hand of time,—cascades thundering through the echoing groves,—rocks and precipices,—the beautiful as well as the sublime traits of nature—formed a spacious field for contemplation many a happy hour. From these inspiring objects, contemplation would lead me to the great Author of nature. Often have I dropped on my knees, and poured out the ecstasies of my soul to the God who inspired them.'

† Hor. Od. Lib. iv. O. 2.

'Concourse and noise, and toil he ever fled,
Nor cared to mingle in the clamorous fray
Of squabbling imps; but to the forest sped.'

Bossuet would not join his young companions, and flew to his solitary task, while the classical boys avenged his flight by applying to him from Virgil the bos suctus aratro, the ox daily toiling in the plough. The young painters, to ridicule the persevering labours of Domenichino in his youth, honoured him by the same title of 'the great ox'; and Passeri, in his delightful biography of his own contemporary artists, has happily expressed the still labours of his concealed genius, sua taciturnus lentetia, his silent slowness. The learned Huet has given an amusing detail of the inventive persecutions of his school-mates, to divert him from his obstinate love of study. 'At length,' says he, 'in order to indulge my own taste, I would rise with the sun, while they were buried in sleep, and hide myself in the woods that I might read and study in quiet,' but they beat the bushes and started in his burrow, the future man of erudition. Sir William Jones was rarely a partaker in the active sports of Harrow; it was said of Gray that he was never a boy, and the unhappy Chatterton and Burns were remarkably serious boys. Milton has preserved for us, in solemn numbers, his school-life—

'When I was yet a child, no childish play
To me was pleasing; all my mind was set
Serious to learn and know, and thence to do
What might be public good, myself I thought
Born to that end, born to promote all truth,
All righteous things—

Par. Reg.

If the youth of genius is apt to retire from the ordinary sports of his mates, he often substitutes others, the reflections of those favourite studies which are haunting his young imagination; the amusements of such an idler have often been fanciful. Ariosto, while yet a school-boy, composed a sort of tragedy from the story of Pyramus and Thisbe, and had it represented by his brothers and sisters. Pope seems to have indicated his passion for Homer in those rough scenes which he drew up from Ogilby's version; and when Sir William Jones at Harrow divided the fields according to a map of Greece, and portioned out to each school-fellow a dominion, and further, when wanting a copy of the Tempest to act from, he supplied it from his memory, we must confess that the boy Jones was reflecting in his amusements the cast of mind he displayed in his after life, and that felicity of memory and taste so prevalent in his literary character. Florian's earliest years were passed in shooting birds all day and reading every evening an old translation of the Iliad; whenever he got a bird remarkable for its size or its plumage, he personified it by one of the names of his heroes, and raising a funeral pyre consumed the body; collecting the ashes in an urn, he presented them to his grandfather, with a narrative of his Patroclus or Sarpedon. We seem here to detect, reflected in his boyish sports, the pleasing genius of the author of Numa Pompilius, Gonsalvo of Cordova and William Tell.

It is perhaps a criterion of talent when a youth is distinguished by his equals; at that moment of life with no flattery on the one side, and no artifice on the other, all emotion and no reflection, the boy who has obtained a pre-eminence has acquired this ineluctably by native powers. The boyhood of Nelson was characterized by events congenial to those of his after-days; and his father understood his character when he declared that "in whatever station he might be placed, he would climb, if possible, to the top of the tree." Some puerile anecdotes which Franklin remembered of himself, in association with his after-life, betray the invention, and the firm intrepidity, of his character; and even perhaps the carelessness of the means to obtain his purpose. In boyhood he was a sort of adventurer; and since his father would not consent to a sea-life, he made the river near him represent the ocean; he lived on the water, and was the daring Columbus of a school-boy's boat. A part where he and his mates stood to angle, in time became a quagmire. In the course of one day the infant projector thought of a wharf for them to stand on, and raised with a heap of stones deposited there for the treading of a house. But he preferred his wharf to another's house; his contrivances to aid his puny labourers, with his resolution not to quit the great work till it was effected, seem to strike out to us the decision and invention of his future character. But the qualities which attract the companions of a school-boy may not be those which are essential to fine genius. The captain or leader of his school-mates has a claim on our attention, but the sequestered boy who may chance to be the artist, is the literary character.

Is there then a period in youth which yields decisive marks of the character of genius? The natures of men are as various as their fortunes. Some, like diamonds, must wait to receive their splendour from the slow touch of the polisher, while others, resembling pearls, appear once born with their beautiful lustre.

Among the inauspicious circumstances is the feebleness of the first attempts; and we must not decide on the talents of a young man by his first works. Dryden and Swift might have been deterred from authorship, had their earliest pieces decided their fate. Racine's earliest composition, which we know of by some fragments his son had preserved, to show their remarkable contrast with his writings, abound with those points and conceits which afterwards he abhorred; the tender author of Andromache could not have been discovered while exhausting himself in his wanderings from nature, in running after conceits as absurd and surprising as the worst parts of Cowley. Gibbon betrayed none of the force and magnitude of his powers in his "Essay on Literature," or his attempted History of Switzerland. Johnson's cadenced prose is not recognizable in the humble simplicity of his earliest years. Many authors have begun unsuccessfully the wait they afterwards excelled in. Raphael, when he first drew his meagre forms under Perugino, had not yet conceived an line of that ideal beauty, which one day he of all men could alone execute.

Even the manhood of genius may pass by unobserved by his companions, and may, like Æneas, be hidden in a cloud amidst his associates. The celebrated Fabius Maximus in his boyhood was called in derision "the idle sheep," from the meekness and gravity of his disposition. His sedateness and taciturnity, his indifference to juvenile amusements, his slowness and difficulty in learning, and his ready submission to his equals, induced them to consider him as one irrecoverably stupid. That greatness of mind, unalterable courage, and invincible character Fabius afterwards displayed, they then imagined had lain concealed in the apparent contrary qualities. The boy of genius may indeed seem slow and dull even to the pædagogic, for thoughtful and observing dispositions conceal themselves in timorous silent characters, who have not yet learnt their strength; nor can that assiduous love, which cannot tear itself away from the secret instruction it is perpetually imbibing, be easily distinguished from that pertinacity which goes on with the mere plodder. We often hear from the early companions of a man of genius that at school, he had appeared heavy and unpromising. Rousseau imagined that the childhood of some men is accompanied by that seeming and deceitful dulness, which is the sign of a profound genius; and Roger Ascham has placed among "the best natures for learning, the unsaturated and hard-witted child," that is, the thoughtful or the melancholic, and the slow. Domenichino was at first heavy and unpromising, and Passeri expresses his surprise at the accounts he received of the early life of this great artist. "It is difficult to believe," he says, "what many assert, that from the beginning this great painter had a ruggedness about him, which entirely incapacitated him from learning his profession, and they have heard from himself that he quite despaired of success. Yet I cannot comprehend how such vivacious talents, with a soul so finely organized, and accompanied with such favorable dispositions for the art, would show such signs of incapacity; I rather think that is a mistake in the proper knowledge of genius, which some imagine indicates more decisively by its sudden vehemence, showing itself like lightning, and like lightning passing away." A parallel case we find in Goldsmith, who passed through an unpromising youth; he declared that he was never attached to the belles-lettres till he was thirty, that poetry had peculiar charms for him till that age, and indeed in his latest hour he was surprising his friends by productions which they had imagined he was incapable of composing. Hume was considered, for his sobriety and asceticism, competent to become a steady merchant; of Johnson it was said that he would never offend in conversation, as Boileau that he had no great understanding, but would speak ill of no one. Farquhar at college was a hard passion, and afterwards, combined, with great knowledge of the world, a light airy talent. Even a discerning parent or master has entirely failed to develop the genius of the youth, who has afterwards ranked among eminent men; and we ought as little to infer from early unfavourable appearances as from inequality of talent. The great Mac Barrow's father used to say, that if it pleased God to take from him any of his children he hoped it might be Mac, as the least promising; and during the three years narrow passed at the Charter-house, he was remarkable for the utter negligence of his studies and his person. The mother of Sheridan, herself a literary female, pronounced early, that he was the dullest and most hopeless of her sons. Bodmer, at the head of the literary class in Switzerland, who had so frequently discovered and animated the literary youths of his country, could never detect the latent genius of Gesner; after a repeated examination of the young man, he put his parents in despair with the hopeless award that a mind of so ordinary a cast must confine itself to mere writing and accomplishments.

Thus it happens that the first years of life do not always include those of genius, and the education of the youth may not be the education of his genius. In all these cases nature had dropt the seeds in the soil, but even a happy disposition must be concealed amidst adverse circumstances. It has happened to some men of genius during a long period of their lives, that an unsettled immobility, without having discovered the objects of its aptitude, a thirst and fever in the temperament of too sensitive being which cannot find the occupation to which it can easily attach itself, has sunk into a melancholy and querulous spirit, weary with the burden of existence; but the instant the latent talent had declared itself, his first work, he eager offspring of desire and love, has astonished the world at once with the birth and the maturity of genius.

Abundant facts exhibit genius unequivocally discovering itself in the juvenile age connecting these facts with the subsequent life—and in general, perhaps a master-mind exhibits precocity. 'Whatever a young man at first applies himself to, is commonly his delight afterwards.' This remark was made by Hartley, who has related an anecdote of the infancy of his genius, which indicated the man. He declared to his daughter that the intention of writing a book upon the nature of man was conceived in his mind when he was a very little boy—when swinging backwards and forwards upon a gate, not more than nine or ten years old; he was then meditating upon the nature of his own mind, how man was made, and for what future end—such was the true origin, in a boy of ten years old, of his celebrated book on the 'frame, the duty, and the expectation of man.' The constitutional propensity has declared itself in painters and poets, who were such before they understood the nature of colours and the arts of verse. The vehement passion of Peiresc for knowledge, according to accounts Gassendi had received from old men who had known him a child, broke out as soon as he had been taught his alphabet; his delight was to be handling books and papers, and his perpetual inquiries after their contents obliged them to invent something to quiet the child's insatiable curiosity, who was offended if told he did not the capacity to understand them. He did not study like ordinary scholars, and would read neither Juvenal nor Ovid without a perpetual consultation of other authors, such was his early love of research! At ten years of age his taste for the studies of antiquity was kindled at the sight of some ancient coin dug up in his neighbourhood; and then that passion began to burn like fire in a breast, as Gassendi most happily describes the fervour and the amplitude of his mind. We have Boccaccio's own words for a proof of his early natural tendency to deep-writing, in a passage of his genealogy of the Gods: 'Before seven years of age, when as yet I had met with no stories, was without a master and hardly knew my letters, I had a natural talent for fiction, and produced some little tales.' Thus the Decamerone was appearing much earlier than we suppose. So Ariosto, as soon as he obtained some knowledge of languages, delighted himself in translating French and Spanish romances; was he not owing plentifully the seeds of his Orlando Furioso? Lope de Vega declares that he was a poet from the cradle, beginning to make verses before he could write them, for he ribbed his school-mates with a morsel of his breakfast to write down the lines he composed in the early morning. Descartes, while yet a boy, was so marked out by habits of deep meditation, that he went among his companions by the title of the philosopher, always questioning, and settling cause and effect. It happened that he was twenty-five years of age before he left the army, but the propensity for meditation had been early formed, and the noble enterprise of reforming philosophy never ceased to inspire his solitary thoughts. Descartes was a man born only for meditation—and he has himself given a very interesting account of the pursuits which occupied his youth, and of the progress of his genius; of that secret struggle he so long held with himself, wandering in concealment over the world, for more than twenty years, and as he says of himself, like the statuary, labouring to draw out a Minerva from the marble block. Michael Angelo, as yet a child wherever he went, busied himself in drawing; and when his noble parents, hurt that a man of genius was disturbing the line of their ancestry, forced him to relinquish the pencil, the infant artist flew to the chisel: art was in his soul and in his hands. Velasquez, the Spanish painter at his school tasks, filled them with sketches and drawings, and as some write their names on their books, his were known by the specimens of his genius. The painter Lanfranco was originally the page of a marquis, who observing that he was perpetually scrawling figures on cards, or with charcoal on the walls, asked the boy whether he would apply to the art he seemed to love? The boy trembled, fearing to have incurred his master's anger; but when encouraged to decide, he did not hesitate: placed under one of the Carraccios, his rapid progress in the art testified how much Lanfranco had suffered by suppressing his natural aptitude. When we find the boy Nanteuil, his parents being averse to their son's practising drawing, hiding himself in a tree to pursue the delightful exercise of his pencil; that Handel, intended for a doctor of the civil laws, and whom no parental discouragement could deprive of his enthusiasm for the musical science, for ever touching harpsichords, and having secretly conveyed a musical instrument to a retired apartment, sitting through the night awakening his harmonious spirit; and when we view Ferguson the child of a peasant, acquiring the art of reading without any one suspecting it, by listening to his father teaching his brother; making a wooden watch without the slightest knowledge of mechanism, and while a shepherd, like an ancient Chaldean, studying the phenomena of the heavens and making a celestial globe, as he had made a wooden watch, can we hesitate to believe that in such minds, there was a resistless and mysterious propensity, growing up with the temperaments of these artists? Ferguson was a shepherd-lad on a plain, placed entirely out of the chance of imitation; or of the influence of casual excitement; or any other of those sources of genius so frequently assigned for its production. The case of Opie is similar.

Yet these cases are not more striking than one related of the Abbé La Caille, who ranked among the first astronomers of the age. La Caille was the son of the parish clerk of a village; at the age of ten years his father sent him every evening to ring the church bell, but the boy always returned home late. His father was angry and beat him, and still the boy returned an hour after he had rung the bell. The father, suspecting something mysterious in his conduct, one evening watched him. He saw his son ascend the steeple, ring the bell as usual, and remain there during an hour. When the unlucky boy descended, he trembled like one caught in the fact, and on his knees confessed that the pleasure he took in watching the stars from the steeple was the real cause of detaining him from home. As the father was not born to be an astronomer, like the son, he flogged the boy severely. The youth was found weeping in the streets, by a man of science, who, when he discovered in a boy of ten years of age, a passion for contemplating the stars at night, and who had discovered an observatory in a steeple, in spite of such ill-treatment, he decided that the seal of nature had impressed itself on the genius of that boy.—Relieving the parent from the son and the son from the parent, he assisted the young La Caille in his passionate pursuit, and the event perfectly justified the prediction. Let others tell us why children feel a predisposition for the studies of astronomy, or natural history, or any similar pursuit. We know that youths have found themselves in parallel situations with Ferguson and La Caille, without experiencing their energies.

The case of Clairon, the great French tragic actress, deserves attention: she seems to have been an actress before she saw a theatre. This female, destined to be a sublime actress, was of the lowest extraction; the daughter of a violent and illiterate woman, who with blows and menaces was driving about the child all day to manual labour. 'I know not,' says Clairon, 'whence I derived my disgust, but I could not bear the idea to be a mere workman, or to remain inactive in a corner.' In her eleventh year, being locked up in a room, as a punishment, with the windows fastened, she climbed upon a chair to look about her. A new object instantly absorbed her attention; in the house opposite she observed a celebrated actress amidst her family, her daughter was performing her dancing lesson; the girl Clairon, the future Melpomene, was struck by the influence of this graceful and affectionate scene. 'All my little being collected itself into my eyes; I lost not a single motion; as soon as the lesson ended all the family applauded and the mother embraced the daughter. That difference of her fate and mine filled me with profound grief, my tears hindered me from seeing any longer, and when the palpitations of my heart allowed me to reascend the chair, all had disappeared.' This was a discovery; from that moment she knew no rest; she rejoiced when she could get her mother to confine her in that room, the happy girl was a divinity to the unhappy one, whose susceptible genius imitated her in every gesture and motion; and Clairon soon showed the effect of her ardent studies, for she betrayed all the graces she had taught herself, in the common intercourse of life; she charmed her friends and even softened her barbarous mother; in a word, she was an actress without knowing what an actress was.

In this case of the use of genius, are we to conclude that the accidental view of a young actress practising her studies, imparted the character of the great tragic actress Clairon? Could a mere chance occurrence have given birth to those faculties which produced a sublime tragedian? In all arts there are talents which may be acquired by imitation and reflection; and thus far may genius be educated, but there are others which are entirely the result of native sensibility, which often secretly torment the possessor, and which may even be lost for the want of development; a state of languor from which many have not recovered. Clairon, before she saw the young actress, and having yet no conception of a theatre, never having entered one, had in her soul that latent faculty which creates a genius of her cast. 'Had I not felt l'oe Dido,' she once exclaimed, 'I could not have thus personified her!'

Some of these facts, we conceive, afford decisive evidence of that instinct in genius, that constitutional propensity in the mind, sometimes called organization, which has inflamed such a war of words by its equivocal term and the ambiguity of its nature; it exists independent of education, and where it is wanting, education can never confer it. Of its mysterious influence we may be ignorant; the effect is more apparent than the cause. It is, however, always working in the character of the chosen mind. In the history of genius, there are unquestionably many secondary causes of considerable influence in developing or even crushing the germ—these have been of late often detected, and sometimes carried even to a ridiculous extreme; but among them none seem more remarkable than the first studies and the first habits.

CHAPTER III.

THE FIRST STUDIES.

The first studies form an epoch in the history of genius, and unquestionably have sensibly influenced its productions. Often have the first impressions stamped a character on the mind adapted to receive one, as often the first step into life has determined its walk. To ourselves, this is a distant period lost in the horizon of our own recollection, and so unobserved by others, that it passes away in neglect.

Many of those peculiarities of men of genius which are not fortunate, and some which have hardened the character in its mould, may be traced to this period. Physicians tell us that there is a certain point in youth at which the constitution is formed, and on which the sanity of life revolves; the character of genius experiences a similar dangerous period. Early bad tastes, early particular habits, early defective instructions, all the egotistical pride of an untamed intellect, are those evil spirits which will dog Genius, to its grave. An early attachment to the works of Sir Thomas Browne produced in Johnson an excessive admiration of that latinised English, which violated the native graces of the language. The first studies Rembrandt affected his after-labours; that peculiar shadow which marks all his pictures originated in the circumstance of his father's mill receiving light from an aperture at the top, which habituated that artist afterwards to view all objects as if seen in that magical light. Wm Pope was a child, he found in his mother's closet a small library of mystical devotion; but it was not suspected if the fact was discovered, that the effusions of love and religion poured forth in his Eloisa were derived from the seraphic raptures of those erotic mystics, who to the end retained a place in his library among the classical books of antiquity. The accidental perusal of Quintus Curtius first made Boyle "in love with other than pedantic books and conjured up in him," as he expresses it, "an unsatisfied appetite of knowledge; so that he thought he owed more to Quintus Curtius than did Alexander." From the perusal of Rycart's folio of Turkish history in childhood the noble and impassioned bard of our times retained those indelible impressions, which gave life and motion to the "Ghaour," the "Corsair," and "Alp." A voyage to the country protracted the scenery. Rycart only communicated the impulse to a mind susceptible of the poetical character; and without this Turkish history we should still have had our poet.

The influence of first studies, in the formation of the character of genius, is a moral phenomenon, which has not sufficiently attracted our notice. Dr. Franklin acquiesces in that when young and wanting books, he accidentally found De Foe's "Essay on Projects," from which vast impressions were derived which afterwards influenced some of the principal events of his life. Rousseau, in early youth, full of his Plutarch, while he was also devouring the trash of romances, could only conceive human nature in the colossal form, or be affected by the intense sensibility of an imagination mastering all his faculties; thinking like a Roman and feeling like a Sybarite. The same circumstance happened to Catharine Macaulay, who herself has told us how she owed the best of her character to the early reading of the Roman historians; but combining Roman admiration with English facts, she violated truth in her English characters, and exaggerated romance in the Roman. But the permanent effect of a solitary bias in the youth of genius, impelling the whole current of his after-life, is strikingly displayed in the remarkable character of Archdeacon Blackburne, the author of the famous "Confessional," and the curious "Memoirs of Hollis," written with such a repulsive fierceness.

I had long considered the character of our archdeacon as a lusus politico et theologicus. Having subscribed to the Articles and enjoying the archdeaconry, he was writing against subscription and the whole hierarchy, with a spirit so irascible and caustic, as if, like Prynne and Bastwick, the archdeacon had already lost both his ears; while his antipathy to monarchy might have done honour to a Roundhead of the Rota Club. The secret of these volcanic explosions was only revealed in a letter accidentally preserved. In the youth of our spirited archdeacon, when fox-hunting was his deepest study, it happened at the house of a relation, that on some rainy day, among other garret lumber, he fell on some worn eaten volumes which had once been the careful collections of his great grandfather, an Oliverian justice. 'These,' says he, 'I conveyed to my lodging-room, and there became acquainted with the manners and principles of many excellent old puritans, and then laid the foundation of my own.' This is the enigma solved! Archdeacon Blackburne, in his reclusion in Yorkshire amidst the Oliverian justice's library, shows that we are in want of a Cervantes, but not of a Quixote, and Yorkshire might yet be as renowned a country as La Mancha; for political romances, it is presumed, may be as fertile of ridicule as any of the fables of chivalry.

Such is the influence through life of those first unobscured impressions on the character of genius, which every author has not recorded.

Education, however indispensable in a cultivated age, produces nothing on the side of genius, and where education ends often genius begins. Gray was asked if he recollected when he first felt the strong predilection to poetry; he replied, that "he believed it was when he began to read Virgil for his own amusement, and not in school hours as a task." Such is the force of self-education in genius, that the celebrated physiologist, John Hunter, who a entirely self-educated, evinced such penetration in his anatomical discoveries, that his sensible biographer observes,—“he has brought into notice passages from writing he was unable to read, and which had been overlooked by profound scholars.”* That the education of genius must be its own work, we appeal to every one of the family; it is not always fortunate, for many die amidst a waste of talents and the clogs of their mind.

Has felt the influence of malignant star.

Beattie.

An unfavourable position in society is an usual obstruction in the course of this self-education; and a man of mine, through half his life, has held a contest with a bad, with no education. There is a race of the late-taught, so, with a capacity of leading in the first rank, are mortals to discover themselves only on a level with their contemporaries. Winkleman, who passed his youth in secure misery as a village schoolmaster, paints feelings rich strikingly contrast with his avocations. “I formerly filled the office of a schoolmaster with the greatest actuality, and I taught the A, B, C, to children with thy heads; at the moment, I was aspiring after the knowledge of the beautiful, and meditating, low to myself, the smiles of Homer; then I said to myself, as I still say, ‘Peace, my soul, thy strength shall surmount thy ills.’” The obstructions of so unhappy a self-education mentally injured his ardent genius; and his secret sorrow was long, at this want of early patronage and those accoutred habits of life. “I am unfortunately one of those born the Greeks named ουκ αμαρτι; vere sapientes, the late-learned, for I have appeared too late in the world and in Italy. To have done something, it was necessary that I should have had an education analogous to my pursuits, and is at your age.” This class of the late learned, which Winkleman notices, is a useful distinction; it is so with a later-art: one of the greatest musicians of our country assures me, that the ear is as latent with many; there is the late-learned even in the musical world. Budaus declared he was both ‘self-taught and late-taught.’

The self-educated are marked by strong peculiarities. Their minds are rich in acquisition, they often want taste and the art of communication; their knowledge, like corn saped in a granary, for want of ventilation and stirring, crishes in its own masses. They may abound with talent in all shapes, but rarely in its place, and they have to read a plethora of genius, and a delirium of wit. They sometimes improve amazingly; their source turbid and obscure, works itself clear at last, and the stream runs and ven sparkles. Those men at first were pushed on by their native energy; at length, they obtain the secret to conduct their genius, which before had conducted them. Sometimes the greater portion of their lives is passed before they can throw themselves out of that world of mediocrity to which they had been confined; their first work is not announced, genius, and their last is stamped with it. Men are long judged by their first work: it takes a long while after they have surpassed themselves before it is discovered. This race of the self-educated are apt to consider some of their own insulated feelings those of all; their prejudices are often invincible, and their tastes unreason and capricious: glorying in their strength, while they are betraying their weakness, yet mightily even in that enthusiasm which is only disciplined by its own fierce habits. Bunyan is the Spenser of the people. The fire burned upwards heaven, although the altar was rude and rustic.

Barry, the painter, has left behind him works not to be turned over by the connoisseur by rote, nor the artist who are not be just and will not suffer even the infirmities of genius to be buried in its grave. That enthusiast, with a temper of mind resembling Rousseau’s, the same creature of imagination, consumed by the same passions, with the same fine intellect disordered, and the same fortitude of soul, found his self-taught pen, like his pencil, betray his genius. A vehement enthusiasm breaks through his ill-composed words, throwing the sparkle of his bold and rich conceptions, so philosophical and magnificent, into the soul of the youth of genius. When in his character of professor, he delivered his lectures at the academy, he never ceased speaking but his auditors rose in a tumult, while their hands returned to him the proud feelings he adored. The self-educated and gifted man, once listening to the children of genius, whom he had created about him, exclaimed, ‘Go it, go it, my boys! they did so at Athens.’ Thus high could he throw up his native mud into the very heaven of his invention!

But even the pages of Barry are the aliment of young genius: before we can discern the beautiful, must we not be endowed with the susceptibility of love? Must not the disposition be formed before even the object appears? The uneducated Barry is the higher priest of enthusiasm than the educated Reynolds. I have witnessed the young artist of genius glow and start over the reveries of Barry, but pause and meditate, and inquire over the mature elegance of Reynolds; in the one, he caught the passion for beauty, and in the other, he discovered the beautiful: with the one he was warm and restless, and with the other calm and satisfied.

Of the difficulties overcome in the self-education of genius, we have a remarkable instance in the character of Moses Mendelssohn, on whom literary Germany has bestowed the honourable title of the Jewish Socrates.* Such were the apparent invincible obstructions which barred out Mendelssohn from the world of literature and philosophy, that, in the history of men of genius, it is something like taking in the history of man, the savage of Aveyron from his woods,—who, destitute of a human language, should at length create a model of eloquence; without a faculty of conceiving a figure, should be capable to add to the demonstrations of Euclid; and without a complex idea and with few sensations, should at length, in the sublimest strain of metaphysics, open to the world a new view of the immortality of the soul!

Mendelssohn, the son of a poor rabbin, in a village in Germany, received an education completely rabbinical, and its nature must be comprehended, or the term of education would be misunderstood. The Israelites in Poland and Germany live, with all the restrictions of their ceremonial law, in an insulated state, and are not always instructed in the language of the country of their birth. They employ for their common intercourse a barbarous or patois Hebrew, while the sole studies of the young rabbins are strictly confined to the Talmud, of which the fundamental principle, like the Sonna of the Turks, is a pious rejection of every species of uninspired learning. This ancient jealous spirit, which walls in the understanding and the faith of man, was shutting out what the imitative Catholics afterwards called heresy. It is, then, these numerous folios of the Talmud which the true Hebraic student contemplates through all the seasons of life, as the Patuecos in their low valley imagine their surrounding mountains to be the confines of the universe.

Of such a nature was the plan of Mendelssohn’s first studies; but even in his boyhood this conflict of study occasioned an agitation of his spirits, which affected his life ever after; rejecting the Talmudical dreamers he caught a nobler spirit from the celebrated Maimonides; and his native sagacity was already clearing up the darkness around. An enemy not less hostile to the enlargement of mind than voluminous legends, presented itself in the indigence of his father, who was now compelled to send away the youth on foot to Berlin to find labour and bread.

At Berlin he becomes an amanuensis to another poor rabbin, who could only still initiate him into the theology, the jurisprudence and scholastic philosophy of his people. Thus he was no farther advanced in that philosophy of the mind in which he was one day to be the rival of Plato and Locke, nor in that knowledge of literature of which he was to be among the first polished critics of Germany.

Some unexpected event occurs which gives the first great impulse to the mind of genius. Mendelssohn received this from the first companion of his misery and his studies, a man of congenial, but maturer powers. He was a Polish Jew, expelled from the communion of the Orthodox, and the calumniated student was now a vagrant, with

* I composed the life of Mendelssohn so far back as in 1778, for a periodical publication, whence our late biographers have drawn their notices; a juvenile production, which happened to excite the attention of the late Barry, then not personally known to me, and he has given all the immortality his poetical pencil could bestow on this man of genius, by immediately placing in his elysium of genius, Moses Mendelssohn shaking hands with Addison, who wrote on the truth of the Christian religion, and near Locke, the English master of Mendelssohn’s mind.

* Life of John Hunter, by Dr Adams, p. 59, where the case is curiously illustrated.

more sensibility than fortitude. But this vagrant was a philosopher, a poet, a naturalist and a mathematician. Mendelssohn, at a distant day, never alluded to him without tears. Thrown together into the same situation, they approached each other by the same sympathies, and communicating in the only language which Mendelssohn knew, the Polander voluntarily undertook his literary education.

Then was seen one of the most extraordinary spectacles in the history of modern literature. Two houseless Hebrew youths might be discovered, in the moonlight streets of Berlin, sitting in retired corners, or on the steps of some porch, the one instructing the other, with an Euclid in his hand; but what is more extraordinary, it was a Hebrew version, composed by himself, for one who knew no other language. Who could then have imagined that the future Plato of Germany was sitting on those steps!

The Polander, whose deep melancholy had settled on his heart, died—yet he had not lived in vain, since the electric spark that lighted up the soul of Mendelssohn had fallen from his own.

Mendelssohn was now left alone; his mind teeming with its chaos, and still master of no other language than that barren idiom which was incapable of expressing the ideas he was meditating on. He had scarcely made a step into the philosophy of his age, and the genius of Mendelssohn had probably been lost to Germany, had not the singularity of his studies and the cast of his mind been detected by the sagacity of Dr Kisch. The aid of this physician was momentous; for he devoted several hours every day to the instruction of a poor youth, whose strong capacity he had the discernment to perceive, and the generous temper to aid. Mendelssohn was soon enabled to read Locke in a Latin version, but with such extreme pain, that, compelled to search for every word, and to arrange their Latin order, and at the same time to combine metaphysical ideas, it was observed that he did not so much translate, as guess by the force of meditation.

This prodigious effort of his intellect retarded his progress, but invigorated his habit, as the racer, by running against the hill, at length courses with facility.

A succeeding effort was to master the living languages, and chiefly the English, that he might read his favourite Locke in his own idiom. Thus a great genius for metaphysics and languages was forming itself by itself.

It is curious to detect, in the character of genius, the effects of local and moral influences. There resulted from Mendelssohn's early situation, certain defects in his intellectual character, derived from his poverty, his Jewish education, and his numerous impediments in literature. Inheriting but one language, too obsolete and naked to serve the purposes of modern philosophy, he perhaps overvalued his new acquisitions, and in his delight of knowing many languages, he with difficulty escaped from remaining a mere philologist; while in his philosophy, having adopted the prevailing principles of Wolf and Baumgarten, his genius was long without the courage or the skill to emancipate itself from their rusty chains. It was more than a step which had brought him into their circle, but a step was yet wanted to escape from it.

At length the mind of Mendelssohn enlarged in literary intercourse; he became a great and original thinker in many beautiful speculations in moral and critical philosophy; while he had gradually been creating a style which the critics of Germany have declared was their first luminous model of precision and elegance. Thus a Hebrew vagrant, first perplexed in the voluminous labyrinth of Judicial learning, in his middle age oppressed by indigence and malady, and in his mature life wrestling with that commercial station whence he derived his humble independence, became one of the masterwriters in the literature of his country. The history of the mind of Mendelssohn is one of the noblest pictures of the self-education of genius.

Friends who are so valuable in our youth, are usually prejudicial in the youth of genius. Peculiar and unfortunate in this state, which is put in danger from what in every other it derives security. The greater part of the multitude of authors and artists originate in the ignorant admiration of their early friends; while the real genius has often been disconcerted and thrown into despair, by the ill-judgments of his domestic circle. The productions of taste are more unfortunate than those which depend on a chain of reasoning, or the detail of facts; these are more palpable to the common judgments of men; but taste is of such rarity, that a long life may be passed by some without once obtaining a familiar acquaintance with a mind so cultivated by knowledge, so tried by experience, and so practised by converse with the literary world that its poetic feeling anticipates the public opinion. When a young writer's first essay is shown, some, through his inability of censure, see nothing but beauties; others, of equal imbecility, can see none; and others, out of jealousy, see nothing but faults. 'I was soon disgusted,' says Gibbon, 'with the modest practice of reading to manuscript to my friends. Of such friends some will praise for politeness, and some will criticize for vanity.' But several of our first writers set their fortunes on the cast of their friends' opinions, we might have lost some precious compositions. The friends of Thomson discovered as thing but faults in his early productions, one of which happened to be his noblest, the 'Winter'; they just could discern that these abounded with luxuriances, without being aware that they were the luxuriances of a poet. He had created a new school in art—and appealed from his circle to the public. From a manuscript letter of our poet's, written when employed on his 'Summer,' I transcribe his sentiments on his former literary friends in Scotland—he is writing to Mallet:—'Far from defending them two lines, I damn them to the lowest depth of the poetical Tophet, prepared of old, for Mitchell, Morrice, Rask, Cook, Beckingham, and a long &c. Wherever I have evidence, or think I have evidence, which is the same thing, I'll be as obstinate as all the mules in Persia.' The poet, of warm affections, so irritably felt the perverse criticisms of his learned friends, that they were to share also nothing less than a damnation to a poetical hell. One of these 'blasts' broke out in a vindictive epigram on Mitchell, whom he describes with a 'blasted eye'; but this criticism having one literally, the poet, to avoid a personal reflection, could only consent to make the blemish more acute:

'Why all not faults, injurious Mitchell! why Appears one beauty to thy blasting eye?'

He again calls him 'the planet-blasted Mitchell!' Of another of these critical friends he speaks with more candour, but with a strong conviction that the critic, a very sensible man, had no sympathy with his poet. 'Adam's reflections on my writings are very good, but he does not in them regard the turn of my genius enough; should I alter my way I would write poorly. I must choose what appears to me the most significant epithet, or I cannot, with any heart, proceed.' The 'Mirror,' when published in Edinburgh, was 'fastidiously' received, as all 'home-productions' are; but London avenged the cause of the author. When Swift introduced Parnell to Lord Bolingbroke, and to the world, he observes, in his Journal, 'it is pleasant to see one who hardly passed for any thing in Ireland, make his way here with a little friendly forwarding.' There is nothing more trying to the judgment of the friends of a young man of genius, than the invasion of a new manner; without a standard to appeal to, without bladders to swim, the ordinary critic sinks into irretrievable distress; but usually pronounces against sobriety. When Reynolds returned from Italy, warm with all the excellence of his art, says Mr Northcote, and painted a portrait, his old master, Hudson, viewing it, and perceiving no trace of his own manner, exclaimed that he did not paint so well as when he left England; while another, who conceived no higher excellence than Kneller, treated with signal contempt the future Raphael of England.

If it be dangerous for a young writer to resign himself to the opinions of his friends, he also incurs some peril in passing them with inattention. What an embarrassment! He wants a Quintilian. One great means to obtain such an invaluable critic, is the cultivation of his own judgment, in a round of meditation and reading; let him at once supply the marble and be himself the sculptor: let the great authors of the world be his gospels, and the best critics their expounders; from the one he will draw inspiration, and from the others he will supply those tardy discoveries in art, which he who solely depends on his own experience may obtain too late in life. Those who do not read criticism will not even merit to be criticised. The more extensive an author's knowledge of what has been done, the greater will be his powers in knowing what to do. Let him preserve his juvenile compositions, whatever these may be, they are the spontaneous growth, and like the plants of the Alps, not always found in other soils; they are his virgin fancies; by contemplating them, he may detect some of his predominant habits,—recesses in manner more happily,—invent novelty from an old jet he had so rudely designed,—and often may steal in himself something so fine that, when thrown into his finished compositions, it may seem a happiness rather than art. A young writer in the progress of his study, should often recollect a fanciful simile of Dryden.—

* In Mr Murray's collection of autographical leaves.

‘As those who unripe veins in mines explore,
On the rich bed again the warm turf lay;
Till time digests the yet imperfect ore,
And know it will be Gold another day.’

‘ingenious youth! if, in a constant perusal of the master-titles, you see your own sentiments anticipated, and in tumult of your mind as it comes in contact with theirs, ones arise; if in meditating on the Confessions of Rousseau, or on those of every man of genius, for they read all their confessions, you recollect that you have experienced the same sensations from the same circumstances, and that you have encountered the same difficulties and overcome them by the same means, then let not your courage be lost in your admiration,—but listen to that ill small voice’ in your heart, which cries with Correggio and with Montesquieu, ‘Ed io anche son Pittore!’”

CHAPTER IV.

OF THE IRRITABILITY OF GENIUS.

The modes of life of a man of genius, often tinged by eccentricity and enthusiasm, are in an eternal conflict with the monotonous and imitative habits of society, as society carried on in a great metropolis,—where men are necessarily alike, and in perpetual intercourse, shaping themselves to one another.

The occupations, the amusements, and the ardour of a man of genius, are discordant with the artificial habits of life; in the vortexes of business or the world of pleasures, crowds of human beings are only treading in one another’s steps; the pleasures and the sorrows of this dense multitude are not his, while he is not obvious to one: Genius in society is therefore often in a state of suffering. Professional characters, who are themselves so ten literary, yielding to their predominant interests, conform to that assumed urbanity which levels them with ordinary minds; but the man of genius cannot leave himself behind in the cabinet he quits; the train of his thoughts is not stopt at will, and in the range of conversation the habits of his mind will prevail; an excited imagination, a high mood feeling, a wandering reverie, a restlessness of temper, are perpetually carrying him out of the professional se of the mere conversationists. He is, like all solitary things, much too sentient, and prepares for defence even to a random touch. His emotions are rapid, his generalising views take things only in masses, while he treats with levity some useful prejudices; he interrogates, he rebuts, he is caustic; in a word, he thinks he converses, while he is at his studies. Sometimes, apparently a complacent listener, we are mortified by detecting the absent man; now he appears humbled and spiritless, ruminating over some failure which probably may be only known to himself, and now haughty and hardy for a triumph he has gained, which yet remains as secret to the world. He is sometimes insolent, and sometimes querulous. He is stung by jealousy; or he writhes in aversion; his eyes inflame, and his teeth gnash; a fever shakes his spirit; a fever which has sometimes generated a disease, and has even produced a slight perturbation of the faculties.†

Once we were nearly receiving from the hand of genius itself, the most curious sketches of the temper, the irascible humours, the delicacy of soul even to its shadowiness, from the warm abozzo of Burns when he began a diary of his heart,—a narrative of characters and events, and a chronology of his emotions. It was natural for such a creature of sensation and passion to project such a regular task; but quite impossible to get through it. The paper-book that he conceived would have recorded all these things, therefore turns out but a very imperfect document. Even that little it was not thought proper to give entire. Yet there we view a warm original mind, when he first stepped into the polished circles of society, discovering that he could no longer ‘pour out his bosom, his every thought and floating fancy, his very inmost soul, with unreserved confidence to another, without hazard of losing part of that respect which man deserves from man; or, from the unavoidable imperfections attending human nature, of one day repenting his confidence.’ This was the first lesson he learnt at Edinburgh, and it was as a substitute for such a human being, that he bought a paper-book to keep under lock and key; a security at least equal, says he, ‘to the bosom of any friend whatever.’ Let the man of genius pause over the fragments of this ‘paper-book;’ it will instruct as much as any open confession of a criminal at the moment he is to suffer. No man was more afflicted with that miserable pride, the infirmity of men of imagination, which exacts from its best friends a perpetual reverence and acknowledgment of its powers. Our Poet, with all his gratitude and veneration for ‘the noble Glenclairn,’ was ‘wounded to the soul’ because his Lordship showed ‘so much attention, engrossing attention, to the only blockhead at table; the whole company consisted of his Lordship, Dunderrate, and myself.’ This Dunderrate, who dined with Lord Glenclairn, might have been of more importance to the world than even a poet; one of the best and most useful men in it. Burns was equally offended with another of his patrons, and a literary brother, Dr. Blair. At the moment, he too appeared to be neglecting the irritable Poet—‘for the mere carcass of greatness—or when his eye measured the difference of their point of elevation; I say to myself, with scarcely any emotion, (he might have added, except a good deal of contempt,) ‘what do I care for him or his pomp either?’—Dr. Blair’s vanity is proverbially known among his acquaintance,’ adds Burns, at the moment that the solitary haughtiness of his own genius had entirely escaped his self-observation. Such are the chimeras of passion infesting the distempered imagination of irritable genius!

Such therefore are censured for great irritability of disposition; and that happy equality of temper so prevalent among mere men of letters,* and which is conveniently acquired by men of the world, has been usually refused to great mental powers, or to vivacious dispositions; authors or artists. The man of wit becomes petulant, and the profound thinker, morose.

When Rousseau once retired to a village, he had to endure its conversation; for this purpose he was compelled to invent an expedient to get rid of his uneasy sensations. ‘Alone,’ says Rousseau, ‘I have never known ennui, even when perfectly unoccupied; my imagination, filling the void, was sufficient to busy me. It is only the inactive chit-chat of the room, when every one is seated face to face, and only moving their tongues, which I never could support. There to be a fixture, nailed with one hand on the other, to settle the state of the weather, or watch the flies about one, or what is worse, to be bandying compliments, this to me is not bearable.’ He hit on the expedient of making lace-strings, carrying his working cushion in his visits, to keep the peace with the country goseips.

Is the occupation of making a great name less anxious and precarious than that of making a great fortune? the progress of a man’s capital is unequivocal to him, but that of the fame of an author, or an artist, is for the greater part of their lives of an ambiguous nature. They find it in one place, and they lose it in another. We may often smile at the local gradations of genius; the esteem in which an author is held here, and the contempt he encounters there; here the learned man is condemned as a heavy drone, and there the man of wit annoys the unwitty listener.

And are not the anxieties, of even the most successful, renewed at every work? often quitted in despair, often returned to with rapture; the same agitation of the spirits, the same poignant delight, the same weariness, the same dissatisfaction, the same querulous languishment after excellence. Is the man of genius a discoverer? the discovery is contested, or it is not comprehended for ten years after, or during his whole life; even men of science are as

* The class of Literary Characters whom I would distinguish as Men of Letters, are described under that title in this volume.

† I have given a history of Literary Quarrels from personal motives, in Quarrels of Authors, vol. iii, p. 285. There we find how many controversies, in which the public get involved, have sprung from some sudden squabble, some neglect of petty civility, some unlucky epithet, or some casual observation dropped without much consideration, which mortified or enraged an author. See further symptoms of this disease, at the close of the chapter on ‘Self-praise,’ in the present work.

children before him. There is a curious letter in Sir Thomas Bodley's Remains to Lord Bacon, then Sir Francis, where he remonstrates with Bacon on his new mode of philosophizing. It seems the fate of all originality of thinking to be immediately opposed; no contemporary seems equal to its comprehension. Bacon was not at all understood at home in his own day; his celebrity was confined to his History of Henry VII., and to his Essays. In some unpublished letters I find Sir Edward Coke writing very miserable, but very bitter verses, on a copy of the Instauration presented to him by Bacon, and even James I., declaring that, like God's power, 'it passeth beyond all understanding.' When Kepler published his work on Comets, the first rational one, it was condemned even by the learned themselves as extravagant. We see the learned Selden signing his recantation; and long afterwards the propriety of his argument on Tithes fully allowed; the aged Galileo on his knees, with his hand on the Gospels, abjuring, as absurdities, errors, and heresies, the philosophical truths he had ascertained. Harvey, in his eightieth year, did not live to witness his great discovery established. Adam Smith was reproached by the economists for having borrowed his system from them, as if the mind of genius does not borrow little parts to create its own vast views. The great Sydenham, by the independence and force of his genius, so highly provoked the malignant emulation of his rivals, that they conspired to have him banished out of the College as 'guilty of medicinal heresy.' Such is the fate of men of genius, who advance a century beyond their contemporaries!

Is our man of genius a learned author? Erudition is a thirst which its fountains have never satiated. What volumes remain to open! What manuscript but makes his heart palpitate! There is no measure, no term in researches, which every new fact may alter, and a date may dissolve. Truth! thou fascinating, but severe mistress! thy adorers are often broken down in thy servitude, performing a thousand unregarded task-works; or now winding thee through thy labyrinth, with a single thread often unravelling, and now feeling their way in darkness, doubtful if it be thyself they are touching. The man of erudition, after his elaborate work, is exposed to the fatal omissions of wearied vigilance, or the accidental knowledge of some inferior mind, and always to the taste, whatever it chance to be, of the public.

The favourite work of Newton was his Chronology, which he wrote over fifteen times; but desisted from its publication during his life-time, from the ill usage he had received, of which he gave several instances to Pearce, the Bishop of Rochester. The same occurred to Sir John Marsham, who found himself accused as not being friendly to revelation. When the learned Pocock published a specimen of his translation of Abulpharagius, an Arabian historian, in 1649, it excited great interest, but when he published his complete version, in 1663, it met with no encouragement; in the course of those thirteen years, the genius of the times had changed; oriental studies were no longer in request. Thevenot then could not find a book-seller in London or at Amsterdam to print his Abulfeda, nor another, learned in Arabian lore, his history of Saladine.

† Endowed with a courage at all proofs, with health, which ill then was unaltered, and with excess of labour has greatly changed, I devoted myself to write the lives of the learned, of the sixteenth century. Renouncing all kinds of pleasure, working ten to twelve hours a day, extracting, ceaselessly crying; after this sad life, I now wished to draw breath turn over what I had amassed, and arrange it. I found myself possessed of many thousands of bulletins, of which the longest did not exceed many lines. At the sight of this frightful chaos, from which I was to form a regular history, I must confess that I shuddered; I felt myself for some time in a stupor and depression of spirits; and now actually that I have finished this work, I cannot endure the recollection of that moment of alarm, without a feeling of involuntary terror. What a business is this, good God, of a compiler! In truth it is too much condemned; it merits some regard. At length I regained courage, I returned to my researches: I have completed my plan, though every day I was forced to add, to correct, to change my facts as well as my ideas: six times has my hand recopied my work, and however fatiguing this may be, it certainly is not that portion of my task which has cost me most.

The reputation of a writer of taste is subjected to difficulties than any other. Every day we observe work of genius, that those parts which have all the assent of the soil, and as such are most liked by its adepts are the most criticised. Modest critics shelter themselves under that general amnesty too freely granted, that are allowed to differ; but we should approximate nearer to the truth if we say that but few of mankind are capable of relishing the beautiful, with that enlarged view which comprehends all the forms of feeling which may assume; forms which may even at times be associated with defects. Would our author delight in the style of taste, of imagination, of passion? a path strewn with roses, but his feet bleed on their thorns. A man of genius composes in a state of actual emotion, and the magic of his style consists in the movements of the soul, but the art of conducting movements is separate from the feeling which moves them. The idea in the mind is not always to be under the pen. The artist's conception often lies not in his pencil. He toils, and repeatedly toils, to get into our minds that sympathy with which we lose the illusion of his pages, and become himself. An author is a great artist; if the hand cannot leave the picture, how much beauty will he undo! yet still he is feeling, still strengthening the weak, still subduing the doubtful, still searching for that single idea which awakens others, while often, as it once happened, the despair hangs the foam on the horse's nostrils. The art of composition is of such slow attainment, that a man of genius, late in life, may discover how its secret consists in itself in the habit. When Fox meditated on a history which should last with the language, he met his criticism in this new province: the rapidity and the force of elocution were extinguished by a pen unconcerned with long and previous study; he saw that he could not do with the great historians of every great people; he complained, while he mourned over the fragment of power which, after such zealous preparation, he dared not complete! Rousseau has glowingly described the constant inquietude by which he obtained the seductive eloquence of his style, and has said that with whatever talent a man may be born, the art of writing is not easily obtained. His existing manuscripts display more erasures than Pope's and show his eagerness to set down his first thoughts and his art to raise them to the impassioned style of his imagination. The memoir of Gibbon was composed seven or nine times, and after all, was left unfinished. Burns' anxiety in finishing his poems was great; 'all my poetry,' says he, 'is the effect of easy composition, but of laborious correction.'

Pope, when employed on the Iliad, found it not only occupy his thoughts by day, but haunting his dreams by night, and once wished himself hanged, to get rid of Homer: and that he experienced often such literary agonies witness his description of the depressions and distractions of genius,

Who pants for glory, finds but short repose,
A breath revives him, or a breath o'erthrows him."

Thus must the days of a great author be passed in a hours as unremitting and exhausting as those of the artisan. The world is not always aware, that to some meditation, composition, and even conversation, may be fictitious pains undetected by the eye and the tenderness of friendship. Whenever Rousseau passed a morning in company, he tells us it was observed that in the evening he was dissatisfied and distressed; and John Hunter, in a mixed company, found conversation fatigued, instead of amusing him. Hawksworth, in the second paper of the Adventurer, has composed, from his own feelings, an eloquent comparative estimate of intellectual and corporeal labour; it may console the humble mechanic.

The anxious uncertainty of an author for his compositions resembles that of a lover when he has written his mistress, not yet decided on his claims: he repeats his labour, for he thinks he has written too much, while he is mortified at recollecting that he had omitted some thing which he imagines would have secured the object of his wishes. Madame de Staël, who has often entered into feelings familiar to a literary and political family, in a parallel between ambition with genius, has distinguished them in this, that while 'ambition perverts in the dream of acquiring power, genius flages of itself. Genius in the midst of society is a pain, an internal fever which weak ture to be treated as a real disease, if the records of it could not soften the sufferings it produces.' These moments of anxiety often darken the brightest rays of genius. Racine had extreme sensibility; he was afflicted by a severe criticism outweighed all the applause he received. He seems to have felt, what he was reproached with, that his Greeks, his Jews, and his Romans were all inmates of Versailles. He had two critics, who, like our Dennis with Pope and Addison, regularly logged his pieces as they appeared. Corneille's object he would attribute to jealousy—at his burlesqued comedies at the Italian theatre, he would smile outwardly, then sick at heart,—but his son informs us, that a stroke of satire from his witty friend Chapelle, whose pleasant sarcasm scarcely concealed its bitterness, sunk more deeply into his heart than the burlesques at the Italian theatre, the test of Corneille, and the iteration of the two Dennises. The life of Tasso abounds with pictures of a complete execution of this kind; his contradictory critics had persecuted him with the most intricate literary discussions, and finally occasioned a mental alienation. We find in one of his letters that he repents the composition of his great Jerusalem, for although his own taste approved of that masterpiece, which still forms the nobler part of its creation, yet he confesses that his critics have decided that the history of the hero Godfrey required another species of conduct. Hence, cries the unhappy bard, 'doubts vex me; but the past and what is done, I know of no remedy; and I long to precipitate the publication that he may be delivered from misery and agony.' He solemnly swears that 'did not the circumstances of my situation compel me, would not print it, even perhaps during my life, I so much doubt of its success.' Such was that painful state of fear and doubt, experienced by the author of the 'Jerusalem Delivered' when he gave it to the world; a state of suspense, among the children of imagination, of which we are more liable to participate in, than the too sensible artist. At Florence may still be viewed the many works begun and abandoned by the genius of Michael Angelo; they are preserved inviolate; 'so sacred is the terror of Michael Angelo's genius!' exclaims Forsyth. Yet these works are not always to be considered as failures of the chisel; they appear rather to have been rejected by missing short of the artist's first conceptions. An interesting domestic story has been preserved of Gesner, who so valiantly devoted his graver and his pencil to the arts, but whose sensibility was ever struggling after that ideal excellence he could not attain; often he sunk into fits of melancholy, and gentle as he was, the tenderness of his wife and friends could not soothe his distressed feelings; it was necessary to abandon him to his own thoughts, till after a long abstinence from his neglected works, in a lucid moment, some accident occasioned him to return to them. One of these hypochondria of genius, after a long interval of despair, one morning at breakfast with his wife, his eye fixed on one of his pictures; it was a group of fauns with young shepherds dancing at the entrance of a cavern shaded with vines; his eye appeared at length to glisten; and a sudden return to good humour broke out in this lively apostrophe, 'Ah! see those playful children, they always annoy me!' This was the moment of gaiety and inspiration, and he flew to his forsaken easel.

La Harpe, an author by profession, observes, that as it has been shown, that there are some maladies peculiar to artists,—there are also sorrows which are peculiar to them, and which the world can neither pity nor soften, because they do not enter into their experience. The questionable language of so many men of genius has been sometimes attributed to causes very different from the real ones,—the most fortunate live to see their talents contested and their best works decried. An author with certain critics seems much in the situation of Benedict, when he exclaimed—'Hang me in a bottle, like a cat, and boot at me; and he that hits me, let him be clapped on the shoulder, and called Adam!' Assuredly many an author has sunk into his grave without the consciousness of having obtained that fame for which he had in vain sacrificed an arduous life. The too feeling Smollet has left this testimony to posterity. 'Had some of those, who are pleased to call themselves my friends, been at any time to deserve the character, and told me ingeniously that I had to expect in the capacity of an author, I should at all probability, have spared myself the incredible labour and chagrin I have since undergone.' And Smollet was a popular writer! Pope's solemn declaration in the preface to his collected works comes by no means short of Smollet's avowal. Hume's philosophical indifference could often suppress that irritability which Pope and Smollet fully indulged. But were the feelings of Hume more obtuse, or did his temper, gentle as it was constitutionally, bear, with a saintly patience, the mortifications his literary life so long endured? After recomposing two of his works, which incurred the same neglect in their altered form, he raised the most sanguine hopes of his history,—but he tells us, 'miserable was my disappointment!' The reasoning Hume once proposed changing his name and his country, and although he never deigned to reply to his opponents, yet they haunted him; and an eye-witness has thus described the irritated author discovering in conversation his suppressed resentment.—'His forcible mode of expression, the brilliant quick movements of his eyes, and the gestures of his body,—these betrayed the pangs of contempt, or of aversion! Erasmus once resolved to abandon for ever his favourite literary pursuits; 'if this,' he exclaimed, alluding to his adversaries, 'if this be the fruits of all my youthful labours!'—

Parties confederate against a man of genius, as happened to Corneille, to D'Avenant, and Milton, and a Pradon and a Settle carry away the meed of a Racine and a Dryden. It was to support the drooping spirit of his friend Racine on the opposition raised against Phædra, that Boileau addressed to him an epistle on the utility to be drawn from the jealousy of the envious. It was more to the world than to his country, that Lord Bacon appealed, by a frank and noble conception in his will,—'For my name and memory, I leave it to men's charitable speeches, and to foreign nations, and the next age.' The calm dignity of the historian De Thou, amidst the passions of his times, confidently expected that justice from posterity which his own age refused to his early and his late labour: that great man was, however, compelled, by his injured feelings, to compose a poem, under the name of another, to serve as his apology against the intolerant Court of Rome, and the factious politicians of France; it was a noble subterfuge to which a great genius was forced. The acquaintances of the poet Collins probably complained of his wayward humours and irritability; but how could they sympathize with the secret mortification of the poet for having failed in his Pastorals, imagining that they were composed on wrong principles; or with a secret agony of soul, burning with his own hands his unsold, but immortal Odes? Nor must we forget here the dignified complaint of the Rambler, with which he awfully closes his work, in appealing to posterity.

In its solitary occupations, genius contracts its peculiarities, and in that sensibility which accompanies it, that loftiness of spirit, those quick jealousies, those excessive affections and aversions, which view every thing, as it passes in its own ideal world, and rarely as it exists in the mediocrity of reality. This irritability of genius is a malady which has raged even among philosophers: we must not, therefore, be surprised at the poetical temperament. They have abandoned their country, they have changed their name, they have punished themselves with exile in the rage of their disorder. Descartes sought in vain, even in his secreted life, a refuge for his genius; he thought himself persecuted in France, he thought himself calumniated among strangers, and he went and died in Sweden; and little did that man of genius think, that his countrymen, would beg to have his ashes restored to them. Hume once proposed to change his name and country, and I believe did. The great poetical genius of our times has openly alienated himself from the land of his brothers; he becomes immortal in the language of a people whom he would contemn; he accepts with ingratitude the fame he loves more than life, and he is only truly great who on that spot of earth, whose genius, when he is no more, will contemplate on his shade in anger and in sorrow.

Thus, the state of authorship is not friendly to equality of temper; and in those various humours incidental to it, when authors are often affected deeply, while the cause escapes all perception of sympathy, at those moments the lightest injury to the feelings, which at another time would make no impression, may produce even fury in the warm temper, or the corroding chagrin of a self wounded spirit. These are moments which claim the tenderness of friendship, animated by a high esteem for the intellectual excellence of this man of genius,—not the general intercourse of society;—not the insensibility of the dull, nor the levity of the volatile.

* See 'Quarrels of Authors,' Vol. II. on the consideration of several wits against D'Avenant, a great genius.

Men of genius are often revered only where they are known by their writings; intellectual beings in the romance of life,—in its history, they are men! Erasmus compared them to the great figures in tapestry-work, which lose their effect when not seen at a distance. Their foibles and their infirmities are obvious to their associates, often only capable of discerning these qualities. The defects of great men are the consolation of the dunces.

CHAPTER V.

THE SPIRIT OF LITERATURE AND THE SPIRIT OF SOCIETY.

When a general intercourse in society prevails, the age of great genius has passed; and equality of talents rages among a multitude of authors and artists; they have extended the superficies of genius, but have lost the intensity; the contest is more furious, but victory is more rare. The founders of National Literature and Art pursued their insulated studies in the full independence of their mind and the development of their inventive faculty. The master-spirits who create an epoch, the inventors, lived at periods when they inherited nothing from their predecessors; in seclusion they stood apart, the solitary lights of their age.

At length, when a people have emerged to glory, and a silent revolution has obtained, by a more uniform light of knowledge coming from all sides, the genius of society becomes greater than the genius of the individual: hence, the character of genius itself becomes subordinate. A conversation age succeeds a studious one, and the family of genius are no longer recluses.

The man of genius is now trammelled with the artificial and mechanical forms of life; and in too close an intercourse with society, the loneliness and raciness of thinking is modified away in its seductive conventions. An excessive indulgence in the pleasures of social life constitutes the great interests of a luxurious and opulent age.

It may be a question whether the literary man and the artist are not immolating their genius to society, when, with the mockery of Proteus, they lose their own by all forms, in the shadowiness of assumed talent. But a path of roses, where all the senses are flattered, is now opened to win an Epictetus from his hut. The morning lounge, the luxurious dinner, and the evening party are the regulated dissipations of hours which true genius knows are always too short for Art, and too rare for its inspirations: and hence so many of our contemporaries, whose card-racks are crowded, have produced only flashy fragments,—efforts, and not works. It is seduction, and not reward, which makes fashionable society offer the man of true genius, for he must be distinguished from those men of the world, who have assumed the literary character, for purposes very distinct from literary ones. In this society, the man of genius shall cease to interest, whatever be his talent; he will be sought for with enthusiasm, but he cannot escape from his certain fate,—that of becoming tiresome to his pretended admirers. The confidential confession of Racine to his son is remarkable. 'Do not think that I am sought after by the great for my dramas; Corneille composes nobler verses than mine, but no one notices him, and he only pleases by the mouth of the actors. I never allude to my works when with men of the world, but I amuse them about matters they like to hear. My talent with them consists not in making them feel that I have any, but in showing them that they have.'—Racine treated the Great, like the children of society; Corneille would not compromise for the tribute he exacted; and consoled himself when, at his entrance into the theatre, the audience usually rose to salute him.

Has not the fate of our reigning literary favourites been uniform? Their majesty hardly exceeds the year. They are pushed aside to put in their place another, who in his turn must descend. Such is the history of the literary character encountering the perpetual difficulty of appearing what he really is not, while he sacrifices to a few, in a certain corner of the metropolis, who have long fanatically called themselves 'The Word,' that more dignified celebrity which makes an author's name more familiar than his person. To one who appeared astonished at the extensive celebrity of Buffon, the modern Pliny replied, 'I have passed fifty years at my desk.' And has not one, the most sublime of the race, sung—

che seggendo in piuma
In Fama non si vicia, né sotto coltre;
Sanza la qual chi sua vita consuma
Cotel vestigio in terra di se lascia
Qual fummo in aere, ed in acqua la schiuma.
*Dante, Inferno, c. xiv.

Another, who had great experience of the world and of literature,† observes, that literary men (and artists) and an intercourse with the great for a refinement of self-love; they are perpetually wanting a confirmation of their own talents in the opinions of others, (for their rivals are, at all times, very cruelly and very adroitly diminishing their reputation;) for this purpose, they require judges sufficiently enlightened to appreciate their talents, but who do not exercise too penetrating a judgment. Now this is exactly the state of the generality of the great, (or persons of fashion,) who cultivate taste and literature; these have only time to acquire that degree of light which is just sufficient to set at ease the fears of these claimants of genius. Their eager vanity is more voracious than delicate, and is willing to accept an incense less durable than ambrosia.

The habitudes of genius, before it lost its freshness in this society, are the mould in which the character is cast; and these, in spite of all the disguise of the man, heretofore make him a distinct being from the man of society. There is something solitary in deep feelings; and the answers who can only dazzle and surprise, will never spread that contagious energy only springing from the fullness of the heart. Let the man of genius then dread to level himself to that mediocrity of feeling and talent required in every-day society, lest he become one of themselves. Ridicule is the shadowy scourge of society, and the terror of the man of genius; Ridicule surrounds him with her chimeras, like the shadowy monsters which opposed Æneas, too impalpable to be grasped, while the airy things triumph, unwounded by a weapon. Æneas was told to pass the grinning monsters unnoticed, and they would then be as harmless, as they were unreal.

Study, Meditation, and Enthusiasm,—this is the progress of genius, and these cannot be the abits of him who lingers till he can only live among pointed d crowds. He bears about him the consciousness of genius, he will be still acting under their influences. And perhaps they never was one of this class of men who had not either first entirely formed himself in solitude, or amidst society a perpetually breaking out to seek for himself. Writers, who, when no longer touched by the fervours of literary and patriotic glory, grovelled into a domestic voluptuary, observed with some surprise of the great Earl of Chatham, that he sacrificed every pleasure of social life, even in youth, to his great pursuit of eloquence; and the Earl himself acknowledged an artifice he practised in his intercourse with society, for he said, when he was young he always came late into company, and left it early. Vittorio Alfieri, and a brother-spirit in our own noble poet, were rarely seen amidst the brilliant circle in which they were born; the workings of their imagination were perpetually emancipating them, and one deep loneliness of feeling proudly insulated them among the unimpassioned triflers of their rank. They preserved unbroken the unity of their character, in constantly escaping from the processional spectacle of society, by frequent intervals of retirement. It is no trivial observation of another noble writer, Lord Shaftesbury, that 'it may happen that a person may be so much the worse author, for being the finer gentleman.'

An extraordinary instance of this disagreement between the man of the world and the literary character, we find in a philosopher seated on a throne. The celebrated Julian stained the imperial purple with an author's ink; and when that Emperor resided among the Antiochians, his unamiable character shocked that volatile and luxurious nation; he slighted the plaudits of their theatre, he abhorred their dancers and their horse-racers, he was absent even at a festival, and perpetually incorrupt, admonished this dissipated people of their impious abandonment of the laws of their country. They libelled the Emperor and prettily lampooned his beard, which the philosopher carelessly wore, neither perfumed nor curled. Julian, desiring to inflict a sharper punishment, pointed at them his own † D'Alembert in Société des Gens de Lettres et des Artistes.

[the Misopogon, or the Antiochian; the Enemy of the laud, where amidst the irony and invective, the literary search bestows on himself many exquisite and individual touches. All that those persons of fashion alleged against the literary character, Julian unreservedly confesses—his address beard and his awkwardnesses, his obstinacy, his unsocial habits, his deficient tastes, &c., while he represents his good qualities as so many extravagancies. But, in this pleasure of self-reprehension, he has not failed to show this light and corrupt people that he could not possibly resemble them. The unhappiness of too strict an education under a family tutor, who never suffered him to swerve from the one right way, with the unlucky circumstance of his master having inspired Julian with such a reverence for Plato and Socrates, Aristotle and Pheophrastus, as to have made them his models: 'Whatever manners,' says the Emperor, 'I may have previously contracted, whether gentle or boorish, it is impossible for me now to alter or unlearn. Habit is said to be a second nature; to oppose it is irksome, but to counteract the study of more than thirty years is extremely difficult, especially then it has been imbibed with so much attention.'

And what if men of genius, relinquishing their habits, could do this violence to their nature, should we not lose the original for a factitious genius, and spoil one race without improving the other? If nature, and habit, that second nature which prevails even over the first, have created two beings distinctly different, what mode of existence shall ever assimilate them? Antipathies and sympathies, those still occult causes, however concealed, will break forth at an unguarded moment. The man of genius will be restive even in his trammelled paces. Clip the wings of an eagle and place him to roost among the domestic poultry; will he peck with them? will he chuck like them? At some unforeseen moment his pinions will overshadow and terrify his tiny associates, for 'the feathered king' will be still musing on the rock and the cloud.

Thus it is, as our literary Emperor discovered, that 'we cannot counteract the study of more than thirty years, when it has been imbibed with so much attention.' Men of genius are usually not practised in the minute attentions; in those heartless courtesies, poor substitutes for generous feelings; they have rarely sacrificed to the unassuming graces of Lord Chesterfield. Plato ingeniously compares Socrates to the gallipots of the Athenian apothecaries, which were painted on the exterior with the grotesque figures of apes and owls, but contained within a precious balm. The man of genius may exclaim amidst many a circle, as did Themistocles, when asked to play at a lute—'I cannot fiddle, but I can make a little village, a great city;' and with Corneille he may be allowed to smile at his own deficiencies, and even disdain to please his rivals, asserting that, 'wanting all these things, he was at the less Corneille.' With the great thinkers and students, their character is still more hopeless. Adam Smith could never free himself from the embarrassed manners of recluse; he was often absent; and his grave and formal conversation made him seem distant and reserved, when, in fact, no man had warmer feelings for his intimates. Buffon's conversation was very indifferent—and the most eloquent writer was then coarse and careless; after each laborious day of study, he pleaded that conversation was to him only a relaxation. Rousseau gave no indication of is energetic style in conversation. A princess, desirous of seeing the great moralist Nicole, experienced inconceivable disappointment, when the moral instructor, entering with the most perplexing bow imaginable, sank down heavily on his chair; the interview promoted no conversation; and the retired student, whose elevated spirit might have endured martyrdom, sank with timidity in the accustomed honour of conversing with a princess, and saying nothing to say. A lively Frenchman, in a very inauspicious description of the distinct sorts of conversations of numerous literary friends, among whom was Dr Frankland, energetically hits off that close observer and thinker, as even in society; among these varieties of conversation he has noted down 'the silence of the celebrated Franklin.' When Lord Oxford desired to be introduced to the studious Thomas Baker, he very unaffectedly declined, in a letter I have seen, that honour, 'as a rash adulator he could not think of engaging in, not having fitted himself for any conversation, but with the dead.'

But this deficient agreeableness in a man of genius may often be connected with those qualities which conduce to a greatness of his public character. A vivid perception of truth on the sudden, bursts with an irruptive heat on the subdued tone of conversation; should he hesitate, that he may correct an equivocal expression, or grasp at a remote idea, he is in danger of sinking into pedantry or rising to genius. Even the tediousness he bestows on us, may swell out from the fullness of knowledge, or be hammered into a hard chain of reasoning; and how often is the cold tardiness of decision, the strict balancing of scepticism and candour! even obscurity may arise from the want of previous knowledge in the listener. But above all, what offends is that freedom of opinion, which a man of genius can no more divest himself of than of the features of his face; that intractable obstinacy which may be called resistance of character—a rock which checks the flowing stream of popular opinions, and divides them by the collision. Poor Burns could never account to himself why 'though when he had a mind he was pretty generally beloved, he could never get the art of commanding respect.' He imagined it was owing to his being deficient in what Sterne calls 'that understrapping virtue of desecration.' 'I am so apt,' he says, 'to a lapis lingue.'

It is remarkable that the conversationists have rarely proved themselves to be the abler writers. He whose fancy is susceptible of excitement, in the presence of his auditors, making the minds of men run with his own, seizing on the first impressions, and touching, as if he really felt them, the shadows and outlines of things—with a memory where all lies ready at hand, quickened by habitual associations, and varying with all those extemporary changes and fugitive colours, which melt away in the rainbow of conversation; that jargon, or vocabulary of fashion, those terms and phrases of the week perpetually to be learnt; that wit, which is only wit in one place, and for a certain time; such vivacity of animal spirits, which often exists separately from the more retired intellectual powers; all these can strike out wit by habit, and pour forth a stream of phrase that has sometimes been imagined to require only to be written down, to be read with the same delight it was heard; we have not all the while been sensible of the flutter of their ideas, the violence of their transitions, their vague notions, their doubtful assertions, and their meagre knowledge—a pen is the extinguisher of these luminaries. A curious contrast occurred between Buffon and his friend Montbelliard, who was associated in his great work; the one possessed the reverse qualities of the other. Montbelliard threw every charm of animation over his delightful conversation, but when he came to take his seat at the rival desk of Buffon, an immense interval separated them; his tongue distilled the music and the honey of the bee, but his pen seemed to be iron, as cold and as hard, while Buffon's was the soft pencil of the philosophical painter of nature. The characters of Cowley and Killegrew are an instance. Cowley was embarrassed in conversation, and had not quickness in argument or repartee; pensive elegance and refined combinations could not be struck at to catch fire; while with Killegrew the sparkling bubbles of his fancy rose and dropped; yet when this delightful conversationist wrote, the deception ceased. Denham, who knew them both, hit off the difference between them;—

'Had Cowley ne'er spoke; Killegrew ne'er writ,
Combin'd in one, they had made a matchless wit.'

Thought and expression are only found easily when they lie on the surface; the operations of the intellect with so-called, are slow and deep. Hence it is that slow-minded men are not, as men of the world imagine, always the dullest. Nicole said of a scintillant wit, 'He conquers me in the drawing-room, but he surrenders to me at discretion on the staircase.' Many a great wit has thought the wit which he never spoke, and many a great reasoner has perplexed his listeners. The conversation-powers of some resemble the show-glass of the fashionable trader; all his moderate capital is there spread out in the last novelties; the magasin within is neither rich nor rare. Chaucer was more facetious in his Tales, than in his conversation, for the Countess of Pembroke used to rally him, observing that his silence was more agreeable to her than his conversation. Tasso's conversation which his friend Manco has attempted to preserve to us, was neither gay nor brilliant; and Goldoni, in his drama of Terquato Tasso, has contrasted the poet's writings and his conversation;—

Ammirò il suo talento, gradisco i carmi suoi;
Ma piacer non trovo a conversar con lui.

The sublime Dante was taciturn or satirical; Butler was sullen or biting; Descartes, whose habits had formed him for solitude and meditation, was silent. Addison and Moliere were only observers in society; and Dryden has very honestly told us, 'my conversation is slow and dull; my humour saturnine and reserved; in short I am none of those who endeavour to break jests in company or make repartees.' It was ingeniously said of Vaccanson, that he was as much a machine as any he made. Hogarth and Swift, who looked on the circles of society with eyes of inspiration, were absent in company; but their grossness and asperity did not prevent the one from being the greatest of comic painters, nor the other as much a creator of manners in his way. Genius even in society is pursuing its own operations; but it would cease to be itself, in becoming another.

One peculiar trait in the conversations of men of genius, which has often injured them when the listeners were not intimately acquainted with the man, are certain sports of a vacant mind; a sudden impulse to throw out opinions, and take views of things in some humour of the moment. Extravagant paradoxes and false opinions are caught up by the humbler proser; and the Philistines are thus enabled to triumph over the strong and gifted man, because in the hour of confidence and the abandonment of the mind, he laid his head in their lap and taught them how he might be shorn of his strength. Dr. Johnson appears often to have indulged this amusement in good and in ill humour. Even such a calm philosopher as Adam Smith, as well as such a child of imagination as Burns, were remarked for this ordinary habit of men of genius, which perhaps as often originates in a gentle feeling of contempt for their auditors, as from any other cause.

Not however that a man of genius does not utter many startling things in conversation which have been found admirable, when the public pursued them. How widely the public often differ from the individual! a century's opinion may intervene between them. The fate of genius resembles that of the Athenian sculptor, who submitted his colossal Minerva to a private party; before the artist they trembled for his daring chisel, and behind him they calumniated. The man of genius smiled at the one, and forgave the other. The statue once fixed in a public place, and seen by the whole city, was the divinity. There is a certain distance at which opinions, as well as statues, must be viewed.

But enough of those defects of men of genius, which often attend their conversations. Must we then bow to authorial dignity, and kiss hands, because they are inked; and to the artist, who thinks us as nothing unless we are canvases under his hands? are there not men of genius, the grace of society? fortunate men! more blest than their brothers; but for this, they are not the more men of genius nor the others less. To how many of the ordinary intimates of a superior genius, who complain of his defects, might one say, 'Do his productions not delight and sometimes surprise you?—You are silent—I beg your pardon; the public has informed you of a great name; you would not otherwise have perceived the precious talent of your neighbour. You know little of your friend but his name.' The personal familiarity of ordinary minds with a man of genius has often produced a ludicrous prejudice. A scotchman, to whom the name of Dr Robertson had travelled down, was curious to know who he was? 'Your neighbour!' but he could not persuade himself that the man whom he conversed with was the great historian of his country. Even a good man could not believe in the announcement of the Messiah, from the same sort of prejudice. 'Can there any thing good come out of Nazareth?' said Nathaniel.

Supper a man of genius to be such as nature and habit have formed him, and he will then be the most interesting companion; then will you see nothing but his mighty mind when it opens itself on you. Barry was the most repulsive of men in his exterior, in the roughness of his language and the wildness of his looks; intermingling vulgar oaths, which, by some unlucky association of habit, he seemed to use as strong expletives and notes of admiration. His conversation has communicated even a horror to some: on one of these occasions, a pious lady, who had felt such intolerable uneasiness in his presence, did not however leave this man of genius that evening, without an impression that she had never heard so divine a man in her life. The conversation happening to turn on that principle of Benevolence which pervades Christianity and the meekness of the Founder, it gave Barry an opportunity of opening on the character of Jesus, with that copiousness of heart and mind, which once heard could never be forgotten. That artist had indeed long in his meditations an ideal head of Christ, which he was always taking to execute; 'It is here!' he would cry, striking his knee. What baffled the invention, as we are told, of Leonardo da Vinci, who left his Christ beardless, having exalted his creative faculty among the apostles, Barry was dreaming on; but this mysterious mixture of a human celestial nature could only be conceived by his mind, and even the catholic enthusiasm of Barry was compelled to refrain from unveiling it to the eye,—but this unspeakable picture was perpetually exciting this artist's emotional conversation.

Few authors and artists but are eloquently instructed on that sort of knowledge or that department of art which has absorbed all their affections; their conversations are the mind to a distant period of life. Who has forgotten what a man of genius has said at such moments! the man of genius becomes an exquisite instrument, when the hand of the performer knows to call forth the rich cadence of the sounds; and—

'The flying fingers touch into a voice.'

D'Annet.

CHAPTER VI.

LITERARY SOLITUDE.

The literary character is reproached with an extreme passion for retirement, cultivating those insulating habits which are great interruptions, and even weakeners of domestic happiness, while in public life these often induce to a succession from its cares, thus eluding its active duties. Yet the vacancies of retired men are eagerly filled by many unemployed men of the world more happily trained for its business. We do not hear these accusations read against the painter who wears away his days at his easel, and the musician by the side of his instrument; and much less should we against the legal and the commercial character; yet all these are as much withdrawn from public and private life as the literary character; their desk is insulating as the library. Yet is the man who is working for his individual interest more highly estimated than the retired student, whose disinterested pursuits are at least more profitable to the world than to himself. La Bruyere discovered the world's erroneous estimate of literary labour: 'There requires a better name to be bestowed on the leisure (the idleness he calls it) of the literary character, and that to meditate, to compose, to read and to be tranquil, should be called working.' But so invincible is the progress of intellectual pursuits, and so rarely are the objects palpable to the observers, that the literary character appears denied for his pursuits, what cannot be refused to every other. That unremitting application, that unbroken series of their thoughts, admired in every profession, is only complained of in that one whose professors with so much sincerity mourn over the shortness of life, which is often closed on them while sketching their works.

It is, however, only in solitude that the genius of recent men has been formed; there their first thoughts sprang, and there it will become them to find their last: for the solitude of old age—and old age must be often a solitude—will be found the happiest with the literary character. Solitude is the nurse of enthusiasm, and enthusiasm is the true parent of genius; in all ages it has been called for—it has been flown to. No considerable work was ever composed, but its author, like an ancient musician, first retired to the grove, or to the closet, to invoke. When genius languishes in an irksome solitude among crowds, that is the moment to fly into seclusion and meditation. There is a society in the deepest solitude; and in the men of genius of the past—

'First of your kind, Society divine.'

and in themselves; for there only they can indulge in the romances of their soul, and only in solitude can they occupy themselves in their dreams and their vigils, and, with the morning, fly without interruption to the labour they had reluctantly quitted. This desert of solitude, so vast and so dreary to the man of the world, to the man of genius opens the magical garden of Armida whose enchantments arose amidst solitude, while solitude was every where among those enchantments.

Whenever Michael Angelo was meditating on some great design, he closed himself up from the world. 'Why do you lead so solitary a life?' asked a friend. 'Art,' replied the sublime artist, 'Art is a jealous god; it requires the whole and entire man.'

We observe men of genius, in public situations, sighing at this solitude; amidst the impediments of the world, and their situation in it, they are doomed to view their intellectual banquet often rising before them, like some fairy delusion, never to taste it. They feel that finer existence in solitude.

Lord Clarendon, whose life so happily combined the contemplative with the active powers of man, dwells on three periods of retirement which he enjoyed; he always took leisure in relating the great tranquillity of spirit experienced during his solitude at Jersey, where for more than two years, employed on his History, he daily wrote 'one sheet of large paper with his own hand.' At the close of his life, his literary labours in his other retirements are detailed with a proud satisfaction. Each of his solitudes occasioned a new acquisition; this the Spanish, that the French, and a third the Italian literature. The public are not yet acquainted with the fertility of Lord Clarendon's literary labours. It was not vanity that induced Scipio to declare of solitude, that it had no loneliness to him, since he voluntarily retired amidst a glorious life to his Linturnum. Cicero was uneasy amidst applauding Rome, and as distinguished his numerous works by the titles of his various villas. Aulus Gellius marked his solitude by his Attic Nights. The 'Golden Grove' of Jeremy Taylor is the produce of his retreat at the Earl of Carberry's seat in Wales; and the 'Divisions of Pury' preserved a man of genius for posterity. Voltaire had talents, and perhaps a taste for society; but at one period of his life he passed five years in the most secret seclusion. Montesquieu quitted the brilliant circles of Paris for his books, his meditations, and his immortal work, and was ridiculed by the gay triflers he deserted. Harrington, to compose his Oceana, severed himself from the society of his friends. Descartes, inflamed by genius, hires an obscure house in an unfrequented quarter at Paris, and there he passes two years, unknown to his acquaintance. Adam Smith, after the publication of his first work, throws himself into a retirement that lasts ten years: even Hume rallies him for separating himself from the world; but by this means the great political inquirer satisfied the world by his great work. And thus it was with men of genius, long are Petrarch withdrew to his Val chisna.

The interruption of visitors by profession has been feelingly lamented by men of letters.—The mind, maturing its speculation, feels the unexpected conversation of cold ceremony, chilling as the blasts of March winds over the blossoms of the Spring. These unhappy beings who wander from house to house, privileged by the charter of society to obstruct the knowledge they cannot impart, to tire because they are tired, or to seek amusement at the cost of others, belong to that class of society which have affixed no other value to time than that of getting rid of it; these are judges not the best qualified to comprehend the nature and evil of their deprivations in the silent apartment of the studious. 'We are afraid,' said some of those visitors to Baxter, 'that we break in upon your time.'—'To be sure you do,' replied the disturbed and blunt scholar. Jreinus, to hint as gently as he could to his friends that he was avaricious of time contrived to place an inscription over the door of his study, which could not fail to fix their eye, intimating that whoever remained there must join in his labours. The amiable Melancthon incapable of a harsh expression, when he received these idle visits, only noted down the time he had expended, that he might reanimate his industry, and not lose a day. The literary character is driven to the most inventive shifts to escape the rapture of a formidable party at a single rush, who enter without 'besieging or beseeching,' as Milton has it. The elegant, poetical Mr Ellis, on one of these occasions, in his country-house, showed a literary friend, that when risen to the last, he usually made his escape by a leap out of the window. Brand Hollis endeavoured to hold out the idea of singularity as a shield; and the great Robert Boyle was compelled to advertise in a newspaper that he just decline visits on certain days, that he might have leisure to finish some of his works.*

But this solitude, at first a necessity, and then a pleasure, is length is not borne without repining. To tame the fervid wildness of youth to the strict regularities of study is a sacrifice performed by the votary; but even Milton appears to have felt this irksome period of life; for in the preface to Smectymnus he says, 'It is but justice not to defraud of due esteem the wearisome labours and studious watchings wherein I have spent and tired out almost a whole youth.' Cowley, that enthusiast for seclusion, in his retirement calls himself 'the melancholy Cowley.' I have seen an original letter of this poet to Evelyn, where he expresses his eagerness to see Evelyn's Essay on Solitude; for a copy of which he had sent over the town, without obtaining one, being 'either all bought up, or burnt in the fire of London.' I am the more desirous, he says, because it is a subject in which I am most deeply interested. Thus Cowley was requiring a book to confirm his predilection, and we know he made the experiment, which did not prove a happy one. We find even Gibbon, with all his fame about him, anticipating the dread he entertained of solitude in advanced life. 'I feel, and shall continue to feel, that domestic solitude, however it may be alleviated by the world, by study, and even by friendship, is a comfortless state, which will grow more painful as I descend in the vale of years.' And again—'Your visit has only served to remind me that man, however amused or occupied in his closet, was not made to live alone.'

* This curious advertisement is preserved in Dr Birch's Life of Boyle, p. 272.

Had the mistaken notions of Sprat not deprived us of Cowley's correspondence, we doubtless had viewed the sorrows of lonely genius touched by a tender pencil. But we have Shenstone, and Gray, and Swift. The heart of Shenstone bleeds in the dead oblivion of solitude. 'Now I am come from a visit, every little uneasiness is sufficient to introduce my whole train of melancholy considerations, and to make me utterly dissatisfied with the life I now lead, and the life I foresee I shall lead, I am angry and envious, and dejected, and frantic, and disregard all present things, as becomes a madman to do. I am infinitely pleased, though it is a gloomy joy, with the application of Dr. Swift's complaint, that he is forced to die in a rage, like a rat in a poisoned hole.' Let the lover of solitude muse on its picture throughout the year, in this stanza by the same amiable, but suffering poet—

Tedious again to curse the drizzling day,
Again to trace the wintry tracks of snow,
Or, soothed by vernal airs, again survey
The self-same hawthorns bud, and crowslips blow.

Swift's letters paint with terrifying colours a picture of solitude; and at length his despair closed with idiotism. Even the playful muse of Gresset throws a sombre querulousness over the solitude of men of genius—

Je le vois, Victimes du Génie,
Au faible prix d'un éclat passager
Vivre isolés, sans jouir de la vie!
Vingt ans d'Ennuis pour quelques jours de Gloire.

Such are the necessity, the pleasures, and the inconveniences of solitude! Were it a question, whether men of genius should blend with the masses of society, one might answer, in a style rather oracular, but intelligible to the initiated—Men of genius! live in solitude, and do not live in solitude!

CHAPTER VII.

THE MEDITATIONS OF GENIUS.

A continuity of attention, a patient quietness of mind, forms one of the characteristics of genius.

A work on the Art of Meditation has not yet been produced; it might prove of immense advantage to him who never happened to have more than one solitary idea. The pursuit of a single principle has produced a great work, and a loose hint has conducted to a new discovery. But while in every manual art, every great workman improves on his predecessor, of the art of the mind, notwithstanding the facility of practice and our incessant experience, millions are yet ignorant of the first rudiments; and men of genius themselves are rarely acquainted with the materials they are working on. Johnson has a curious observation on the mind itself,—he thinks it obtains a stationary point, from whence it can never advance, occurring before the middle of life. He says, 'when the powers of nature have attained their intended energy, they can be no more advanced. The shrub can never become a tree. Nothing then remains but practice and experience; and perhaps why they do so little, may be worth inquiry.' The result of this inquiry would probably lay a broader foundation for this art of the mind than we have hitherto possessed. Ferguson has expressed himself with sublimity—'The lustre which man casts around him, like the flame of a meteor, shines only while his motion continues; the moments of rest and of obscurity are the same.' What is this art of meditation, but the power of withdrawing ourselves from the world, to view that world moving within ourselves, while we are in repose; as the artist by an optical instrument concentrates the boundless landscape around him, and patiently traces all nature in that small space.

* I recommend the reader to turn to the whole passage, in Johnson's Letters to Mrs Thrale, Vol. I. p. 293.

Certain constituent principles of the mind itself, which the study of metaphysics has curiously discovered, offer many important regulations in this desirable art. We may even suspect, since men of genius in the present age have confided to us the secrets of their studies, that this art may be carried on by more obvious means, and even by mechanical contrivances, and practical habits. There is a government of our thoughts; and many secrets yet remain to be revealed in the art of the mind; but as yet they consist of insulated facts, from which, however, may hereafter be formed an experimental history. Many little habits may be contracted by genius, and may be observed in ourselves. A mind well organized may be regulated by a single contrivance: it is by a bit of lead that we are enabled to track the flight of time. The mind of genius can be made to take a particular disposition, or train of ideas. It is a remarkable circumstance in the studies of men of genius, that previous to composition they have often awakened their imagination by the imagination of their favourite masters. By touching a magnet they became a magnet. A circumstance has been recorded of Gray, by Mr Mathias, 'as worthy of all acceptance among the higher votaries of the divine art, when they are assured that Mr Gray never sat down to compose any poetry without previously, and for a considerable time, reading the works of Spenser.' But the circumstance was not unusual with Malherbe, Corneille, and Racine; and the most fervid verses of Homer, and the most tender of Euripides, were often repeated by Milton. Even antiquity exhibits the same exciting intercourse of the mind of genius. Cicero informs us how his eloquence caught inspiration from a constant study of the Latin and Grecian poetry; and it has been recorded of Pompey, who was great even in his youth, that he never undertook any considerable enterprise, without animating his genius by having read to him the character of Agamemnon in the first Iliad; although he acknowledged that the enthusiasm he caught came rather from the poet than the hero. When Boesuet had to compose a funeral oration, he was accustomed to retire for several days to his study, to ruminate over the pages of Homer; and when asked the reason of this habit, he exclaimed, in these lines,

—Magnam mihi mentem, animunque
Delius inspirat Vates—

It is on the same principle of pre-disposing the mind, that many have first generated their feelings in the symphonies of music. Alfieri, often before he wrote, prepared his mind by listening to music—a circumstance which has been recorded of others.

We are scarcely aware how we may govern our thoughts by means of our sensations. De Luc was subject to violent bursts of passion, but he calmed the interior tumult by the artifice of filling his mouth with sweets and comfits. When Goldoni found his sleep disturbed by the obtrusive ideas still floating from the studies of the day, he contrived to lull himself to rest by conning in his mind a vocabulary of the Venetian dialect, translating some word into Tuscan and French; which being a very uninteresting occupation, at the third or fourth version this recipe never failed. This was an act of withdrawing attention from the greater to the less emotion; where, as the interest weakened, the excitement ceased. Mendelssohn, whose feeble and too sensitive frame was often reduced to the last stage of suffering by intellectual exertion, when engaged in any point of difficulty, would in an instant contrive a perfect cessation from thinking, by mechanically going to the window, and counting the tiles upon the roof of his neighbour's house. Facts like these show how much art may be concerned in the management of the mind.

Some profound thinkers could not pursue the operations of their mind in the distraction of light and noise. Malbranche, Hobbes, Thomas, and others closed their curtains to concentrate their thoughts, as Milton says of the mind, 'in the spacious circuits of her musing.' The study of an author or an artist would be ill placed in the midst of a beautiful landscape; the Penserose of Milton, 'hid from day's garish eye,' is the man of genius. A secluded and naked apartment, with nothing but a desk, a chair, and a single sheet of paper, was for fifty years the study of Buffon; the single ornament was a print of Newton placed before his eyes—nothing broke into the unity of his reveries.

The arts of memory have at all times excited the attention of the studious; they open a world of untravell'd mysteries; every one seems to form some discovery of his own, but which rather excites his astonishment than enlarges his comprehension. When the late William Hutton, a man of an original cast of mind, as an experiment in memory, opened a book which he had divided into 365 columns, according to the days of the year, he resolved to try to recollect an anecdote, as insignificant and remote as he was able, rejecting all under ten years of age; and to his surprise, he filled those spaces for small reminiscences, within ten columns; but till this experiment had been made, he never conceived the extent of this faculty. When we reflect, that whatever we know, and whatever we feel, are the very smallest portions of all the knowledge and all the feelings we have been acquiring through life, how desirable would be that art, which should open again the scenes which have vanished, revive the emotions which other impressions have effaced, and enrich our thoughts, with thoughts not less precious; the man of genius who shall possess this art, will not satisfy himself with the knowledge of a few mornings and its transient emotions, writing on the moveable sand of present sensations, present feelings, which alter with the first breezes of public opinion. Memory is the foundation of genius; for this faculty, with men of genius, is associated with imagination and passion; it is a chronology not merely of events, but of emotions; hence they remember nothing that is not interesting to their feelings, while the ordinary mind, accurate on all events alike, is not impressed on any. The incidents of the novelist, are often founded on the common ones of life; and the personages so admirably alive in his fictions, he only discovered among the crowd. The arts of memory will preserve all we wish; they form a saving bank of genius, to which it may have recourse, as a wealth which it can accumulate unperceptibly amidst the ordinary expenditure. Locke taught us the first rudiments of this art, when he showed us how he stored his thoughts and his facts, by an artificial arrangement; and Addison, before he commenced his Spectators, had amassed three folios of materials; but the higher step will be the volume which shall give an account of a man to himself, where a single observation, a chronicled emotion, a hope or a project, on which the soul may still hang, like a clew of past knowledge in his hand, will restore to him all his lost studies; his evanescent existence again enters into his life, and he will contemplate on himself as an entire man: to preserve the past, is half of immortality.

The memorials of Gibbon and Priestley present us with the experience and the habits of the literary Character. 'What I have known,' says Dr Priestley, 'with respect to myself, has tended much to lessen both my admiration and my contempt of others. Could we have entered into the mind of Isaac Newton, and have traced all the steps by which he produced his great works, we might see working very extraordinary in the process. Our student, with an ingenious simplicity, opens to us that 'variety of mechanical expedients by which he secured and arranged his thoughts,' and that discipline of the mind, by a peculiar arrangement of his studies, for the day and for the year, in which he rivalled the calm and unalterable system pursued by Gibbon. Buffon and Voltaire employed the same manoeuvres, and often only combined the knowledge they obtained, by humble methods. They knew what to ask for, and made use of an intelligent secretary; aware, as Lord Bacon has expressed it, that some Books 'may be read by deputy.' Buffon laid down an excellent rule to obtain originality, when he advised the writer, first to exhaust his own thoughts before he attempted to consult other writers. The advice of Lord Bacon, that we should pursue our studies, whether the mind is disposed or indispensed, is excellent; in the one case, we shall gain a great step, and in the other, we 'shall work out the knots and stands of the mind, and make the middle times the more pleasant.' John Hunter very happily illustrated the advantage, which every one derives from putting his thoughts in writing,

'it resembles,' said he 'a tradesman taking stock; without which, he never knows either what he possesses, or in what he is deficient.' Industry is the feature by which the ancients so frequently describe an eminent character; such phrases as 'incredibili industria; diligentia singulari,' are usual. When we reflect on the magnitude of the labours of Cicero, Erasmus, Gesner, Baronius, Lord Bacon, Usher, and Bayle, we seem asleep at the base of these monuments of study, and scarcely awaken to admire. Such are the laborious instructions of mankind!

Nor let those other artists of the mind, who work in the airy looms of fancy and wit, imagine that they are weaving their wets, without the direction of a principle, and without a secret habit which they have acquired; there may be even an art, unperceived by themselves, in opening and pursuing a scene of pure invention, and even in the happiest turns of wit. One who had all the experience of such an artist, has employed the very terms we have used, of 'mechanical' and 'habitual.' 'Be assured,' says Goldsmith, 'that wit is in some measure mechanical; and that a man long habituated to catch at even its resemblance, will at last be happy enough to possess the substance.' By a long habit of writing, he acquires a justness of thinking, and a mastery of manner, which holiday writers, even with ten times his genius, may vainly attempt to equal.' Even in the sublime efforts of imagination, this art of meditation may be practised; and Alfieri has shown us, that in those energetic tragic dramas which were often produced in a state of enthusiasm, he pursued a regulated process. 'All my tragedies have been composed three times,' and he describes the three stages of conception, development, and versifying. 'After these three operations, I proceed like other authors, to polish, correct or amend.'

'It is habit in mankind, even virtue itself!' exclaimed Metastasio; and we may add, even the meditations of genius. Some of its boldest conceptions are indeed fortuitous, starting up and vanishing almost in the perception; like that giant form, sometimes seen amidst the glaciers, opposite the traveller, afar from him, moving as he moves, stopping as he stops, yet, in a moment lost and perhaps never more seen,—although but his own reflection! Often in the still obscurity of the night, the ideas, the studies, the whole history of the day is acted over again, and in these vivid reveries, we are converted into spectators. A great poetical contemporary of our country does not think that even his dreams should pass away unnoticed, and keeps, what he calls, a register of nocturnals. The historian De Thou was one of those great literary characters, who, all his life, was preparing to write the history which he wrote; omitting nothing, in his travels and his embassies, which went to the formation of a great man, De Thou has given a very curious account of his dreams. Such was his passion for study, and his ardent admiration of the great men whom he conversed with, that he often imagined in his sleep, that he was travelling in Italy, in Germany, and in England, where he saw and consulted the learned, and examined their curious libraries; he had all his life time these literary dreams, but more particularly when in his travels, he thus repeated the images of the day. If memory does not chain down these blurring, fading children of the imagination, and with the beams of the morning, the mind suddenly finds itself forsaken and solitary. Rousseau has uttered a complaint on this occasion: full of enthusiasm, he devoted to the subject of his thoughts, as was his custom, the long sleepless intervals of his nights, meditating in bed, with his eyes closed, he turned over his periods, in a tumult of ideas; but when he rose and had dressed, all was vanished, and when he sat down to his papers, he had nothing to write. Thus genius has its vespers, and its vigils, as well as its matins, which we have been so often told are the true hours of its inspiration—but every hour may be full of inspiration for him who knows to meditate. No man was more practised in this art of the mind, than Pope, and even the night was not an unregarded portion of his poetical existence.

Few works of magnitude presented themselves at once, in their extent and their associations to their authors; the man of genius perceives not more than two or three striking circumstances, unobserved by another; in revolving the subject, the whole mind is gradually agitated; it is a summer landscape, at the break of day, wrapt in mist, where the sun strikes on a single object, till the light and warmth increasing, all starts up in the noon-day of imagination. How beautifully this state of the mind, in the progress of composition, is described by Dryden, alluding to his work, 'when it was only a confused mass of thoughts, tumbling over one another in the dark; when the fancy was yet in its first work, moving the sleeping images of things, towards the light, there to be distinguished, and then either to be chosen or rejected, by the judgment.' At that moment, he adds, 'I was in that eagerness of imagination, which, by over-pleasing fanciful men, flatters them into the danger of writing.'—Gibbon tells us of his history, 'at the onset, all was dark and doubtful; even the title of the work, the true era of the decline and fall of the empire, &c. I was often tempted to cast away the labour of seven years.' Winckelmann was long lost in composing his 'History of Art'; a hundred fruitless attempts were made, before he could discover a plan amidst the labyrinth. Slight conceptions kindle finished works: a lady asking for a few verses on rural topics, of the Abbé De Lille, his specimens pleased, and sketches heaped on sketches, produced 'Les Jardins.' In writing the 'Pleasures of Memory,' the poet at first proposed a simple description in a few lines, till conducted by meditation, the perfect composition of several years closed in that fine poem. And thus it happened with the Rape of the Lock, and many celebrated productions.

Were it possible to collect some thoughts of great thinkers, which were never written, we should discover vivid conceptions, and an originality they never dared to pursue in their works! Artists have this advantage over authors, that their virgin fancies, their chance felicities, which labour cannot afterwards produce, are constantly perpetuated; and these 'studies' as they are called, are as precious to posterity, as their more complete designs. We possess one remarkable evidence of these fortuitous thoughts of genius. Pope and Swift, being in the country together, observed, that if contemplative men were to notice 'the thoughts which suddenly present themselves to their minds, when walking in the fields &c. they might find many as well worth preserving, as some of their more deliberate reflections.' They made a trial, and agreed to write down such involuntary thoughts as occurred during their stay there; these furnished out the 'Thoughts' in Pope's and Swift's miscellanies.* Among Lord Bacon's Remains, we find a paper entitled 'sudden thoughts, set down for profit.' At all hours, by the side of Voltaire's bed, or on his table, stood his pen and ink, with slips of paper. The margins of his books were covered with his 'sudden thoughts.' Cicero, in reading, constantly took notes and made comments; but we must recollect there is an art of reading, as well as an art of thinking.

This art of meditation may be exercised at all hours and in all places; and men of genius in their walks, at table, and amidst assemblies, turning the eye of the mind inwards, can form an artificial solitude; retired amidst a crowd, and wise amidst distraction and folly. Some of the great actions of men of this habit of mind, were first meditated on, amidst the noise of a convivial party, or the music of a concert. The victory of Waterloo might have been organized in the ball room at Brussels, as Rodney at the table of Lord Sandwich, while the bottle was briskly circulating, was observed arranging bits of cork; his solitary amusement having excited an inquiry, he said that he was practising a plan how to annihilate an enemy's fleet; this afterwards proved to be that discovery of breaking the line, which the happy audacity of the hero executed. Thus Hogarth, with an eye always awake to the ridiculous, would catch a character on his thumb-nail; Leonardo da Vinci could detect in the stains of an old weather-beaten wall, the landscapes of nature, and Haydn carefully noted down in a pocket book, the passages and ideas which came to him in his walks, or amidst company.

To this habit of continuity of attention, tracing the first simple idea through its remoter consequences, Galileo and Newton owed many of their discoveries. It was one evening in the cathedral of Pisa, that Galileo observed the vibrations of a brass lustre pendent from the vaulted roof, which had been left swinging by one of the vergers; the habitual meditation of genius combined with an ordinary accident a new idea of science, and hence, conceived the invention of measuring time by the medium of a pendulum. Who but a genius of this order, sitting in his orchard, and being struck by the fall of an apple, could have discovered a new quality in matter by the system of gravitation; or have imagined, while viewing boys blowing soap-bubbles, the properties of light, and then anatomised a ray! It was the same principle which led Franklin when on board a ship, observing a partial stillness in the waves, when they threw down water which had been used for culinary purposes, to the discovery of the wonderful property in oil of calming the agitated ocean, and many a ship has been preserved in tempestuous weather, or a landing facilitated on a dangerous surf, by this simple meditation of genius.

In the stillness of meditation the mind of genius must be frequently thrown; it is a kind of darkness which hides from us all surrounding objects, even in the light of day. This is the first state of existence in genius.—In Cicero, on Old Age, we find Cato admiring that Caius Sulpitius Gallus, who when he sat down to write in the morning was surprised by the evening, and when he took up his pen in the evening was surprised by the appearance of the morning. Socrates has remained a whole day in immovable meditation, his eyes and countenance directed to one spot as if in the stillness of death. La Fontaine, when writing his comic tales, has been observed early in the morning and late in the evening, in the same recumbent posture under the same tree. This quiescent state is a sort of enthusiasm, and renders every thing that surrounds us as distant as if an immense interval separated us from the scene. Poggius has told us of Dante, that he indulged his meditations more strongly than any man he knew; and when once deeply engaged in reading he seemed to live only in his ideas. The poet went to view a public procession, and having entered a bookseller's shop, taking up a book he sunk into a reverie; on his return he declared that he had neither seen nor heard a single occurrence in public exhibition which had passed before him. It has been told of a modern astronomer, that one summer night when he was withdrawing to his chamber, the brightness of the heavens showed a phenomenon. He passed the whole night in observing it; and when they came to him early in the morning, and found him in the same attitude, he said, like one who had been recollecting his thoughts for a few moments, 'It must be thus; but I'll go to bed before it is late.' He had gazed the entire night in meditation, and was not aware of it.

There is nothing incredible in the stories related of some who have experienced this entranced state, in a very extraordinary degree; that ecstasy in study, where the mind deliciously inebriated with the object it contemplates, feels nothing, from the excess of feeling, as a philosopher well describes it.—Archimedes, involved in the investigation of mathematical truth, and the painters Protogenes and Parmegiano, found their senses locked up as it were in meditation, so as to be incapable of withdrawing themselves from their work even in the midst of the terrors and storming of the place by the enemy. Marino was so absorbed in the composition of his 'Adonis,' that he suffered his leg to be burnt for some time before the pain grew stronger than the intellectual pleasure of his imagination. Thomas, an intense thinker, would sit for hours against a hedge, composing with a low voice, taking the same pinch of snuff for half an hour together, without being aware that it had long disappeared; when he quitted his apartment, after prolonging his studies there, a visible alteration was observed in his person, and the agitation of his recent thoughts was still traced in his air and manner. With what eloquent truth has Buffon described those reveries of the student, which compress his day, and mark the hours by the sensations of minutes. 'Invention,' he says, 'depends on patience; contemplate your subject long, it will gradually unfold till a sort of electric spark convulses for a moment the brain, and spreads down to the very heart a glow of irritation. Then come the luxuries of genius, the true hours for production and composition; hours so delightful that I have spent twelve or fourteen successively at my writing-desk, and still been in a state of pleasure.'

This eager delight of pursuing his study, and this impatience of interruption in the pursuit, are finely described by Milton in a letter to his friend Deodati.

'Such is the character of my mind, that no delay, none of the ordinary cessations (for rest or otherwise) no, I had nearly said, care or thinking of the very subject, could me back from being hurried on to the destined point, or from completing the great circuit as it were, of the soul in which I am engaged.'

Such is the picture of genius, viewed in the stillness of meditation, but there is yet a more excited state,—namely, as if consciousness were mixing with its reveries, a full allusion of a scene, a person, a passion, the emotions of the soul affect even the organs of sense. It is experienced at the moments the man of genius is producing; these are the hours of inspiration, and this is the gentle outbreak of genius!

CHAPTER VIII.

THE ENTHUSIASM OF GENIUS.

A state of mind occurs in the most active operations of genius, which the term reverie inadequately indicates; metaphysical distinctions but ill describe it, and popular language affords no terms for those faculties and feelings which escape the observation of the multitude who are not affected by the phenomenon.

The illusion of a drama, over persons of great sensibility, where all the senses are excited by a mixture of reality with imagination, is experienced by men of genius in their own vivified ideal world; real emotions are raised by fiction. In a scene, apparently passing in their presence, where the whole train of circumstances succeeds in all the continuity of nature, and a sort of real existences appear to rise up before them, they perceive themselves spectators or actors, feel their sympathies excited, and involuntarily use language and gestures, while the exterior organs of sense are visibly affected; not that they are spectators and actors, nor that the scene exists. In this exalted state, the enthusiast of genius produces his masterpiece. This waking dream is distinct from reverie, where our thoughts wandering without connection, the faint impressions are so evanescent as to occur without even being recollected. Not so when one closely pursued act of meditation carries the enthusiast of genius beyond the precinct of actual existence, while this act of contemplation makes the thing contemplated. He is now the busy painter of a world which he himself only views; alone he hears, he sees, he touches, he laughs and weeps; his brows and lips, and his very limbs move. Poets and even painters, like Lord Bacon describes witches, 'are imaginative,' have often involuntarily betrayed in the act of composition those gestures which accompany this enthusiasm. Quintilian has nobly compared them to the lashings of the lion's tail preparing to combat. Even actors of genius have accustomed themselves to walk on the stage for an hour before the curtain was drawn, to fill their minds with all the phantoms of the drama, to personify, to catch the passion, to speak to others, to do all that a man of genius would have viewed in the subject.

Aware of this peculiar faculty so prevalent in the most vivid exercise of genius, Lord Kaimes seems to have been the first who, in a work on criticism, attempted to name the ideal presence, to distinguish it from the real presence of things; it has been called the representative faculty, the imaginative state, &c. Call it what we will, no term opens to us the invisible mode of its operations, or expresses its variable nature. Conscious of the existence of such a faculty, our critic perceived that the conception of it is by no means clear when described in words. Has not the difference of any actual thing and its image in a place perplexed some philosophers? And it is well known how far the ideal philosophy has been carried. 'All are pictures, alike painted on the retina, or optical sensorium,' exclaimed the enthusiast Barry, who only saw pictures in nature and nature in pictures.

Cold and barren tempers without imagination, whose impressions of objects never rise beyond those of memory and reflection, which know only to compare, and not to excite, will smile at this equivocal state of the ideal presence; yet it is a real one to the enthusiast of genius, and it is his happiest and peculiar condition without this power no metaphysical aid, no art to be taught him, no mystery of talent shall avail him; unblest with it the votary shall find each sacrifice lying cold on the altar, for no accepting flame from heaven shall kindle it.

• Memm sic est Ingenium, nulla aut mora, nulla quies, nulla ferme illius rei cura aut cogitatio distincta, quod perveniunt quo feror, et grandem aliquem studiorum meorum quasi potulum conficiam.

This enthusiasm indeed can only be discovered by men genius themselves, yet when most under its influence, we can least perceive it, as the eye which sees all things does not view itself; and to trace this invisible operation, is warmth on the nerve, were to search for the principle of life which found would cease to be life. There is, never, something of reality in this state of the ideal presence; for the most familiar instances show that the nerves each external sense are put in motion by the idea of the object, as if the real object had been presented to it; the presence is only in the degree. Thus the exterior senses are more concerned in the ideal world than at first appears; we thrill at even the idea of any thing that makes us shudder, and only imagining it often produces a real shudder. A curious consequence flows from this principle: Milton, lingering amidst the freshness of nature in Eden, it all the delights of those elements with which he was rearing; his nerves moved with the images which excited him. The fierce and wild Dante amidst the abysses of hell, informed, must have often been startled by its horrors, and often left his bitter and gloomy spirit in the stings he felt on the great criminal. The moving nerves then of the man of genius are a reality; he sees, he hears, he feels by each. How mysterious to us is the operation of his faculty: a Homer and a Richardson,* like Nature, put a volume large as life itself—embracing a circuit of human existence!

Can we doubt of the reality of this faculty, when the visible and outward frame of the man of genius bears witness to its presence? When Fielding said, 'I do not doubt at the most pathetic and affecting scenes have been written with tears,' he probably drew that discovery from an inverse feeling to his own. Fielding would have been gratified to have confirmed the observation by facts which never reached him. Metastasio, in writing the ninth scene of the second act of his Olympiad, found himself suddenly moved, shedding tears. The imagined sorrows inspired real tears; and they afterwards proved contagious. Had our poet not personated his surprise by an interesting sonnet, the circumstance had passed away with the emotion, as many such are. Alfieri, the most energetic poet of modern times, having composed, without a pause, the whole of an act, noted in the margin—'Written under a paroxysm of enthusiasm, and while shedding a flood of tears.' The impressions which the frame experiences in this state, leave deeper traces behind them than those of reverie. The remors of Dryden, after having written an ode, a circumstance accidentally preserved, were not unusual with him—for in the preface to his Tales, he tells us, that 'in translating Homer, he found greater pleasure than in Virgil; but it was not a pleasure without pain; the continual agitation of the spirits must needs be a weakener to my constitution, especially in age, and many pauses are required for refreshment betwixt the heats.' We find Metastasio, like others of the brotherhood, susceptible of his stage, complaining of his sufferings during the poetical raptures. 'When I apply with attention, the nerves of my sensorium are put into a violent tumult; I grow as red as a drunkard, and am obliged to quit my work.' When Buffon was absorbed on a subject which presented great objections to his opinions, he felt his head burn, and saw his countenance flushed; and this was a warning for him to moderate his attention. Gray could never compose voluntarily, his genius resembled the armed apparition in Shakespeare's master tragedy. 'He would not be commanded,' as we are told by Mr Mathias. When he wished to compose the Installation Ode, for a considerable time he felt himself without the power to begin it: a friend calling on him, Gray flung open his door hastily, and in a hurried voice and tone exclaiming, in the first verse of his ode,

'Hence, avaunt! 'tis holy ground!'

his friend started at the disordered appearance of the bard, whose organs had disturbed his very air and countenance, till he recovered himself. Listen to one labouring with all the magic of the spell. Madam Roland has thus powerfully described the ideal presence in her first readings of Telemachus and Tasso:—'My respiration rose, I felt a rapid fire colouring my face and my voice changing had

* Richardson assembles a family about him, writing down what they said, seeing their very manner of saying, living with them as often and as long as he will—with such a personal sympathy, that an ingenious lawyer once told me that he required stronger evidence of a fact in any court of law than a circumstantial scene in Richardson.

betrayed my agitation. I was Eucharis for Telemachus and Erminia for Tancréd. However, during this perfect transformation, I did not yet think that I myself was any thing, for any one: the whole had no connection with myself. I sought for nothing around me; I was them; I saw only the objects which existed for them; it was a dream, without being awakened.' The effect which the study of Plutarch's illustrious men produced on the mighty mind of Alfieri, during a whole winter, while he lived as it were among the heroes of antiquity, he has himself told. Alfieri wept and raved with grief and indignation that he was born under a government which favoured no Roman heroes nor sages; as often as he was struck with the great actions of these great men, in his extreme agitation he rose from his seat like one possessed. The feeling of genius in Alfieri was suppressed for more than twenty years, by the discouragement of his uncle; but as the natural temperament cannot be crushed out of the soul of genius, he was a poet without writing a single verse; and as a great poet, the ideal presence at times became ungovernable and verging to madness. In traversing the wilds of Arragon, his emotions, he says, would certainly have given birth to poetry, could he have expressed himself in verse. It was a complete state of the imaginative existence, or this ideal presence; for he proceeded along the wilds of Arragon in a reverie, weeping and laughing by turns. He considered this as a folly, because it ended in nothing but in laughter and tears. He was not aware that he was then yielding to a demonstration, could he have judged of himself, that he possessed those dispositions of mind and energy of passion which form the poetical character.

Genius creates by a single conception; the statuary conceives the statue at once, which he afterwards executes by the slow process of art; and the architect contrives a whole palace in an instant. In a single principle, opening as it were on a sudden to genius, a great and new system of things is discovered. It has happened, sometimes, that this single conception rushing over the whole concentrated soul of genius, has agitated the frame convulsively; it comes like a whispered secret from Nature. When Mallebranche first took up Descartes's Treatise on Man, the germ of his own subsequent philosophic system, such was his intense feeling, that a violent palpitation of the heart, more than once, obliged him to lay down the volume. When the first idea of the Essay on the Arts and Sciences rushed on the mind of Rousseau, a feverish symptom in his nervous system approached to a slight delirium: stopping under an oak, he wrote with a pencil the Proseopoeie of Fabricius.—'I still remember my solitary transport at the discovery of a philosophical argument against the doctrine of transubstantiation,' exclaimed Gibbon in his Memoirs.

This quick sensibility of genius has suppressed the voices of poets in reciting their most pathetic passages.—Thomson was so oppressed by a passage in Virgil or Milton, when he attempted to read, that 'his voice sunk in ill-articulated sounds from the bottom of his breast.' The tremulous figure of the ancient Sybil appears to have been viewed in that land of the Muses, by the energetic description of Paulus Jovius of the impetus and afflatus of one of the Italian improvisatori, some of whom, I have heard from one present at a similar exhibition, have not degenerated in poetic inspiration, nor in its corporeal excitement. 'His eyes fixed downwards, kindle, as he gives utterance to his effusions, the moist drops flow down his cheeks, the veins of his forehead swell, and wonderfully his learned ears as it were, abstracted and intent, moderate each impulse of his flowing numbers.'*

This enthusiasm throws the man of genius into those reveries where, amidst Nature, while others are terrified at destruction, he can only view Nature herself. The mind of Pliny, to add one more chapter to his mighty scroll, sought her amidst the volcano in which he perished. Vernet was on board a ship in the midst of a raging tempest, and all hope was given up: the astonished captain beheld the artist of genius, his pencil in his hand, in calm enthusiasm, sketching the terrible world of waters—studying the wave that was rising to devour him.

There is a tender enthusiasm in the elevated studies of antiquity, in which the ideal presence or the imaginative existence is seen prevailing over the mind. It is finely said by Livy, that 'in contemplating antiquity, the mind itself becomes antique.' Amidst the monuments of great and departed nations, our imagination is touched by the grandeur of local impressions, and the vivid associations of the manners, the arts, and the individuals of a great people. Men of genius have roved amidst the awful ruins till the ideal presence has fondly built up the city anew, and have become Romans in the Rome of two thousand years past. Pomponius Lætus, who devoted his life to this study, was constantly seen wandering amidst the vestiges of this 'throne of the world': there, in many a reverie, as his eye rested on the mutilated arch and the broken column, he stopped to muse, and dropt tears in the ideal presence of Rome and of the Romans. Another enthusiast of this class was Bosius, who sought beneath Rome for another Rome, in those catacombs built by the early Christians, for their asylum and their sepulchres. His work of 'Roma Sotteranea' is the production of a subterraneous life, passed in fervent and perilous labours. Taking with him a hermit's meal for the week, this new Pliny often descended into the bowels of the earth, by lamp-light, clearing away the sand and ruins, till some tomb broke forth, or some inscription became legible: accompanied by some friend whom his enthusiasm had inspired with his own sympathy, here he dictated his notes, tracing the mouldering sculpture, and catching the fading picture. Thrown back into the primitive ages of Christianity, amidst the local impressions, the historian of the Christian catacombs collected the memorials of an age and of a race, which were hidden beneath the earth.

Werner, the mineralogist, celebrated for his lectures, by some accounts transmitted by his auditors, appears to have exercised this faculty. Werner often said that 'he always depended on the muse for inspiration.' His unwritten lecture was a reverie—till kindling in his progress, blending science and imagination in the grandeur of his conceptions, at times, as if he had gathered about him the very elements of Nature, his spirit seemed to be hovering over the waters and the strata.

It is this enthusiasm which inconceivably fills the mind of genius in all great and solemn operations: it is an agitation in greatness, and is required not only in the fine arts, but wherever a great and continued exertion of the soul must be employed. It was experienced by De Thou, the historian, when after his morning prayers he always added another to implore the Divinity to purify his heart from partiality and hatred, and to open his spirit in developing the truth, amidst the contending factions of his times; and by Haydn, when employed in his 'Creation,' earnestly addressing the Creator ere he struck his instrument. In moments like these, man becomes a perfect unity—one thought and one act, abstracted from all other thoughts and all other acts. It was felt by Gray in his loftiest excursions, and is perhaps the same power which impels the villager, when, to overcome his rivals in a contest for leaping, he retires back some steps, collects all exertion into his mind, and clears the eventful bound. One of our Admirals in the reign of Elizabeth, held as a maxim, that a height of passion, amounting to phrenzy, was necessary to qualify a man for that place; and Nelson, decorated by all his honours about him, on the day of our 'de, at the sight of those emblems of glory emulated himself. Thus enthusiasm was necessary and effective for his genius.

This enthusiasm, prolonged as it often has been by the operation of the imaginative existence becomes a state of perturbed feeling, and can only be distinguished from a disordered intellect by the power of volition, in a sound mind, of withdrawing from the ideal world into the world of sense. It is but a step which carries us from the wanderings of fancy into the aberrations of delirium.

'With curious art the brain too finely wrought
Preys on herself, and is destroyed by thought;
Constant attention wears the active mind,
Blots out her powers, and leaves a blank behind—
The greatest genius to this fate may bow.'

Churchill.

There may be an agony in thought which only deep thinkers experience. The terrible effects of metaphysical studies on Beattie, has been told by himself.—Since the Essay on Truth was printed in quarto, I have never dared to read it over. I durst not even read the sheets to see whether there were any errors in the print, and was obliged to get a friend to do that office for me. These studies came in time to have dreadful effects upon my nervous system; and I cannot read what I then wrote without some degree of horror, because it recalls to my mind the horrors that I have sometimes felt after passing a long evening in those severe studies.' Goldoni, after a long exertion of writing sixteen plays in a year, confessed he paid the penalty of the folly; he flew to Genoa, leading a life of delicious vacuity; to pass the day without doing any thing, was all the enjoyment he was now capable of feeling. But long after he said, 'I felt at that time, and have ever since continued to feel, the consequence of the exhaustion of spirits I sustained in composing my comic comedies.' Boerhaave has related of himself, that he imprudently indulged in intense thought on a particular subject, he did not close his eyes for six weeks after; and Tissot, in his work on the health of men of letters, alludes in similar cases, where a complete stupor has affected the unhappy student for a period of six months.

Assuredly the finest geniuses could not always withdraw themselves from that intensely interesting train of ideas, which we have shown has not been removed from about them by even the violent stimuli of exterior objects: the optical illusion,—the being of their passion,—the invisible existences repeatedly endowed by them with a real force, have still hung before their eyes. It was in this state that Petrarch found himself in that minute narrative of a vision in which Laura appeared to him; and Tasso in the lofty conversations he held with a spirit that glided towards him on the beams of the sun; and thus, Malbranche listening to the voice of God within him; or Lord Herbert on his knees, in the stillness of the sky; or Pascal starting at times at an abyss opening by his side. Descartes, when young, and in a country seclusion, his brain exhausted with meditation, and his imagination heated to excess, heard a voice in the air which called him to pursue the search of truth; he never doubted the vision; and this dream in the delirium of genius charmed him even in his after-studies. Our Collins and Cowper were often thrown into that extraordinary state of mind, when the ideal presence converted them into visionaries; and their illusions were as strong as Swedenburgh's, who saw heaven on earth in the glittering streets of his New Jerusalem; and Cardan's, when he so carefully observed a number of well-armed men at his feet; and Benvenuto Cellini, whose vivid imagination and glorious egotism so frequently contemplated 'a resplendent light hovering over his shadow.'

Yet what less than enthusiasm is the purchase price of high passion and invention? Perhaps never has there been a man of genius of this rare cast, who has not betrayed early in youth the ebullitions of the imagination in some outward action at that period, when the illusions of life are more real to them than its realities. A slight derangement of our accustomed habits, a little perturbation of the faculties, and a romantic tinge on the feelings, go no indifferent promise of genius; of that generous transport which knows nothing of the baseness of mankind, unsatisfied, and raging with a devouring eagerness for the abstract it has not yet found; to perfect some glorious design, to charm the world, or make it happier. Often we hear from the confessions of men of genius, of their having indulged in the puerile state the most noble, the most delightful, the most impossible projects; and if age ridicules the imaginative existence of its youth, be assured that it is the decline of its genius. That vigorous and tender enthusiast, Fenelon, in his early youth, troubled his friends with a classical and religious reverie. He was on the point of quitting them to restore the independence of Greece, in the character of a missionary, and to collect the relics of antiquity with the taste of a classical antiquary. The Peloponnesus opened to him the Church of Corinth, where St Paul preached, the Piræus where Socrates conversed; while the latent poet was to pluck laurels from Delphos, and rove amidst the amenities of Tempe. Such was the influence of the ideal process; and barren will be his imagination, and luckless his fortune, who, claiming the honours of genius, has never been touched by such a temporary delirium.

To this enthusiasm, and to this alone, can we attribute the self-immolation of men of genius. Mighty and laborious works have been pursued, as a forlorn hope, at the certain destruction of the fortune of the individual. The fate of Castell's Lexicon,* of Bloch's magnificent work on

* Castell lost 12000*l.* by this great work; and gave away copies, while the rest rotted at home. He exhibits a curious picture of literary labour in his preface.—As for myself, I have been unceasingly occupied for such a number of years in this mass—Molendin he calls them—that day seemed as it were a holiday in which I have not laboured so much as ishes, and other great and similar labours, attest the enthusiasm which accompanied their progress. They have sated their works with their blood : they have silently borne the pangs of disease ; they have barred themselves on the pursuits of fortune ; they have torn themselves away from all they loved in life, patiently suffering these self-denials, to escape from those interruptions and impediments to their studies. Martyrs of literature and art, they shod in their solitude that halo of immortality over their odious heads, which is a reality to the visionary of glory. Filson would not desist from proceeding with one of his works, although warned by the physician of the certain loss of his sight ; he declared he preferred his duty to his eyes, and doubtless his fame to his comfort. Anthony Wood, preserve the lives of others, voluntarily resigned his own ; cloistered studies ; nor did the literary passion desert him in his last moments, when with his dying hands he grasped his beloved papers, and his last mortal thoughts went on his Athena Oxonienses.^{*} Moreri, the founder of our great biographical collections, conceived the design with such enthusiasm, and found such voluptuousness in his labour, that he willingly withdrew from the popular celebrity he had acquired as a preacher, and the preferment which a minister of state, in whose house he resided, would have opened to his views. After the first edition of his historical Dictionary, he had nothing so much at heart as improvement. His unyielding application was converting labour into death ; but collecting his last renovated vigour, with his dying hands he gave the volume to the world, though he did not live to witness even its publication. All objects in life appeared mean to him compared with that unalloyed delight of addressing to the literary men of his age, the history of their brothers. The same enthusiasm consumed the pupils of art devoured by their own ardour. The sung and classical sculptor, who raised the statue of Charles II placed in the centre of the Royal Exchange, as in the midst of his work, advised by his medical friends to desist from marble ; for the energy of his labour, with its strong excitement of his feelings, already had made fatal inroads in his constitution. But he was willing, he said to die at the foot of his statue. The statue was raised, and the young sculptor, with the shining eyes and hectic blush of consumption, beheld it there—returned home—and shortly was no more. Drouais, a pupil of David, the French painter, was a youth of fortune, but the solitary leisure of his youth was his devotion to Raphael : he was at his studies at four in the morning till night ; ‘Painting or nothing’ was the cry of this enthusiast of elegance ; First fame, then amusement, was another. His sensibility was as great as his enthusiasm ; and he cut in pieces the picture for which David declared he would inevitably stain the prize. ‘I have had my reward in your approbation ; but next year I shall feel more certain of deserving it !’ was the reply of the young enthusiast. Afterwards he astonished Paris with his Marius—but while engaged on a subject which he could never quit, the principle of life itself was drying up in his veins. Henry Heady and Kirke White were the early victims of the enthusiasm of study ; and are mourned for ever by the few who are organised as themselves.

‘Twas thine own genius gave the fatal blow,
And helped to plant the wound that laid thee low ;
So the struck eagle, stretched upon the plain
No more through rolling clouds to soar again,
Viewed his own feather on the fatal dart,
And winged the shaft that quivered in his heart ;
Keen were his pangs, but keener far to feel
He nursed the pinion which impelled the steel,
While the same plumage that had warmed his nest,
Drank the last life-blood of his bleeding breast.’

English Bards and Scotch Reviewers.

Thus comes the shadow of death among those who are living with more than half dead. Yet ‘there is no celebrity for the artist,’ said Gerner, ‘if the love of his own art does not become a vehement passion ; if the hours he employs to cultivate it are not for him the most delicious of his life ; if study becomes not his true existence and his first happiness ; if the society of his brothers in art is not that which most pleases him ; if even in the night-time the ideas of his art do not occupy his vigils or his dreams ; if in the morning he flies not to his work with a keen or eighteen hours in these enlarging Lexicons and encyclopedias.’ Bloch expended all his fortune in his splendid work.

^{*} See Calamities of Authors, Vol. I, p. 243.

new rapture. These are the marks of him who labours for true glory and posterity ; but if he seek only to please the taste of his age, his works will not kindle the desires nor touch the hearts of those who love the arts and the artists.’

Unaccompanied by enthusiasm, genius will produce nothing but uninteresting works of art ; not a work of art, resembling the dove of Archidæus, which other artists beheld flying, but could not make another dove to meet it in the air. Enthusiasm is the secret spirit which hovers over the production of genius throwing the reader of a book, or the spectator of a statue, into the very ideal presence whence these works have really originated. A great work always leaves us in a state of musing.

CHAPTER IX.

LITERARY JEALOUSY.

Jealousy, long declared to be the offspring of little minds, is not, however, restricted to them ; it fiercely rages in the literary republic, among the Senate and the Order of Knights, as well as the people. In that curious self-description which Linneus comprised in a single page, written with the precision of a naturalist, that great man discovered that his constitution was liable to be afflicted with jealousy. Literary jealousy seems often proportioned to the degree of genius ; the shadowy and equivocal claims of literary honour is the real cause of this terrible fear ; in cases where the object is more palpable and definite, and the pre-eminence is more universal, than intellectual excellence can be, jealousy will not so strongly affect the claimant for our admiration. The most beautiful woman, in the age of beauty, will be rarely jealous : seldom she encounters a rival ; and while her claims exist, who can contend with a fine feature or a dissolving glance ? But a man of genius has no other existence than in the opinion of the world ; a divided empire would obscure him, a contested one might annihilate him.

The lives of authors and artists exhibit a most painful disease in that jealousy which is the perpetual fever of their existence. Why does Plato never mention Zenophon, and why does Zenophon inveigh against Plato, studiously collecting every little report which may detract from his fame ? They wrote on the same subject ! Why did Corneille, tottering on the grave, when Racine consulted him on his first tragedy, advise the author never to write another ? Why does Voltaire continually detract from the sublimity of Corneille, the sweetness of Racine, and the fire of Crevillon ? Why, when Boccaccio sent to Petrarch a copy of Dante, declaring that the work was like a first light which had illuminated his mind, did Petrarch coldly observe that he had not been anxious to inquire after it, having intended to compose in the vernacular idiom and not wishing to be considered as a plagiarist ; while he only allows Dante's superiority from having written in the vulgar idiom, which he did not think was an enviable, but an inferior merit. Thus frigidly Petrarch took the altitude of the solitary Ætna before him, in the ‘Inferno,’ while he shrunk into himself with the painful consciousness of the existence of another poet, who obscured his own solitary majesty. Why is Waller silent on the merits of Cowley, and why does he not give one verse to return the praise with which Dryden honoured him, while he is warm in panegyric on Beaumont and Fletcher, on Sandys, Ware, and D'Avenant ? Because of some of these their species of composition was different from his own, and the rest he could not fear.

The moral feeling has often been found too weak to temper the malignancy of literary jealousy, and has led some men of genius to an incredible excess. A memorable and recent example offers in the history of the two brothers, Dr William, and John Hunter both great characters, fitted to be rivals, but Nature, it was imagined, in the tenderness of blood had placed a bar to rivalry. John, without any determined pursuit in his youth, was received by his brother at the height of his celebrity ; the Doctor initiated him into his school ; they performed their experiments together ; and William Hunter was the first to announce to the world the great genius of his brother. After this close connection in all their studies and discoveries, Dr William Hunter published his magnificent work—the proud favourite of his heart, the assertor of his fame. Was it credible that the genius of the celebrated anatomist, which had been nursed under the wing of his brother, should turn on that wing to clip it ? John Hum-ter put in his claim to the chief discovery; it was answered by his brother. The Royal Society, to whom they appealed, concealed the documents of this unnatural feud. The blow was felt, and the jealousy of literary honour for ever separated the brothers, and the brothers of genius.*

In the jealousy of genius, however, there is a peculiar case, where he fever rages not in its malignancy, yet silently consumes. Even the man of genius of the gentlest temper dies under its slow wastings; and this infection may happen among dear friends, when a man of genius loses that self-opinion which animated his solitary labours and constituted his happiness—when he views himself at the height of his class, suddenly eclipsed by another great genius. It is then the morbid sensibility, acting on so delicate a frame, feels as if under the old witchcraft of tying the knot on the nuptial day,—the faculties are suddenly extinct by the very imagination. This is the jealousy not of hatred, but of despair. A curious case of this kind appears in the anecdote of the Spanish artist Castillo, a man distinguished by every amiable disposition; he was the great painter of Seville. When some of Morillo's paintings were shown to him, who seems to have been his nephew, he stood in meek astonishment before them, and when he recovered his voice, turning away, he exclaimed with a sigh, Ya murio Castillo! Castillo is no more! Returning home the stricken genius relinquished his pencil, and pined away in hopelessness.

CHAPTER X.

WANT OF MUTUAL ESTEEM.

Among men of genius that want of mutual esteem, usually attributed to envy or jealousy, often originates in a deficiency of analogous ideas, or sympathy, in the parties. On this principle several curious phenomena in the history of genius may be explained.

Every man of genius has a manner of his own; a mode of thinking and a habit of style; and usually decides on a work as it approximates or varies from his own. When one great author depreciates another it has often no worse source than his own taste. The witty Cowey despised the natural Chaucer; the cold classical Boileau the rough sublimity of Crebillon; the refining Marivaux the familiar Moliere. Fielding ridiculed Richardson, whose manner so strongly contrasted with his own; and Richardson condemned Fielding and declared he would not last. Cumberland escaped a fit of unforgiveness, not living to read his own character by Bishop Watson, whose logical head tried the lighter elegancies of that polished man by his own nervous genius, destitute of whatever was beautiful in taste. There was no envy in the breast of Johnson when he advised Mrs Thrale not to purchase Gray's Letters as trifling and dull, no more than in Gray himself when he sunk the poetical character of Shenstone, his simplicity and purity of feeling, by an image of ludicrous caxempt. The deficient sympathy in these men of genius, for modes of feeling opposite to their own, was the real cause of their opinions; and thus it happens that even superior genius is so often liable to be unjust and false in its decisions.

The same principle operates still more strikingly in the remarkable contempt of men of genius for those pursuits and the pursuers, which require talents quite distinct from their own, with a cast of mind thrown by nature into another mould. Hence we must not be surprised at the antipathies of Selden and Locke, of Longueur and Buffon, and this class of genius, against poetry and poets: while on the other side, these undervalue the pursuits of the antiquary, the naturalist, and the metaphysician, by their own favourite course of imagination. We can only understand in the degree we comprehend; and in both these cases the parties will be found quite deficient in those qualities of genius which constitute the excellence of the other. A professor of polite literature condemned the study of botany, as adapted to mediocrity of talent and only demanding patience; but Linnæus showed how a man of genius becomes a creator even in a science which seems to depend only on order and method. It will not be a question with some whether a man must be endowed with the energy and aptitude of genius, to excel in antiquarianism, in natural history, &c.; and that the prejudices raised against the claims of such to the honours of genius have probably arisen from the secluded nature of their pursuits, and the little knowledge the men of art and imagination have of these persons, who live in a society of their own. On this subject a very curious circumstance has been revealed of Peirsec, whose enthusiasm science was long felt throughout Europe; his name was known in every country, and his death was lamented in forty languages; yet was this great man unknown to several men of genius in his own country; Rochefort declared he had never heard of his name, and Malherbe wondered why his death created so universal a sensation. Thus we see the classes of literature, the planets of Heaven, revolving like distinct worlds; it would not be less absurd for the inhabitants of Venus to treat with contempt the powers and faculties of those of Jupiter, than it is for the men of wit and imagination those of the men of knowledge and curiosity. They are incapable of exerting the peculiar qualities which give real value to these pursuits, and therefore they must remain ignorant of their nature and their result.

It is not then always envy or jealousy which induces men of genius to undervalue each other; the want of sympathy will sufficiently account for their false judgements. Suppose Newton, Quinsault, and Machiavel, accidentally meeting together, unknown to each other, would they soon have desisted from the vain attempt of communicating their ideas? The philosopher had condemned the poet of the Graces as an intolerable trifler, and the author of the 'The Prince' as a dark political spy. Machiavel had conceived Newton to be a dreamer among the stars, and a mere almanack-maker among men; and the scholar a rhimer, nauseously douceux. Quinsault might be imagined he was scated between two madmen. Had they annoyed each other for some time, they would have retired their enmity by reciprocal contempt, and each have proceeded with a determination to avoid hereafter two disagreeable companions.*

CHAPTER XI.

SELF-PRaise.

Vanity, egotism, a strong sense of their own sufficiency form another accusation against men of genius; but the complexion of self-praise must alter with the occasion; the simplicity of truth may appear vanity, and the consciousness of superiority seem envy—to Mediocrity. It is we who do nothing, who cannot even imagine any thing to be done, who are so much displeased with self-kindness, self-love, self-independence, self-admiration, which the men of genius are nothing but a modification of the passion of glory.

He who exults in himself is at least in earnest; but he who refuses to receive that praise in public for which he has devoted so much labour in his privacy, is not: he is compelled to suppress the very instinct of his nature; for while we censure no man for loving fame, but only for showing us how much he is possessed by the passion, we allow him to create the appetite, but we deny him the aliment. Our effeminate minds are the willing dupes of what is called the modesty of genius, or, as it has been termed, 'the polished reserve of modern times;' and this from the selfish principle that it serves at least to keep out of the company its painful pre-eminence. But this 'polished reserve,' like something as fashionable, the ladies' rouge, at first appearing with rather too much colour, and in the heat of an evening, by dying away till the true complexion comes out. We know well the numerous subterfuges of these modest men of genius, to extort that praise from their private circle which is thus openly denied them. Have they not been taken by surprise, enlarging their own panegyric, which might rival Phin's on Trajan, for care and copiousness? or impudently veiling their naked beauty with the transparency of a third person? or never prefixing their name to the volume, which they would not easily forgive a friend to pass unnoticed.

The love of praise is instinctive in the nature of man of genius. Their praise is the foot on which the past rolls, and the wheel on which the future rolls. The generous qualities and the virtues of a man of genius are readily produced by the applause conferred on him. To him whom the world admires, the happiness of the world must be dear, said Madame De Staël. Like the North American Indian, (for the savage and the man of genius preserve the genuine feelings of Nature,) he would listen to his own se, when amidst his circle they chaunt their gods and heroes. The honest savages laud the worthies among themselves, as well as their departed; and when auditor hears his own name, he answers by a cry of awe and of pride. But pleasure and pride must raise emotion in the breast of genius, amidst a polished circle: to bring himself down to them, he must start at a pliment, and turn away even from one of his own verses.

but this, it seems, is not always the case with men of us, since the accusation we are noticing has been so reiterated. Take from some that supreme opinion themselves, that pride of exultation, and you crush the men of their excellence. Many vast designs must have abided in the conception, had not their authors breathed that vital air of self-delight, this energy of vanity, so operative in great undertakings. We have recently seen this principle in the literary character unfold itself in the life of the late Bishop of Landaff: whatever he did, he felt it done as a master; whatever he wrote, it was as he declared, the best work on the subject yet written, was this feeling with which he emulated Cicero in remembrance or in action. 'When I am dead, you will not meet with another John Hunter,' said the great anatomist, to one of his garrulous friends. An apology is needed for relating the fact, but the weakness is only in the allegory. Corneille has given a very noble full-length of sublime egotism which accompanied him through life: 'I doubt if we had any such author in the present day, other he would dare to be so just to himself, and so just to the public. The self-praise of Buffon at least called his genius; and the inscription beneath his name in the library of the Jardin des Plantes, which I told was raised to him in his life time, exceeds all panegyrics;—it places him alone in Nature, as the first and last interpreter of her works.' He said of the great geniuses of modern times, that there were not more than Newton, Bacon, Leibnitz, Montesquieu, and myself. It was in this spirit that he conceived and terminated his great works, that he sat in patient meditation at his desk for half a century, and that all Europe, even in a state of war, bowed to the modern Piny.

Nor is the vanity of Buffon, and Voltaire, and Rousseau purely national as some will suppose; for men of genius in all ages have expressed a consciousness of the internal force of genius. No one felt this self-exultation so potent than our Hobbes, who has indeed, in his controversy with Wallis, asserted that there may be nothing less than self-commendation; and De Thou, one of the most noble-minded, the most thinking, the most impartial of historians, in the Memoirs of his own life, composed the third person, has surprised and somewhat puzzled critics, by that frequent distribution of self-commendation which they knew not how to accord with the modesty of gravity with which he was so amply endowed. After great and solemn labour, amidst the injustice of his persecutors, that great man had sufficient experience of his own merits to assert them. Kepler, amidst his great discoveries, looks down like a superior being on other men, as he breaks forth in glory and egotism: 'I dare insult mankind by confessing that I am he who has turned once to advantage. If I am pardoned, I shall rejoice; blamed, I shall endure it. The die is cast; I have written this book, and whether it be read by posterity or by contemporaries, is of no consequence; it may well wait for a reader during one century, when God himself will give six thousand years has waited for an observer like myself.' He predicts that 'his discoveries would be verified in succeeding ages,' yet were Kepler now among us, familiar society, we should be invited to inspect a monument of inordinate vanity. But it was this solitary majesty; this lofty conception of their genius, which hovered over the sleepless pillow, and charmed the solitude, of Bacon, of Newton, and of Montesquieu; of Ben Jonson, of Milton, and Corneille; and of Michael Angelo. Such is the nature of genius anticipate their contemporaries, and know they are creators, long before the tardy consent of the public;

'They see the laurel which entwines their bust,
They mark the pomp which consecrates their dust,
Shake off the dimness which obscures them now,
And feel the future glory bind their brow.'

Smalley's Precieuses.

To be admired, is the noble simplicity of the Ancients in expressing with ardour the consciousness of genius, and openly claiming that praise by which it was nourished. The ancients were not infected by our spurious effeminate modesty. Socrates, on the day of his trial, firmly commended himself: he told the various benefits he had conferred on his country. 'Instead of condemning me for imaginary crimes, you would do better, considering my poverty, to order me to be maintained out of the public treasury.' Epicurus, writing to a minister of state, declares—'If you desire glory, nothing can bestow it more than the letters I write to you;' and Seneca, in quoting these words, adds—'What Epicurus promised to his friend, that, my Lucilius, I promise you.' Orna me! was the constant cry of Cicero; and he desires the historian Lucceius to write separately the conspiracy of Cataline, and publish quickly, that while he yet lived, he might taste of the sweetness of his glory. Horace and Ovid were equally sensible to their immortality: but what modern poet would be tolerated with such an avowal? Yet Dryden honestly declares that it was better for him to own this failing of vanity, than the world to do it for him; and adds, 'For what other reason have I spent my life in so unprofitable a study? Why am I grown old in seeking so barren a reward as fame? The same pains and application which have made me a poet, might have raised me to any honours of the gown.' Was not Cervantes very sensible to his own merits, when a rival started up; and did he not assert them too, when passing sentence on the bad books of the times, he distinguishes his own work by a handsome compliment? Nor was Butler less proud of his own merits; for he has done ample justice to his Hudibras, and traced out, with great self-delight, its variety of excellences. Richardson, the novelist, exhibits one of the most striking instances of what is called literary vanity—the delight of an author in his works; he has pointed out all the beauties of his three great works, in various manners.* He always taxed a visitor by one of his long letters. It was this intense self-delight, which produced his voluminous labours.

There are certain authors whose very existence seems to require a high conception of their own talents; and who must, as some animals appear to do, furnish the means of life out of their own substance. These men of genius open their career with peculiar tastes, or with a predilection for some great work; in a word, with many unpopular dispositions. Yet we see them magnanimous, though defeated, proceeding with the public feeling against them. At length we view them ranking with their rivals. Without having yielded up their peculiar tastes or their incorrigible viciousness, they have, however, heightened their individual excellences. No human opinion can change their self opinion; alive to the consciousness of their powers, their pursuits are placed above impediment, and their great views can suffer no contraction. These men of genius bear a charmed mail on their breast; 'hopeless, not heartless,' may be often the motto of their ensign; and if they do not always possess reputation, they still look for fame; for these do not necessarily accompany each other.

Acknowledge, too, that an author must be more sensible to his real merits, while he is unquestionably much less to his defects, than most of his readers; the author not only comprehends his merits better, because they have passed through a long process in his mind, but he is familiar with every part, while the reader has had but a vague notion of the whole. Why does the excellent work, by repetition, rise in interest? because in obtaining this gradual intimacy with an author, we appear to recover half the genius we had lost on a first perusal. The work of genius too is associated, in the mind of the author, with much more than it contains. Why are great men often found greater than the books they write? Ask the man of genius, if he has written all he wished he could have written? Has he satisfied himself, in this work for which you accuse his pride? The true supplement has not always accompanied the work itself. The mind of the reader has the limits of a mere recipient, while that of the author, even after his work, is teeming with creation. 'On many occasions, my soul seems to know more than it can say, and to be endowed with a mind by itself, far superior to the mind I really have,' said Marivaux, with equal truth and happiness.

* I have observed them in Curiosities of Literature, First Series.

* See it verified in Curiosities of Literature.

† See Quarrels of Authors, Vol. III, p. 113.

With these explanations of what are called the vanity and egotism of genius, be it remembered, that the sense of their own sufficiency is assumed at their own risk; the great man who thinks greatly of himself, is not diminishing that greatness, in heaping fuel on his fire. With his unlucky brethren, such a feeling may end in the aberrations of harmless madness: as it happened with Percival Stockdale. He, who after a parallel between himself and Charles XII. of Sweden, concludes that 'some parts will be to his advantage, and some to mine,' but in regard to fame,—the main object between Stockdale and Charles XII.—Percival imagined that 'his own will not probably take its fixed and immovable station, and shine with its expanded and permanent splendour till it consecrates his ashes, till it illumines his tomb.' After this, the reader, who may never have heard of the name of Percival Stockdale, must be told, that there exist his own 'Memoirs of his Life and Writings.'* The Memoirs of a scribbler are instructive to literary men; to correct, and to be corrected, should be their daily practice, that they may be taught not only to exult in themselves, but to fear themselves.

It is hard to refuse these men of genius that aurea vitalis, of which they are so apt to be liberal to others. Are they not accused of the meanest adulations? When a young writer finds the notice of a person of some eminence, he has expressed himself in language which transcended that of mortality; a finer reason than reason itself, inspired it; the sensation has been expressed with all its fullness, by Milton,

'The debt immense of endless gratitude.'

Who ever pays an 'immense debt,' in small sums? Every man of genius has left such honourable traces of his private affections,—from Locke, whose dedication of his great work is more adulative than could be imagined, from a temperate philosopher to Churchill, whose warm eulogiums on his friends so beautifully contrast with the dark and evil passions of his satire. Even in advanced age, the man of genius dwells on the nutritious grief he caught in his youth from veteran genius; that seed sinks deep into a genial soil, roots there, and, like the aloe, will flower at the end of life. When Virgil was yet a youth, Cicero heard one of his eclogues, and exclaimed with his accustomed warmth, Magna spes altera Romæ!

'The second great hope of Rome,' intending by the first either himself or Lucretius. The words of Cicero were the secret honey on which the imagination of Virgil fed for many a year, for in one of his latest productions, the twelfth book of the Æneid, he applies these very words to Ascanius; the voice of Cicero had hung forever in his ear.

Such then, is the extreme susceptibility of praise in men of genius, and not less their exuberant sensibility to censure; I have elsewhere shown how some have died of criticism. The Abbé Cassagne felt so acutely the severity of Boileau, that in the prime of life he fell melancholy, and died insane. I am informed that the poet, Scott of Amwell, could never recover from a ludicrous criticism, written by a physician, who never pretended to poetical taste. Some, like Racine, have died of a simple rebuke, and some have found an epigram, as one who fell a victim to one, said, 'fasten on their hearts, and have been thrown into a slow fever.' Pope has been seen writhing in anguish on his chair; and it is told of Montesquieu, that notwithstanding the greatness of his character, he was so much affected by the perpetual criticisms on his work on Laws, that they hastened his death. The morbid feelings of Hawkesworth closed in suicide. The self-love in genius is, perhaps, much more delicate than gross.

But alas, their vengeance as quickly kindled lasts as long! Genius is a dangerous gift of nature; with a keener relish for enjoyment, and with passions more effervescent, the same material forms a Caroline, and a Cromwell, or a Cicero and a Bacon. Plato, in his visionary man of genius, lays great stress on his possessing the most vehement passions, while he adds reason to restrain them. But it is imagination which torments even their inflammable senses; give to the same vehement passion a different direction, and it is glory or infamy.

'Si Je n'étois César, j'aurais été Brutus.'

Voltaire.

The imagination of genius is the breath of its life, which I have sketched a character of Percival Stockdale, in Calamities of Authors, II. 313, it was taken ad vivum.

breeds its own disease. How are we to describe symptoms which come from one source, but show themselves all forms? It is now an intermittent fever, now a delirium, an hysterical affection, and now a horrid melancholism. Have we no other opiate to still the agony no other cordial to send its warmth to the heart, than to's reason? Must men of genius, who so rarely tortured and torturing passions about them, often disgusted, self-humiliated? The enemies of genius are connected with their morbid imagination; these engender in casual slights, or in unguarded expressions, or in opinions, or in a witty derision, or even in the abrupt goodness of tender admonition—The man of genius is over the phantom that darkens his feelings, and starts his vindictive fangs, in a libel, called his memoir, or another public way, called a criticism. We are told Comines the historian, when residing at the court of Count de Charolais afterwards Duke of Burgundy, on returning from hunting, with inconsiderate jocularity down before the Count, ordering the Prince to put off boots; the Count would not affect greatness, and he executed his commission, in return for the princely command, the Count dashed the boot on Comines's nose, which bled; and from that time, he was mortified at the Count of Burgundy, by retaining the nick-name of the booted Count. The blow rankled in the heart of the man of genius, the Duke of Burgundy has come down to us in his memoirs, blackened by his vengeance. Many, unknown to their readers, like Comines, have had a booted head, the secret poison is distilled on their lasting page. I have elsewhere fully written a tale of literary hatred, where I have seen a man of genius, devoting a whole life in harnessing the industry or the genius which he himself could contain, in the character of Gilbert Stuart.* The French Revolution, among its illustrations of the worst human passions exhibits one, in Collet d'Herbois; when that wretch was tossed up in the storm, to the summit of power, a monstrous imagination seized him; he projected the city of Lyons, and massacring its inhabitants. He even the heart to commence, and to continue that cruelty against human nature; the ostensible motive, royalism, but the secret one was literary vengeance; wretched a poet and actor as a man, he had been taken off the theatre in Lyons, and his dark remorseless soul resolved to repay that ignominy, by the blood of as many as the very walls of the city. Is there but one Collet d'Herbois in the universe? When the imagination of genius becomes its madness, even the worst of human beings is only a genius.

CHAPTER XII.

THE DOMESTIC LIFE OF GENIUS.

When the temper and the leisure of the literary character are alike broken, even his best works, the too faithful mirrors of his state of mind, will participate of its inequalities; and surely the incubations of genius in its debars and shadowy combinations, are not less sensible in their operation than the composition of sonorous bodies, when, while the warm metal is settling in the mould, even an unusual vibration of the air, during the moment of fusion, will injure the tone.

Some of the conspicuous blemishes of several great compositions may be attributed to the domestic miseries of their authors. The desultory life of Camoens is imagined to be perceptible in the deficient connection of his epic; and Milton's peculiar situation and divided family prevented those passages from being erased, which otherwise had not escaped from his reviving hand—he felt himself in the situation of his Sampson Agonistes, whom he so pathetically describes, as 'His fier' derision, captive, poor and blind.'

Cervantes, through precipitate publication, fell into the slips of memory observable in his satirical romance. The careless rapid lines of Dryden are justly attributed to his distress, and he indeed pleads for his inequalities from his domestic circumstances. Johnson silently, but eagerly often corrected the Ramblers in their successive editions of which so many had been despatched in haste. The learned Greaves offered some excuses for his errors in his edition of Abulfeda, from 'his being five years embarrased with law-suits and diverted from his studies.' What he returned to them, he expresses his surprise at pains he had formerly undergone, but of which he felt himself 'unwilling, he knew not how, of again going. Goldoni, when at the bar, abandoned his talent for several years: and having resumed it, his remedy totally failed: 'My head,' says he, 'was occupied with my professional employment, I was uneasy in and in bad humour.'

* See Calamities of Authors, II. 40

Best years of Meng's life were embittered by the and the harshness of his father, who himself a poor and with poorer feelings, converted his home into a house, forced his son into the slavery of stipulated work, while his bread and water were the only fruits fine arts; in this domestic persecution, from which as at length obliged to fly, he contracted those morose saturnine habits which for ever after shut up the un- Meng's in the dark solitude of his soul. It has been of Alonso Cano, a celebrated Spanish painter, that could have carried his art much higher had not the unag persecution of the inquisitors entirely deprived him at tranquillity so necessary to the very existence of

The poet Rousseau passed half his life in trouble, ger, and in despair, from the severe persecution, or justice, of his enemies, respecting an anonymous libel uttered to him; his temper was poisoned, and he pointed. Ovid, in exile on the barren shores of Tomos, de- by his genius, even in his copious Tristia, loses the lanceo of his fancy. The reason which Rousseau al-for the cynical spleen which so frequently breathes in his works, shows how the domestic character of an of genius leaves itself behind in his productions. describing the infelicity of his domestic affairs occa- by the mother of Theresa, and Theresa herself, women of the lowest order, he adds on this wretched iago, 'these unexpected disagreeable events, in a of my own choice, plunged me into literature, to give direction and diversion to my mind; and in all my works, I scattered that bilious humour which had oc- curred this very occupation.' Our author's character in works was the very opposite one in which he ap- peared to these low people; they treated his simplicity as silliness; feeling his degradation among them, his usual timidity assumed a tone of boldness and original- his writings, while a strong sense of shame heighten- is causticity, condemning that urbanity he knew not to tise. His miserable subservience to these people was real cause of his oppressed spirit calling out for some fined freedom in society. Thus the real Rousseau, all his disordered feelings, only appeared in his writ- ing, the secrets of his heart were in his pen.

he home of the literary character should be the abode of repose and of silence. There must be look for the is of study, in progressive and alternate labours; a which,' says Gibbon, 'I would not exchange for the sures of India.' Rousseau had always a work going rainy days and spare hours, such as his dictionary music; a variety of works never tired; the single one exhausted. Metastasio talks with delight of his va- which resembled the fruits in the garden of Armida,

While one matures, the other buds and blows.

for is it always fame, nor any lower motive, which induces him to hold an indefatigable pen; another ally powerful exists, which must remain inexplicable un who knows not to escape from the listlessness of the passion for literary occupation. He whose eye only measure the space occupied by the voluminous ore of the older Pliny, of a Mazzuchelli, a Muratori, fontaillon, and a Gough; all men who laboured from love of labour, and can see nothing in that space but industry which filled it, is like him who only views a at a distance—the streets and the squares, and all life and population within, he can never know. These ary characters projected these works as so many mes to escape from uninteresting pursuits; and, in a folios, how many evils of life did they bury, while happiness expanded with their volume. Aulus Gel- desired to live no longer, than he was able to retain faculty of writing and observing. The literary char- er must grow as impassioned with his subject as Eli- with his History of Animals; 'wealth and honour I it have obtained at the courts of princes; but I pre- the delight of multiplying my knowledge. I am re that the avaricious and the ambitious will accuse me of folly, but I have always found most pleasure in observing the nature of animals, studying their character, and writing their history.' Even with those who have acquired their celebrity, the love of literary labour is not diminished, a circumstance recorded by the younger Pliny of Livy; in a preface to one of his lost books, that histo- rian had said that he had got sufficient glory by his former writings on the Roman history, and might now repose in silence; but his mind was so restless and so abhorrent of indolence, that it only felt its existence in literary exertion. Such are the minds who are without hope, if they are without occupation.

Amidst the repose and silence of study, delightful to the literary character, are the soothing interruptions of the voices of those whom he loves; these shall re-animate his languor, and moments of inspiration shall be caught in the emotions of affection, when a father or a friend, a wife, a daughter, or a sister, become the participators of his own tastes, the companions of his studies, and identify their happiness with his fame. If Horace was dear to his friends, he declares they owed him to his father,

—purus et insons
(Ut me collaudem) si vivo et carus amicis, Causa fuit Pater his.

Lib. i. Sat. vi. v. 66.

If pure and innocent, if dear (forgive
These little praises) to my friends I live,
My father was the cause.

Francis.

This intelligent father, an obscure tax-gatherer, discovered the propensity of Horace's mind; for he removed the boy of genius from a rural seclusion to the metropo- lis, anxiously attending on him to his various masters. Vitruvius pours forth a grateful prayer to the memory of his parents, who had instilled into his soul a love for literary and philosophical subjects. The father of Gibbon urged him to literary distinction, and the dedication of the 'Essay on literature,' to that father, connected with his subsequent labour, shows the force of the excitement. The son of Buffon one day surprised his father by the sight of a column, which he had raised to the memory of his father's eloquent genius. 'It will do you honour,' observed the Gallic sage. And when that son in the revolution was led to the guillotine, he ascended in silence, so impressed with his father's fame, that he only told the people, 'I am the son of Buffon!' It was the mother of Burns who kindled his genius by delighting his childhood with the recitations of the old Scottish ballads, while to his father he attributed his cast of character; as Bishop Watson has recently traced to the affectionate influence of his mother, the religious feelings which he declares he had inherited from her. There is, what may be called, family genius; in the home of a man of genius he diffuses an electrical atmosphere; his own pre-eminence strikes out talents in all. Evelyn, in his beautiful retreat at Sayes Court, had inspired his family with that variety of tastes which he himself was spreading throughout the nation. His son translated Rapin's 'Gardens' which poem the father proudly preserved in his 'Sylvia'; his lady, ever busy in his study, excelled in the arts her husband loved, and designed the frontispiece to his Lucretius; she was the cultivator of their celebrated garden, which served as 'an example,' of his great work on 'forest trees.' Cow- ley, who has commemorated Evelyn's love of books and gardens, has delightfully applied them to his lady, in whom, says the bard, Evelyn meets both pleasures;

'The fairest garden in her looks,
And in her mind the wisest books.'

The house of Haller resembled a temple consecrated to science and the arts, for the votaries were his own family. The universal acquirements of Haller, were possessed in some degree by every one under his roof; and their studious delight in transcribing manuscripts, in consulting authors, in botanising, drawing and colouring the plants under his eye, formed occupations which made the daughters happy and the sons eminent. The painter Stella inspired his family to copy his fanciful inventions, and the playful graver of Claudine Stella, his niece, animated his 'Sports of Children.' The poems of the late Hurdus were printed by the hands of his sisters.

No event in literary history is more impressive than the fate of Quintilian; it was in the midst of his elaborate work, composed to form the literary character of a son, his great hope, that he experienced the most terrible affliction in the domestic life of genius—the deaths of his wife, and one child after the other. It was a moral earthquake with a single survivor amidst the ruins. An awful burst of parental and literary affliction breaks forth in Quintilian's lamentation,—'my wealth, and my writings, the fruits of a long and painful life, must now be reserved only for strangers; all I possess is for aliens and no longer mine!' The husband, the father, and the man of genius, utter one cry of agony.

Deprived of these social consolations, we see Johnson call about him those whose calamities exiled them from society, and his roof lodges the blind, the lame and the poor; for the heart of genius must possess something human it can call its own to be kind to. Its elevated emotions, even in domestic life, would enlarge the moral vocabulary, like the Abbé de Saint Pierre, who has fixed in his language two significant words; one which served to explain the virtue most familiar to him—bienfaisance; and the irritable vanity magnifying its ephemeral fame the sage reduced to a mortifying diminutive—la glorie.

It has often excited surprise that men of genius eminent in the world, are not more revered than other men in their domestic circle. The disparity between the public and the private esteem of the same man is often striking; in privacy the comic genius is not always cheerful, the sage is sometimes ridiculous, and the poet not delightful. The golden hour of invention must terminate like other hours, and when the man of genius returns to the cares, the duties, the vexations, and the amusements of life, his companions behold him as one of themselves—the creature of habits and infirmities. Men of genius, like the deities of Homer, are deities only in their 'Heaven of Invention': mixing with mortals, they shed their blood like Venus, or bellow like Mars. Yet in the business of life the cultivators of science and the arts, with all their simplicity of feeling and generous openness about them, do not meet on equal terms with other men; their frequent abstractions calling off the mind to whatever enters into its favourite pursuits, render them greatly inferior to others in practical and immediate observation. A man of genius may know the whole map of the world of human nature; but, like the great geographer, may be apt to be lost in the wood, which any one in the neighbourhood knows better than him. 'The conversation of a poet,' says Goldsmith, 'is that of a man of sense, while his actions are those of a fool.' Genius, careless of the future, and absent in the present, avoids to mix too deeply in common life as its business; hence it becomes an easy victim to common foals and vulgar villains. 'I love my family's welfare, but I cannot be so foolish as to make myself the slave to the minute affairs of a house,' said Montequieu. The story told of a man of learning is probably true, however ridiculous; deeply occupied in his library, one, rushing in, informed him that the house was on fire! 'Go to my wife—these matters belong to her!' pettishly replied the interrupted student. Bacon sat at one end of his table wrapt in many a reverie, while at the other the creatures about him were trafficking with his honour, and ruining his good name; 'I am better fitted for this,' said that great man once, holding out a book, 'than for the life I have of late led.' Buffon, who consumed his mornings in his old tower of Montbar, at the end of his garden, with all nature opening to him, formed all his ideas of what was passing before him by the arts of an active and pliant capuchin, and the comments of a perurquier on the scandalous chronicles; those he treated as children; but the children commanded the great man. Dr Young, whose satires give the very anatomy of human foibles, was entirely governed by his house-keeper; she thought and acted for him, which probably greatly assisted the 'Night Thoughts'; but his curate exposed the domestic economy of a man of genius by a satirical novel. Was not the hero Marlborough, at the moment he was the terror of France and the glory of Germany, held under the finger of his wife by the meanest passion of avarice?

But men of genius have too often been accused of imaginary crimes; their very eminence attracts the lie of calumny, a lie which tradition conveys beyond the possibility of refutation. Sometimes reproached for being undutiful sons, because they displeased their fathers in making an obscure name celebrated. The family of Descartes were insensible to the lustre his studies reflected on them; they lamented, as a blot in their escutcheon, that Descartes, who was born a gentleman, should become a philosopher. This elevated genius was even denied the satisfaction of embracing an unforgiving parent, while his dwarfish brother, with a mind diminutive as his person, ridiculed his philosophic relative, and turned to advantage his philosophic dispositions. They have been disagreeable companions, because they felt the want of dullness, or the impertinence of instruction; as bell hands, when united to women, who without a man feeling had the mean sense, or the unnatural cruel prey upon their infirmities. But is the magnet magnet, though the particles scattered about it, except of attraction, are unattracted by its occult quality?

Poverty is the endemic distemper of the commonwealth but poverty is no term for 'ears polite.' Few can conceive a great character in a state of humble ease. That passion for wealth through all ranks, leaving Hollanders aside, seems peculiar to the country of the 'Wealth of Nations' is made the first principle of existence; and where the cul de sac is ever referred to commercial result. This is not the chief object of among the continental nations, where it seems perpetually restricted to the commercial class. Montesquieu, who was in England, observed that 'if he had been here nothing could have consoled him on failing to ascend a large fortune, but I do not lament the mediocrity of circumstances in France.' This evil, for such it may be considered, has much increased here since Montesquieu's visit. It is useless to persuade some that there is a poverty, neither vulgar, nor terrifying, asking no favour, on no terms receiving any—a poverty which annihilates ideal evils, and becomes even a source of pride—a poverty which will confer independence, that first step to power.

There have been men of genius who have even been willing to want. We see Rousseau rushing out of the hall the financier, selling his watch, copying music by sheet, and by the mechanical industry of two hours, chasing ten for genius. We may smile at the excess of young Barry, who finding himself too constant a tenant of tavern-company, imagined that his expenditure of a was occasioned by having money; to put an end to conflict, he threw the little he possessed at once into Liffey; but let us not forget that Barry, in the midst of life, confidently began a labour of years, and one of the noblest inventions in his art, a great poem in a poem with no other resource than what he found in seconds through the night, by which he furnished the day with those slight and saleable sketches which secured interrupted mornings for his genius. Spinoza, a man celebrated and calumniated as Epicurus, lived in a state of abstinence, even of honours, of pensions, and of presents, which, however disguised by kindness, he would not accept, so fearful was this philosopher of a cell lodging in a cottage, and obtaining a livelihood by public optical glasses, and at his death his small accounts show how he had subsisted on a few pence a day.

'Enjoy spare feast! a radish and an egg.'—Comus.

Spinoza said he never had spent more than he earned and certainly thought there was such a thing as squandering earnings. Such are the men who have often sunk at the light regard of their neighbours in contrast with the growing celebrity; and who feel that eternal trend, what the wisest and the poorest of the Athenians has said done to us, that 'not to want any thing is an attribute of Divinity; but man approximates to this perfection by wanting little.'

There may be sufficient motives to induce the better character to make a state of mediocrity his choice. If he loses his happiness, he mutilates his genius. Golden with the simplicity of his feelings and habits, in reviewing his life, tells us how he was always relapsing into his not propensity of comic writing; 'but the thought of this does not disturb me; for though in any other situation I might have been in easier circumstances, I should never have been so happy.' Bayle is a parent of the modern literary character; he pursued the same course, and early in life adopted the principle 'Neither to fear bad fortune, nor have any ardent desires for good.' He was acquainted with the passions only as their historians, and lived only for literature, he sacrificed to it the two great acquisitions of human pursuits—fortune and a family; but in England, in France, in Germany, in Italy, in Holland, in Prussia, at Geneva, he found a family of friends, and an accumulation of celebrity. A life of hard deprivations was long the life of Lianus. Without a fortune, it never seemed to him necessary to acquire. Peregriating on foot with a stylus, a magnifying glass, and a basket for plants, he shared with the peasant his rustic meal. New art acquired at a cheaper rate, says one of his eulogists, 'satisfied with the least of the little, he only felt the necessity of completing his Flora; and the want of fortune did deprive him of his glory, nor of that statue raised to after death in the gardens of the University of Upsal; of that solemn eulogy delivered by a crowned head; of those medals which the king of Sweden, and the desecrated, struck, to commemorate the genius of the three domes of Nature.

substituting fortune for the object of his designs, the genius deprives himself of the inspirations of him lives for himself; that is, for his Art. If he bends to public taste, not daring to raise it to his own, he has not choice of his subjects, which itself is a sort of invention.

A task-worker ceases to think his own thoughts; stipulated price and time are weighing on his pen or pencil, while the hour-glass is dropping its hasty sands. No man of genius would become something more than himself—if he would be wealthy and even luxurious, no sever torments him, besides the thirst of glory; such desires create many fears, and a mind in fear is a mind in slavery. So inadequate, too, are the remunerations of literary works, that the one of the greatest skill difficulty, and the longest labour, is not valued with the hasty spurious novelty for which the taste of the public craves, from the strength of its disease, rather than appetite. Rousseau observed that his musical opera, worked five or six weeks, brought him as much money he had received for his Emilius, which had cost him sixty years of meditation, and three years of composition. This single fact represents a hundred. In one of Shakespeare's sonnets he pathetically laments this condition of his necessities which forced him on the trade of assailing the public; and he illustrates this degradation by a cruel image. 'Hide Fortune,' cries the bard,—

'The guilty goddess of my harmless deeds,
That did not better for my life provide
Than public means which public manners breeds;
Thence comes it that my name receives a brand;
And almost thence my nature is subdued
To what it works in, LIKE THE DYER'S HAND.'

Such is the fate of that author, who, in his variety of sk-workers, blue, yellow, and red, lives without ever having own his own natural complexion. We hear the eloquent truth from another who has shared in the bliss of composition, and the misery of its 'daily bread.' 'A single hour of composition won from the business of the day, is worth more than the whole day's toil of him who works at the trade of literature; in the one case the spirit moves joyfully to refresh itself, like a hart to the water-courses; in the other it pursues its miserable way, panting and jaded with the dogs of hunger and necessity behind.* Genius undegraded and unexhausted, may, indeed, even a garret, glow in its career; but it must be on the principle which induced Rousseau solemnly to renounce writing 'par métier.' This in the Journal des Savans he has attempted, but found himself quite inadequate to 'the occasion.'† In a garret, the author of the 'Studies of Nature' exultingly tells us that he arranged his work. 'It is in a little garret, in the new street of St Etienne du Louvre, where I resided four years, in the midst of physical and domestic afflictions. But there I enjoyed the most exquisite pleasures of my life, amid profound solitude and a enchanting horizon. There I put the finishing hand on my 'Studies of Nature,' and there I published them. It has been a question with some, more indeed abroad than at home, whether the art of instructing mankind by the press would not be less suspicious in its character, were it less interested in one of its motives? We have had some noble self-deniials of this kind, and are not without them even in our country. Boileau almost censures himself for having accepted money for one of his dramas, while he who was not rich, gave away his elaborate works to the public; and he seems desirous of raising the art of writing to a more disinterested profession than any other requiring no fees. Milton did not compose his immortal poem with any view of copyright; and Linguet sold his works for a single ducat. The Abbé Mably, the author of many political and moral works, preserved the dignity of the literary character, for while he lived on little, he could accept only a few presentation copies from the book-sellers. Since we have become a nation of book collectors.

* Quarterly Review, No. XVI, p. 538.
† Twice he repeated this resolution.—See his works, Vol. xxi, p. 263. Vol. xxxii, p. 50.

ors, the principle seems changed; even the wealthy author becomes proud of the largest tribute paid to his genius, because this tribute is the evidence of the numbers who pay it; so that the property of a book represents to the literary candidate so many thousand voters in his favour.

The man of genius wrestling with heavy and oppressive fortune, who follows the avocations of an author as a precarious source of existence, should take as the model of the authorial life that of Dr Johnson; the dignity of the literary character was ever associated with his feelings; and the 'reverence thyself' was present to his mind even when doomed to be one of the Helots of literature, by Osborn, by Cave, or by Millar. Destitute of this ennobling principle, the author sinks into the tribe of those rabid adventurers of the pen who have masked the degraded form of the literary character under the title of 'authors by profession—the Guthries, the Ralphs, and the Amhursts.' 'There are worse evils, for the literary man,' says a modern author, who is himself the true model of the literary character,—than neglect, poverty, imprisonment, and death. There are even more piteous objects than Chatterton himself with the poison of his lips.' 'I should die with hunger, were I at peace with the world,' exclaimed a corsair of literature,—and dashed his pen into that black flood before him of soot and gall.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE MATRIMONIAL STATE.

Matrimony has often been considered as a condition not well suited to the domestic life of genius; it is accompanied by too many embarrassments for the head and the heart. It was an axiom with Fussell, the Swiss artist, that the marriage state is incompatible with a high cultivation of the fine arts. Peireac the great French collector, refused marriage, convinced that the cares of a family were too absorbing for the freedom necessary to literary pursuits, and a sacrifice of fortune incompatible with his great designs. Boyle, who would not suffer his studies to be interrupted by 'household affairs,' lived as a boarder with his sister Lady Ranelagh. Bayle, and Hobbes, and Hume, and Gibbon, and Adam Smith, decided for celibacy. Such has been the state of the great author whose sole occupation is combined with passion, and whose happiness is his fame—fame, which balances that of the heroes of the age, who have sometimes honoured themselves by acknowledging it.

This debate, for our present topic has sometimes warmed into one, in truth is ill adapted for controversy; the heart is more concerned in its issue than any espoused doctrine terminating in partial views. Look into the domestic annals of genius—observe the variety of positions into which the literary character is thrown in the nuptial state. Will cynicism always obtain his sullen triumph, and prudence be allowed to calculate away some of the richer feelings of our nature? Is it an axiom that literary characters must necessarily institute a new order of celibacy? One position we may assume, that the studies, and even the happiness of the pursuits of literary characters, are powerfully influenced by the domestic associate of their lives.

Men of genius rarely pass through the age of love without its passion: even their Delias and Amandas are often the shadows of some real object. According to Shakespeare's experience,

'Never durst poet touch a pen to write,
Until his ink were tempered with love's sighs.'
Love's Labour Lost, Act IV. Scene 2.

Their imagination is perpetually colouring those pictures of domestic happiness they delight to dwell on. He who is no husband may sigh for that devoted tenderness which is at once bestowed and received; and tears may start in the eyes of him who can become a child among children, and is no father. These deprivations have usually been the concealed cause of the querulous and settled melancholy of the literary character. The real occasion of Shakespeare's unhappiness was, that early in life he had been captivated by a young lady adapted to be both the muse and the wife of the poet. Her mild graces were soon touched by his plaintive love-songs and elegies. Their

* The reader will find an original letter by Guthrie to a Minister of State, in which this modern phrase was probably his own invention, with the principle unblushingly avowed. See 'Calamities of Authors,' vol. I, p. 6. Ralph farther opens mysteries, in an anonymous pamphlet of 'The Case of Authors by profession.' They were both pensioned sensibility was too mutual, and lasted for some years, till she died. It was in parting from her that he first sketched his 'Pastoral Ballad.' Shenstone had the fortitude to refuse marriage; his spirit could not endure that she should participate in that life of deprivations to which he was doomed, by an inconsiderate union with poetry and poverty. But he loved, and his heart was not locked up in the ice of celibacy. He says in a moment of humour, 'It is long since I have considered myself as widow. The world will not perhaps consider me in that light entirely till I have married my maid.' Thomson met a reciprocal passion in his Amanda, while the full tenderness of his heart was ever wasting itself like waters in a desert. As we have been made little acquainted with this part of the history of these deep feelings from a manuscript letter written to Mallet. 'To turn my eyes a softer way, to you know who—absence sighs it to me. What is my heart made of? a soft system of low nerves, too sensible for my quiet—capable of being very happy or very unhappy, I am afraid the last will prevail. Lay your hand upon a kindred heart, and despise me not. I know not what it is, but she dwells upon my thought in a mingled sentiment, which is the sweetest, the most intimately pleasing the soul can receive, and which I would wish never to want towards some dear object or another. To have always some secret darling idea to which one can still have recourse amidst the noise and nonsense of the world, and which never fails to touch us in the most exquisite manner, is an art of happiness that fortune cannot deprive us of. This may be called romantic; but whatever the cause is, the effect is really felt. Pray, when you write, tell me when you saw her, and with the pure eye of a friend, when you see her again, whisper that I am her most humble servant.' Even Pope was enamoured of 'a scornful lady; and as Johnson observed, 'polluted his will with female resentment.' Johnson himself, we are told by Miss Seward, who knew him, 'had always a metaphysical passion for one princess or other,—the rustic Lucy Porter, or the haughty Molly Astor, or the sublimated methodist Hill Boothby; and lastly, the more charming Mrs Thrale.' Even in his advanced age, at the height of his celebrity, we hear his cries of lonely wretchedness. 'I want every comfort; my life is very solitary and very cheerless. Let me know that I have yet a friend—let us be kind to one another.' But the 'kindness' of distant friends is like the polar sun, too far removed to warm. A female is the only friend the solitary can have, because her friendship is never absent. Even those who have eluded individual tenderness, are tortured by an aching void in their feelings. The stoic Akenside, in his books of 'Odes,' has preserved the history of a life of genius in a series of his own feelings. One entitled, 'At Study,' closes with these memorable lines;

'Me though no peculiar fair
Touches with a lover's care;
Though the pride of my desire
Asks immortal friendship's name,
Asks the palm of honest fame
And the old heroic lyre;
Though the day have smoothly gone,
Or to lettered leisure known,
Or in social duty spent;
Yet as eve my lonely breast
Seeks in vain for perfect rest,
Languishes for true content.'

If ever a man of letters lived in a state of energy and excitement which might raise him above the atmosphere of social love, it was assuredly the enthusiast, Thomas Hollis, who, solely devoted to literature and to republicanism, was occupied in furnishing Europe and America with editions of his favourite authors. He would not marry, lest marriage should interrupt the labours of his platonic politics. But his extraordinary memoirs, while they show an intrepid mind in a robust frame, bear witness to the self-tormentor who had trodden down the natural bonds of domestic life. Hence the deep 'dejection of his spirits;' those incessant cries, that he has no 'one to advise, assist, or cherish those magnanimous pursuits in him.' At length he retreated into the country, in utter hopelessness.

I go not into the country for attentions to agriculture as such, nor attentions of interest of any kind, which I have over despised as such; but as a used man, to pass the remainder of a life in tolerable sanity and quiet, after having given up the flower of it, voluntarily, day, week, month, year after year successive to each other, to public service, and being no longer able to sustain, in help mind, the labours that I have chosen to go through without falling speedily into the greatest disordered, and it might be imbecility itself. This is not colouring, but the exact plain truth, and Gray's,

'Poor moralist, and what art thou?
A solitary fly!
Thy joys no glittering female meets,
No hive hast thou of hoarded sweets.'

Assuredly it would not be a question whether these literary characters should have married, had not Montaigne, when a widower, declared that 'he would not marry a second time, though it were wisdom itself;—but the my Gascon has not disclosed how far Madame was concerned in this anathema.

If the literary man unites himself to a woman whose taste and whose temper, are adverse to his pursuits, he must courageously prepare for a martyrdom. Should a female mathematician be united to a poet, it is probable that she would be left to her abstractions; to demonstrate to herself how many a specious diagram fails when brought into its mechanical operation; or while discovering the infinite varieties of a curve, may deduce her husband's. If she becomes as jealous of his books as other wives are of the mistresses of their husbands, she may act the virgin even over his innocent papers. The wife of Bishop Cosin, while her husband was employed on his Lexicon, one day consigned the volume of many years to the flames; and obliged that scholar to begin a second siege of Troy in a second Lexicon. The wife of Whitelocke often destroyed his MSS and the marks of her nails have come down to posterity in the numerous lacerations still gaping in his 'Memorials.' The learned Sir Henry Saville, who devoted more than half his life, and near ten thousand pounds, to his magnificent edition of St Chrysostom, led a very uneasy life between that Saint and Lady Saville; and with her tenderness for him and her own want of moment, Saint Chrysostom incurred more than one danger. One of those learned scholars who translated the Scriptures, kept a diary of his studies and his domestic calamities, for they both went on together; buried only among his books, his wife, from many causes, plunged him in debt; he was compelled to make the last sacrifice of a literary man, by disposing of his library. But now, he writes books, and she worse and worse in temper, discounts were of fast growth between them. Our man of study found his wife, like the remora, a little fish, sticking at the bottom of his ship impeding its progress. He desperately resolved to fly from the country and his wife. There is a cool entry in the diary, on a warm proceeding, one morning; wherein he expresses some curiosity to know the cause of his wife being out of temper! Simplicity of a patient scholar! * The present matrimonial case, however, terminated in unexpected happiness; the wife, after having forced her husband to be deprived of his library, to be daily chronicling her caprices, and finally, to take the senseless resolution of abandoning his country, yet, living in good times, religion and conscience united them again; and, as the connubial diarist ingeniously describes this second marriage of himself and his wife,—made it be with them, as surgeons say it is with a fractured bone, if once well set, the stronger for a fracture.' A new consolation for domestic ruptures!

Observe the errors and infirmities of the greatest and genius in their matrimonial connections. Milton could nothing of the greatness of his mind, in the choice of his wives; his first wife was the object of sudden fancy. He left the metropolis, and unexpectedly returned a married man; united to a woman of such uncongenial disposition, that the romp was frightened at the literary habits of his great poet, found his house solitary, beat his nephews, and ran away after a single month's residence! To this circumstance, we owe his famous treatise on Divorce, and a party, (by no means extinct,) who, having made it choices in their wives, were for divorcing, as fast as they had been for marrying, calling themselves Militants. When we find that Moliere, so skilful in human life, married a girl from his own troop, who made him exclaim

* The entry may amuse. Hodie, nescio qua inopem uxorem meam agitar, nam pecuniam usudatam propter mihi, ac sic irata disceat.—'This day, I know not the cause the ill-temper of my wife; when I gave her money for her expenses, she flung it upon the ground and departed in passion.' For some, this Flemish picture must be so far from please, too minute a copy of vulgar life those bitter disgusts and ridiculous embarrassments which he himself played off at the Theatre; that Addison's taste in morals and in life, could suffer the ambition of a courtier to prevail with himself to seek a Countess, whom he describes under the stormy character of Oceana, who over him contemptuously into solitude, and shortened his days; and, that Steele, warm and thoughtless, was united to a cold precise 'Miss Prue,' as he calls her, and from whom he never parted without bickerings; in all these cases we censure the great men, not their wives.* Rousseau has honestly confessed his error: he had united himself to a low illiterate woman—and when he retreated into solitude, he felt the weight which he carried with him. He laments that he had not educated his wife; 'In a docile age, I could have adorned her mind with talents and knowledge which would have more closely united us in retirement. We should not then have felt the intolerable tedium à tête à tête; it is in solitude one feels the advantage of living with another who can think.' Thus Rousseau confesses the fatal error, and indicates the right principle.

But it seems not absolutely necessary for the domestic happiness of the literary character, that his wife should be a literary woman. The lady of Wieland was a very pleasing domestic person, who without reading her husband's works, knew he was a great poet. Wieland was apt to exercise his imagination in a sort of angry declamation and bitter amplifications; and the writer of this account in perfect German taste, assures us, 'that many of his felicities of diction were thus struck out at a heat' during this frequent operation of his genius, the placable temper of Mrs Wieland overcame the organ of the German bard, merely by her admiration and her patience. When the burst was over, Wieland himself was so charmed by her docility, that he usually closed with giving up all his opinions. There is another sort of homely happiness, aptly described in the plain words of Bishop Newton: He found 'the study of sacred and classic authors ill agreed with butchers' and bakers' bills'; and when the prospect of a bishopric opened on him, 'more servants, more entertainments, a better table, &c.' it became necessary to look out for 'some clever sensible woman to be his wife, who would lay out his money to the best advantage, and be careful and tender of his health; a friend and companion at all hours, and who would be happier in staying at home than be perpetually gadding abroad.' Such are the wives, not adapted to be the votaries, but who may be the faithful companions through life, even of a man of genius.

That susceptibility, which is love in its most compliant form, is a constitutional faculty in the female character, and hence its docility and enthusiasm has varied with the genius of different ages. When universities were opened to the sex, have they not acquired academic glory? Have not the wives of military men shared in the perils of the field, and as Anna Comnena, and our Mrs Hutchinson, become even their historians? In the age of love and sympathy the female receives an indelible character from her literary associate; his pursuits are even the objects of her thoughts; he sees his tastes reflected in his family, much less by himself, whose solitary labours often preclude him from forming them, than by that image of his own genius in his house—the mother of his children. Antiquity abounds with many inspiring examples of this camelion reflection of the female character. Aspasia, from her arms of Pericles, borrowing his genius, could instruct her archons how to govern the republic; Portia, the wife of the republican Brutus, devouring the burning coals, showed a glorious suicide which Brutus had approved; while Paulina, the wife of Seneca, when the veins of that philosopher were commanded to be opened, voluntarily chose the same death; the philosopher commanded that her flowing blood should be stopped, but her pallid features never after showed her still the wife of Seneca! The wife of Lucan is said to have transcribed and corrected the Pharsalia after the death of her husband; and the tender mind of the wife had caught the energy of the bard by its intercourse; and when he was no more, she placed his bust in her bed, that she might never close her eyes without being soothed by his image. The picture of a literary wife of antiquity has descended to us, touched by the domestic pencil of a man of genius. It is the susceptible Calpurnia, the lady of the younger Pliny; 'her affection to me has given her a turn to books—her passion will increase with our days, for it is not my youth or my person which time gradually impairs, but my reputation and my glory, of which she is enamoured.' Could Mrs Hutchinson have written the life of her husband, had she not reflected from the patriot himself, all his devotedness to the country, had she not lent her whole soul to every event which concerned him? This female susceptibility was strong in the wife of Klopstock; our novelist Richardson, who could not read the Messiah in the original, was desirous of some account of the poem, and its progress. She writes to him that no one can inform him better than herself, for she knows the most of that which is not published, 'being always present at the birth of the young verses, which begin by fragments here and there, of a subject of which his soul is just then filled. Persons who live as we do have no need of two chambers; we are always in the same; I with my little work, still, still,—only regarding sometimes my husband's sweet face, which is so venerable at that time, with tears of devotion and all the sublimity of the subject—my husband reading me his young verses and suffering my criticisms.' Meta Mollers writes with enthusiasm, and in German English; but he is a pitiful critic who has only discovered the oddness of her language.

Gesner declared that whatever were his talents, the person who had most contributed to develop them was his wife. She is unknown to the public; but the history of the mind of such a woman can only be truly discovered in the 'Letters of Gesner and his Family.' While Gesner gave himself up entirely to his favourite arts, drawing, painting, etching, and composing poems, his wife would often reanimate a genius that was apt to despond in its attempts, and often exciting him to new productions, her certain and delicate taste was attentively consulted by the poet-painter—but she combined the most practical good sense with the most feeling imagination; this forms the rareness of the character—for this same woman, who united with her husband in the education of their children, to relieve him from the interruptions of common business, carried on alone the concerns of his house in la librairie. Her correspondence with her son, a young artist travelling for his studies, opens what an old poet comprehensively terms 'a gathered mind.' Imagine a woman attending the domestic economy, and the commercial details yet withdrawing out of this business of life into that of the more elevated pursuits of her husband, and the cares and counsels she bestowed on her son to form the artist and the man. To know this incomparable woman we must hear her. 'Consider your father's precepts as oracles of wisdom; they are the result of the experience he has collected, not only of life, but of that art which he has acquired simply by his own industry.' She would not have her son suffer his strong affection to herself to absorb all other sentiments. 'Had you remained at home, and been habituated under your mother's auspices to employments merely domestic, what advantage would you have acquired? I own we should have passed some delightful winter evenings together; but your love for the arts, and my ambition to see my sons as much distinguished for their talents as their virtues, would have been a constant source of regret at your passing your time in a manner so little worthy of you.' How profound is her observation on the strong but confined attachments of a youth of genius. 'I have frequently remarked, with some regret, the excessive attachment you indulge towards those who see and feel as you do yourself, and the total neglect with which you seem to treat every one else. I should reproach a man with such a fault who was destined to pass his life in a small and unvarying circle; but in an artist, who has a great object in view, and whose country is the whole world, this disposition seems to me likely to produce a great number of inconveniences—alas! my son, the life you have hitherto led in your father's house has been in fact a pastoral life, and not such a one as was necessary for the education of a man whose destiny summons him to the world.—And when her son, after meditating on some of the most glorious productions of art, felt himself as he says, 'disheartened and cast down at the unattainable superiority of the artist, and that it was only by reflecting on the immense labour and continued efforts which such master pieces must have required, that I regained my courage and my ardour, she observes, 'this passage, my dear son, is to me as precious as gold, and I send it to you again, because I wish you to impress it strongly on your mind. The remembrance of this may also be a useful preservative from too great confidence in your abilities, to which a warm imagination sometimes be liable, or from the despondence you occasionally feel from the contemplation of grand originals Continue, therefore, my dear son, to form a sound judgment and a pure taste from your own observations ; your mind, while yet young and flexible, may receive whatever impressions you wish. Be careful that your abilities do not inspire in you too much confidence, lest it should happen to you as it has to many others, that they have never possessed any greater merit than that of having good abilities.' One more extract to preserve an incident which may touch the heart of genius. This extraordinary woman whose characteristic is that of strong sense with delicacy of feeling, would check her German sentimentality at the moment she was betraying those emotions in which the imagination is so powerfully mixed up with the associated feelings. Arriving at their cottage at Suhlwald, she proceeds—'On entering the parlour three small pictures, painted by you, met my eyes. I passed some time in contemplating them. It is now a year, thought I since I saw him trace these pleasing forms ; he whistled and sang, and I saw them grow under his pencil ; now he is far, far from us.—In short, I had the weakness to press my lips on one of these pictures. You well know, my dear son, that I am not much addicted to scenes of a sentimental turn ; but to-day, while I considered your works, I could not restrain from this little impulse of maternal feelings. Do not, however, be apprehensive that the tender affection of a mother will ever lead me too far, or that I shall suffer my mind to be too powerfully impressed with the painful sensations to which your absence gives birth. My reason convinces me that it is for your welfare that you are now in a place where your abilities will have opportunities of unfolding, and where you can become great in your art.'

* See Curiosities of Literature, for various anecdotes of 'Literary Wives.'

'Such was the incomparable wife and mother of the Geometers!—Will it now be a question whether matrimony is incompatible with the cultivation of the arts ? A wife who reanimates the drooping genius of her husband, and a mother who is inspired by the ambition of seeing her sons eminent, is she not the real being which the ancients only personified in their Muse ?

CHAPTER XIV.

LITERARY FRIENDSHIPS.

Among the virtues which literature inspires, is that of the most romantic friendship. The delirium of love, and even its lighter caprices, are incompatible with the pursuits of the student ; but to feel friendship like a passion, is necessary to the mind of genius, alternately elated and depressed, ever prodigal of feeling, and exursive in knowledge.

The qualities which constitute literary friendship, compared with those of men of the world, must render it as rare as true love itself, which it resembles in that intellectual tenderness of which both so deeply participate. Two atoms must meet out of the mass of nature, of such purity, that when they once adhere, they shall be as one, resisting the utmost force of separation. This literary friendship begins 'in the dews of their youth,' and may be said not to expire on their tomb. Engaged in similar studies, if one is found to excel, he shall find in the other the protector of his fame. In their familiar conversations, the memory of the one associates with the fancy of the other ; and to such an intercourse, the world owes some of the finer effusions of genius, and some of those monuments of labour which required more than one giant hand.

In the poem Cowley composed on the death of his friend Harvey, this stanza opens a pleasing scene of two young literary friends engaged in their midnight studies.

'Say, for you saw us, ye immortal lights
How oft unwearied have we spent the nights
Till the Ladman stars, so famed for love,
Wondered at us from above.
We spent them not in toys, in lust, or wine ;
But search of deep philosophy,
Wit, eloquence, and poetry ;
Arts which I loved, for they, my friend, were thine.'

Milton has not only given the exquisite Lycidas to the memory of one young friend, but his Eptataphium Dementis to another.

'w, mournfully cries the youthful genius, as versified agborne,

'whom shal I my hopes and fears impart,
'rust the cares and follies of my heart ?'

The Sonnet of Gray on West, is another beautiful instance of that literary friendship of which we have many instances in our own days, from the school or the shop, and which have rivalled in devoted affection many of those pages can record.

Such a friendship can never be the lot of men of the world, for it takes its source in the most elevated feelings, it springs up only in the freshness of nature, and a passion in the golden age of human life. It is intellectual, it loves solitude ; for literary friendship has no courtly gaieties and factious assemblies. The friendships of men of society move on the principle of personal merit, or to relieve themselves from the loneliness of custom, but interest can easily separate the interested, and weariness is contagious, the contact of the perpetually watched. Men of the world may look on each other with the same countenances, but not with the same hearts. Literary friendship is a sympathy, not of manners, but of feelings. In the common mart of life may be found many friendships which terminate in complaint and contempt ; more they know one another, the less is their mutual esteem ; the feeble mind quarrels with one still more able than himself ; the dissolute riot with the dissolute, while they despise their companions, they too have become despicable.

That perfect unity of feeling, that ~~marking~~ of two individuals but one being is displayed in such cases as friendships as those of Beaumont and Fletcher ; their labours were so combined that no critic can detect the mingled production of either ; and whose lives were so closely united, that no biographer can compose the memoirs of the one without running into the life of the other. Their days were as closely interwoven as their veins. Montaigne and Charron, in the eyes of posterity, rivaled, but such literary friendship knows no rivalry ; it was Montaigne's affection for Charron, that he requested him by his will to bear the arms of the Montaignes ; Charron evinced his gratitude to the manes of his departed friend, by leaving his fortune to the sister of Montaigne. How pathetically Erasmus mourns over the death of his beloved Sir Thomas More—'In Moro scribi videtur aliusque us,—'I seem to see myself extinct in More.—It was melancholy preage of his own death, which shortly afterwards followed. The Doric sweetness and simplicity of Isaac Walton, the angler, were reflected in a most clear and generous, when Charles Cotton continued his feelings, rather than the little work of Walton. Montaigne and Farnelli called each other il Gemello, the Twin, and both delighted to trace the resemblance of their lives and fates, and the perpetual alliance of the verse and the voice.

Goguet, the author of 'The Origin of the Arts and Sciences,' bequeathed his MSS. and his books to his friend Fugere, with whom he had long united his affections and his studies, that his surviving friend might proceed with them ; but the author had died of a slow and painful disorder, while Fugere had watched by the side of his dying friend, in silent despair ; the sight of these MSS. and books was his death-stroke ; half his soul which had once given them animation was parted from him, and a few weeks terminated his own days. When Lloyd heard of the death of Churchill, he neither wished to revive him nor did. The Abbé de St Pierre gave an interesting proof of literary friendship for Varignon the geometer ; they were of congenial dispositions, and St Pierre when he went to Paris, could not endure to part with Varignon, who was too poor to accompany him ; and St Pierre was not rich. A certain income, however moderate, was necessary for the tranquil pursuits of geometry. St Pierre presented Varignon with a portion of his own income, accompanied by that delicacy of feeling which men of genius who know each other can best conceive : 'I do not give it you,' said St Pierre, 'as a salary, but an annuity, that thus you may be independent and quit me when you dislike me.' The same circumstance occurred between Akenside and Dyson, who, when the poet was in great danger of adding one more illustrious name to the Calamities of Authors, interposed between him and fortune, by allowing him an annuity of three hundred a year, and when he found the fame of his literary friend attacked, although not in the habit of composition, Dyson published an able and a curious defence of Akenside's poetical and philosophical character. The name and character of Dyson have been suffered to die away, without a single tribute of even biographical sympathy ; but is the record of literary glory, the patron's name should be inscribed by the side of the literary character ; for the which incurs an obligation whenever a man of genius is rejected.

The statesman Fouquet, deserted by all others, witnessed La Fontaine hastening every literary man to the rison-gate; many have inscribed their works to their disgraced patron, in the hour

When Int'rest calls off all her sneaking train,
And all the obliged desert, and all the vain,
They wait, or to the scaffold, or the cell,
When the last ling'ring friend has bid farewell.

Such are the friendships of the great literary character! Their elevated minds have raised them into domestic heroes, whose deeds have been often only recorded on that idling register, the human heart.

CHAPTER XV.

THE LITERARY AND PERSONAL CHARACTER.

Are the personal dispositions of an author discoverable in his writings as those of an artist are imagined to appear in his works, where Michael Angelo is always great and Raphael ever graceful?

Is the moralist a moral man? Is he malignant who publishes caustic satires? Is he a libertine who composes loose poems? And is he whose imagination delights in error and in blood, the very monster he paints?

Many licentious writers have led chaste lives. La Mothe le Vayer wrote two works of a free nature; yet it was the unblemished life of a retired sage. Bayle is too faithful compiler of impurities, but he resisted the corruption of the senses as much as Newton. La Fontaine wrote tales fertile in intrigues, yet the 'bon homme' is not left on record a single ingenious amour. Smollet's character is immaculate; yet he has described two scenes which offend even in the freedom of imagination. Cowley, who boasts with such gaiety of the versatility of his passion among so many mistresses, wanted even the confidence to address one. Thus, licentious writers may be very chaste men; for the imagination may be a volcano, while the heart is an Alp of ice.

Turn to the moralist—there we find Seneca, the disinterested usurer of seven millions, writing on moderate desires, on a table of gold. Sallust, who so eloquently decries against the licentiousness of the age, was repeatedly accused in the Senate of public and habitual debaucheries; and when this inveigher against the spoilers of provinces attained to a remote government, Sallust pillaged like Verres. Lucian, when young, declared against the friendship of the great, as another name for servitude; but when his talents procured him a situation under the Emperor, he facetiously compared himself to those quacks, who themselves plagued with a perpetual cough, offer to all an infallible remedy for one. Sir Thomas More, in his Utopia, declares that no man ought to be punished for his religion; yet he became a fierce persecutor, racking and burning men when his own true faith here was at theebb. At the moment the poet Rousseau was giving versions of the Psalms, full of anction, as our neighbours say, he was profaning the same pen with the most infamous of epigrams. We have heard of an erotic poet of our times composing sacred poetry, or night-hymns in church-yards. The pathetic genius of Sterne played about his head, but never reached his heart.

And thus with the personal dispositions of an author, which may be quite the reverse from those which appear in his writings. Chanson would not believe that Horace was a happy man, because his verses were cheerful, no more than he could think Pope so, because he is continually informing us of it. Young, who is constantly commending preferment in his writings, was all his life pining after it; and while the sombrous author of the 'Night Thoughts' was composing them, he was as cheerful as any other man; he was as lively in conversation as he was gloomy in his writings: and when a lady expressed her surprise at his social converse, he replied—'There is such a difference between writing and talking.' Molière, on the contrary, whose humour was so perfectly comic, and even ludicrous, was a very thoughtful and serious man, and perhaps even of a melancholy temper: his strongly-natured physiognomy exhibits the face of a great tragic, rather than of a great comic poet. Could one have imagined that the brilliant wit, the luxuriant raillery, and the deep and deep sense of Pascal had been combined with the most opposite qualities—the hypochondriasm and bigotry of an ascetic? Rochefoucauld, says the eloquent Dugald Stewart, in private life was a conspicuous example of all those moral qualities of which he seemed to deny the existence, and exhibited in this respect a striking contrast to the Cardinal De Retz, who has presumed to censure him for his want of faith in the reality of virtue; and to which we must add, that De Retz was one of those pretended patriots without a single of those virtues for which he was the clamorous advocate of faction. When Voltaire attributed the excessive tenderness in the tragedies of Racine to the poet's own impassioned character, the younger Racine amply showed that his father was by no means this glave of love; that his intercourse with a certain actress was occasioned by his pains to form her, who with a fine voice, and memory, and beauty, was incapable of comprehending the verses she recited, or accompanying them with any natural gesture. The tender Racine never wrote a single love poem, nor had a mistress; and his wife had never read his tragedies, for poetry was not her delight. Racine's motive for making love the constant source of action in his tragedies, was on the principle which has influenced so many poets, who usually conform to the prevalent taste of the times. In the court of a young monarch, it was necessary that heroes should be lovers; and since Corneille had no nobly run in one career, Racine could not have existed as a great poet, had he not rivalled him in an opposite one. The tender Racine was no lover; but he was a subtle and epigrammatic observer, before whom his convivial friends never cared to open their minds. It is not therefore surprising if we are often erroneous in the conception we form of the personal character of a distant author. Klopstock, the votary of Zion's muse, so astonished and warmed the sage Bodmer, that he invited the inspired bard to his house; but his visitor shocked the grave professor, when, instead of a poet rapt in silent meditation, a volatile youth leapt out of the chaise, who was an enthusiast for retirement only when writing verses. An artist whose pictures exhibit a series of scenes of domestic tenderness, awakening all the charities of private life, participated in them in no other way than on his canvass. Evelyn, who has written in favour of active life, loved and lived in retirement; while Sir George Mackenzie framed an eulogium on solitude, who had been continually in the bustle of business.

Thus an author and an artist may yield no certain indication of their personal character in their works. Inconstant men will write on constancy, and licentious minds may elevate themselves into poetry and piety. And were this not so, we should be unjust to some of the greatest geniuses, when the extraordinary sentiments they put into the mouths of their dramatic personages are maliciously applied to themselves. Euripides was accused of atheism, when he made a denier of the gods appear on the stage. Milton has been censured by Clarke for the impiety of Satan; and it was possible that an enemy of Shakespeare might have reproached him for his perfect delineation of the accomplished villain Iago; as it was said that Dr Moore was sometimes hurt in the opinions of some, by his horrid Zeluco. Crebillon complains of some.—'They charge me with all the iniquities of Atræus, and they consider me in some places as a wretch with whom it is unfit to associate; as if all which the mind invents must be derived from the heart.' This poet offers a striking instance of the little alliance existing between the literary and personal dispositions of an author. Crebillon, who exulted on his entrance into the French academy, that he had never tinged his pen with the gall of satire, delighted to strike on the most harrowing string of the tragic lyre. In his Atræus, the father drinks the blood of his son; in Rhadamistus, the son expires under the hand of the father; in Electra, the son assassinates the mother. A poet is a painter of the soul; but a great artist is not therefore a bad man.

Montaigne appears to have been sensible of this fact in the literary character. Of authors, he says, he likes to read their little anecdotes and private passions; and adds, 'Car j'ai une singulière curiosité de connoître l'ame et les naïfs jugemens de mes auteurs. Il faut bien juger leur suffisance, mais non pas leurs moeurs, ni eux, par cette montre de leurs écrits qu'ils talent au théâtre du monde.' Which may be thus translated—'For I have a singular curiosity to know the soul and simple opinions of my authors. We must judge of their ability, but not of their manners, nor of themselves, by that show of their writings which they display on the theatre of the world.' This is very just, and are we yet convinced, that the simplicity of this old favourite of Europe, might not have been as much a theatrica gesture, as the sentimentality of Sterne?

We must not therefore consider that he who paints vice with energy is therefore vicious, lest we injure an honourable man; nor must we imagine that he who celebrates virtue is therefore virtuous, for we may then repose on a heart which knowing the right pursues the wrong.

These paradoxical appearances in the history of genius present a curious moral phenomenon. Much must be attributed to the plastic nature of the versatile faculty itself. Men of genius have often resisted the indulgence of one talent to exercise another with equal power; some, who have solely composed sermons, could have touched on the fables of society with the spirit of Horace or Juvenal; Blackstone and Sir William Jones directed that genius to the austere studies of law and philology, which might have excelled in the poetical and historical character. So versatile is this faculty of genius, that its possessors are sometimes uncertain of the manner in which they shall treat their subject; whether to be grave or ludicrous? When Brebeuf, the French translator of the Pharsalia of Lucan, had completed the first book as it now appears, he at the same time composed a burlesque version, and sent both to the great arbiter of taste in that day, to decide which the poet should continue? The decision proved to be difficult. Are there not writers who can brew a tempest or fling a sunshine with all the vehemence of genius at their will? They adopt one principle, and all things shrink into the pigmy forms of ridicule; they change it, and all rise to stately, with animated Colossuses. On this principle of the versatility of the faculty, a production of genius is a piece of art which wrought up to its full effect is merely the result of certain combinations of the mind, with a felicity of manner obtained by taste and habit.

Are we then to reduce the works of a man of genius to a mere sport of his talents; a game in which he is only the best player? Can he whose secret power raises so many emotions in our breasts, be without any in his own? A mere actor performing a part? Is he unfeeling when he is pathetic, indifferent when he is indignant? An alien to all the wisdom and virtue he inspires? No! were men of genius themselves to assert this, and it is said some incline to it, there is a more certain conviction, that their mistakes, in our own consciousness, which for ever assures us, that deep feelings and elevated thoughts must spring from their source.

In proving that the character of the man may be very opposite to that of his writing, we must recollect that the habits of life may be contrary to the habits of the mind. The influence of their studies over men of genius, is limited; out of the ideal world, man is reduced to be the active creature of sensation. An author, has in truth, two distinct characters; the literary, formed by the habits of his study; the personal, by the habits of situation. Gray, cold, effeminate and timid in his personal, was lofty and awful in his literary character; we see men of polished manners and bland affection, in grasping a pen, are thrusting a poignard; while others in domestic life, with the simplicity of children and the feebleness of nervous affections, can shake the senate or the bar with the vehemence of their elquence and the intrepidity of their spirit.

And, however the personal character may contrast with that of their genius, still are the works themselves genuine, and exist in realities for us—and were so doubtless to themselves, in the act of composition. In the calm study, a beautiful imagination may convert him whose morals are corrupt, into an admirable moralist, awakening feelings which yet may be cold in the business of life; since we have shown that the phlegmatic can excite himself into wit, and the cheerful man delight in Night-thoughts. Salust, the corrupt Salust, might retain the most sublime conceptions of the virtues which were to save the Republic; and Sterne, whose heart was not so susceptible in ordinary occurrences, while he was gradually creating incident after incident, touching the emotions one after another, in the stories of Le Fevre and Maria, might have thrilled—like some of his readers.* Many have mourned

* Long after this was written, and while this volume was passing through the press, I discovered a new incident in the life of Sterne, which verifies my conjecture. By some unpublished letters of Sterne's in Mr Murray's Collection of Autographical Letters, it appears that early in life, he deeply fixed the affections of a young lady, during a period of five years, and for some cause I know not, he suddenly deserted her and married another. The young lady was too sensible of over the wisdom or the virtue they contemplated, and at their own infirmities. Thus, though there may be identity, between the book and the man, still for the author is ever an abstract being, and, as one of the poets said, 'a dead man may sin dead, leaving behind him no other sin.' An author's wisdom or his folly cannot die with him. The volume, not the author, is our companion, and is for us a real personage, performing to us whatever it inspires; 'he being dead, yet speaking.' Such is the vitality of a book!

CHAPTER XIV.

THE MAN OF LETTERS.

Among the more active members of the republic is a class to whom may be appropriately assigned the title of Men of Letters.

The man of letters, whose habits and whose whole so closely resemble those of an author, can only be distinguished by the simple circumstance, that the man of letters is not an author.

Yet he whose sole occupation through life is learning who is always acquiring and never producing appears ridiculous as the architect who never raised an edifice, the statuary who refrains from sculpture. His passions are reproached with terminating in an epicurean selfishness, and amidst his incessant avocations he himself is considered as a particular sort of idler.

This race of literary characters, as they now exist could not have appeared till the press had poured its influence; in the degree that the nations of Europe became literary, was that philosophical curiosity kindled, which induced some to devote their fortunes and their days to experience some of the purest of human enjoyment, preserving and familiarising themselves with the 'remnants of vanished minds,' that indestructible history of the genius of every people, through all its eras—and what men have thought and whatever men have done, were length discovered to be found in Books.

Men of letters occupy an intermediate station between authors and readers; with more curiosity of knowledge and more multiplied tastes, and by those precious collections which they are forming during their lives, more completely furnished with the means than are possessed by the multitude who read, and the few who write.

The studies of an author are usually restricted to particular subjects; his tastes are tinged by their coloring, and his mind is always shaping itself to them. An author's works form his solitary pride, and often mark the boundaries of his empire; while half his life wears away in the slow maturity of composition; and still the sensation of authorship torments its victim alike in disappointment or in possession.

But the solitude of the man of letters is smoothed by the surrounding objects of his passion; he possesses them, and they possess him. His volumes in triple rows on their shelves; his portfolios, those moveable galleries of pictures and sketches; his rich medallier of coins and gems, that library without books; some favourite sculptures and paintings on which his eye lingers as they catch a magical light; and some antiquities of all nations, here and there, about his house; these are his furniture. Every thing about him is so endeared to him by habit, and many higher associations, that even to quit his collections for a short time becomes a real suffering; he is one of the highlanders of the Hollanders—a lover or fancier.* He lives where he will die; often his library and his chamber are contiguous, and this 'Parva, sed apta,' this contracted space, his this act of treachery; she lost her senses and was confined in a private mad-house, where Sterne twice visited her. He has drawn and coloured the picture of her madness, which he himself had occasioned! This fact only adds to some which have so deeply injured the sentimental character of this author, and the whole spurious race of his wretched span. His life was lonely, and shadown, his principles unsected, and it does not seem that our wit bore a single attraction of personal affection about him; for his death was characteristic of his life. Sterne died at his lodgings, with neither friend nor relative by his side; a hired nurse was the sole companion of the man whose wit found admirers in every street, but whose heart could not draw one by his death-bed.

* The Dutch call every thing for which they have a passion Liefhebbers—things having their love; and as their feeling is much stronger than their delicacy, they apply the term to every thing, from poetry and picture to tulips and tobacco. Liefhebbers are lovers or fanciers.

and resumed without effort, yet if the realities of ch is that life of self-oblivion of the man of letters, for so many have voluntarily relinquished a public sta-or their rank in society; neglecting even fortune and

h. Of the pleasures of the man of letters it may be they combine those opposite sources of enjoyment in the hunter and the angler. Of a great hunter said, that he did not live but hunted; and the man ters, in his perpetual researches, feels the like beat-the joy of discovery, in his own chase; while in the calm of his spirits, such is the sweetness of his unin-rupted hours, like those of the angler that one may say of what Colonel Venables, an enthusiastic angler, deof his favourite pursuit, 'many have cast off other creations and embraced this; but I never knew any an-wholly cast off, though occasions might interrupt, their actions to their beloved recreation.'

But 'men of the world,' as they are so emphatically distinguished, imagine that a man so lifeless in 'the world' be one of the dead in it, and, with mistaken wit, ould inscribe over the sepulchre of his library, 'Here lies body of our friend.' If the man of letters has voluntarily quitted their 'world,' at least he has past into another where he enjoys a sense of existence through a long succession of ages, and where Time, who destroys all things for here, for him only preserves and discovers. This world best described by one who has lingered amongst its inspirations. 'We are wafted into other times and strange lands, connecting us by a sad but exalting relationship with great events and great minds which have passed away.
our studies at once cherish and controul the imagination, leading it over an unbounded range of the noblest scenes the overawing company of departed wisdom and genius.'

If the man of letters is less dependent on others for the very perception of his own existence, his solitude is not that of a desert, but of the most cultivated humanity; for all here tends to keep alive those concentrated feelings which cannot be indulged with security, or even without ridicule, in general society. Like the Lucullus of Plutarch, he would not only live among the votaries of literature, but would live for them; he throws open his library, his gallery, and his cabinet, to all the Grecians. Such are the men who father neglected genius, or awaken its infancy by the perpetual legacy of the 'Prizes' of Literature and science; who project those benevolent institutions where they have poured out the philanthropy of their hearts in that world which they appear to have forsaken. If Europe is literary, to whom does she owe this, more than to these men of letters? To their noble passion of amassing through life those magnificent collections, which often bear the names of their founders from the gratitude of a following age? Venice, Florence, and Copenhagen, Oxford and London, attest the existence of their labours. Our Bodleys and our Harleys, our Cottons and our Sloanes, our Cracherodes and our Townleys, were of this race! In the perpetuity of their own studies, they felt as if they were extending human longevity, by throwing an unbroken light of knowledge into the next age. Each of the public works, for such they become, was the project and the execution of a solitary man of letters during half a century; the generous enthusiasm which inspired their intrepid labours;
the difficulties overcome; the voluntary privations of what the world calls its pleasures and its honours would form an interesting history not yet written; their due, yet un-discharged.

Living more with books than with men, the man of letters is more tolerant of opinions than they are among themselves, nor are his views of human affairs contracted to the day, as those who in the heat and hurry of life can act only on expedients, and not on principles; who deem themselves politicians because they are not moralists; to whom the centuries behind have conveyed no results, and who cannot see how the present time is always full of the future; as Leibnitz has expressed a profound reflection.

'Every thing,' says the lively Burnet, 'must be brought to the nature of tinder or gunpowder, ready for a spark to set it on fire,' before they discover it. The man of letters is accused of a cold indifference to the interests which divide society. In truth, he knows their miserable beginnings and their certain terminations; he is therefore rarely observed as the head, or the rump, of a party.

Antiquity presents such a man of letters in Atticus, who retreated from a political to a literary life; had his letters accompanied those of Cicero they would have illustrated the ideal character of a man of letters. But the sage Atticius rejected a popular celebrity for a passion not less powerful yielding up his whole soul to study. Cicero, with all his devotion to literature, was still agitated by another kind of glory and the most perfect author in Rome imagined that he was enlarging his honours by the intrigues of the consulship. He has distinctly marked the character of the man of letters in the person of his friend Atticus, and has expressed his respect, although he could not content himself with its imitation. 'I know,' says this man of genius and ambition, 'I know the greatness and ingenuouness of your soul, nor have I found any difference between us, but in a different choice of life; a certain sort of ambition has led me earnestly to seek after honours, while other motives, by no means blameable, induced you to adopt an honourable leisure; honestum otium.* These motives appear in the interesting memoirs of this man of letters—a contempt of political intrigues with a desire to escape from the bustle and splendour of Rome to the learned leisure of Athens; to dismiss a pompous train of slaves for the delight of assembling under his roof a literary society of readers and transcribers; and there having collected the portraits or busts of the illustrious men of his country, he caught their spirit and was influenced by their virtues or their genius, as he inscribed under them, in concise verses, the characters of their mind. Valuing wealth only for its use, a dignified economy enabled him to be profuse, and a moderate expenditure allowed him to be generous.

The result of this literary life was the strong affections of the Athenians; at the first opportunity, the absence of the man of letters offered, they raised a statue to him, conferring on our Pomponius the fond surname of Atticus.
To have received a name from the voice of the city they inhabited, has happened to more than one man of letters.
Pinelli, born a Neapolitan, but residing at Venice, among other peculiar honours received from the senate, was there distinguished by the affectionate title of 'the Venetian.'

Yet such a character as Atticus could not escape censure from 'men of the world;' they want the heart and the imagination to conceive something better than themselves.
The happy indifference, perhaps the contempt, of our Atticius for rival factions, they have stigmatised as a cold neutrality, and a timid cowardly hypocrisy. Yet Atticus could not have been a mutual friend, had both not alike held the man of letters as a sacred being amidst their disguised ambition; and the urbanity of Atticus, while it balanced the fierceness of two heroes, Pompey and Cæsar, could even temper the rivalry of genius in the orators Hortensius and Cicero. A great man of our own country widely differed from the accusers of Atticus; Sir Matthew Hale lived in times distracted, and took the character of our man of letters for his model, adopting two principles in the conduct of Atticus; engaging with no party or public business, and affording a constant relief to the unfortunate of whatever party, he was thus preserved amidst the contests of times. Even Cicero himself, in his happier moments, in addressing his friend, exclaims—'I had much rather be sitting on your little bench under Aristotle's picture, than in the curule chairs of our great ones.'
This wish was probably sincere, and reminds us of another great politician in his secession from public affairs, retreating to a literary life, when he appears suddenly to have discovered a new-found world. Fox's favourite line, which he often repeated, was,

'How various his employments whom the world Calls idle.'

Cooper.

If the personal interests of the man of letters are not too deeply involved in society, his individual prosperity however is never contrary to public happiness. Other professions necessarily exist by the conflict and the calamities of the community; the politician is great by hatching an intrigue; the lawyer is counting his briefs; the physician his sick-list; the soldier is clamorous for war, and the merchant riots on the public calamity of high prices. But the man of letters only calls for peace and books, to unite himself with his brothers scattered over Europe; and his usefulness can only be felt, when, after a long interchange of destruction, men during short intervals, recovering their senses, discover that 'knowledge is power.'

Of those eminent men of letters, who were not authors, the history of Peiresec opens the most enlarged view of their activity. This moving picture of a literary life had been lost for us, had not Peiresec found in Gassendi a twin-spirit; so intimate was that biographer with the very thoughts; so closely united in the same pursuits, and so perpetual an observer of the remarkable man whom he has immortalized, that when employed on this elaborate resemblance of his friend, he was only painting himself with all the identifying strokes of self-love.

It was in the vast library of Pinelli, the founder of the most magnificent one in Europe, that Peiresec, then a youth, felt the remote hope of emulating the man of letters before his eyes. His life was not without preparation, not without fortunate coincidences, but there was a grandeur of design in the execution, which originated in the genius of the man himself.

The curious genius of Peiresec was marked by its precocity, as usually are strong passions in strong minds; this was the germ of all those studies which seemed mature in his youth. He resolved on a personal intercourse with the great literary characters of Europe; and his friend has thrown over these literary travels, that charm of detail by which we accompany Peiresec into the libraries of the learned; with the critic correcting manuscripts, and settling points of erudition; or by the opened cabinet of the antiquary, decyphering obscure inscriptions, and explaining medals; in the galleries of the curious in art, among their marbles, their pictures and their prints, he has often revealed to the artist some secret in his own art. In the museum of the naturalist, or among the plants of the botanist, there was no rarity of nature, and no work of art on which he had not to communicate; his mind toiled with that impatience of knowledge, that becomes a pain only in the cessation of rest. In England Peiresec was the associate of Camden and Selden, and had more than one interview with that friend to literary men, our calumniated James I; one may judge by these who were the men whom he first sought, and by whom he himself ever after was sought. Such indeed were immortal friendships! immortal they may be justly called, from the objects in which they concerned themselves, and from the permanent results of their combined studies.

Another peculiar greatness in this literary character was his enlarged devotion to literature for itself; he made his own universal curiosity the source of knowledge to other men; considering the studious as forming but one great family wherever they were, the national repositories of knowledge in Europe, for Peiresec, formed but one collection for the world. This man of letters had possessed himself of their contents, that he might have manuscripts collected, unedited pieces explored, extracts supplied, and even draughtsmen employed in remote parts of the world, to furnish views and plans, and to copy antiquities for the student, who in some distant retirement discovered that the literary treasures of the world were unfailingly opened to him by the secret devotion of this man of letters.

Carrying on the same grandeur in his views, Europe could not limit his inextinguishable curiosity; his universal mind busied itself in every part of the habitable globe. He kept up a noble traffic with all travellers, supplying them with philosophical instruments and recent inventions, by which he facilitated their discoveries, and secured their reception even in barbarous realms; in return he claimed, at his own cost, for he was 'born rather to give than to receive,' Says Gassendi, fresh importations of oriental literature, curious antiquities, or botanic rarities, and it was the curiosity of Peiresec which first embellished his own garden, and thence the gardens of Europe, with a rich variety of exotic flowers and fruits. Whenever he was presented with a medal, a vase, or a manuscript, he never slept over the gift till he had discovered what the donor delighted in; and a book, a picture, or a plant, when none could not be offered, fed their mutual passion and sustained the general cause of science.—The correspondence of Peiresec branched out to the farthest bounds of Ethiopia, connected both Americas, and had touched the newly discovered extremities of the universe, when this intrepid mind closed in a premature death.

I have drawn this imperfect view of Peiresec's character, that men of letters may be reminded of the capacities they possess. There still remains another peculiar feature. With all these vast views the fortune of Peiresec was not great; and when he sometimes endured the reproach of those whose sordidness was startled at this prodigality of mind, and the great objects which were the result, Peiresec replied that 'a small matter suffices for the natural wants of a literary man, whose true wealth consists in the monuments of arts, the treasures of his library, and the brotherly affections of the ingenious.' He was a French judge, but he supported the dignity more by his own character than by luxury or parade. He would not wear silk, and no tapestry hangings ornamented his apartments; but the walls were covered with the portraits of his literary friends: and in the unadorned simplicity of his study, his books, his papers, and his letters were scattered about him on the tables, the seats, and the floor. There, stealing from the world, he would sometimes admit to his spare supper his friend Gassendi, 'content,' says that amiable philosopher, 'to have me for his guest.'

Peiresec, like Pinelli, never published any work. Few days, indeed, passed without Peiresec writing a letter on the most curious inquiries; epistles which might be considered as so many little books, observes Gassendi.* These men of letters derived their pleasure, and perhaps their pride, from those vast strata of knowledge which their curiosity had heaped together in their mighty collections. They either were not endowed with that faculty of genius which strikes out aggregate views, or with the talent of composition which embellishes minute ones. This deficiency in the minds of such may be attributed to a thirst of learning, which the very means to allay can only inflame. From all sides they are gathering information; and that knowledge seems never perfect to which every day brings new acquisitions. With these men, to compose is to hesitate; and to revise is to be mortified by fresh doubts and unsupplied omissions. Peiresec was employed all his life in a history of Provence; and day after day he was adding to the splendid mass. But 'Peiresec,' observes Gassendi, 'could not mature the birth of his literary offspring, or lick it into any shape of elegant form; he was therefore content to take the midwife's part, by helping the happier labours of others.'

Such are the silent cultivators of knowledge, who are rarely authors, but who are often, however, contributing to the works of authors: without their secret labours, the public would not have possessed many valued works. That curious knowledge of books which, since Europe has become literary, is both the beginning and the result of knowledge; and literary history itself, which is the history of the age, of the nation and of the individual, one of the important consequences of these vast collections of books, has almost been created in our own times. These sources, which offer so much delightful instruction to the author and the artist, are separate studies from the cultivation of literature and the arts, and constitute more particularly the province of these men of letters.

The philosophical writer, who can adorn the page or history, is not always equal to form it. Robertson, after his successful history of Scotland, was long irresolute in his design, and so unpractised in researches of the sort he was desirous of attempting, that his admirers had nearly lost his popular productions, had not a fortunate introduction to Dr Birch enabled him to open the clasped books, and to drink of the sealed fountains. Robertson has confessed his inadequate knowledge and his overflowing gratitude, in letters which I have elsewhere printed. A suggestion by a man of letters has opened the career of may an aspirant; a hint from Walsh conveyed a new occupation of English poetry to one of its masters. The celebrated treatise of Grotius, on 'Peace and War,' was rejected by Peiresce. It was said of Magliabechi, who never wrote one, that by his diffusive communications he was in some respects concerned in all the great works of his times. Sir Robert Cotton greatly assisted Camden and Speed; and that hermit of literature, Baker of Cambridge, was still supplying with his invaluable researches, Burnet, Kennet, Hearne, of Middleton. Such is the concealed aid which these men of letters afford our authors, and which we may compare to those subterranean streams, which flowing into spacious lakes, are still, unobserved, enlarging the waters which attract the public eye.

* The history of the letters of Peiresec is remarkable. He preserved copies of his entire correspondence; but it has been recorded that many of these epistles were consumed, to save fuel, by the obstinate avarice of a niece. This would not have been a solitary instance of eminent men leaving their collections to unworthy descendants. However, after the silence of more than a century, some of these letters have been recovered and may be found in some French journals of A. Millin. They descended from the gentleman who married this very niece, probably the remains of the collection. The letters answer to the description of Gassendi, full of curious knowledge and observation.

Such are these men of letters! but the last touches of their picture, given with all the delicacy and warmth of a self-painter, may come from the Count de Caylus, celebrated for his collections and for his generous patronage of artists.

'His glory is confined to the mere power which he has of being one day useful to letters and to the arts; for his whole life is employed in collecting materials of which sordid men and artists make no use till after the death of men who amassed them. It affords him a very sensible measure to labour in hopes of being useful to those who pursue the same course of studies, while there are so great a number who die without discharging the debt which they incur to society.'

CHAPTER XVII.

LITERARY OLD AGE.

The old age of the literary character retains its enjoyments, and usually its powers, a happiness which accompanies no other. The old age of coquetry with extinct beauty; that of the used idler left without a sensation; that of a grasping Cæsar, who envies his heir; or that of the Machiavel who has no longer a voice in the cabinet, makes all these persons resemble unhappy spirits who cannot find their graves. But for the aged man of letters memory returns to her stories, and imagination is still on the wing, amidst fresh discoveries and new designs. The thorns fall like dry leaves, but he like ripe fruit, and is raised when no longer on the tree.

The intellectual faculties, the latest to decline, are often vigorous in the decrepitude of age. The curious mind is still striking out into new pursuits; and the mind of genius is still creating. ANCORA IMPARO.—'Yet I am learning!' Such was the concise inscription of an ingenious leech of an old man placed in a child's go-cart, with an our-sour upon it, which Michael Angelo applied to his own vast genius in his ninetieth year.*

Time, the great destroyer of other men's happiness, only enlarges the patrimony of literature to its possessor. A learned and highly intellectual friend once said to me, 'If I have acquired more knowledge these last four years than I had hitherto, I shall add materially to my stores in the next four years; and so at every subsequent period of my life, should I acquire only in the same proportion, the general mass of my knowledge will greatly accumulate. If we are not deprived by nature or misfortune, of the means to pursue this perpetual augmentation of knowledge, I do not see but we may be still fully occupied and deeply interested even to the last day of our earthly term.' In such pursuits, where life is rather wearing out, than rusting out, as Bishop Cumberland expressed it, death scarcely can take us by surprise; and much less by those continued menaces which shake the old age of men, of no intellectual pursuits, who are dying so many years.

Active enjoyments in the decline of life, then, constitute the happiness of literary men: the study of the arts and literature spread a sunshine in the winter of their days; and their own works may be as delightful to themselves, as roses plucked by the Norwegian amidst his snows; and they will discover that unregarded kindness of nature, who has given flowers that only open in the evening, and flower through the night-time. Necker offers a beautiful instance even of the influence of late studies in life; for he tells us, that 'the era of three-score and ten is an agreeable age for writing; your mind has not lost its

* This characteristic form closes the lectures of Mr Fuseli, who thus indirectly reminds us of the last words of Reynolds; and the graver of Blake, vital as the pencil of Fuseli, has raised the person of Michael Angelo with its admirable portrait, breathing inspiration vigour, and envy leaves you in peace.' The opening of one of La Mothe le Vayer's Treatises is striking: 'I should but ill return the favours God has granted me in the eightieth year of my age, should I allow myself to give way to that shameless want of occupation which I have condemned all my life;' and the old man proceeds with his 'observations, on the composition and reading of books.' The literary character has been fully occupied in the eightieth and ninetieth year of life. Isaac Walton still glowed while writing some of the most interesting biographies in his eighty-fifth year, and in his ninetieth enriched the poetical world with the first publication of a romantic tale by Chalkhill, 'the friend of Spenser.' Bodmer, beyond eighty, was occupied on Homer, and Wieland on Cicero's Letters.* But the delight of opening a new pursuit, or a new course of reading, imparts the vivacity and novelty of youth even to old age; the revolutions of modern chemistry kindled the curiosity of Dr Reid to his latest days; and a deservedly popular author, now advanced in life, at this moment, has discovered, in a class of reading to which he had never been accustomed, what will probably supply him with fresh furniture for his mind during life. Even the steps of time are retraced, and what has passed away again becomes ours; for in advanced life a return to our early studies refreshes and renovates the spirits; we open the poets who made us enthusiasts, and the philosophers who taught us to think, with a new source of feeling in our own experience. Adam Smith confessed his satisfaction at this pleasure to professor Dugald Stewart, while 'he was repertising, with the enthusiasm of a student, the tragic poets of ancient Greece, and Sophocles and Euripides lay open on his table.'

Dans ses veines toujours un jeune sang bouillonne,
Et Sophocle à cent ans peint encore Antigone.

The calm philosophic Hume found death only could interrupt the keen pleasure he was again receiving from Lucian, and which could inspire him at the moment with a humorous self-dialogue with Charron.

Not without a sense of exultation has the literary character felt his happiness, in the unbroken chain of his habits and his feelings. Hobbes exulted that he had outlived his enemies, and was still the same Hobbes; and to demonstrate the reality of this existence, published, in the eighty-seventh year of his age, his version of the Odyssey, and the following year, his Iliad. Of the happy results of literary habits in advanced life, the Count de Tressan, the elegant abridger of the old French romances, in his 'literary advice to his children,' has drawn a most pleasing picture. With a taste for study, which he found rather inconvenient in the moveable existence of a man of the world, and a military wanderer, he had however contrived to reserve an hour or two every day for literary pursuits; the men of science, with whom he had chiefly associated, appear to have turned his passion to observation and knowledge, rather than towards imagination and feeling; the combination formed a wreath for his grey hairs. When Count de Tressan retired from a brilliant to an affectionate circle, amidst his family, he pursued his literary tastes, with the vivacity of a young author inspired by the illusion of fame. At the age of seventy-five, with the imagination of a poet, he abridged, he translated, he recomposed, his old Chivalric Romances, and his reanimated fancy struck fire in the veins of the old man. Among the first designs of his retirement was a singular philosophical legacy for his children; it was a view of the history and progress of the human mind—of its principles, its errors, and its advantages, as these were reflected in himself; in the dawnings of his taste, the secret inclinations of his mind, which the men of genius of the age with whom he associated had developed; in expatiating on their memory, he calls on his children to witness the happiness of study, in those pleasures which were soothing and adorning his old age. 'Without knowledge, without literature,' exclaims the venerable enthusiast, 'in whatever rank we are born, we can only resemble the vulgar.' To the Centenary Fontenelle the Count de Tressan was chiefly indebted for the happy life he derived from the cultivation of literature; and when this man of a hundred years died, Tressan, himself on the borders of the grave, would offer the last fruits of his mind in an eulogy to his ancient master; it was the voice of the dying to the dead, a last moment of the love and sensibility of genius, which feeble life could not extinguish.

If the genius of Cicero, inspired by the love of literature, has thrown something delightful over this latest season of life, in his de Senectute; and if to have written on old age, in old age, is to have obtained a triumph over time,* the literary character, when he shall discover himself like a stranger in a new world, when all that he loved has not life, and all that lives has no love for old age; when he shall find himself grown obsolete, when his ear shall cease to listen, and nature has locked up the man entirely within himself, even then the votary of literature shall not feel the decline of life—preserving the flame alive on the altar, and even at his last moments, in the act of sacrifice. Such was the fate, perhaps now told for the first time, of the great Lord Clarendon; it was in the midst of composition that his pen suddenly fell from his hand on the paper, he took it up again, and again it fell; deprived of the sense of touch, he found his hand without motion; the ear perceived himself struck by palsy—and thus was the life of the noble exile closed amidst the warmth of a literary work, unfinished.

CHAPTER XVIII.

LITERARY HONOURS.

Literature is an avenue to glory, ever open for those ingenious men who are deprived of honours or of wealth. Like that illustrious Roman who owed nothing to his ancestors, videtur ex se natus, they seem self-born; and in the baptism of fame, they have given themselves their name. The sons of a sword-maker, a potter, and a taw-gatherer, were the greatest of Orators, the most majestic of poets, and the most graceful of the satirists of antiquity. The eloquent Massillon, the brilliant Flechier, Rousseau and Diderot; Johnson, Akenside, and Franklin, arose amidst the most humble avocations.

It is the prerogative of genius to elevate obscure men to the higher class of society; if the influence of wealth in the present day has been justly said to have created a new aristocracy of its own, and where they already begin to be jealous of their ranks, we may assert that genius creates a sort of intellectual nobility, which is conferred on some Literary Characters by the involuntary feelings of the public; and were men of genius to bear arms, they might consist not of imaginary things, of griffins and chimeras, but of deeds performed and of public works in existence. When Dondi raised the great astronomical clock at the University of Padua, which was long the admiration of Europe, it gave a name and nobility to its maker and all his descendants; there still lives a Marquis Dondi dall'Horologio. Sir Hugh Middleton, in memory of his vast enterprise, changed his former arms to bear three piles, by which instruments he had strengthened the works he had invented, when his genius poured forth the waters through our metropolis, distinguishing it from all others in the world. Should not Evelyn have inserted an oak-tree in his bearings? For our author's 'Sylvia' occasioned the plantation of 'many millions of timber-trees,' and the present navy of Great Britain has been constructed with the oaks which the genius of Evelyn planted. If the public have borrowed the names of some Lords to grace a Sandwich and a Spenser, we may be allowed to raise into titles of literary nobility those distinctions which the public voice has attached to some authors; Æschylus Potter, Athenian Stuart, and Anaxæus Moore.

This intellectual nobility is not chimerical; does it not separate a man from the crowd? Whenever the rightful possessor appears, will not the eyes of all spectators be fixed on him? I allude to scenes which I have witnessed. Will not even literary honours add a nobility to nobility? and teach the nation to esteem a name which might otherwise be hidden under its rank, and remain unknown? Our illustrious list of literary noblemen is far more glorious than the satirical "Catalogue of Noble Authors," drawn up by a polished and heartless cynic, who has pointed his brilliant shafts at all who were chivalrous in spirit, or appertained to the family of genius. One may presume on the existence of this intellectual nobility, from the extraordinary circumstance that the Great have actually felt a jealousy of the literary rank. But no rivalry can exist in the solitary honour conferred on an author: an honour not derived from birth, nor creation, but from public opinion, and as inseparable from his name, as an essential quality is from its object; for the diamond will sparkle and rose will be fragrant, otherwise, it is no diamond nor rose. The great may well condescend to be humble to God, since genius pays its homage in becoming proud of its humility. Cardinal Richelieu was mortified at the obtrusiveness of the unbending Corneille; several noblemen at Pope's indifference to their rank; and Magliabechi, book-prodigy of his age, whom every literary stranger visited at Florence, assured Lord Raley, that the Duke of Tuscany had become jealous of the attention he was receiving from foreigners, as they usually went first to Magliabechi before the Grand Duke. A confession Montesquieu states, with open candour, a fact in history which confirms this jealousy of the Great with the Literary Character. 'On my entering into life, I was spoiled as a man of talents, and people of condition gave me a favourable reception; but when the success of my Perses Letters proved perhaps that I was not unworthy of reputation, and the public began to esteem me, my relation with the great was discouraging, and I experienced numerous mortifications.' Montesquieu subjects a relation sufficiently humiliating for the mere nobleman: 'The Great, inwardly wounded with the glory of a celebrated name, seek to humble it. In general he only can endure the fame of others, who deserves fame himself. This sort of jealousy unquestionably prevailed in the Lord Orford; a wit, a man of the world, and a great rank, but while he considered literature as a mere amusement, he was mortified at not obtaining literary celebrity; he felt his authorial, always beneath his personal character; he broke with every literary man who looked up to him as their friend; and how he has delivered his feelings on Johnson, Goldsmith and Gray, whom unfortunately him he personally knew, it fell to my lot to discover, could add, but not diminish, what has been called the severity of that delineation.'

Who was the dignified character, Lord Chesterfield or Samuel Johnson, when the great author, proud of his labour, rejected his lordship's sneaking patronage? 'I value myself,' says Swift, 'upon making the ministry aware to be acquainted with Parnell, and not Parnell with the ministry.' Piron would not suffer the Literary Character to be lowered in his presence. Entering the apartment of a nobleman, who was conducting another peer to the star's head, the latter stopped to make way for Piron. 'Pass on my lord,' said the noble master, 'pass, he is only a poet.' Piron replied, 'since our qualities are declared, I shall take my rank,' and placed himself before the lord. Nor is this pride, the true source of elevated character, refused to the great artist as well as the great author. Michael Angelo, invited by Julius II, to the Court of Rome, found that intrigue had indisposed his Holiness towards him, and more than once, the great artist was suffered to linger in attendance in the anti-chamber. One day the indignant man of genius exclaimed, 'tell his holiness, if he wants me, he must look for me elsewhere.' He flew back to his beloved Florence, to proceed with that celebrated cartoon, which afterwards became a favourite study with all artists. Thrice the Pope wrote for his return, and at length menaced the little state of Tuscany with war, if Michael Angelo prolonged his absence. He returned. The sublime artist knelt at the feet of the Father of the Church, turning aside his troubled countenance in silence: an intermeddling Bishop offered himself as a mediator, apologizing for our artist by observing, that 'of his proud humour are these painters made.' Julius turned to this pitiable mediator, and as Vasari tells used a switch on this occasion, observing, 'you speak injuriously of him, while I am silent. It is you who are ignorant.' Raising Michael Angelo, Julius II, embraced the man of genius. 'I can make lords of you every day, but I cannot create a Titian,' said the Emperor Charles V to his courtiers, who had become jealous of the hours, and the half-hours which that monarch managed, that he might converse with the man of genius at his work. There is an elevated intercourse between Power and Genius; and if they are deficient in reciprocal esteem, neither are great. The intellectual nobility seems to have been asserted by De Harlay, a great French statesman, for when the academy was once not received with royal honours, he complained to the French monarch, observing, that when 'a man of letters was presented to Francis I, for the first time, the king rays advanced three steps from the throne to receive a. If ever the voice of individuals can recompense a life of weary labour it is in speaking a foreign accent—it sounds as the distant plaudit of posterity. The distance of see between the literary character and the inquirer in no respects represents the distance of time which separates the author from the next age. Fontenelle was never so gratified than when a Swede, arriving at the gates of his, inquired of the custom-house officers where Fontenelle resided, and expressed his indignation that not one of them had ever heard of his name. Hobbes expresses his sad delight that his portrait was sought after by foreigners and that the Great Duke of Tuscany made the philosopher the object of his first inquiries. Camden was not sensible to the visits of German noblemen, who were sirous of seeing the British Pliny; and Pocock, while received no aid from patronage at home for his Oriental studies, never relaxed in those unrequited labours, from a warm personal testimonies of learned foreigners, who seemed to see and converse with this prodigy of eastern erudition.

Yes! to the very presence of the man of genius will the old spontaneously pay their tribute of respect, of admiration, or of love; many a pilgrimage has he lived to receive, and many a crowd has followed his footsteps. There are days in the life of genius which repay its sufferings. Demosthenes confessed he was pleased when even a fisherman of Athens pointed him out. Corneille had his particular seat in the theatre, and the audience would rise to salute him when he entered. At the presence of Raynal in the House of Commons, the speaker was requested to suspend the debate till that illustrious foreigner, who had risen on the English parliament, was there placed and distinguished, to his honour. Spinoza, when he gained a humble livelihood by grinding optical glasses, at an obscure village in Holland, was visited by the first General in Europe, who, for the sake of this philosophical conference, suspended his march.

In all ages, and in all countries, has this feeling been rated: nor is it a temporary ebullition, nor an individual occurrence; it comes out of the heart of man. In Spain, whatever was most beautiful in its kind was described by the name of the great Spanish bard; every thing excellent was called a Lope. Italy would furnish a volume of the public honours decreed to literary men, nor is that spirit extinct, though the national character has fallen by the chance of fortune; and Metastasio and Tiraboschi received what had been accorded to Petrarch and to Poggio. Germany, patriotic to its literary characters, is the land of enthusiasm of genius. On the borders of the Linnet, the public walk of Zurich, the monument of Genner, erected by the votes of his fellow-citizens, attests their sensibility; and a solemn funeral honoured the remains of Jopstock, led by the senate of Hamburg, with fifty thousand votaries, so penetrated by one universal sentiment, that this multitude preserved a mournful silence, and the serenade of the police ceased to be necessary through its civility at the solemn burial of the man of genius. Has not Holland proved insensible? The statue of Erasmus, in Rotterdam, still animates her young students, and sets a noble example to her neighbours of the influence exerted by the sight of the statue of a man of genius: nor can it be forgotten that the senate of Rotterdam declared the emigrant Bayle, that 'such a man should not be considered as a foreigner.' In France, since Francis I. created genius, and Louis XIV. knew to be liberal to it, an impulse was communicated to the French people, where the statues of their illustrious men spread inspiration on the spots which living they would have haunted—their theatres the great dramatists; in their Institute their illustrious authors; in their public edifices their other men of genius.* This is worthy of the country which privileged the family of La Fontaine to be for ever exempt, from taxes, and decreed that the productions of the mind, were not seizable, when the creditors of Crebillon would have attached the produce of his tragedies. These distinctive honours accorded to genius were in unison with their decree respecting the will of Bayle. It was the subject of a law-suit between the heir of the will, and the inheritor by blood. The latter contested that this great literary character, being a fugitive for religion and dying in a prohibited country, was without the power of disposing of his property, and that our author, when he resided in Holland, was civilly dead. In the parliament of Toulouse the judge decided that learned men are free in all countries; that he who had sought in a foreign land an asylum from his love of letters, was no fugitive; that it was unworthy of France to treat as a stranger a son in whom she gloried; and he protested against the notion of a civil death to such a man as Bayle, whose name was living throughout Europe.

* We cannot bury the Fame of our English worthies—that taste before us, independent of ourselves; but we bury the fluence of their inspiring presence in those immortal memorials of genius easy to be read by all men, their statues and their busts, consigning them to spots seldom visited, and often obscure to be viewed. Count Algarotti has ingeniously said 'L'argent que nous employons en tabatières et en pommes servoit aux anciens à célébrer la mémoire des grands hommes par des monuments dignes de passer à la postérité; à nous l'on brûle des feux de joie pour une victoire remportée, ils élevent des arcs de triomphe de porphyre et de marbre.' May we not, for our honour, and for the advantage of our art, predict better times for ourselves?

Even the most common objects are consecrated when associated with the memory of the man of genius. We still seek for his tomb on the spot where it has vanished; the enthusiasts of genius still wander on the hills of Pausanias, and muse on Virgil to retrace his landscapes, or as Sir William Jones ascended Forest-hill, with the Allegro in his hand, and step by step, seemed in his fancy to have trodden in the foot-path of Milton; there is a grove at Magdalen College which retains the name of Addison's walk, where still the student will linger; and there is a cave at Macao, which is still visited by the Portuguese from a national feeling, where Camoens is said to have composed his Lusiad. When Petrarch was passing by his native town he was received with the honors of his fame; but when the heads of the town, unawares to Petrarch, conducted him to the house where the poet was born, and informed him that the proprietor had often wished to make alterations, but that the towns-people had risen to insist that the house which was consecrated by the birth of Petrarch should be preserved unchanged; this was a triumph more affecting to Petrarch than his coronation at Rome. In the village of Certaldo is still shown the house of Boccaccio; and on a turret are seen the arms of the Medici, which they had sculptured there, with an inscription alluding to a small house and a name which filled the world. 'Foreigners,' says Anthony Wood of Milton, 'have, out of pure devotion, gone to Bread-street to see the house and chamber where he was born;' and at Paris the house which Voltaire inhabited, and at Ferney his study, are both preserved inviolate. Thus is the very apartment of a man of genius, the chair he studied in, the table he wrote on, contemplated with curiosity; the spot is full of local impressions. And all this happens from an unsatisfied desire to see and hear him whom we never can see nor hear; yet in a moment of illusion, if we listen to a traditional conversation, if we can revive one of his feelings, if we can catch but a dim image of his person, we reproduce this man of genius before us, on whose features we so often dwell. Even the rage of the military spirit has taught itself to respect the abode of genius; and Caesar and Sylla, who never spared their own Roman blood, alike felt their spirit rebuked, and saved the literary city of Athens. The house of the man of genius has been spared amidst contending empires, from the days of Pindar to those of Buffon; and the recent letter of Prince Schwarzenberg to the Countess, for the preservation of the philosopher's chateau, is a memorial of this elevated feeling.³

And the meanest things, the very household stuff associated with the memory of the man of genius, become the objects of our affections. At a festival in honour of Thomson the poet, the chair in which he composed part of his Seasons was produced, and appears to have communicated some of the raptures to which he was liable who had sat in that chair; Rabelais among his drollest inventions, could not have imagined that his old cloak would have been preserved in the University of Montpellier for future doctors to wear on the day they took their degree; nor could Shakespeare, that the mulberry tree which he planted would have been multiplied into relics. But in such instances the feeling is right with a wrong direction; and while the populace are exhausting their emotions on an old tree, and an old cloak, they are paying that involuntary tribute to genius which forms its pride, and will generate the race.

* In the grandeur of Milton's verse we perceive the feeling he associated with this literary honour.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE INFLUENCE OF AUTHORS.

Wherefore should not the literary character be associated in utility or glory with the other professional classes of society? These indeed press more immediately on the attention of men; they are stimulated by personal interests, and they are remunerated by honours; while the literary character, from its habits, is secluded; prodding its usefulness in concealment, and often at a late period in life; not always too of immediate application, and often even unvalued by the passing generation.

It is curious to observe of the characters of the other classes in society, how each rises or falls in public esteem, according to the exigencies of the times. Ere we had swept from the seas all the fleets of our rivals, the naval hero was the popular character; while military, from the political panic occasioned by standing armies, was invariably lowered in public regard; the extraordinary change of circumstances, and the genius of one man, have entirely reversed the public feeling.*

The commercial character was long, even in this country, placed very low in the scale of honour; the merchant was considered merely as a money-trader, profiting by the individual distress of the nobleman, and afterwards was viewed with jealous eyes by the country gentleman. A Dutch monarch, who initiated us into the mysteries of banks and loans, by combining commercial influence with political power, raised the mercantile character.†

But the commercial prosperity of a nation inspires no veneration in mankind; nor will its military power win their affection. There is an interchange of opinions, as well as of spices and specie, which induces nations to esteem each other; and there is a glorious succession of authors, as well as of seamen and soldiers, for ever standing before the eyes of the universe.

It is by our authors that foreigners have been taught to subdue their own prejudices. About the year 1700, the Italian Gemelli told all Europe that he could find nothing among us but our writings to distinguish us from the worst of barbarians. Our civil wars, and our great revolution, had probably disturbed the Italian's imagination. Too long we appeared a people whose genius partook of the density and variableness of our climate, incapacitated even by situation, from the enjoyment of arts which had not yet travelled to us; and as if Nature herself had designed to disjoin us from more polished neighbours and brighter skies. We now arbitrate among the nations of the world; we possess their involuntary esteem, nor is there a man of genius among them who stands unconnected with our intellectual sovereignty.

'We conquered France, but felt our captive's charms,
Her arts victorious triumphed o'er our arms.'

At the moment Pope was writing these lines, that silent operation of genius had commenced, which changes the fate of nations. The first writers of France were passing over into England to learn to think and write, or thought and wrote like Englishmen in France.‡ This

*Mr Gifford, in his notes to his recent Translation of Persius, with his accustomed keenness of spirit, has detected this fact in our popular manners. 'Persius, whenever he has occasion for a more worthless character than ordinary, commonly repairs to the camp for him. Fielding and Smollet in compliance with the cant of their times, manifested a patriotic abhorrence of the military; and seldom went farther for a blockhead, a parasite, or an adept in low villany, than the Army-list. We have outlived this stupid piece of injustice, and a 'led-captain' is no longer considered as the indispensable vice of every novel.'

†Voltaire borrowed all the genius of our country; our poetry and our philosophy. Buffon began by translating Hales's 'Vegetable Statics;' and before Linnæus classed his plants, singular revolution in the human mind, and, by its reaction, in human affairs, was not effected by merchants profiting over them by superior capital; or by admirals and generals humiliating them by victories; but by our authors, whose works are now printed at foreign presses, a circumstance which proves, as much as the commerce and prowess of England, the ascendancy of her genius. Even had our nation displayed more limited resources than its awful powers have opened; had the sphere of its dominion been only its island boundaries, could the same literary character have predominated, we might have attained the same eminence and admiration in the hearts of our continental neighbours. The small cities of Athens and of Florence will perpetually attest the influence of the literary character over other nations; the one received the tributes of the mistress of the universe, when the Romans sent their youth to be educated at Athens; while the other, at the revival of letters, beheld every polished European crowding to its little court.

There is a small portion of men, who appear marked out by nature and habit, for the purpose of cultivating their thoughts in peace, and giving activity to their sentiments, by disclosing them to the people. Those who govern a nation cannot at the same time enlighten them;—authors stand between the governors and the governed.

Important discoveries are often obtained by accident; by the single thought of a man of genius, which has sometimes changed the dispositions of a people, and even of an age, is slowly matured in meditation. Even the mechanical inventions of genius must first become perfect in its own solitary abode, ere the world can possess them. The people are a vast body, of which men of genius are the eyes and the hands; and the public mind is the creation of the philosophical writer; these are axioms as demonstrable as any in Euclid, and as sure in their operation, as any principle in mechanics. When Epicurus published his doctrines, men immediately began to express themselves with freedom on the established religion; the dark and fearful superstitions of paganism fell into neglect, and mouldered away, the inevitable fate of established falsehood. When Machiavel, living amidst the principalities of Italy, where stratagem and assassination were the politics of those wretched rivals, by lifting the veil from these cabinets of banditti, that calumniated man of genius, alarmed the world by exposing a system subversive of all human virtue and happiness, and led the way to political freedom. When Locke and Montesquieu appeared, the old systems of government were reviewed; the principles of legislation were developed; and many changes have succeeded, and are still to succeed. Politicians affect to disbelieve that abstract principles possess any considerable influence on the conduct of the subject. 'In times of tranquillity,' they say, 'they are not wanted, and in times of confusion they are never heard.' But this has been their error; it is in leisure, when they are not wanted, that they are studied by the speculative part of mankind; and when they are wanted they are already prepared for the active multitude, who come like a phalanx, pressing each other with an unity of feeling and an integrity of force. Paley would not close his eyes on what was passing before him; and he has observed, that during the convulsive troubles at Geneva the political theory of Rousseau was prevalent in the contests; while in the political disputes of our country those ideas of civil authority displayed in the works of Locke, recurred in every form. How, therefore, can the character of an author be considered as subordinate in society? Politicians do not secretly think so, at the moment they are proclaiming it to the world: nor do they fancy, as they would have us imagine, that paper and pens use only rags and feathers; whatever they affect, the truth and Buffon began his Natural History, our own naturalist Ray had opened their road to Nature. Bacon, Newton, Boyle, reduced the fanciful philosophy of France into experiment and demonstration. Helvetius, Diderot, and their brethren, gleaned their pretended discoveries from our Shalbury, Mandeville, and Toland, whom sometimes they out-translated. Even our novelists were closely imitated.—Our great compilations of voyages and travels, Hackluyt, Churchill, &c. furnished Montesquieu with the moral facts he required for his large picture of his 'Esprit des Loix.' The Cyclopaedia of Chambers was the parent of the French work. Even historical compilers exalted in our country before it, had appeared in France. Our Universal History, and Statley, Echaru, and Hooke, preceded Rollin and other French abridgers of history; while Hume and our philosophical historians set them a nobler example, which remains for the yet to rival.

as they consider the worst actions of men, as of far consequence than the propagation of their opinions. I well know, as Sophocles declared, that 'opinion is stronger than truth.' Have politicians not often excited their disguised terrors? Books, and sometimes their men, have been burnt; but burning books is no part of refutation. Cromwell was alarmed when he saw the insinuations of Harrington, and dreaded the effects of that more than the plots of the royalists; while Charles rembled at an author, only in his manuscript state; in the height of terror, and to the honour of genius, it decreed, that 'Scribere est agere.'¹² behave the influence of authors in forming the character of men, where the solitary man of genius stamps his on a people. The parsimonious habits, the money-grubbing precepts, the wary cunning, and not the most odious means to obtain the end, of Dr Franklin, imitated themselves on his Americans; loftier feelings could elevate a man of genius, who became the founder of a new people, retaining the habits of a journeyman printer, while the elegant tastes of Sir William Jones could be the servants of a commercial corporation to open vast sources of knowledge; a mere company of men, influenced by the literary character, enlarge the use of the imagination and collect fresh materials for the glory of human nature.

I have said that authors produce their usefulness in private, and that their good is not of immediate application, often unvalued by their own generation. On this occasion the name of Evelyn always occurs to me. This man supplied the public with nearly thirty works, at a time when taste and curiosity were not yet domiciliated in the country; his patriotism warmed beyond the eightieth year of his age; and in his dying hand he held another legacy for his nation. Whether his enthusiasm was intruding on us a taste for medals and prints; or intent on softening the city of smoke and smells, and to sweeten its plantations of native plants; or having enriched our beds and our gardens; placed summer-ices on our tables, and varied even the sallads of our country; furnishing 'a Gardener's Kalendar,' which, as Cowley said, 'to last as long as months and years,' and the horticulturalist will not forget Father Evelyn in the heir of his name, Millar: whether the philosopher of the Royal Society, or the lighter satirist of the toilette, or the fine model for active as well as contemplative life—yet in all these changes of a studious life, the better part of his story has not been told.—While Britain retains her pre-eminence among the nations of Europe, the 'Sylvia' Evelyn will endure with her triumphant oaks. In the edition of that work the heart of the patriot exults at the result: he tells Charles, 'I have many millions of timber-trees, besides infinite others, have been propagated & planted at the instigation, and by the sole direction of yours.' It was an author in his studious retreat, who took a prophetic eye on the age we live in, secured the victories of our naval sovereignty. Inquire at the mirality how the fleets of Nelson have been connected; and they can tell you that it was with the oaks of the genius of Evelyn planted.¹³

The same character existed in France, where De Serres in 1599 composed a work on the cultivation of mulberry trees in reference to the art of raising silk-worms, taught his fellow citizens to convert a leaf into silk, silk to become the representative of gold. Our author countered the hostility of the prejudices of his times in giving his country one of her staple commodities; but he only received a medal recently struck in honour of De Serres, by the Agricultural Society of the department of Seine. We are too slow in commemorating the generalment Sydney was condemned to death for certain transcripts found in his library; and the reason alleged was, 'scribere est agere—that to write is to act. The papers which served to condemn Sydney, it appears, were only answers to Filmer's obsolete Defence of Monarchical Tyranny—a metaphysical inference drawn by the crown lawyers as a necessary consequence. Authors may write that which may not afterwards approve; their manuscript opinions very liable to be changed, and authors even change those notions they have published. A man ought only to lose his life for his opinions, in the metaphysical sense; opinions that are not opinions; but not an axe against a pen.

Since this has been written, the Diary of Evelyn is published: it cannot add to his general character, whatever it may; but we may anticipate much curious amusement from the study of a literary character whose studies formed the business of our own country; and our authors are defrauded even in the debt we are daily incurring of their posthumous fame.

When an author writes on a national subject, he awakens all the knowledge which lies buried in the sleep of nations; he calls around him, as it were, every man of talents; and though his own fame should be eclipsed by his successors, yet the emanation, the morning light, broke from his source. Our naturalist Ray, though no man was more modest in his claims, delighted to tell a friend that 'since the publication of his catalogue of Cambridge Plants, many were prompted to botanical studies, and to herbalise in their walks in the fields.' A work in France, under the title of 'L'Ami des Hommes,' first spread there a general passion for agricultural pursuits; and although the national ardour carried all to excess, yet marshes were drained and waste lands enclosed. The Emilius of Rousseau, whatever errors and extravagancies a system which would bring us back to nature may contain, operated a complete revolution in modern Europe, by changing the education of men; and the boldness and novelty of some of its principles communicated a new spring to the human intellect. The commercial world owes to two retired philosophers, in the solitude of their study, Locke and Smith, those principles which dignify Trade into a liberal pursuit, and connect it with the happiness of a people.

Beccaria, who dared to raise his voice in favour of humanity, against the prejudices of many centuries, by his work on 'Crimes and Punishments,' at length abolished torture; and Locke and Voltaire, on 'Toleration,' have long made us tolerant. But the principles of many works of this stamp have become so incorporated in our minds and feelings, that we can scarcely at this day conceive the fervour they excited at the time, or the magnanimity of their authors in the decision of their opinions.

And to whom does the world owe more than to the founders of miscellaneous writing, or the creators of new and elegant tastes in European nations? We possess one peculiar to ourselves. To Grazer our nation is indebted for that visionary delight of recalling from their graves the illustrious dead: and as it were, of living with them, as far as a familiarity with their features and their very looks forms a part of life. This pleasing taste for portraits seems peculiar to our nation, and was created by the ingenuity of a solitary author, who had very nearly abandoned these many delightful associations which a collection of fine portraits affords, by the want of a due comprehension of their nature among his friends, and even at first in the public. Before the miscellanists rose, learning was the solitary enjoyment of the insulated learned; they spoke a language of their own; and they lived in a desert, separated from the world; but the miscellanists became their interpreters, opening a communication between two spots, close to each other, yet which were so long separated, the closet and the world. These authors were not Bacons, Newtons, and Leibnitzes; but they were Addison, Fontenelle, and Feyjoo, the first popular authors in their nations who taught England, France, and Spain to become a reading people; while their fugitive page imbues with intellectual sweetness, an uncultivated mind, like the perfumed mould which the swimmer in the Persian Sadi took up; it was a piece of common earth, but astonished at its fragrance, he asked whether it were musk or amber? 'I am nothing but earth; but roses were planted on my soil, and their odorous virtues have deliciously penetrated through all my pores; I have retained the infusion of sweetness; otherwise I had been but a lump of earth.'

There is a singleness and unity in the pursuits of genius, through all ages, which produces a sort of consanguinity in the characters of authors. Men of genius, in their different classes, living at distinct periods, or in remote countries, seem to be the same persons with another name; and thus the literary character who has long departed, seems only to have transmigrated. In the great march of the human intellect he is still occupying the same place, and he is still carrying on with the same powers, his great work, through a line of centuries.

In the history of genius there is no chronology, for to us every thing it has done is present; and the earliest attempt is connected with the most recent. Many men of genius must arise before a particular man of genius can appear. Before Homer there were other bards—we have a catalogue of their names and works. Corneille could not have been the chief dramatist of France, had not the founders of the French drama preceded him; and Pope could not have appeared before Dryden. Whether the works of genius are those of pure imagination, or searches after truth, they are alike tainted by the feelings and the events of their times; but the man of genius must be placed in the line of his descent.

Aristotle, Hobbes, and Locke, Descartes and Newton, approximate more than we imagine. The same chain of intellect Aristotle holds, through the intervals of time, is held by them; and links will only be added by their successors. The naturalists, Pliny, Gesner, Aldrovandus, and Buffon, derive differences in their characters from the spirit of the times; but each only made an accession to the family estate, while each was the legitimate representative of the family of the naturalists. Aristophanes, Moliere, and Foote, are brothers of the family of national wits: the wit of Aristophanes was a part of the common property, and Moliere and Foote were Aristophanic. Plutarch, La Mothe le Vayer, and Bayle, alike busied in amassing the materials of human thought and human action, with the same vigorous and vagrant curiosity, must have had the same habits of life. If Plutarch was credulous, La Mothe le Vayer sceptical, and Bayle philosophical, the heirs of the family may differ in their dispositions, but no one will arraign the integrity of the lineal descent. My learned and reflecting friend, whose original researches have enriched our national history, has thus observed on the character of Wickliffe:—'To complete our idea of the importance of Wickliffe, it is only necessary to add, that as his writings made John Huss the reformer of Bohemia, so the writings of John Huss led Martin Luther to be the reformer of Germany; so extensive and so incalculable are the consequences which sometimes follow from human actions.*' Our historian has accompanied this by giving the very feelings of Luther in early life on his first perusal of the works of John Huss: we see the spark of creation caught at the moment; a striking influence of the generation of character! Thus a father spirit has many sons; and several of the great revolutions in the history of man have been opened by such, and carried on by that secret creation of minds visibly operating on human affairs. In the history of the human mind, he takes an imperfect view, who is confined to contemporary knowledge, as well as he who stops short with the Ancients, and has not advanced with their descendants. Those who do not carry their researches through the genealogical lines of genius, will mutilate their minds, and want the perfect strength of an entire man.

Such are 'the great lights of the world,' by whom the torch of knowledge has been successively seized and transmitted from one to the other. This is that noble image borrowed from a Grecian game, which Plato has applied to the rapid generations of man to mark how the continuity of human affairs is maintained from age to age. The torch of genius is perpetually transferred from hand to hand amidst this fleeting scene.

CURIOSITIES OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

BY

RUFUS W. GRISWOLD,

AUTHOR OF "THE POETS AND POETRY OF AMERICA," ETC.

TO THE READER.

THE Publishers of this edition of D'ISRAELI, anxious to enlarge the work by adding to it some of the "Curiosities of American Literature," applied to the Editor of the following pages for such an amount of matter, of the description herewith given, as might be printed within certain specified limits; and he has gleaned from many rare and curious old books relating to our country or written by our countrymen, and from other sources inaccessible to the general reader, what he trusts will be received as a suitable appendix for an American impression of D'ISRAELI's interesting miscellany.

Doubtless the "Curiosities of Literature" and "The Literary Character Illustrated," constitute together the most valuable as well as the most amusing book of literary history and biography which has ever been written. Its popularity is great and universal. In this country the materials for such a work are not abundant, and the reader will not expect to find in the following pages articles intrinsically as interesting as those given by an author unequalled in his department, whose field was the world. A rule which the Editor has observed, to exclude every thing relating to contemporaries, induces the omission of many things which might have been as attractive as what he has presented; but the propriety of such omissions will probably not be questioned.

CURIOSITIES OF AMERICAN LITERATURE.

RARE AND CURIOUS BOOKS BY THE EARLY TRAVELERS IN AMERICA.

THE custom of defaming America by "false and scoundrel reports, from the sulphureous breath of every fact-monger," is one that has the warrant of antity in its favour. "Such are the lying propensities of the English nation who stay at home," says one of the Puritans, "that it requires the devotion of much of time and substance to refute their wicked calumnies." It was not only those who remained at home who were suspected of falsehood, for more than two centuries ago the amiable Mr. William Wood, in his New England's Prospect, complains of this disposition of his countrymen; and a hundred years after—in 1746—a prototype of the present generation scribbled upon America and the Americans, one R. Cross, who had been "convicted of forgery, and sentenced to be hanged, after some time obtained the reprieve of transportation," and did us the honour to be up his residence in Pennsylvania, against the inhabitants of which province he wrote a book which contained far more lies than verities. But the early travelers were not all of this description. With few exceptions they were fond of the marvellous, and somewhat more credulous than their successors, but many of them were as earnest to defend as others to assail the new found world. Among others, the respectable Mr. Joselyn, who published his "Account of two voyages to America," in 1764, was a very liberal and entertaining writer. He was the first one to chronicle the appearance of the remarkable visitor who still assumes as once a year exhibits himself for the behoof of operators of hotels about Nahant and the adjacent bays and promontories—"the sea-serpent that lay coiled up on a cable on a rock at Cape Ann,"—and he tells us of "triton, or merman, which one Mr. Mitten, a great traveler, saw in Casco Bay; which triton, laying his head upon the side of the canoe, had one of them popped off by the said Mitten, which was in all respects like the head of a man," with many similar tales, which he makes this sensible reflection: "These, and many other stories, they told me, the credit whereof I shall neither impeach nor enforce, but shall satisfy myself, and I hope the reader, with the saying of a wise, learned, and honourable knight, that 'there be many stranger things in the world than are to be seen between London and Stanes.'" Another traveler, much more willing to commend than to censure, was Mr. Michael Dutton, who came to Boston in 1686, and afterwards published his "Life and Errors." He visited the authorities and the clergy in that part of New England, and gave liberally of praise to all, one of his especial favourites was a Mrs. Green, wife of one of the first printers who came to this country, of whom he says, that "she espoused her husband's obligations" as well as his person, "and whenever, by ties of nature, or squeezing of war, he owed either money or love, she esteemed herself no less a debtor;" and of a Mrs. Wilkins he says, "She is a tender wife, a kind mother, and is a woman well poised in all humours; or, in other words, Mrs. Wilkins is a person of an even temper, which rendered her conversation more agreeable than those who laugh more, but smile less: Some there are, who spend more spirits, in straining, for an hour's mirth, than they can recover in a month, which renders them so unequal company whilst she is always equal, and the same. "Tis virtue to know her; wisdom, to converse with her, and joy to behold her; or (to do her justice in fewer words) she is the counterpart of her pious husband, who without her, is but half himself."

Virgo Triumphans, or Virginia in general; but the south part thereof in particular: including the fertile Carolina, and the no less excellent Island of Roanoke, richly and experimentally valued. Humbly presented as the auspice of a beginning year to the Parliament of England and Council of State. By Edward Williams, Gent.—This was published in London in 1650, and is dedicated to "the supreme authority of this nation, the Parliament of England," in language even more servile and mean than was usual in that age. "This dedication," says Mr. Williams, "in itself unworthy the honour of an address to your Grandeur, and of a foil too dead in shadow to approach neerer your most vigorous luster, reposes itself yet upon a confidence that in imitation of that God of whom you are in power the proper representatives, who vouchsafed graciously to accept a poorer pair of Turkeys from those whose abilities could not ascend to a more rich oblation, you will be pleased to cast a favourable aspect upon this humble offering, as proceeding from a grateful, clear, and sincere intention, whose desire being strongly passionate to present your Honours with something more worthy the auspice of a beginning year, is circumscribed by a narrowness of abilities and fortunes."

We quote a portion of his description of Virginia, which, with some of the early writers, comprehended all the country from Cape Cod to Florida. "Yet to shew," he says, "that nature regards this ornament of the new world with a more indulgent eye than she hath cast upon many other countries, whatever China, Persia, Japan, Cyprus, Candy, Sicily, Greece, the South of Italy, Spain, and the opposite parts of Africa, to all which she is parallel, may boast of, will be produced in this happy country. The same bounty of summer, the same mild remission of winter, with a more virgin and unexhausted soyle being material arguments to show that modesty and truth receive no diminution by the comparison. Nor is the present wideness of it without a particular beauty, being all over a natural grove of Oakes, Pines, Cedars, Cypress, Mulberry, Chestnut, Laurel, Sassafras, Cherry, Plum trees, and Vines, all of so delectable an aspect, that the melancholliest eye in the world cannot look upon it without contentment, nor content himself without admiration. No shrubs or underwoods choke up your passage, and in its season your foot can hardly direct itself where it will not be died in the blood of large and delicious strawberries: The rivers which every way glide in deepe and navigable channels, betwixt the breasts of this uberous Countrey, and contribute to its conveniency beauty and fertility, labour with the multitude of their fishy inhabitants in greater variety of species, and of a more incomparable delicacy in tast and sweetness than whatever the European sea can boast of: Sturgeon of ten feet, Drummes of size in length; Conger Eeles, Trout, Salmon, Bret, Mullet, Cod, Herring, Perch, Lampreyes, and whatever else can be desired to the satisfaction of the most voluptuous wishes."

"The Sunne, which in other countreys makes his visit in flames and droughts, heere casts his suspicious Beames, and by an innocent and complementall warmth, courts the bosome of this his particular favorite, hastening and disposing its wombe for ripe productions, which salute him in an absolute perfection. Winter snowes, frosts, and other excesses, are heere only remembered, never known. The purling Springs and wanton Rivers every where kissing the happy soyle into a perpetuall verdure, into an unwearied fertility: no obstructions in your expectations, attempt and hope them, prosecute and enjoy them."

Another very rare and curious work, of a yet earlier date, is entitled "Virginia richly valued by the description of the maine land of Florida, her next neighbour, out of the foure yeeres continuall travel and discouerie, for about one thousand miles East and West of Don Ferdinando de Soto, and six hundred able men in his companie. Wherein are truly observed the riches and fertility of those parts, abounding with things necessarie, pleasant, and profitable for the life of man: with the manners and dispositions of the Inhabitants: Written by a Portugall Gentleman of Elvas, employed in all the action, and translated out of Portuguese." This was printed in London in 1609, though the Portuguese original appeared in 1557. Hackluyt was the translator, but it is not in his collection of voyages. It is chiefly valuable for the information it imparts of the adventures of the never to be sufficiently execrated De Soto. One incident is worth preserving. Most of the speeches of the caciques, given by the author, are doubtless fictitious; but there are a few exceptions, with intrinsic evidences of genuineness. One of them is said to have been made but a short time before De Soto's death. "The Gouverneur," says the narrator, "fell into great dumps to see how hard it was to get to the Sea: and worse, because his men and horses every day diminished, being without succour to sustaine themselves in the country: and with that thought he fell sick. But before heooke his bed hee sent an Indian to the Cacique of Quigaha to tell him, that hee was the Child of the Sunne, and that all the way that hee came all men obeyed and served him, that he requested him to accept of his friendship, and come unto him: for he would be very glad to see him; and in signe of love and obedience to bring something with him of that which in his countrey was most esteemed. That Cacique answered by the same Indian: 'That whereas he said he was the Child of the Sunne, if he would drie vp the River he would beleene him: and touching the rest, that hee was wont to visit none; but rather that all those of whom he had notice did wait him, served, obeyed and paid him tributes willingly or perforce: therefore if hee desired to see him, it were best he should come thither: that if hee came in peace, he would receive him with speciall good will; and if in warre, in like manner hee would attend him in the towne where he was, and that for him or any other hee would not shrinke one foote backe.'"

The works relating to Virginia are nearly as numerous as those descriptive of New England. The best which we shall notice is the "History and Present State of Virginia," printed in London, in 1705. It is valuable for its account of the civil history of the colony down to that time. After mentioning that the Church of England was established by law, the author remarks—"They have no more than five conventicles among them, namely, three small meetings of Quakers, and two of Presbyterians. 'Tis observed, that these countieys where the Presbyterian meetings are, produce very mean tobacco; and for that reason can get no orthodox minister to stay among them; but, whenever they could, the people went very orderly to church. As for the Quakers, 'tis observed that by letting them alone they decrease daily.—The maintenance of a minister was appointed by law to be 16,000 pounds of tobacco annually. The fee for a funeral sermon was 400 pounds of tobacco; for a marriage license 200, &c. &c."

In 1706 was published "A Journal of Travels from New Hampshire to Caratuck, on the Continent of North America." By George Keith. Keith was a man of learning, who came to this country the second time, on the same ship with Governor Dudley, in 1702. He was in the first place a schoolmaster and preacher among the Quakers, but abandoned them and joined the Church of England, by whose authorities he was selected, on the ground that a seceder is always the most industrious and vindictive of enemies, to assay his former friends. He ultimately became the founder of a sect called Keithian Baptists. While in Massachusetts he had a quarrel with Increase Mather, and one of his pamphlets was printed in New York, "the printer in Boston not daring to print it, lest he should give offence to the Independent preachers there." In his travels he gives a characteristic anecdote. He was exposed to some danger in crossing a ferry to Rhode Island, during a storm, when the boat he was in was relieved by the exertions of John Burden, a Quaker. After being brought safe on shore, he offered money to the Quaker's men, which he would not allow them to accept; he then "thanked him very kindly for his help in our great danger, and said to him, John, ye have been the means under God to save our natural life, so for me to be the means under God to save your soul, for good information to bring you out of your dangerous errors. He replied, George, save thy own soul. I have no need of thy help; then, said I, I will pray for your conversion; he replied, the prayers of the wicked are an abomination; so uncharitable was he in his opinion concerning me, (as they generally are concerning all those who differ from them) though charitable in this opinion."

New-England's Prospect. A true, lively, and experimental description of that part of America, commonly called New-England: discovering the state of that country, both as it stands to our new-come English Planters; and to the old Native Inhabitants, saying down that which may both enrich the knowledge of the mind-travelling Reader, or benefit the future voyager.—Written by William Wood, and printed in London by John Dawson, in 1639. It is the best topographical account of New England then published, and was valuable chiefly for its statistics. The author's address to the reader, is, however, amusing, and we quote it entire. It is a favourable specimen of his style:

"Though I will promise thee no such voluptuous discourse, as many have made upon a scander subject, though they have travailed no further than the smoke of their owne native chimnies) yet dare I presume to present thee with the very true, and faithfull relation of some few yeares travels and experience, wherein I could bee loath to broach any thing which may puzzle thy beleefe, and so justly draw upon my selfe, that unust aspersion commonly laid on travellers; of whom many say, they may lye by authority, because none can outwile them, which Proverbe had surely his original from the sleepey beleefe of many a homebred Dormouse, who comprehends not either the raritie or possibility of those things he sees not: to whom the most classic relations seem riddles and paradoxes: of whom may bee said as once of Diogenes, that because he crept himselfe in the circumference of a tubbe, hee therefore contemned the Port and Pallace of Alexander, which hee knew not. So there are many a tub-brain'd Lyncke, who because any thing stranger than ordinary, is too large for the strait hoops of his apprehension, is peremptoriely concludes it is a lye: But I decline his sort of thicke witted readers, and dedicate the mite of my endeavours to my more credulous, ingenious, and less censorious Countrymen, for whose sakes I undertake this worke: and I did it the rather, because there are some relations heretofore past the Presse, which have bene very imperfect, as also because there have bene many scandalous and false reports past upon the Country, even from the sulphurous breath of every idle ballad-monger: wherefore to perfect the one, and to ke of the other, I have layed downe the nature of the Country, without any partiall respect unto it, as being my dwelling place where I have lived these foure yeares, and intend God willing to returne shortly againe; But my conscience is to me a thousand witnesses, that what I speake is the very truth, and this will informe thee almost as fully concerning it, as if thou wentest over to see it. Now whereas I have writte the latter part of this relation concerning the Indians in a more light and facetious stile, than the former: because their carriage and behaviour hath afforded some matter of mirth and laughter, than gravity and risedome: and therefore I have inserted many passages of mirth concerning them, to spice the rest of my more serious discourse, and to make it more pleasant. Thus thou mayest in two or three houres travaille over a few leaves, see and know that, which cost him that writt it, yeares and travaille over sea and land, before he knew it; and therefore I hope thou wilt accept it:

which shall be my full reward, as it was my whole ambition, and so I rest,

Thine bound in what I may, W. W."

A discourse concerning the currencies of the British plantations in America. Especially with regard to their paper money: more particularly in relation to the province of the Massachusetts Bay, in New-England.—A very well written pamphlet, published in 1739. The following observations from this work, would apply to a later period. "The goodly appearance which Boston, and the country in general, at present make in fine houses, equipage, and dress, is owing to paper money. Never were greater complaints of want of money, while, at the same time, never more extravagance in equipages and dress. Boston, like a private man of small fortune, does not become richer, but poorer, by a rich, goodly appearance."

A concise account of North America: containing a description of the several British Colonies on that continent, including the islands of Newfoundland, Cape Breton, &c. as to their situation, extent, climate, soil, produce, rise, governments, religion, present boundaries, and the number of inhabitants supposed to be in each. Also of the interior or westerly parts of the country, upon the rivers St. Lawrence, the Mississippi, Christina and the great lakes. To which is subjoined, an account of the several nations and tribes of Indians residing in those parts, as to their customs, manners, government, numbers, &c. containing many useful and entertaining facts never before treated of.—This was written by Major Robert Rogers, and was published in 1765. Among the "entertaining facts never before treated of," are perhaps the author's conjectures respecting the fogs of Newfoundland. "These coasts," he says, "are observed to be extremely subject to fogs, occasioned by the vapours, which are exhaled from the lakes, swamps and bogs, with which the island abounds, as is generally supposed: but perhaps is more owing to the vast shoals of fish and sea animals which frequent these coasts, whose breath, warmth, and motion, occasion vapours to arise from the sea: hence I imagine it is, that, notwithstanding the almost perpetual fogs here, the air is wholesome and agreeable to most constitutions, which would hardly be the case if they sprung from bogs, swamps, and fresh water lakes."

At Berlin, in 1773, appeared a work entitled "America and the Americans," written by a German officer to defend the aborigines against the statements of De Pau. He sums up the character of the Indians, at the conclusion of his book, in the following manner: "The savages think as they please; they eat when they are hungry; they sleep when they are sleepy; they walk about when they choose; they do not torment themselves about the future, and their labours are their amusements. It is true that they have the villanous custom of sometimes eating their prisoners. This is the life of a hog, it will be said; this mode of living cannot however be so bad as it may be supposed to be, since three-fourths of our noblemen live in the same manner; the difference between them and the savages is, that instead, like the latter, of eating their prisoners, they often consume their creditors."

A General History of Connecticut, from its first Settlement under George Fenwick, Esq., to its latest period of Amity with Great Britain, including a Description of the Country and many curious and interesting Anecdotes.—This work was written by the Rev. Dr. Samuel A. Peters, and was declared by even the British reviewers to contain “so many marks of party spleen and idle credulity as to be altogether unworthy of public attention.” The author says that “treachery is the staple commodity of the four New England provinces,” and gives a wonderful account of the Cahoon falls, near Albany, “where,” he observes, “water is consolidated without frost, by pressure, by swiftness, between the pinching, sturdy rocks, to such a degree of induration, that no iron crow can be forced into it.”

“Joyfull Newses out of the new found world, wherein are declared the rare and singular vertues of diuers and sundrie Herbs, Trees, Oyles, Plants, & Stones, with their applications, aswell to the vse of Phisicke, as Chirurgery: which being wel applied, bring such present remedy for all diseases, as may seeme altogether incredible: notwithstanding by practice found out, to be true. Also the portraiture of the sayde Herbes, very aptly described: Englished by John Frampton, Merchant. Imprinted at London, in Paules Churchyard at the signe of the Queenes Armes, by William Norton, 1580.”—This is one of the most rare and curious of the books relating to America printed in the sixteenth century. It was originally written in Spanish, by Doctor Monardes, of Seville. Although Frampton declares that being no longer “pressed with the toiles of his old trade, to passe the tyme to some benefite of his countrye, and to avoyde idleness, he took in hand to translate the booke,” he was probably in some way interested in the sale of the trees, herbs, &c., “the singular and rare vertues” of which are described by its author in a style that would have been deemed creditable to a modern Perkins, Brandreth, or Williams. From that part of the work relating to “Tobacco and of his great vertues,” we copy a few paragraphs.

“This hearbe which commonly is called Tabaco, is an Hearbe of much antiquite, and known amongst the Indians, and in especially among them of the new Spayne, and after that those Countries were gotten by our Spaniards, beyng taught of the Indians, they did profite themselves with those things, in the wounds which they receiued in their Warres, healing themselves therewith to their great benefite.

“Within these few yeeres there hath beene brought into Spayne of it, more to adorne Gardens with the fairenesse thereof, and too geue a pleasaunt sight, than that it was thought to haue the meruellous medicinable vertues, which it hath, but now we doe vse it more for his vertues, than for his fairenesse. For surely they are such which doe bring admiration.

“It is growing in many partes of the Indias, but ordinarily in moyst and shadowie places, and it is needfull that the grounde where it is sown, bee well tilled, and that it be a fruitfull grounde, and at all times it is sown, in the hot Countries. But in the colde Countries it must bee sown in the Moneth of Marche, for that it may defende it selfe from the frost.”

“The proper name of it amongst the Indians is Piciell, for the name of Tabaco is given to it by our Spaniards, by reason of an Island that is named Tabaco. This hearbe Tabaco hath particular vertue to heale griefes of the head, and in especially comming of colde cannes, and so it cureth the headake when it cometh of a cold humor, or of a windy cause. The Leanes must be layde botte to the grieve, and multiplying them the tyme that is needful, vntill the grieve be taken away.

Some there be that doe annoynt them with the Oyle of Oranges, and so they performe a very good worke.

“In any manner of griefe that is in the body or any other part therof it helpeth, proceeding of a cold cause & applied thereunto, it taketh it away, not without greate admiration.

“In griefes of the brest it worketh a maruellous effect, & inesppecially in those that doe cast out mater and reteneasme at the mouth, and in them that are short breasted, and in any other olde euilles making of the hearbes decoction, or with Sugar and Syrope, and being taken in little quantitie, it doth expell the Matters, and rottennes of the brest maruellously, and the smoke being taken in at the mouth, doeth cause that the matter be expelled out of the brest of them that do seatch their breath shorne.

“In the Toothache when the grieve cometh of a colde cause, or of colde Rumes, putting to it a little ball made of the leafe of the Tabaco, washing first the tooth with a small cloth wet wth the Juyce, it taketh away the payne, and stayeth it, that the putrifaction goe not forwarde: in hot causes it doth not profite, and this remedy is so common that it healeth every one.

“One of the meruelles of this hearbe, and that which bringeth most admiration, is, the manner howe the Priestes of the Indians did vse it, which was in this manner: when there was amongst the Indians any manner of businesse, of greate importance, in the which the chiefe Gentlemen called Casiques, or any of the principall people of the countrie, had necessite to consult with their Priestes, in any businesse of importance: then they went and propounded their matter to their chiefe Priest, forthwith in their presence, he tooke certayne leanes of the Tabaco, and cast them in to the fire, and did receiue the smoke of them at his mouth, and at his nose with a Cane, and in taking of it, hee fell downe vpon the ground, as a Dead man, and remainyng so, according to the quantitie of the smoke that he had taken, when the hearbe had done his worke, he did reuiue and awake, and gaue them their answeres, according to the visions, and illusions which hee sawe, whiles hee was rapte in the same manner, and he did interprete to them, as to him seemed best, or as the Diuell had counselled him, geuing them casually doubtfull answeres, in such sorte, that howsoeuer it fell out, they might say that it was the same, which was declared, and the answeres that he made.

“In like sort the rest of the Indians for their pastime, doe take the smoke of the Tabaco, too make themselves drunke withall, and to see the visions, and things that represent vnto them that wherein they doe delight: and other times they take it to knowe their businesse, and successe, because conformable to that, which they haue seene beyng drunke therewith, euen so they iudge of their businesse. And as the Devil is a deceauer, & hath the knowledge of the vertue of hearbes, so he did shew the vertue of this Hearb, that by the meanes thereof, they might see their imaginations, and visions, that he hath represented to them, and by that meanes deceiue them.”

Other chapters treat of “Snowe, and the Vertue thereof,” “the unspeakable Vertue of iron and steell in physicke,” etc.

Books of travel in America were hardly less frequent in the sixteenth and seventeenth than in the nineteenth century; and the passages we have given from some of the most rare of those which have been preserved show that the early tourists were about as philosophic and eccentric as their successors.

COTTON MATHER.

THE most celebrated person of his age in America was Cotton Mather. He was once revered as a saint, and he is still regarded as a man of great natural abilities, and profound and universal learning. It is true that he had much scholarship; he could read many languages, and his memory was so retentive that he rarely forgot the most trivial circumstance; but he had so little genius to comprehend great truths, and his attainments were for the most part rather curious than valuable. In all his long life he was a model of industry; and, beside his three hundred and eighty-two printed works, he left many manuscripts, of which the greatest is called "Illustrations of the Sacred Scriptures," in which he laboured daily for more than thirty years. It is a mere compilation of facts and opinions, from multitudinous sources, and embraces nothing that would be valuable to the modern scholar. His minor works are nearly all forgotten, even by the antiquaries. The Magnalia Christi Americana is preserved rather as curiosity than as an authority; for recent investigations have shown that his statements are not to be relied on where he had any interest in misrepresenting facts or characters. His style abounds, more than that of any of his contemporaries, with puerilities, puns, and grotesque conceits. But it is questionable whether his intellectual was not better than his moral character; for though of all men he was the most observant of forms, and "deemed himself starved unless he fasted once a month," and "found astonishing entertainment" in "spending three days together, without food, in knocking at the door of Heaven," he was still without humility or charity—ambitious, intriguing and unscrupulous. He believed in witchcraft, a circumstance for which he is not perhaps to be blamed, since no amount of learning or integrity could exempt one from credulity; but after fanning into a flame the terrible superstitions on this subject, when the frenzy was over he hypocritically endeavoured to persuade the people that instead of encouraging the proceedings, his influence and exertions had been on the side of caution and forbearance. Failing of this, he attempted to justify his conduct by inventing various personal histories, to show that there had been good cause for the atrocious persecutions. The devil certainly had much more power over Mather and the civil judges than over any of the unhappy convicts, the bodies of some of whom were treated even after death with a brutality that might have spalled the 'savages' who were spectators of these civilized and 'Christian' tragedies. Mather at one time kept one of the supposed witches in his house, to observe closely her actions. She was a young girl, who a sport or wantonness attempted to practise upon his sedulity. "The manner in which she played with his religious prejudices shows considerable art. A Quaker's book, which was then one of the greatest of abominations, was brought to her, and she read whole pages in it, with the exception of the names of the Deity and her Saviour, which she was not able to speak. Such books as she might have read with profit, she was not permitted to open; or, if she was urged to read in her Bible or Catechism, she was immediately taken with distractions. On the contrary, she could read in a jest-book without the least difficulty, and actually seemed to enjoy it. Popish books she was permitted to read at leisure, but a work against the Catholics, she might not touch. One gleam of suspicion seemed to shoot over his mind on one occasion; for he says, 'I, considering there might be a snare in it, put a stop to this fanciful business. Only I could not but be amazed at one thing; a certain prayer-book, [the Episcopal doubtless,] being brought her, she not only could read it very well, but also did read a large part of it over, calling it her Bible, and putting more than ordinary respect upon it. If she were going into her tortures, at the tenders of this book, she would recover herself to read it. Only when she came to the Lord's prayer, now and then occurring in that book, she would have her eyes put out; so that she must turn over a new leaf, and then she could read again. Whereas also there are scriptures in that book, she could read them there; but if any showed her the same scriptures in the Bible itself, she should sooner die than read them. And she was likewise made unable to read the Psalms in an ancient metre, which this prayer-book had in the same volume with it.' It was not very surprising, that she should after a time lose her veneration for him. Accordingly he remarks, that, though her carriage had been dutiful, 'it was afterwards, with a sauciness, which I was not used to be treated withal.' She would knock at his study door, telling him that some one below would be glad to see him; when he had taken the trouble to go down, and scolded her for the falsehood, she would say, 'Mrs. Mather is always glad to see you.' 'She would call out to him with numberless importunities.' Having determined to give a public account of her case, in a sermon to his congregation, she was troubled at it, thinking it not unlikely that sharper eyes than his might be turned upon her. She made many attempts to prevent it by threatening him with the vengeance of the spirits, till he was almost out of patience, and exorcized them in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. All these were perfectly intelligible to them; but 'the Indian language they did not seem so well to understand.' One part of the system of this artful young creature was to persuade him, that he was under the special protection of Heaven, so that spells could have no power over him. When he went to prayer, 'the demons would throw her on the floor, where she would whistle, and sing, and yell, to drown the voice of prayer; and she would fetch blows with her fist and kicks with her foot at the man that prayed. But still her fist and foot would recoil, when within an inch or two of him, as if rebounding against a wall.' This powerful appeal to his vanity was not lost upon him. It made him more solicitous than ever to patronize the delusion."

Mather entered college when twelve years old. At eighteen he began to preach. We have already alluded to the Magnalia. Grahame, the historian, calls it the most interesting work which the literature of this country has produced, and says that some of the biographical parts of it are superior to Plutarch; but this, as Mr. Peabody well remarks in his Life of Mather, is absurd and extravagant praise; the highest pretension of the work being, that it is curious and entertaining.

Toward the close of his career, Mather's reputation declined; and his mind, at this period of his life, appears to have been diseased, almost to insanity.

* In the archives of the Massachusetts Historical Society, among the manuscripts of Cotton Mather, there is a paper, on which is endorsed the following curious record in his hand-writing. "November 29th, 1692. While I was preaching at a private fast, (kept for a possessed young woman,) on Mark ix. 28, 29, the Devil in the damsel flew upon me, and tore the leaf, as it is now torn, over against the text."

THE BAY PSALM BOOK.

THE first book published in British America was "The Psalmes in Metre, faithfully Translated, for the Use, Edification, and Comfort of the Saints, in Public and Private, especially in New England," printed at Cambridge, in 1640. The version was made by Thomas Welde of Roxbury, Richard Mather of Dorchester, and John Eliot the apostle of the Indians. The translators seem to have been aware that it possessed but little poetical merit. "If," say they, in their preface, "the verses are not always so smooth and elegant as some may desire and expect, let them consider that God's altar needs not our polishings; for we have respected rather a plain translation, than to smooth our verses with the sweetness of any paraphrase, and so have attended to conscience rather than elegance, and fidelity rather than poetry, in translating Hebrew words into English language, and David's poetry into English metre." Cotton Mather laments the inelegance of the version, but declares that the Hebrew was most exactly rendered. After a second edition had been printed, President Dunster,* of Harvard College, assisted by Mr. Richard Lyon, a tutor at Cambridge, attempted to improve it, and in their advertisement to the godly reader they state that they "had special eye both to the gravity of the phrase of sacred writ and to the sweetness of the verse." Dunster's edition was reprinted twenty-three times in America, and several times in Scotland and England, where it was long used in the dissenting congregations. The following specimen is from the second edition:

PSALM CXXXVII.

The rivers on of Babylon,
There when wee did sit downe,
Yea, even then, wee mourned when Wee remembered Sion.
Our harp wee did hang it amid,
Upon the willow tree,
Because there they that us away
Led in captivitee
Requir'd of us a song, and thus Askt mirth us waste who laid,
Sing us among a Sion's song,
Unto us then they said.
The Lord's song sing can wee, being
In stranger's land? then let Lose her skill my right hand if I
Jerusalem forget.
Let cleave my tongue my pallate on
If mind thee doe not I,
If chiefe joyes o're I prize not more,
Jerusalem my Joy.
Remember, Lord, Edom's sons' word,
Unto the ground, said they,
It rase, it rase, when as it was Jerusalem her day.
Blest shall he be that payeth the Daughter of Babylon,
Who must be waste, that which thou hast
Rewarded us upon.
O happie hee shall surely bee
That taketh up, that eke
Thy little ones against the stones
Doth into pieces breake.

Mather and Eliot were men of sound learning, and Welde was the author of some respectable elegies and other verses. But although God's altar may not have needed overmuch their "polishings," their own poetry was sadly deficient in elegance and melody, and required all the improvement which the bards of Harvard could make in it, we should think, to be either said or sung. To show the difference between the original and the subsequent impressions, we copy the first Psalm from each version.

PSALME I.

By Welde and others.

O blessed man, that in th'advice
Of wicked doeth not walk:
nor stand in sinner's way, nor sit in chayre of scornfull folk.
But in the law of Iehovah,
is his longing delight:
and in his law doth meditate,
by day and eke by night.
And he shall be like to a tree planted by water-rivers:
that in his season yeilds his fruit,
and his leafe never withereth.
And all he doth, shall prosper well,
the wicked are not so:
but they are like unto the chaffe,
which winde drives to and fro.
Therefore shall not ungodly men, rise to stand in the doome, nor shall the sinners with the just,
in their assemblie come.
For of the righteous men, the Lord
acknowledgeth the way:
but the way of vngodly men shall vriterly decay.

PSAL. I.

Corrected by Dunster and Lyon.

O blessed man that walks not in th'advice of wicked men
Nor standeth in the sinners way nor scorn's seat sits in.
But he upon Iehovah's law
doth set his whole delight:
And in his law doth meditate
both in the day and night.
He shall be like a planted tree by water brooks; which shall
In his due season yield his fruit, whose leaf shall never fall:
And all he doth shall prosper well.
The wicked are not so:
But they are like unto the chaff,
which wind driveth to and fro Therefore shall no ungodly men in judgement stand upright:
Nor in th'assembly of the just shall stand the sinful wight.
For of ye righteous men, ye Lord
acknowledgeth the way:
Whereas the way of wicked men shall utterly decay.

lege, and was inaugurated on the twenty-seventh (August, 1640). In 1654 he became unpopular on account of his public advocacy of anti-pedobaptism, and was compelled to resign. When he died, in 1659, he bequeathed legacies to the persons who were most active in causing his separation from the College. In the life of Dunster, in the Magnalia, is the following admonition by a Mr. Shepherd, to the authors of the New Psalm Book:

"You Roxbury poets, keep clear of the crime
Of missing to give to us very good rhyme.
And you of Dorchester, your verses lengthen,
But with the texts' own words you will them strengthen."

ELIOT AND HIS INDIAN TRANSLATIONS.

"Since the death of Paul," says Edward Everett in an address at Bloody Brook, "a nobler, truer, and warmer spirit than John Eliot, never lived; and taking the state of the country, the narrowness of the means, the rudeness of the age, into consideration, the history of the Christian church does not contain an example of resolute, untiring, successful labour, superior to that of translating the entire Scriptures into the language of the native tribes of Massachusetts; a labour performed, not in the flush of youth, nor within the luxurious abodes of academic lore, but under the constant arden of his duties as a minister and a preacher, and at a time of life when the spirit begins to flag." Such is the judgment of one of the first scholars and most discerning men of our own age of the Apostle of the Indians—the noblest of all the noble men who planted civilization and religion in the new world.

Eliot was born at Nasing—not Nasin, as it is erroneously given by Allen and others—in Essex, England, in 1604. He was educated at Cambridge, and being subsequently persecuted for non-conformity, so far as 'not to be allowed even to teach a school in his native country,' according to Neal, he at the age of twenty-seven came to America, landing at Boston on the third of November, 1631. In the following year he became pastor of a Congregational church in Roxbury, and in the autumn of 1646, he preached his first sermon in the language of the Indians at Nonantum, now Newtown. From that year until he died, in the eighty-sixth year of his age, he laboured with an earnestness and ability rarely equalled and never surpassed, to educate and convert the Indians; and of all the Christian missionaries in America from its discovery to the present time, he was the most successful.

Eliot wrote several narratives of the advancement and condition of religion among the Indians, which were published in England; a tract entitled "Communion of the Churches;" a "History of the Gospels;" and "The Christian Commonwealth," a book which was denounced seditious by the colonial government, publicly recanted, and suppressed. He was also at an earlier day one of the committee by whom The Bay Psalm Book was prepared. His reputation, however, rests upon his Indian Grammar, and various translations into the Indian language, the chief of which was that of the Bible, completed in 1663. From the commencement of his ministry among the natives, the project of his translation appears to have been floating in his mind, at the magnitude of the work, and the difficulties with which it was likely to be attended, sometimes discouraged him; and in his "Further Progress of the Gospel," published in 1655, he says despondingly, "I have no hope to see the Bible translated, much less printed, in my own day." Yet he laboured at the task from time to time, trusting that the providence of God would at length send the aid necessary to print such portions of it as should be prepared for the press. Nor was his trust in vain: through the aid of "The Corporation for Promoting the Gospel among the Heathen in New-England," the New Testament was published at Cambridge in September, 1661, soon after the restoration of Charles the Second to the throne. The printing was completed while the question of the confirmation of the Society's charter was pending, and it was deemed an excellent opportunity to conciliate the good will of the King, to whom the Commissioners of the United Colonies dedicated the Translation, in an address written in a tone adapted to win his favourable regard. This dedication has the following preface:

"Upon the enformation of the Desolution of the Corporation, and intimation of hopes that his Majesty would [renew and] confirme the same, &c. The Commissioners thought meet to present his Majesty with the New Testament printed in the Indian language with these presents following, &c."

The document itself, as printed in the few copies of the Testament sent to England, is in these words:

"To the High and Mighty Prince, Charles the Second, by the Grace of God, King of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c.

"The Commissioners of the United Colonies in New-England: I, wish increase of all happiness, &c.

"MOST DREAD SOVERAIGN,

"If our weak apprehensions have not misled us, this Work will be no unacceptable Present to Your Majesty, as having a greater Interest therein, than we believe is generally understood: which (upon this Occasion) we conceive it our Duty to declare.

"The People of these four Colonies (Confederated for Mutual Defence, in the time of the late Distractions of our dear Native Country) Your Majesties natural born Subjects, by the Favour and Grant of Your Royal Father and Grandfather of Famous Memory, put themselves upon this great and hazardous Undertaking, of Planting themselves at their own Charge in these remote ends of the Earth, that without offence or provocation to our dear Brethren and Countrymen, we might enjoy that liberty to Worship God, which our own Consciences informed us, was not only our Right, but Duty: As also that we might (if it so pleased God) be instrumental to spread the light of the Gospel, the knowledge of the Son of God our Saviour, to the poor barbarous Heathen, which by His late Majesty, in some of our Patents, is declared to be His principal aim.

"These honest and Pious Intentions, have, through the grace and goodness of God and our Kings, been seconded with proportionable success: for, omitting the Immunities indulged us by Your Highness Royal Predecessors, we have been greatly encouraged by Your Majesties gracious expressions of Favour and Approbation signified, unto the Address made by the principal of our Colonies, to which the rest do most cordially Subscribe, though wanting the like seasonable opportunity, they have been (till now) deprived of the means to Congratulate Your Majesties happy Reconstitution, after Your long suffering, which we implore may yet be graciously accepted, that we may be equal partakers of Your Royal Favour and Moderation; which hath been so Illustrious that (to admiration) the animosities and different Perswasions of men have been so soon Composed, and so much cause of hope, that (unless the sins of the Nation prevent) a blessed Calm will succeed the late horrid Confusions of Church and State. And shall not we (Dread Sovereign) your Subjects of these Colonies, of the same Faith and Belief in all Points of Doctrine with our Countrymen, and the other Reformed Churches, (though perhaps not alike perswaded in some matters of Order, which in outward respects hath been unhappy for us) promise and assure our selves of all just favour and indulgence from a Prince so happily and graciously endowed?

"The other part of our Errand hither, hath been attended with Endeavours and Blessings; many of the wilde Indians being taught, and understanding the Doctrine of the Christian Religion, and with much affection attending such Preachers as are sent to teach them, many of their Children are instructed to Write and Reade, and some of them have proceeded further, to attain the knowledge of the Latine and Greek Tongues, and are brought up with our English youth in University-learning: There are divers of them that can and do reade some parts of the Scripture, and some Catechisms, which formerly have been Translated into their own Language, which hath occasioned the undertaking of a greater Work, viz: The Printing of the whole Bible, which (being Translated by a painful Labourer amongst them, who was desirous to see the Work accomplished in his dayes) hath already proceeded to the finishing of the New Testament, which we here humbly present to Your Majesty, as the first fruits and accomplishment of the Pious Design of your Royal Ancestors. The Old Testament is now under the Press, wanting and craving your Royal Favour and Assistance for the perfecting thereof.

"We may not conceal, that though this Work hath been begun and prosecuted by such Instruments as God hath raised up here, yet the chief Charge and Cost, which hath supported and carried it thus far, hath been from the Charity and Piety of our well-affected Countrymen in England; who being sensible of our inability in that respect, and studious to promote so good a Work, contributed large Sums of Money, which were to be improved according to the Direction and Order of the then-prevailing Powers, which hath been faithfully and religiously attended both there and here, according to the pious intentions of the Benefactors. And we do most humbly beseech your Majesty, that a matter of so much Devotion and Piety, tending so much to the Honour of God, may suffer no disappointment through any Legal defect (without the fault of the Donors, or the poor Indians, who onely receive the benefit) but that your Majesty be graciously pleased to Establish and Confirm the same, being contrived and done (as we conceive) in the first year of your Majesties Reign, as this Book was begun and now finished in the first year of your Establishment; which doth not onely presage the happy success of your Highness Government, but will be a perpetual monument, that by your Majesties Favour the Gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, was first made known to the Indians: An Honour whereof (we are assured) your Majesty will not a little esteem.

"SIR, The shines of Your Royal Favour upon these Undertakings, will make these tender Plants to flourish, notwithstanding any malevolent Aspect from those that bear evil will to this Sion, and render Your Majesty more Illustrious and Glorious to after Generations.

"The God of Heaven long preserve and bless Your Majesty with many happy Dayes, to his Glory, the good and comfort of his Church and People. Amen."

In 1653, the Old and New Testaments, and a version of the Psalter in a separate volume, were completed, and a copy of each forwarded to the King. Richard Baxter who was a friend and correspondent of Eliot, speaks of the gift as "such a work and fruit of a plantation, as was never before presented to a king." The perfect Bible was accompanied by the following dedicatory address, which Thomas states was omitted in nearly all the copies circulated in America.

"To the High and Mighty Prince, Charles the Second by the Grace of God, King of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c.

"The Commissioners of the United Colonies in New-England, wish all happiness, &c.

"MOST DREAD SOVERAIGN,

"As our former Presentation of the New Testament was Graciously Accepted by Your Majesty; so with all Humble Thankfulness for that Royal Favour, and with the like hope, We are bold now to Present the WHOLE BIBLE, Translated into the Language of the Natives of this Country, by A Painful Labourer in that Work, and now Printed and Finished, by means of the Pious Beneficence of Your Majesties Subjects in England: which also by Your Special Favour hath been Continued and Confirmed to the intended Use and Advancement of so Great and Good a Work, as is the Propagation of the Gospel to these poor Barbarians in this (Ere-while) Unknown World.

"Translations of Holy Scripture, The Word of the King of Kings, have ever been deemed not unworthy of the most Princely Dedications: Examples whereof are extant in divers Languages. But Your Majesty is the First that hath Received one in this Language, or from this American World, or from any Parts so Remote from Europe as these are, for ought that ever we heard of.

"Publications also of these Sacred Writings to the Sons of Men (who here, and here onely, have the Mysteries of their Eternal Salvation revealed to them by the God of Heaven) is a Work that the Greatest Princes have Honoured themselves by. But to Publish and Communicate the same to a Lost People, as remote from Knowledge and Civility, much more from Christianity, as they were from all Knowing, Civil, and Christian Nations; a People without Law, without Letters, without Riches, or Means to procure any such thing; a People that sate as deep in Darkness, and in the shadow of Death, as (we think) any since the Creation: This puts a Lastre upon it that is Superlative; and to have given Royal Patronage and Countenance to such a Publication, or to the Means thereof, will stand among the Marks of Lasting Honour in the eyes of all that are Considerate, even unto After-Generations.

"And though there be in this Western World many Colonies of other European Nations, yet we humbly conceive, no Prince hath had a Return of such a Work as this; which may be some Token of the Success of your Majesties Plantation of New-England, Undertaken and Settled under the Encouragement and Security of Grants from Your Royal Father and Grandfather, of Famous Memory, and Cherished with late Gracious Aspects from Your Majesty. Though indeed the present Poverty of these Plantations could not have Accomplished this Work, had not the forementioned Bounty of England lent Relief; Nor could that have Continued to stand us in stead, without the Influence of Your Royal Favour and Authority, whereby the Corporation there, For Propagating the Gospel among these Natives, hath been Established and Encouraged (whose Labour of Love, Care, and Faithfulness in that Trust, must ever be remembered with Honour.) Yes, when private persons, for their private Ends, have of late sought Advantages to deprive the said Corporation of Half the Possessions that had been, by Liberal Contributions, obtained for so Religious Ends; We understand, That, by an Honourable and Righteous Decree as Your Majesties Court of Chancery, their Hopes have been defeated, and the Thing Settled where it was and is. For which great Favour, and Illustrious Fruit of Your Majesties Government, we cannot but return our most Humble Thanks in this Publick manner; And, as the Result of the joynt Endeavours of our Majesties Subjects there and here, acting under your Royal Influence, We Present You with this Work, which upon sundry accounts is to be called Yours.

"The Southern Colonies of the Spanish Nation have sent home from this American Continent, much Gold and Silver, as the Fruit and End of their Discoveries and Transplantations: That (we confess) is a scarce Commodity in this Colder Climate. But (suitable to the Ends of our Undertaking,) we Present this, to their Concomitant Fruits of our poor Endeavours to Plant and Propagate the Gospel here; which, upon a true account, is as much better than Gold, as the Souls of men are more worth than the whole World. This is a nobler Fruit (and indeed, in the Counsels of All-Disposing Providence, was an higher intended End) of Columbus his Adventure. And though by his Brother's being hindered from a seasonable Application, your Famous Predecessour and Ancestor, King Henry the seventh, missed of being sole Owner of that first Discovery, and of the Riches thereof; yet, if the Honour of first Discovering the True and Saving Knowledge of the Gospel unto the poor Americans, and of Erecting his Kingdom of JESUS CHRIST among them, be Reserved for, and do Redound unto your Majesty, and the English Nation, After-ages will not reckon this inferior to the other. Religion is the End and Glory of Mankind: and as it was the Professed End of this Plantation; so we desire ever to keep it in our Eye as our main design (both as to ourselves, and the Natives about us) and that our Products may be answerable hereunto. Give us therefore leave (Dread Sovereign) yet again humbly to Beg the Continuance of your Royal Favour, and of the Influences thereof, upon this poor Plantation, The United Colonies of NEW-ENGLAND, for the Securing and Establishment of our Civil Privileges, and Religious Liberties hitherto Enjoyed; and upon this Good Work of Propagating Religion to these Natives, that the Supports and Encouragements thereof from England may be still countenanced and Confirmed. May this Nursing still suck the Breast of Kings, and be fostered by your Majesty, as it hath been by your Royal Predecessors, unto the Preservation of its main Concernments; It shall thrive and prosper to the Glory of God, and the Honour of your Majesty: Neither will it be any loss or grief unto our Lord the King, to have his Blessing of the Poor to come upon Him, and that from these Ends of the Earth.

"The God by whom Kings Reign, and Princes Decree Justice, Bless Your Majesty, and Establish your Throne in Righteousness, in Mercy, and in Truth, to the Glory of His Name, the Good of His People, and to Your own Comfort and Rejoycing, not in this onely, but in another World."

The first impression of the Indian Bible, says Comers Francis, in his excellent Life of Eliot, sufficed for about twenty years. In 1680 another edition of the New Testament was published. Mr. Eliot, in a letter written during that period to the Honourable Mr. Boyle, alludes to it when he says, "We are at the nineteenth chapter of the Acts; and when we have impressed the New Testament, our Commissioners approve of my preparing and impressing the Old." In addition to the Psalms, a Catechism was annexed, as is the first impression. This New Testament has the imprint of Cambridge, but no printer's name. In 1685, a second edition of the Old Testament appeared, printed at Cambridge by Samuel Green. This was bound with the last impression of the New Testament; and the two parts, thus taken together, constitute the second edition of the whole Bible, though there was an interval of five years between the times at which the two Testaments respectively appeared. Each part has but one title page, which is in Indian, and the same as before. We learn some facts respecting this second edition of the Indian version from Eliot's correspondence with Mr. Boyle. The whole impression was two thousand copies. It was superintended by Mr. Eliot, who gave a part of his salary towards defraying the expense, and received for the same purpose from the corporation in England, through Mr. Boyle, nine hundred pounds at different times, namely, forty pounds at one time, four hundred and sixty at another, and four hundred at a third. If some collateral expenses be included, the whole cost of the impression must have been little, if any, short of a thousand pounds. Mr. Eliot's remarks lead us to suppose, that the first edition was nearly or quite exhausted. If so, and if the number of its copies was what I have supposed, this fact will furnish us with a measure by which we may estimate the demand for the Scriptures among the Indians for twenty years after the translation was first printed. We may presume that the number of copies, which curiosity might lead people in the colony to purchase, or which courtesy might send to England, could not be large. Eliot apologised to Mr. Boyle for the slow progress of the printing, by alleging the want of an adequate number of workmen, and the interruption of labour among those whom they had, by sickness, which prevailed fatally in the winter of 1683 and the spring of 1684. His heart was saddened by these and other events, which seemed to throw discouragement on the work; for he was then bending beneath the weight of years, and with the feelings of an old and faithful servant, his soul yearned to witness, as his last labour, the completion of the new edition of his translation. The affectionate earnestness with which he dwells on the subject in his correspondence with the English philosopher, has a touching interest. "My age," says he, "makes me importunate. I shall depart joyfully, may I but leave the Bible among them; for it is the word of life." Again he writes, "I desire to see it done before I die, and I am so deep in years, that I cannot expect to live long; and sundry say, if I do not procure it printed while I live, it is not within the prospect of human reason, whether ever, or when, or how, it may be accomplished." He bore it on his heart to God in his devotions, and the anxious earnestness of his soul seemed to be fixed on this point. The prayer of the good old man was answered. He lived to see a new impression of his Bible; and when he took the precious volume in his hands, we can easily imagine that with uplifted eyes he may have uttered the Nunc dimittis of the aged Simeon. In preparing this second edition Mr. Eliot received valuable assistance from the Reverend John Cotton of Plymouth, who had spent much of his time for several years in forming a thorough acquaintance with the Indian language. This obligation Eliot acknowledged in a letter to Boyle in 1688. Several years before that time, Boyle had intrusted to Eliot thirty pounds for the promotion of religion among the Indians. The money had not been expended, perhaps because no opportunity had occurred for the particular mode of using it which Boyle designed. Of this sum, Eliot requested that ten pounds might be given to Major Gookin's widow, who was poor; ten pounds to Gookin's son, who lectured among the Indians; and ten pounds to Mr. John Cotton, "who," says he, "helped me much in the second edition of the Bible." Probably Mr. Cotton revised the whole version with him, that by their joint labours a more exact and faithful translation might be exhibited in the new impression.

Mr. Francis elsewhere remarks, that the Indian Bible has become one of those rare books which the antiquarian deems it a treasure to possess. The copies in public or private libraries are very few. It has acquired the venerable appearance of an ancient and sealed book; and when we turn over its pages, those long and harsh words seem like the mysterious hieroglyphics in some time-hallowed temple of old Egypt. It failed to answer the pious purpose for which the translator laboured in preparing it. But it has answered another purpose, which was perhaps never in his mind, or, if it were, was doubtless regarded as an inferior consideration. In connexion with his Indian Grammar, it has afforded important aid as a valuable document, in the study of comparative philology. Though the language in which it is printed is no longer read, yet this book is prized as one of the means of gaining an insight into the structure and character of "unwritten dialects of barbarous nations," a subject which, of late years, has attracted the attention of learned men, and the study of which, it is believed, will furnish new facts to modify the hitherto received principles of universal grammar. On this account scholars of the highest name in modern times have had reason to thank Eliot for labours, which the Indians are not left to thank him for. While the cause of religion missed, in a great degree, the benefit designed for it, the science of language acknowledges a contribution to its stores. Mr. Eliot translated the Bible into a dialect of what is called the Mohegan tongue, a language spoken by all the New England Indians, essentially the same, but varied by different dialects among the several tribes. By Eliot and others it was called the Massachusetts language. There is, besides, a moral aspect, in which this translation of the Scriptures should be viewed. It must be regarded as a monument of laborious piety, of painstaking love to the soul of man. Would the translator have had the spirit to undertake, still more the perseverance to carry through, a work so wearisome and discouraging, had he not been animated by the deep, steady, strong principle of devotedness to God and to the highest good of his fellow-men? The theological scholar, who translates the Bible, or even one of the Testaments, from the original to his vernacular tongue, is considered as having achieved a great task, and is giving ample proof of his diligence. Yet such a work is easy compared with the labour which Eliot undertook and finished amidst a press of other employments, which alone might have been deemed sufficient to satisfy the demands of Christian industry. Among the many remarkable doings of the Apostle to the Indians, this bears the most striking testimony to his capacity of resolute endurance in the cause of man's spiritual welfare. We justly admire the moral courage, the spirit of self-sacrifice, which sustained him in the tasks of preaching, visiting, and instruction, never deterred by the dark squalidness of barbarity, never daunted by the fierce threats of men who knew so low his passions, never moved by exposure to storms cold, and the various forms of physical suffering. But when we represent him to our minds, as labouring at his translation of the Scriptures in the silence of his study, year after year, in the freshness of the morning hour and by the taper of midnight, wearied but not disheartened; continually perplexed with the almost unmanageable phraseology of the dialect of the barbarians, yet always patient to discover how it might be made to represent truly the meaning of the sacred books; doing this chapter by chapter, verse by verse, without a wish to give over the toil; cherishing for a long time only a faint hope of publication, yet still willing to believe, that God in his good providence would finally send the means of giving the printed word of life to those for whom he toiled and prayed,—we cannot but feel that we witness a more trying task, a more surprising labour, than any presented by the stirring and active duties of his ministry among the Indians. It was a long, heavy, hard work, wrought out by the silent but wasting efforts of mental toil, and relieved by no immediately animating excitement. It was truly a labour of love. When we take that old dark volume into our hands, we understand not the words in which it is written; but it has another and beautiful meaning which we do understand. It is a symbol of the affection which a devoted man cherished for the soul of his fellow-man: it is the expression of a benevolence, which failed in no effort to give light to those who sat in darkness and in the shadow of death; and so it remains, and will ever remain, a venerable manifestation of the power of spiritual truth and spiritual sympathy.

It is indeed strange that the language of a version of the Bible, made less than two hundred years ago, should now be utterly extinct. But the second edition of the Translation was the last, and the printer will never again be called to set types for those words so strange, nor will there in all after time, probably, be a person in the world who can read the book.

Cotton Mather tells us that the anagram of Eliot's name was Toile, and the conceit has the merit of expressing truly one of the chief traits in the apostle's character. Beside the labours which we have mentioned, he translated Baxter's "Call to the Unconverted," Bayly's "Practice of Piety," and "several of the compositures" of Shepard, and others of his contemporaries, into the Indian language.

"His youth was innocent; his ripper age
Mark'd with some act of goodness, every day;
And watch'd by eyes that loved him, calm and sage,
Faded his late declining years away.
Cheerful he gave his being up, and went
To share the holy rest that waits a life well spent."

MRS. BRADSTREET.

MRS. ANNE BRADSTREET. "the mirror of her age, and glory of her sex," as she is styled by John Norton, of excellent memory, came to America with her husband, Simon Bradstreet, governor of the colony, in 1630, when she was but eighteen years of age. She was a daughter of Governor Dudley, a miserly, though a "virtuous and discreet gentleman," for whom Governor Belcher wrote the following epitaph:

"Here lies Thomas Dudley, that trusty old stud—
A bargain's a bargain, and must be made good."

Mrs. Bradstreet's verses were printed at Cambridge, in 1640. The volume was entitled, "Several Poems, compiled with great variety of wit and learning, full of delight; wherein especially is contained a compleat discourse and description of the four Elements, Constitutions, Ages of Man, and Seasons of the Year, together with an exact Epitome of the Three First Monarchies, viz: the Assyrian, Persian, Grecian; and Roman Commonwealth, from the beginning, to the end of the last King; with divers other Pleasant and Serious Poems." Norton declares her poetry so fine that, were Maro to hear it, he would condemn his own works to the fire; and in a poetical description of her character says—

Her breast was a brave pallace, a broad street,
Where all heroic, ample thoughts did meet,
Where nature such a tenement had tane,
That other souls to hers dwelt in a lane!

The author of the Magnalia speaks of her poetry as a "monument for her memory beyond the stateliest marble;" and John Rogers, one of the Presidents of Harvard College, in some verses addressed to her, says—

Your only hand these poesies did compose:
Your head the source, whence all those springs did flow:
Your voice, whence change's sweetest notes arose:
Your feet, that kept the dance alone, I trow:
Then veil your bonnets, poetasters all,
Strike, lower amain, and at these humbly fall,
And deem yourselves advanced to be her pedestal.
Should all with lowly congees laurels bring,
Waste Flora's magazine to find a wreath,

Or Pineus' banks, 'twere too mean offering;
Your muse a fairer garland doth bequeath
To guard your fairer front; here 'tis your name
Shall stand immarbled; this your little frame
Shall great Colossus be, to your eternal fame.

She died in September, 1672, and "was greatly mourned." The following stanzas are from one of her minor pieces, entitled "Contemplations."

Under the cooling shadow of a stately elm
Close sate I by a goodly river's side;
Where gliding streams the rocks did overwhelm;
A lonely place, with pleasures dignified.
I once that loved the shady woods so well,
Now thought the rivers did the trees excell,
And if the sun would ever shine, there would I dwell.

While on the stealing stream I fixt mine eye,
Which to the long'd-for ocean held its course,
I markt nor crooks, nor rubs that there did lye
Could hinder aught, but still augment its force:
O happy flood, quoth I, that holdst thy race
Till thou arrive at thy beloved place,
Nor is it rocks or shoals that can obstruct thy pace.

Nor is 't enough, that thou alone may'st slide,
But hundred brooks in thy clear waves do meet,
So hand in hand along with thee they glide
To Thetis' house, where all embrace and greet:
Thou emblem true, of what I count the best,
O could I lead my rivulets to rest,
So may we press to that vast mansion, ever blest.

Ye fish, which in this liquid region 'bide,
That for each season, have your habitation,
Now salt, now fresh, where you think best to glide,
To unknown coasts to give a visitation,
In lakes and ponds, you leave your numerous fry,
So nature taught, and yet you know not why,
You watry folk that know not your felicity.

Look how the wantons frisk to taste the air,
Then to the colder bottom straight they dive,
Eftsoon to Neptune's glassie hall repair
To see what trade the great ones there do drive,
Who forrage o'er the spacious sea-green field,
And take the trembling prey before it yield,
Whose armour is their scales, their spreading fins their shield.

While musing thus with contemplation fed,
And thousand fancies buzzing in my brain,
The sweet-tongued Philomel percht o'er my head,
And chanted forth a most melodious strain
Which rapt me so with wonder and delight,
I judg'd my hearing better than my sight,
And wish'd me wings with her a while to take my flight.

O merry bird (said I) that fears no snares,
That neither toyles nor hoards up in thy barn,
Feels no sad thoughts, nor cruciating cares
To gain more good, or shun what might thee harm.
Thy cloaths ne'er wear, thy meat is every where,
Thy bed a bough, thy drink the water cleer,
Reminds not what is past, nor what's to come dost fear,

The dawning morn with songs thou dost prevent,*
Setts hundred notes unto thy feather'd crew,
So each one tunes his pretty instrument,
And warbling out the old, begins anew,
And thus they pass their youth in summer season,
Then follow thee into a better region,
Where winter's never felt by that sweet airy legion.

Man's at the best a creature frail and vain,
In knowledge ignorant, in strength but weak;
Subject to sorrows, losses, sickness, pain,
Each storm his state, his mind, his body break:
From some of these he never finds cessation,
But day or night, within, without, vexation, [lation.
Troubles from foes, from friends, from dearest, near'st re-

* Anticipate.

And ye; this sinfull creature, frail and vain,
This lump of wretchedness, of sin and sorrow,
This weather-beaten vessel wrackt with pain,
Joyes not in hope of an eternal morrow:
Nor all his losses, crosses, and vexation,
In weight, in frequency, and long duration,
Can make him deeply groan for that divine translation.

The mariner that on smooth waves doth glide,
Sings merrily, and steers his barge with ease,
As if he had command of wind and tide,
And had become great master of the seas;
But suddenly a storm spoils all the sport,
And makes him long for a more quiet port,
Which 'gainst all adverse winds may serve for fort.

So he that saileth in this world of pleasure,
Feeding on sweets, that never bit of th' sowre,
That's full of friends, of honour, and of treasure,
Fond fool, he takes this earth ev'n for heaven's bowen
But sad affliction comes and makes him see
Here's neither honour, wealth nor safety;
Only above is found all with security.

O Time, the fatal wrack of mortal things,
That draws oblivion's curtains over kings,
Their sumptuous monuments, men know them not,
Their names without a record are forgot;
Their parts, their ports, their pomp's all laid in th' dust;
Nor wit nor gold, nor buildings scape time's rust;
But he whose name is grav'd in the white stone
Shall last and shine when all of these are gone.

ROGER WILLIAMS AND HIS CONTROVERSIES.

ROGER WILLIAMS was on many accounts the most remarkable man among the Puritans. He was the first legislator who fully recognized the rights of conscience, and this of itself should make his name immortal. He was eccentric, in conduct as well as in opinion, but nevertheless a man of genius and virtue, of firmness, courage, disinterestedness and benevolence. The notice of Williams and his writings by Dr. Verplanck is so just and comprehensive that we quote it, without abridgment. He emigrated to New England from Wales in 1630. He was then, says Verplanck, a man of austere life and popular manners, full of reading, skilled in controversy, and gifted with a rapid, copious, and vehement eloquence. The writers of those days represent him as being full of turbulent and singular opinions, "and the whole country," saith the quaint Cotton Mather, "was soon like to be set on fire by the rapid motion of a windmill in the head of this one man."* The heresy which appeared most grievous to his brethren, was his zeal for unqualified religious liberty. In the warmth of his charity, he contended for "freedom of conscience, even to Papists and Arminians, with security of civil peace to all," a doctrine that filled the Massachusetts clergy with horror and alarm. "He violently urged," says Cotton Mather, "that the civil magistrate might not punish breaches of the first table of the commandments, which utterly took away from the authority all capacity to prevent the land which they had purchased on purpose for a recess from such things, from becoming such a sink of abominations as would have been the reproach and ruin of Christianity in these parts of the world."

In addition to these "most disturbant and offensive doctrines," Mather charges him with preaching against the Royal charter of the colony, "on an insignificant pretence of wrong therein done unto the Indians." To his fervent zeal for liberty of opinion, this singular man united an equal degree of tenacity to every article of his own narrow creed. He objected to the custom of returning thanks after meat, as, in some manner or other, involving a corruption of primitive and pure worship; he refused to join any of the churches in Boston, unless they would first make a public and solemn declaration of their repentance for having formerly communion with the church of England; and when his doctrines of religious liberty were condemned by the clergy, he wrote to his own church at Salem, "that if they would not separate as well from the churches of New England as of Old, he would separate from them."

All his peculiar opinions, whether true or erroneous, were alike offensive to his puritan brethren, and controversy soon waxed warm. Some logicians, more tolerant or politic than the rest, attempted to reconcile the disputants by a whimsical, and not very intelligible sophism. They approved not, said they, of persecuting men for conscience' sake, but solely for correcting them for sinning against conscience; and so not persecuting, but punishing heretics. Williams was not a man who could be imposed upon by words, or intimidated by threats; and he accordingly persevered in inculcating his doctrines publicly and vehemently. The clergy, after having in vain endeavoured to shake him by argument and remonstrance, at last determined to call in the aid of the civil authority; and the General Court, after due consideration of the case, passed sentence of banishment upon him, or, as they phrased it, "ordered his removal out of the jurisdiction of the court." Some of the men in power had determined that he should be sent to England; but, when they sent to take him, they found that, with his usual spirit of resolute independence, he had already departed, no one knew whither, accompanied by a few of his people, who, to use their own language, had gone with their beloved pastor "to seek their providences." After some wanderings, he pitched his tent at a place to which he gave the name of Providence, and there became the founder and legislator of the colony of Rhode Island. There he continued to rule, sometimes as the governor, and always as the guide and father of the settlement, for forty-eight years, employing himself in acts of kindness to his former enemies, affording relief to the distressed, and offering an asylum to the persecuted. The government of his colony was formed on his favourite principle, that in matters of faith and worship, every citizen should walk according to the light of his own conscience, without restraint or interference from the civil magistrate. During a visit which Williams made to England, in 1643, for the purpose of procuring a colonial charter, he published a formal and laboured vindication of this doctrine, under the title of "The Bloody Tenet, Or, a Dialogue between Truth and Peace." In this work, written with his usual boldness and decision, he anticipated most of the arguments which, fifty years after, attracted so much attention, when they were brought forward by Locke. His own conduct in power, was in perfect accordance with his speculative opinions; and when, in his old age, the order of his little community was disturbed by an irruption of Quaker preachers, he combated them only in pamphlets and public disputations, and contented himself with overwhelming their docnines with a torrent of learning, sarcasms, syllogisms, and puns.*

It should also be remembered, to the honour of Roger Williams, that no one of the early colonists, without excepting William Penn himself, equaled him in justice and benevolence towards the Indians. He laboured incessantly, and with much success, to enlighten and conciliate them, and by this means acquired personal influence among them, which he had frequently the enviable satisfaction of exerting in behalf of those who had banished him. It is not the least remarkable or characteristic incident of his varied life, but within one year after his exile, and while he was yet hot with controversy, and indignant at his wrongs, his first interference with the affairs of his former colony was to protect its frontier settlements from an Indian massacre. From that time forward, though he was never permitted to return to Massachusetts, he was frequently employed by the government of that province in negotiations with the Indians, and on other business of the highest importance. Even Cotton Mather, in spite of his steadfast abhorrence of Williams's heresy, seems to have been touched with the magnanimity and kindness of the man; and after having stigmatized him as "the infamous Korah of New England," he confesses, a little reluctantly, that "for the forty years after his exile, he acquitted himself so ably, that many judicious people judged him to have had the root of the matter in him, during the long winter of his retirement."

WILLIAM PENN AND JOHN LOCKE.

WITH all his goodness and gentleness, the founder of Pennsylvania was not free from that spirit of bitter controversy which prevailed before his arrival in this country, in New England; and the titles of some of his works are as quaint and intemperate as those of Mather and Williams, as for example, "A Brief Reply to a Mere Rhapsody of Lies, Folly, and Slander," and "An Answer to a False and Foolish Libel," etc. The great name of Locke, says Verplanck, is associated with that of William Penn, by a double tie; by his celebrated constitution for the Carolinas, which enrols him among the earliest legislators of America, and by one of those anecdotes of private friendship and magnanimity, upon which the mind gladly reposes, after wandering among the cold and dreary generalities of history. During the short period of Penn's influence at the court of James II., he obtained from the king the promise of a pardon for Locke, who had fled to Holland from the persecution of the dominant party. Locke, though grateful to Penn for this unsolicited kindness, replied with a firmness worthy of the man who was destined to become the most formidable adversary of tyranny in all its shapes, "that he could not accept a pardon, when he had not been guilty of any crime." Three years after this occurrence, the Stuarts were driven from the throne of England; Locke then returned in triumph. At the same time, the champions of English liberty, to serve some party object, proclaimed Penn a traitor, without the slightest ground; and all his rights as an Englishman, and his chartered privileges, were shamelessly violated by the very statesmen who had drafted the Act of Toleration and the Bill of Rights. In this season of distress and desertion, Penn was unexpectedly gratified by the grateful remembrance of Locke, who now, in his turn, interceded to procure a pardon from the new sovereign. In the pride of slandered innocence, Penn answered, as Locke had formerly done, "that he had never been guilty of any crime, and could not, therefore, rest satisfied with a mode of liberation which would ever appear as a standing monument of his guilt." The genius of Locke has been described by Dr. Watts, with equal elegance and truth, as being "wide as the sea, calm as the night, bright as the day;" still his mind appears to have been deficient in that practical sagacity which so happily tempered the enthusiasm of William Penn. The code of government and laws which Locke formed for the Carolinas, contained many excellent provisions; but it was embarrassed by numerous and discordant subdivisions of power, was perplexed by some impracticable refinements in the administration of justice, and was, in all respects, unnecessarily artificial and complicated. Nevertheless, it is, remarks Verplanck, a legitimate subject of national pride that we can thus number this virtuous and profound philosopher among those original legislators of this country, who gave to our political character its first impulse and direction.*

THE POETRY OF GOVERNOR WOLCOTT.

ROGER WOLCOTT, a major-general at the capture of Louisburg, and afterward governor of Connecticut, published a volume of "Poetical Meditations" at New London, in 1725. His principal work is "A Brief Account of the Agency of the Honourable John Winthrop, Esquire, in the Court of King Charles the Second, Anno Domini, 1662, when he obtained a Charter for the Colony of Connecticut." In this he describes a miracle by one of Winthrop's company, on the return voyage.

The winds awhile
Are courteous, and conduct them on their way,
To near the midst of the Atlantic sea,
When suddenly their pleasant gales they change
For dismal storms that o'er the ocean range.
For faithless Æolus, meditating harms,
Breaks up the peace, and priding much in arms,
Unbars the great artillery of heaven,
And at the fatal signal by him given,
The cloudy chariots threatening take the plains:
Drawn by wing'd steeds hard pressing on their reins.
These vast battalions, in dire aspect raised,
Start from the barriers—night with lightning blazed,
Whilst clashing wheels, resounding thunders crack,
Strike mortals deaf, and heavens astonish'd shake.
Here the ship captain, in the midnight watch,
Stamps on the deck, and thunders up the hatch; /
And to the mariners aloud he cries,
"Now all from safe recumbency arise:
All hands aloft, and stand well to your tack,
Engendering storms have clothed the sky with black
Big tempests threaten to undo the world:
Down topsail, let the mainsail soon be fur'd:
Haste to the foresail, there take up a reef;
'Tis time, boys, now if ever, to be brief;
Aloof for life; let's try to stem the tide,
The ship's much water, thus we may not ride:
Stand roomer then, let's run before the sea,
That so the ship may feel her steerage way;
Steady at helm!" Swiftly along she scuds
Before the wind, and cuts the foaming soda.
Sometimes aloft she lifts her prow so high,
As if she'd run her bowsprit through the sky;

* The title of one of his books against George Fox, and his follower, Burrowes, is "The Fox digged out of his Burrow."

* The leading and nearly all the practicable principles of Locke had been sometime familiar in New England.

Then from the summit ebbes and hurries down,
As if her way were to the centre shown.

Meanwhile our founders in the cabin sat,
Reflecting on their true and sad estate;
Whilst holy Warham's sacred lips did treat
About God's promises and mercies great.

Still more gigantic births spring from the clouds,
Which tore the tatter'd canvass from the shrouds,
And dreadful balls of lightning fill the air,
Shot from the hand of the great Thunderer.

And now a mighty sea the ship o'ertakes,
Which falling on the deck, the bulk-head breaks;
The sailors cling to ropes, and frightened cry,
"The ship is foundered, we die! we die!"

Those in the cabin heard the sailors screech;
All rise, and reverend Warham do beseech,
That he would now lift up to Heaven a cry
For preservation in extremity.
He with a faith sure bottom'd on the word
Of Him that is of sea and winds the Lord,
His eyes lifts up to Heaven, his hands extends,
And fervent prayers for deliverance sends.
The winds abate, the threatening waves appease,
And a sweet calm sits regent on the seas.
They bless the name of their deliverer,
Who now they found a God that heareth prayer.

Still further westward on they keep their way,
Ploughing the pavement of the briny sea,
Till the vast ocean they had overpast,
And in Connecticut their anchors cast.

In a speech to the king, descriptive of the valley of the Connecticut, Winthrop says—

The grassy banks are like a verdant bed,
With choicest flowers all enamell'd,
O'er which the wing'd choristers do fly,
And wound the air with wondrous melody.
Here Philomel, high perch'd upon a thorn,
Sings cheerful hymns to the approaching morn.
The song once set, each bird tunes up his lyre,
Responding heavenly music through the quire. . . .

Each plain is bounded at its utmost edge
With a long chain of mountains in a ridge,
Whose azure tops advance themselves so high,
They seem like pendants hanging in the sky.

In an account of King Philip's war, he tells how the soldier—

met his amorous dame,
Whose eye had often set his heart in flame.
Urged with the motives of her love and fear,
She runs and clasps her arms about her dear,
Where, weeping on his bosom as she lies,
And languishing, on him she sets her eyes,
Till those bright lamps do with her life expire,
And leave him waltering in a double fire.

In the next page he describes the rising of the sun—

By this Aurora doth with gold adorn
The ever beauteous eyelids of the morn;
And burning Titan his exhaustless rays,
Bright in the eastern horizon displays;
Then soon appearing in majestic awe,
Makes all the starry deities withdraw;
Veiling their faces in deep reverence,
Before the throne of his magnificence.

Wolcott retired from public life, after having held many honourable offices, in 1753, and died in May, 1767, in the eighty-ninth year of his age.

ALLEN'S POEM ON THE BOSTON MASSACRE.

We have a thin quarto entitled "The Poem which the Committee of the town of Boston had voted unanimously to be published with the late Oration: with Observations relating thereto, together with some very pertinent Extracts from an Ingenious Composition never published." It was "printed by E. Russell: at his office near Doctor Gardiner's, in Marlborough street in 1772." The author, whose name was James Allen, appears to have been a Royalist, but on terms of inimacy with the leading Whigs of the city, whom he contrived to keep in ignorance of his real sentiments.

The poem was written at Dr. Warren's particular request, and when "old Sam Adams," as chairman of the publishing committee, carried to the printer the oration of the Fifth of March, he was instructed to have appear as an appendix to that performance this satire, which it is said was received in committee with great applause. When the proof-sheets were examined, however, one of the members perceived that they had been duped, that the poem "was all a bite"—that if the author was actuated by any principles, they were mischievous—in fine, that he was a strenuous Tory, and influenced alone by a desire to serve the royal cause, as a more close examination of the "ingenious and elegant composition" before them would show. Of course, the committee rescinded the vote to print it, and it was issued by Mr. Russell on his own account.
It is in the heroic measure, and rather smoothly venified, but its irony is so apparent that it seems almost incredible that such men as Samuel Adams and Joseph Warren should not have perceived its object at a glance. We quote an apostrophe to the king, from the ninth page:

Stay, Pharaoh, stay, that impious hand forbear,
Nor tempt the genius of our souls too far;
How oft, Ungracious! in thy thankless stead
Mid scenes of death our generous youth have bled!
When the proud Gaul thy mightiest powers repell'd,
And drove thy legions trembling from the field,
We rent the laurel from the victor's brow,
And round thy temples taught the wreath to grow.
Say, when thy slaughter'd bands the desert dy'd,
Where the lone Ohio rolls her gloomy tide,
Whose dreary banks their wasting bones inhume,
What arm avenged them? Thankless! was it thine?
But generous Valour scorns a boasting word,
And conscious Virtue reaps her own reward!
Yet conscious Virtue bids thee now to speak,
Though guilty blushes kindle o'er thy cheek.
If wasting wars, and painful toils, at length,
Had drain'd our veins, and wither'd all our strength,
How couldst thou, cruel, form the base design,
And round our necks the wreath of bondage twine?
And if some lingering spirit roused to strife
Bid ruffian Murder drink the drops of life,
Shall future ages e'er forget the deed?
And not for this imperious B. . . . n bleed?
When comes that period Heaven predestines meet,
When Europe's glories shall be whelm'd in dust,
When our proud fleets the naval wreath shall wear,
And o'er her empires hurl the bolts of war,
Unnerv'd by Fate, the boldest heart shall fail,
And mid their guards auxiliar kings grow pale.
In vain shall B. . . . n lift her suppliant eye,
An alien'd offspring feels no filial tie;
Her tears in vain shall bathe the soldiers' feet—
Remember, INORANT! B-st-n's crimson'd street!
Whole hecatombs of lives the deed shall pay,
And purge the murders of that guilty day.

* Alluding to the taking of Louisburg, in 1755, by Gen.
Pepperell, with the aid of a British squadron.

† From various metrical compositions written before the Revolution, it appears that the name Ohio was originally pronounced O-go, as in the text.

NATHANIEL WARD—HIS "SIMPLE COBLER OF AGGAWAM."

NATHANIEL WARD was one of the most learned and able, yet eccentric of the nonconformists who came to America. He was the son of a clergyman of the established church, and was graduated at Cambridge, in 1595. After studying the civil law, he travelled on the continent, and studied divinity at Heidelberg, under Pareus, a celebrated Calvinist, whose principles he adopted. He was forbidden to preach on his return to England, and in June, 1634, he came to America, and in the same year was settled as pastor of the church in Ipswich, or Aggawam, near Boston. His wealth did not long permit him to continue in the pastoral office, and he was employed by the colonial government in various ways for several years. In 1645, he wrote the "Simple Cobler," of which the full title is as follows:

"The Simple Cobler of Aggawam in America. Willing to help mend his Native Country, lamentably tattered, with in the upper-Leather and sole, with all the honest stitches he can take. And as willing never to be paid for his work, by Old English wonted pay. It is his Trade to atch all the year long, gratis. Therefore I pray Gentlemen keep your purses. By Theodore de la Guard. In rebus viciis ac tenui spe, fortissima quaque consilia tutissima sunt.—Cic. In English,

"When bootes and shoes are torne up to the lefts, Coblers must thrust their awles up to the hefts.

"This no time to feare Spilles gram:
Nō Sutor quidem ultra crepidam."

This is one of the most curious works written about America; the most quaint and pedantic at a period when quaintness and pedantry were the fashion; and he most violent and enthusiastic of an age when violence and enthusiasm in religious affairs were almost universal. The author's religious opinions, says the North American Review, are on the side of the Commonwealth party, though he professes great loyalty to the King; he shows himself to be a zealous puritan; and with willingness to concede whatever is "indifferent," he is the stubborn advocate of the most violent intolerance and relentless persecution.

The extracts which we select will give an idea of his principles and style. We quote, in the first place, from that portion of the "Simple Cobler" which treats of religious toleration:

"Here is lately brought us an extract of a Magna Charta, so called, compiled between the Sub-planters of a West-Indian Island; whereof the first Article of constipulation, firmly provides free stable-room and litter for all kinde of consciences, be they never so kirt or jadish; making it actionable, yea, treasonable, to disturbe any man in his Religion, or to discommend t, whatever it be. Wee are very sorry to see such professed profanenesse in English Professors, as inhumanly to lay their Religious Foundations on the mine of true Religion; which strictly binds every conscience to contend earnestly for the Truth: to preserve unity of spirit, faith and Ordinances, to be all like-minded, of one accord; every man to take his brother at his Christian care: to stand fast with one spirit, with one mind, striving together for the faith of the Gospel: and by no means to permit Heresies or erroneous opinions: But God abhorring such loathsome beverages, hath in his righteous judgement blasted that enterprize, which might otherwise have pro-

pered well, for ought I know; I presume their case is generally knowne ere this.

"If the devill might have his free option, I believe he would ask nothing else, but liberty to enfranchise all false Religions, and to embondage the true; nor should he need: It is much to be feared, that laxe Tolerations upon State pretences and planting necessities, will be the next subtle Stratagem he will spread, to distate the Truth of God and supplant the peace of the Churches. Tolerations in things tolerable, exquisitely drawn out by the lines of the Scripture, and pensill of the Spirit, are the sacred favours of Truth, the due latitudes of Love, the faire Compartments of Christian fraternity: but irregular dispensations, dealt forth by the facilities of men, are the frontiers of error, the redoubts of Schisme, the perillous irritaments of carnall and spirituall enmity.

"My heart hath naturally detested foure things: The standing of the Apocrypha in the Bible; Forrainers dwelling in my Countrey, to crowd our native Subjects into the corners of the Earth; Alchymized coines; Tolerations of divers Religions, or of one Religion in segregant shapes: He that willingly assents to the last, if he examines his heart by day-light, his conscience will tell him, he is either an Atheist, or an Heretique, or an Hypocrite, or at best a captive to some lust. Poly-piety is the greatest impiety in the world. True Religion is Ignis probationis, which doth congregare homogenea & segregare heterogenea.

"Not to tolerate things meerly indifferent to weak consciences, argues a conscience too strong: pressed uniformity in these, causes much disunity: To tolerate more than indifferents, is not to deale indifferently with God; He that doth it, takes his Scepter out of his hand, and bids him stand by. Who hath to doe to institute Religion but God. The power of all Religion and Ordinances, lies in their purity: their purity in their simplicity: then are mixtures pernicious. I lived in a City, where a Papist preached in one Church, a Lutheran in another, a Calvinist in a third; a Lutheran one part of the day, a Calvinist the other, in the same pulpit: the Religion of that place was but motly and meagre, their affections Leopardlike.

"If the whole Creature should conspire to doe the Creator a mischief, or offer him an insolency, it would be in nothing more, than in erecting untruths against his Truth, or by sophisticating his Truths with humane medleyes; the removing of some one iota in Scripture, may draw out all the life, and traverse all the Truth of the whole Bible; but to authorise an untruth, by a Toleration of State, is to build a Sconce against the walls of heaven, to batter God out of his Chaire: To tell a practical lye, is a great sin, but yet transient; but to set up a Theoricall untruth, is to warrant every lye that lies from its root to the top of every branch it hath, which are not a few."

Concerning tolerations, he further asserts—

"He that is willing to tolerate any Religion, or discrepant way of Religion, besides his own, unless it be in matters meerly indifferent, either doubts of his own, or is not sincere in it.

"He that is willing to tolerate any unsound Opinion, that his own may also be tolerated, though never so sound, will for a need hang Gods Bible at the Devils girdle."

Again he says—

"If the State of England shall either willingly To-

Jerate, or weakly connive at such Courses, the Church of that Kingdom will sooner become the Devils Dancing-Schools, then Gods-Temple; The Civill State a Beare-garden, then an Exchange: The whole Realme a Pais base, then an England. And what pity it is, that that Country which hath been the Staple of Truth to all Christendome, should now become the Aviary of Errors to the whole World, let every fearing heart judge.

"It is said Opinionists are many, and strong, that desunt Vires, that it is turbata respublica, I am very sorry for it, but more sorry, if despondency of minde shall cause the least tergiversation in Gods Worthies, who have receiv'd such pledges of his presence in their late Counsels and Conflicts. It is not thousands of Opinionists that can pinion his Everlasting armes, I can hardly believe there is a greater unbeliever than my Selfe, yet I can verily believe that the God of Truth will in a short time scatter them all like smoake before the wind. I confesse I am troubled to see Men so over-troubled about them; I am rather glad to heare the Devill is breaking up house in England, and removing somewhither else, give him leave to sell all his rage, and odde-ends by the out-cry; and let his petty Chapmen make their Market while they may, upon my poore credit it will not last long.

"An easie head may soon demonstrate, that the pre-mentioned Planters, by Tolering all Religions, had immazed themselves in the most intolerable confusions and inextricable thraldomes the world ever heard of. I am perswaded the Devill himselfe was never willing with their proceedings, for feare it would breake his wind and wits to attend such a Province. I speak it seriously according to my meaning. How all Religions should enjoy their Liberty, Justice its due regularity, Civill cohabitation morall honesty, in one and the same Jurisdiction, is beyond the Artique of my comprehension. If the whole conclave of Hell can so compromise exadverse and diametricall contradictions, as to compolitize such a multimonstrous maufrey of heteroclytes and quicquidlibets quietly; I trust I may say with all humble reverence, they can doe more then the Senate of Heaven. My modus loquendi pardoned; I intirely wish much welfare and more wisdom to that Plantation."

How strange to reason, how natural to human nature, that men who had been driven by persecution from their native country, should have in their turn become persecutors, and doom the bodies of those who differ from them to the rack, as well as their soules to eternal perdition.

Cotton Mather says of the "Simple Cöbler," that "it demonstrated its author to be a subtile statesman." We give a few paragraphs, in which his political principles are exhibited—

"Wee heare that Majestas Imperii hath challenged Salus Populi into the field; the one fighting for Prerogatives, the other defending Liberties: Were I a Constable bigge enough, I would set one of them by the heeles to keep both their hands quiet; I meane onely in a paire of Stocks, made of sound Reason, handsomely fitted for the legges of their Understanding.

"If Salus Populi began, surely it was not that Salus Populi which I left in England: that Salus Populi was as mannerly a Salus Populi as need bee: if I bee not much deceived, that Salus Populi suffer'd its nose to be held to the Grindstone, till it was almost ground; the gristles; and yet grew never the sharper for ought I could discerne; What was, before the world was made, I leave to better Antiquaries than myself; but thinke, since the world began, it was never storry that Salus Populi began with Majestas Imperii, unless Majestas Imperii first unharbour'd it, and hunted it: a stand, and then it must either turn head and live, or turn taile and dye: but more have beene storryed on the other hand than Majestas Imperii is willing to hear: doubt not but Majestas Imperii knows, that Commes wealths cost as much the making as Crownes; and if they bee well made, would yet outsell an illfashioned Crown, in any Market overt, even in Smithfield, if they could be well voucht. But Preces & Lockryme, are the peoples weapons: so are Swords and Pistols, when God and Parliaments hid them Arme. Prayers and Teares are good weapons for them that have nothing but knees and eyes; but most men are made with teeth and nailes; onely they must neither scratch for Liberties, nor bite Prerogatives, they have wept and prayed as God would have them. If Subjects must fight for their Kings against other Kingdomes, when their Kings will; I know no reason, but they may fight against their Kings for their own Kingdomes, when Parliaments say they may and must: but Parliaments must not say they must, till God sayes they may."

His address to the King, towards whom he was very bitter, is bold and insulting, though he professes great loyalty and reverence. The following is one of the concluding paragraphs of the address.

"Sir you may now please to discover your Selfe where you please; I trust I have not indangered you I presume your Eare-guard will keep farre enough from you what ever I have said: be it so, I have discharged my duty, let them look to theirs. If my tongue should reach your eares, which I little hope for; Let it be once said; the great King of great Britaine, tooke advice of a simple Cöbler, yet such a Cöbler, as will not exchange either his blood or his pride, with any Shoemaker or Tanner in your Realme, nor with any of your late Bishops which have flattered you thus in peccat: J would not speake thus in the ears of the world, through the mouth of the Presse for all the plunder your plunderers have pillaged; were it not somewhat to abate your Royall indignation toward a loyall Subject; a Subject whose heart hath bene long carbont doed, des veniam verbo, in flames of affection towards you. Your Majesty knows or may know, time was, when I did, or would have done you a better peece of service, then all your Troopes and Regiments are now doing. Should J hear any Gentleman that follows you, of my yeares, say hee loves you better than I, if I were lawfull, I would sweare by my Sword, he said more than his sword would make good."

The Simple Cöbler had a pious horror of bedecked ladies, and discourses of them in the following quaint manner:

"Should I not keepe promise in speaking a little of Womens fashions, they would take it unkindly; I was loath to pester better matter with such stuffe; I rather thought it meet to let them stand by themselves, like the Quæ Genus in the Grammar, being Deficient of Redundants, not to be brought under any Rule: I shall therefore make hold for this once, to borrow a little of their loose tongued Liberty, and mispend a weal of wo upon their long-wasted, but short-skirted patience:

little use of my stirrup will doe no harme.

"Ridentem dicere verum, quid prohibet?"

"Gray Gravity it selfe can well betoame,
That Language be adapted to the Theme.
He that to Parrots speaks, must parrotise:
He that instructs a foole, may act th' unwise.

"It is known more then enough, that I am neither figard, nor Cinick, to the due bravery of the true Gen-ry: if any man mislikes a bully mong drosscock more hen I, let him take her for his labour: I honour the roman that can honour her selfe with her attire: a ood Text alwayes deserves a fair Margent: I am not such offended if I see a trimme, far trimmer than she hat wears it: in a word, whatever Christianity or Civility will allow, I can afford with London measure:
ut when I heare a nugiperous Gentledame inquire what dress the Queen is in this week: what the nudius-terian fashion of the Court: I meane the very new-st: with egge to be in it in all haste, what ever it be;
look at her as the very gizzard of a trifle, the product
f a quarter of a cypher, the epitome of nothing, fitter e be kicht, if shee were of a kickable substance, than ither honour'd or humour'd.

"To speak moderately, I truly confesse, it is beyond he ken of my understanding to conceive, how those women should have any true grace, or valuable vertue, hat have so little wit, as to disfigure themselves with uch exotick garbes, as not only dismantles their naive lovely lustre, but transclouts them into gant barboses, ill-shapen-shotten-shell-fish, Egyptian Hyeroglyshicks, or at the best into French furts of the pastery, which a proper English woman should scorne with her sels: it is no marvell they weare drailles on the hinder art of their heads, having nothing as it seems in the bre-part, but a few Squirrils brains to help them friak tho ill-favor'd fashion to another.

"These whim' Crown'd shees, these fashion-fansying wits,

Are empty thin brain'd shells, and fiddling Kits.

"The very troublers and impoverishers of mankind, can hardly forbear to commend to the world a say-ng of a Lady living sometime with the Queen of Bohemia, I know not where shee found it, but it is pitty it should be lost.

"The World is full of care, much like unto a bubble;
Women and care, and care and women, and women and care and trouble.

"The Verses are even enough for such odde pegma's.
can make my selfe sicke at any time, with comparing he dazling splendor wherewith our Gentlewomen were embellished in some former habits, with the gutbundred goodness, wherewith they are now surcingle nd debauched. Wee have about five or six of them a our Colony: if I see any of them accidentally, I cannot cleanse my phansie of them for a moneth after.
have been a solitary widdower almost twelve yeares, sposed lately to make a step over to my Native Jentry for a yoke-fellow: but when I consider how women there have tripe-wifed themselves with their ladments, I have no heart to the voyage, least their mausous shapes and the Sea, should work too sorely pon my stomach. I speak sadly; me thinkes it should weake the heartes of Englishmen to see so many good-y English-women imprisoned in French Cages, peering out of their hood-holes for some men of mercy to help them with a little wit, and no body relieves them.

"It is a more common then convenient saying, that nine Taylors make a man: it were well if nineteene could make a woman to her minde: if Taylors were men indeed, well furnished but with meer morall principles, they would disdain to be led about like Apes, by such mynick Marmosets. It is a most unworthy thing, for men that have bones in them, to spend their lives in making fiddle-cases for futilous womens phansies;
which are the very petticoes of infirmity, the gyblets of perquisquilian toys. I am so charitable to think, that most of that mystery would worke the cheerfuller while they live, if they might bee well discharged of the tiring slavery of mis-tyring women: it is no little labour to be continually putting up English-women into Out-landish cakes: who if they be not shifted anew, once in a few moneths, grow too sowre for their Husbands. What this Trade will answer for themselves when God shall take measure of Taylors consciences is beyond my skill to imagine. There was a time when—

"The joyning of the Red-Rose with the White,
Did set our State into a Damask plight.

"But now our Roses are turned to Flors de lices,
our Carnations to Tulips, our Gilliflowers to Dayzes, our City-Dames, to an indenominable Quamralry of overturcas'd things. Hee that makes Coates for the Moone, had need take measure every noone; and he that makes for women, as often, to keepe them from Lanacy.

"I have often heard divers Ladies vent loud feminine complaints of the wearisome varieties and charg-able changes of fashions: I marvell themselves pre-ferre not a Bill of redresse. I would* Essex Ladies would lead the Chore, for the honour of their County and persons; or rather the thrice honourable Ladies of the Court, whom it best becomes: who may wel presume of a Le Roy le veult from our sober King, a Les Seigneurs ont Assensus from our prudent Peers, and the like Assensus from our considerate, I dare not say wife-worne Commons: who I beleeve had much rather passe one such Bill, than pay so many Taylors Bills as they are forced to doe.

"Most deare and unparallel'd Ladies, be pleased to attempt it: as you have the precellency of the women of the world for beauty and feature; so assume the honour to give, and not take Law from any, in matter of attire: if ye can transact so faire a motion among yourselves unanimously, I dare say, they that most re-nite, will least repent. What greater honour can your Honors desire, then to build a Promontory president to all foraigne Ladies, to deserve so eminently at the hands of all the English Gentry present and to come. and to confute the opinion of all the wise men in the world, who never thought it possible for women to doe so good a work!

"If any man think I have spoken rather merrily than seriously he is much mistaken, I have written what I write with all the indignation I can, and no more than I ought. I confesse I veer'd my tongue to this kinde of Language de industria though unwillingly, suppo-

* All the Counties and shires of England have had wars in them since the Conquest, but Essex, which is only free, and should be thankful.

sing those I speak to are incapable of grave and rational arguments.

"I desire all Ladies and Gentlewomen to understand that all this while I intend not such as through necessary modesty to avoyd morose singularity, follow fashions slowly, a flight shot or two off, shewing by their moderation, that they rather draw countermont with their hearts, then put on by their examples.

"I point my pen only against the light-heel'd beagles that lead the chase so fast, that they run all civility out of breath, against these Ape-headed pullets, which invent Antique foole-fangles, meerly for fashion and novelty sake.

"In a word, if I begin once to declime against fashions, let men and women look well about them, there is somewhat in the businesse; I confesse to the world, I never had grace enough to be strict in that kinde; and of late years, I have found syrrope of pride very wholesome in a due Dos, which makes mee keep such store of that drugges by me, that if any body comes to me for a question-full or two about fashions, they never complain of me for giving them hard measure, or under-weight.

"But I addressse my self to those who can both hear and mend all if they please: I seriously feare, if the pious Parliament doe not finde a time to state fashions, as ancient Parliaments have done in some part, God will hardly finde a time to state Religion or Peace. They are the surquedryes of pride, the wantonnesse of idlenesse, provoking sins, the certain prodromies of assured judgement, Zept. 1. 7, 8.

"It is beyond all account, how many Gentlemens and Citizens estates are doplumed by their feather-headed wives, what usefull supplies the pannage of England would afford other Countries, what rich returns to it selfe, if it were not slic'd out into male and female fripperies: and what a multitude of misimply'd hands, might be better improv'd in some more manly Manufactures for the publike weale; it is not easily credible, what may be said of the preterpluralities of Taylors in London: I have heard an honest man say, that not long since there were numbered between Temple-barre and Charing-Crosse, eight thousand of that Trade: let it be conjectured by that proportion how many there are in and about London, and in all England, they will appeare to be very numerous. If the Parliament would please to mend women, which their Husbands dare not doe, there need not so many men to make and mend as there are. I hope the present dolefull estate of the Realme, will perswade more strongly to some considerate course herein, than I now can.

"Knew I how to bring it in, I would speak a word to long haire, whereof I will say no more but this: if God proves not such a Barbor to it as he threatens, unless it be amended, Esa. 7. 20. before the Peace of the State and Church be well settled, then let my prophesie be scorned, as a sound minde scorns the ryot of that sin, and more it needs not. If those who are tearmed Rattle-heads and Impuritans, would take up a Resolution to begin in moderation of haire, to the just reproach of those that are called Puritans and Round-heads, I would honour their manlinesse, as much as the others godlinesse, so long as I knew what man or honour meant: if neither can find a Barbour's shop, let them turne in, to Psal. 68. 21. Jer. 7. 39. 1 Cor. 11. 14. if it be thought no wisdom in men to distinguish themselves in the field by the Scissers, let it bee thought no injustice in God, not to distinguish them by the Sword. I had rather God should know me by my sobriety, than mine enemy not know me by my vanity. He is it kept, that is kept by his owne sin. A short promise is a farre safer guard than a long lock: it is an ill distiction which God is loth to looke at, and his Angels cannot know his Saints by. Though it be not the mark of the Beast, yet it may be the mark of a beast prepared to slaughter. I am sure men use not to weare such manes; I am also sure Souldiers use to weare other marklets or notadoes in time of battell."

The following is a remarkable proof of the purity of manners in the early state of the Colony.

"I would my skill would serve also, as well as my heart, to translate Prince Rupert, for his Queen-mothers sake, Eliz: a second. Mismeane me not. I have had him in mine armes when he was younger, I wish I had him there now: if I mistake not, hee promised then to be a good Prince, but I doubt he hath forgot it: if I thought he would not be angry with me, I would pray hard to his Maker, to make him a right Roundhead, a wise-hearted Palatine, a thankfull man to the English; to forgive all his sinnes, and at length to save his soule, notwithstanding all his God-damnes mee's: yet I may doe him wrong, I am not certaine hee useth that oath; I wish no man else would. I dare say the Devils dare not. I thank God I have lived in a Colony of many thousand English almost these twelve yeares, am held a very sociable man; yet I may considerately say, I never heard but one Oath sworne, nor never saw one man drunke, nor ever heard of three women Adulteresses, in all this time, that I can call to minde: If these sinnes bee amongst us privily, the Lord heale us, I would not bee understood to boast of our innocency; there is no cause I should, our hearts may be bad enough, and our lives much better."

One extract from the conclusion of the book, is selected as a favourable specimen of his style, and another to show to what horrible cruelty religious intolerance impels those, who have the power to persecute.

"Goe on brave Englishmen, in the name of God, go on prosperously, because of Truth and Righteousness: Yee that have the Cause of Religion, the life of your Kingdom and of all the good that is in it in your hands: Goe on undauntedly: As you are Called and Chosen, so be faithfull: Yee fight the battelli of the Lord, bee neither desidious nor perfidious: You serve the King of Kings, who stiles you his heavenly Regiments: Consider well, what impregnable fighting it is in heaven, where the Lord of Hosts is your General, his Angels, your Colonells, the Stars, your fellow-souldiers, his Saints, your Oratours, his Promises, your victuallers, his Truth, your Trenches; where Drums are Harpe, Trumpets joyfull sounds; your Ensigns, Christs Banners; where your weapons and armour are spirituall, therefore irresistible, therefore impiercable; where Sunne and wind cannot disadvantage you, you are above them, where hell it selfe cannot hurt you, where your swords are furbished and sharpened, by him that made their metall, where your wounds, are bound up with the oyle of a good Cause, where your blood runnes into the veynes of Christ, where sudden death is present martyrdom and life; your funerall resurrection; your honour, glory; where your widows and babes are received into perpetuall penions; your names listed among Devils Worthies; where your greatest losses are greatest gaires; and where you leave the troubles of warre, to lye downe in downy beds of eternall rest.

"What good will it doe you, deare Countrymen, to live without lives, to enjoy England without the God of England, your Kingdome without a Parliament, your Parliament without power, your Liberties without stability, your Lawes without Justice, your honours without vertue, your beings without tranquility, your wives without honesty, your children without morality, your servants without civility, your lands without propriety, your goods without immunity, the Gospel without salvation, your Churches without Ministry, your Ministers without piety, and all you have or can have, with more teares and bitterness of heart, than all you have and shall have will sweeten or wipe away?"

"Goe on therefore Renowned Gentlemen, fall on resolutely, till your hands cleave to your swords, your swords to your enemies hearts, your hearts to victory, your victories to triumph, your triumphs to the everlasting praise of him that hath given you Spirits to offer your selves willingly, and to jeopard your lives in high perills, for his Name and service sake.

"And Wee your Brethren, though we necessarily abide beyond Jordan, and remaine on the American Sea-coasts, will send up Armies of prayers to the Throne of Grace, that the God of power and goodness, would encourage your hearts, cover your heads, strengthen your arms, pardon your sinnes, save your soules, and blesse your families, in the day of Battell. Wee will also pray, that the same Lord of Hosts, would discover the Counsellors, defeat the Enterprizes, deride the hopes, disdain the insolencies, and wound the hairy scalpes of your obstinate Enemies, and yet pardon all that are unwillingly misled. Wee will likewise helpe you to beleve that God will be seene on the Mount, that it is all one with him, to save by many or few, and that he doth but humble and try you for the present, that he may doe you good at the latter end. All which hee bring to passe who is able to doe exceeding abundantly, above all we can aske or thinke, for his Truth and mercy sake in Jesus Christ. Amen. Amen."

"A Word of Ireland: Not of the Nation universally, nor of any man in it, that hath so much as one haire of Christianity or Humanity growing on his head or beard, but only of the truculent Cut-throats, and such as shall take up Armes in their Defence.

"These Irish anciently called Anthropophagi, man-eaters: Have a Tradition among them, That when the Devill shewed our Saviour all the kingdomes of the Earth and their glory, that he would not shew him Ireland, but reserved it for himself: it is probably true, for he hath kept it ever since for his own peculiar; the old Fox foresaw it would eclipse the glory of all the rest: he thought it wisdom to keep it for a Boggards for himself, and all his unclean spirits employed in this Hemisphere, and the people, to doe his Son and Heire, I mean the Pope, that service for which Lewis the eleventh kept his Barber Olivier, which makes them so blood-thirsty. They are the very Offall of men, Dregges of Mankind, Reproach of Christendome, the Bots that crawl on the Beasts taile, I wonder Rome it self is not ashamed of them.

"J begge upon my hands and knees, that the Expedition against them may be undertaken while the hearts and hands of our Souldiery are hot, to whom J will be bold to say briefly: Happy is he that shall reward them as they have served us, and Cursed be he that shall do that work of the Lord negligently, Cursed be he that holdeth back his Sword from blood; yea, Cursed be he that maketh not his Sword starke drunk with Irish blood, that doth not recompence them double for their hellish treachery to the English, that maketh them not heaps upon heaps, and their Country a dwelling place for Dragons, an Astonishment to Nations: Let not that eye look for pity, nor that hand to be spared, that pities or spares them, and let him be accursed, that curseth not them bitterly."

The conclusion of the Cobler is in verse—

"I pray let me drive in half a dozen plaine honest Country Hobnails, such as the Martyrs were wont to wear; to make my work hold the surer; and I have done.

1. There, lives cannot be good,
There, Faith cannot be sure,
Where Truth cannot be quiet,
Nor Ordinances pure.
2. No King can King it right,
Nor rightly sway his Rod:
Who truly loves not Christ,
And truly fears not God.
3. He cannot rule a Land,
As Lands should ruled been,
That lets himself be rul'd
By a ruling Romane Queen.
4. No earthly man can be True Subject to this State;
Who makes the Pope his Christ,
An Heretique his Mate.
5. There Peace will goe to War,
And Silence make a noise:
Where upper things will not
With nether equipoyse.
6. The upper world shall Rule,
While Stars will run their race,
The nether world obey,
While People keep their place.

THE CLEUNCH.

If any of these come out
So long 's the world doe last:
Then credit not a word
Of what is said and past.

So farewell England old
If evill times ensue,
Let good men come to us,
Wee 'l welcome them to New.
And farewell Honor'd Friends,
If happy dayes ensue,
You 'l have some Guests from hence,
Pray welcome us to you.
And farewell simple world,
If thou 't thy Cranium mend,
There is my Last and All,
And a Shoem-Akers

POSTSCRIPT.

This honest Cobler has done what he might:
That Statesmen in their Shoes might walk upright,
But rotten Shoes of Spanish running-leather:
No Coblers skill, can stitch them strong together.
It were best to cast such rotten stuff away:
And look for that, that never will decay.
If all were shod with Gospel's lasting Peace;
Hatred abroad, and Wars at home would cease.

JEROME BRESLAUER.

FRENEAU—RIVINGTON, ETC.

PHILIP FRENEAU was the most distinguished poet of our revolutionary time. He was a voluminous writer, and many of his compositions are intrinsically worthless, or, relating to persons and events now forgotten, are no longer interesting; but enough remain to show that he had more genius and more enthusiasm than any other bard whose powers were called into action during the great struggle for liberty.

He was of French extraction. His father, an ardent and intelligent Huguenot, came to America immediately after the revocation of the edict of Nantz, in company with a number of Protestant gentlemen, who on their arrival founded the old church of Saint Esprit, in New York, and afterward, I believe, the pleasant village of New Rochelle, near that city. The poet was born on the fifteenth of January, in the year 1752. His father died while he was yet a child, but his mother attended carefully to his education, and he entered Nassau Hall at Princeton, in 1767, so far advanced in classical studies, that the president of the college made his proficiency the subject of a congratulatory letter to one of his relatives. His room-mate and most devoted friend here was James Madison, and among his classmates were many others who in after time became eminent as legislators or scholars. He was graduated when nineteen years of age, and soon after removed to Philadelphia, where he was for several years on terms of familiar intimacy with the well known Francis Hopkinson, with whom he was associated as a political writer.

He began to compose verses at an early period, and, before leaving Princeton, had formed the plan of an epic poem on the life and discoveries of Columbus, of which his "Address to Ferdinand" is probably a fragment. After his removal to Philadelphia his attention was devoted to politics, and his poetical writings related principally to public characters and events. His satires on Hugh Gaine, James Rivington, and other prominent Tories, were remarkably popular in their time, though deserving of little praise for their chasteness or elegance of diction; and his patriotic songs and ballads, which are superior to any metrical compositions then written in this country, were everywhere sung with enthusiasm.

Rivington was editor and proprietor of "Rivington's New York Gazetteer, or The Connecticut Enquirer, and Quebec Weekly Advertiser." This paper was established in the early part of 1773, and excelled all others in America in its devotion to the royal government, until the autumn of 1775, when a company of armed men from Connecticut entered the city, broke into the printing house, threw the types into heaps, and destroyed the press. Soon after this Rivington went to England, where he was supplied with new printing materials, and received a commission as King's Printer for the colony. When the British gained possession of the city, he returned and recommenced the publication of his paper, under the title of "Rivington's New York Loyal Gazette." No editors of the present age are comparable with Rivington for servility or mendacity. Even the Tories were wont to call his paper "The Lying Gazette," and he several times publicly apologized for the "mistakes" which "his zeal for the success of his Majesty's arms, his sanguine wishes for the good of his country, and his friendship for individuals," caused him to commit. The following epigram was written by Freneau on observing that the title of the Gazette had become nearly illegible.

Says Satan to Jemmy, "I hold you a bet
That you mean to abandon our Royal Gazette,
Or, between you and me, you would manage things better Than the title to print on so sneaking a letter."

"Now being connected so long in the art,
It would not be prudent at present to part;
And people, perhaps, would be frighten'd, and fret
If the devil alone carried on the Gazette."

Says Jemmy to Satan (by way of a wipe.)

"Who gives me the matter should furnish the type;
And why you find fault, I can scarcely divine,
For the types, like the printer, are certainly thine."

"Tis thine to deceive with the semblance of truth,
Thou friend of my age, and thou guide of my youth!
But, to prosper, pray send me some further supplies,
A set of new types, and a set of new lies."

Soon afterward he wrote the following—

ON MR. RIVINGTON'S NEWLY ENGRAVED KING'S ARMS.

To his Royal Gazette.

From the regions of night, with his head in a sack,
Ascended a person accoutred in black,
And upward directing his circular eye-whites;
(Like the jure-divine political Levites)
And leaning his elbow on Rivington's shelf,
While the printer was busy, thus mused with himself:
"My mandates are fully complied with at last,
New ARMS are engraved, and new letters are cast;
I therefore determine and freely accord,
This servant of mine shall receive his reward."
Then turning about, to the printer he said,
"Who late was my servant shall now be my aid;
Since under my banners so bravely you fight,
Kneel down—for your merits I dub you a KINGET,
From a passive subaltera I bid you to rise
THE INVENTOR, as well as the PRINTER OF LIES."

At the close of the war, Rivington discarded the signs of royalty, and modified the title of his paper so that it appeared as "Rivington's Gazette and Universal Advertiser." From the Whigs, however, it received no support, and in 1783 its publication was abandoned. With all its faults, it was the most ably edited and most neatly printed newspaper in America, and if the Whigs would have accepted his service, Rivington would have argued and lied as industriously for them as he had previously for the Tories. Among Freneau's satires is the following, written a few weeks before the publication of the last number of the Gazette.

RIVINGTON'S CONFESSIONS.

Addressed to the Whigs of New York.

Long life and low spirits were never my choice,
As long as I live I intend to rejoice;
When life is worn out, and no wine's to be had,
'Tis time enough then to be serious and sad.

'Tis time enough then to reflect and repent,
When our liquor is gone, and our money is spent,
But I cannot endure what is practised by some
This anticipating of mischiefs to come:

A debt must be paid, I am sorry to say,
Alike in their turns by the grave and the gay,
And due to a despot that none can deceive,
Who grants us no respite and signs no reprieve.

Thrice happy is he that from care can retreat,
And its plagues and vexations put under his feet;
Blow the storm as it may, he is always in trim,
And the sun's in the zenith for ever to him.

Since the world, then, in earnest, is nothing but care,
And the world will allow I have also my share)
et, tow'd as I am in the stormy expanse,
The best way, I find, is to leave it to chance.

Look round, if you please, and survey the wide ball,
And CHANCE, you will find, has direction of all:
I was owing to chance that I first saw the light,
And chance may destroy me before it is night!

'Twas a chance, a mere chance, that your arms gain'd the day,

'Twas a chance that the Britons so soon went away,
'o chance by their leaders the nation is cast,
And chance to perdition will send them at last.

Now because I remain when the puppies are gone,
You would willingly see me hang'd, quarter'd, and drawn,
Though I think I have logic sufficient to prove
That the chance of my stay—is a proof of my love.

Or deeds of destruction some hundreds are ripe,
But the worst of my foes are your lads of the type:
Because they have nothing to put on their shelves
They are striving to make me as poor as themselves.

There's LONDON, and KOLLOCK, those strong bulls of Baahan,
Are striving to look me away from my station,
And HOLY, all at once, is as wonderful great
Is if none but himself was to print for the STARS.

'E all are convinced I'd a right to expect
That a sinner returning you would not reject—
Quite sick of the scarlet and slaves of the throne,
I'm now at your option to make me your own.

Suppose I had gone with the Tories and rabble,
'o starve or be drown'd on the shoals of Cape Sable,
Had suffer'd, 'tis true—but I'll have you to know,
For nothing had gain'd by my trouble and woe.

You say that with grief and dejection of heart
Pack'd up my awls, with a view to depart,
That my shelves were dismantled, my cellars unstored,
My boxes afloat, and my hampers on board:

And hence you infer (I am sure without reason)
That a right you possess to entangle my reason—
'et your barns I ne'er burnt, nor your blood have I spilt,
And my terror alone was no proof of my guilt.

The charge may be true—for I found it in vain
To lean on a staff that was broken in twain,
And ere I had gone at Port Roseway to fix,
Had chose to sell drams on the south side of Styx.

Confess, that with shame and contrition oppress'd,
Sign'd an agreement to go with the rest,
But ere they weigh'd anchor to sail her last trip,
Saw they were vermin, and gave them the slip:

Now why you should call me the worst man alive,
In the word of a convert, I cannot contrive,
Though turn'd a plain, honest republican, still
You own me no proselyte, do what I will.

My paper is alter'd—good people, don't fret;
Call it no longer the ROYAL GAZETTE,
To me a great monarch has lost all his charms,
Have pull'd down his LION, and trampled his ARMS.

While fate was propitious, I thought they might stand,
You know I was zealous for George's command)
But since he disgraced it, and left us behind,
I thought him an angel—I've alter'd my mind.

In the very same day that his army went hence
Ceased to tell lies for the sake of his pence:
And what was the reason?—the true one is best—
Worship no suns when they hang to the west.

In this I resemble a Turk or a Moor,
Bright Phoebus ascending, I prostrate adore:
And, therefore, excuse me for printing some lays,
An ode or a sonnet is Wash ngton's praise.

His prudence and caution has saved your dominions,
This chief of all chiefs, and the pride of Virginians!
And when he is gone—I pronounce it with pain—
We scarcely shall meet with his equal again.

The gods for that hero did trouble prepare,
But gave him a mind that could feed upon care,
They gave him a spirit, serene but severe,
Above all disorder, confusion, and fear;
In him it was fortune where others would fail:
He was born for the tempest, and weather'd the gale.

Old Plato asserted that life is a dream,
And man but a shadow, a cloud or a stream;
By which it is plain he intended to say
That man, like a shadow, must vanish away:

If this be the fact, in relation to man,
And if each one is striving to get what he can,
I hope while I live, you will all think it best,
To allow me to bustle along with the rest.

A view of my life, though some parts might be solemn,
Would make, on the whole, a ridiculous volume:
In the life that's hereafter (to speak with submission)
I hope I shall publish a better edition:

Even swine you permit to subside in the street;—
You pity a dog that lies down to be beat—
Then forget what is past, for the year's at a close—
And men of my age have some need of repose.

But as to the Tories that yet may remain,
They scarcely need give you a moment of pain;
What dare they attempt when their masters have fled;
—When the soul is departed who wars with the dead?

On the waves of the Styx had they rode quarantine,
They could not have look'd more infernally lean
Than the day, when repenting, dismay'd and distress'd,
Like the doves to their windows, they flew to their nest.

Poor souls! for the love of the king and his nation
They have had their full quantum of mortification;
Wherever they fought, or whatever they won,
The dream's at an end—the delusion is done.

The TEMPLE you rais'd was so wonderful large
Not one of them thought you could answer the charge,
It seem'd a mere castle constructed of vapour,
Surrounded with gibbets, and founded on FARRA.

On the basis of freedom you built it too strong!
And CARLETON confess'd, when you held it so long,
That if any thing human the fabric could shatter,
The ROYAL GAZETTE must accomplish the matter.

An engine like that, in such hands as my own
Had shaken king CUNEO* himself from his throne,
In another rebellion had ruin'd the Scot,
While the Pope and Pretender had both gone to pot.

If you stood my attacks, I have nothing to say—
I fought, like the Swiss, for the sake of my pay;
But while I was proving your fabric unsound
Our vessel mis'd stay, and we all went aground.

Thus ended in ruin what madness begun,
And thus was our nation disgraced and undone,
Renown'd as we were, and the lords of the deep,
If our outset was folly, our exit was sleep.

A dominion like THIS, that some millions had cost!—
The king might have wept when he saw it was lost;—
This Jewel—whose value I cannot describe:
This pearl—that was richer than all his Dutch tribe.

When the war came upon us, you very well knew
My income was small and my riches were few—
If your money was scarce, and your prospects were bad,
Why hinder me printing for people that had?

* The negro king in Jamaica; whom the English declared Independent in 1739.

'T would have pleased you, no doubt, had I gone with a few sets

Of books, to exist in your cold Massachusetts;
Or to wander at Norfolk with ill-fated Hoon,
Not a shirt to my back, nor a sole to my shoe:

Now, if we mistook (as we did, it is plain)
Our error was owing to wicked Hoon Gains,
For he gave such accounts of your starving and strife
As proved that his pictures were drawn from the life.

The part that I acted by some men of sense
Was wrongfully held to be malice prepenes,
When to all the world else it was perfectly plain,
One principle ruled me—a passion for gain.

You pretend I have suffer'd no loss in the cause,
And have, therefore, no right to partake of your laws:—
Some people love talking—I find to my cost,
I too am a loser—my PENSION is lost!

Nay, did not your printers repeatedly stoop
To desecrate and reflect on my PORTABLE soup?
At me have your porcupines darted the quill,
You have plunder'd my Office and published my Will.

Resolved upon mischief, you held it no crime
To steal my Reflections, and print them in rhyme,
When all the town knew (and a number confes'd)
That papers, like these, were no cause of arrest.

You never consider'd my struggles and strife;
That my lot is to toil and to worry through life;
My windows you broke—not a pane did you spare—
And my house you have made a mere old man of war.

And still you insist I've no right to complain!—
Indeed if I do, I'm afraid it's in vain—
Yet am willing to hope you're too learnedly read
To hang up a printer for being misled.

If this be your aim, I must think of a flight—
In less than a month I must bid you good night,
And hurry away to that whale-ridden shore
Where CLINTON and CARLTON retreated before.

From signs in the sky, and from tokens on land,
I'm inclined to suspect my departure's at hand:
Old *Argo the ship,—in a peep at her star,
I found they were scraping her bottom for TAR:

For many nights past, as the house can attest,
A boy with a feather-bed troubled my rest:
My shop, the last evening, seem'd all in a blaze,
And a HEX crowd'd at midnight, my waiting-man says;

Even then, as I lay with strange whims in my head,
A ghost hove in sight, not a yard from my bed,
It seem'd General ROBERTSON, bravely array'd,
But I grasp'd at the substance, and found him a shade!

He appear'd as of old, when head of the throng,
And loaded with laurels, he waddled along—
He seem'd at the foot of my bedstead to stand,
And cried—"Jamie Rivington, reach me your hand;

"And Jamie, (said he) I am sorry to find
Some demon advised you to loiter behind;
The country is hostile—you had better get off it,
Here's nothing but squabbles, all plague, and no profit!

'Since the day that Sir William came here with his throng
He managed things so, that they always went wrong;
And though for his knighthood, he kept MESCHIANZA,
I think he was nothing but mere Sancho Panza:

"That famous conductor of moonlight retreats,
Sir HARRY came next with his armies and fleets,
But finding, 'the Rebels were dying and dead,'
He grounded his arms and retreated—to bed.

* A southern constellation consisting of twenty-four stars.

"Other luck we had once at the battle of Byones!
But Aere they have ruin'd earl Charles and Burgoyne,
Here brave colonel Monckton was thrown on his back,
And here lies poor Andre! the best of the pack."

So saying, he flitted away in a trice,
Just adding, "he hoped I would take his advice"—
Which I surely shall do, if you push me too hard—
And so I remain, with eternal regard,

JAMES RIVINGTON, Printer, of late to the king,
But now a republican—under your wing—
Let him stand where he is—don't push him down hill,
And he'll turn a true Blue-Skin, or just what you will—

Another of his pasquinades is entitled:

RIVINGTON'S LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT.

Since life is uncertain, and no one can say
How soon we may go, or how long we shall stay,
Methinks he is wisest who soonest prepares,
And settles, in season, his worldly affairs:

Some folks are so weak they can scarce avoid crying,
And think when they're making their wills they are dying
'T is surely a serious employment—but still,
Who e'er died the sooner for making his will?

Let others be sad, when their lives they review,
But I know whom I've served—and him faithfully too;
And though it may seem a fanatical story,
He often has show'd me a glimpse of his glory.

INPRIMA, my carcass I give and devise
To be made into cakes of a moderate size,
To nourish those Tories whose spirits may droop,
And serve the king's army with portable soup.

Unless I mistake, in the scriptures we read
That "worms on the dead shall deliciously feed,"
The scripture stands true—and that I am firm in,
For what are our Tories and soldiers but vermin?

This soup of all soups can't be call'd that of beef,
(And this may to some be a matter of grief:)
But I am certain the BULL would occasion a laugh,
That beef-portable soup should be made of a CALF.

To the king, my dear master, I give a full set
(In volumes bound up) of the ROYAL GAZETTE,
In which he will find the vast records contain'd
Of provinces conquer'd, and victories gain'd.

As to ARNOLD, the traitor, and Satan his brother,
I beg they will also accept of another;
And this shall be bound in Morocco red leather,
Provided they'll read it, like brothers together,

But if Arnold should die, 't is another affair,
Then Satan, surviving, shall be the sole heir;
He often has told me he thought it quite clever
So to him and his heirs I bequeath it for ever.

I know there are some (that would fain be thought wiser)
Who say my Gazette is a record of lies;
In answer to this, I shall only reply—
All the choices that I had was, to starve or to tie.

My fiddles, my flutes, French horns and guitars,*
I leave to our XXIXES, now weary of wars—
To the wars of the stage they more boldly advance,
The captains shall play, and the soldiers shall dance.†

To Sir Henry Clinton, his use and behoof,
I leave my French brandy, of very good proof;
It will give him fresh spirits for battle and slaughter,
And make him feel bolder by land and by water:

* The articles of bequest in this poem were inconstant & advertised in the Royal Gazette, and pulled off with a despatch peculiar to the editor of that paper.

† It became fashionable at this period with the British officers to assume the business of the Drama: to the small mortification of those who had been holding them up as the undoubted conquerors of North America.

Let I caution the knight, for fear he do wrong,
 'Tis *avant la viande, et après la poison—
 't will strengthen his stomach, prevent it from turning,
 And digest the affront of his effigy—burning.

To Baron KNYPHAUSEN, his heirs and assigns,
 I bequeath my old Heck, and my Burgundy wines,
 'To a true Hessian drunkard, no liquors are sweeter,
 And I know the old man is no foe to the creature.

To a GENERAL, my namesake,† I give and dispose
 Of a purse full of clipp'd, light, sweetest half-joes;
 I hereby desire him to take back his trash,
 And return me my HANNAH's infallible WASH.

My chessmen and tables, and other such chattels,
 I give to CORNWALLIS, tremendous in battles:
 By moving of these (not tracing the map)
 He'll explain to the king how he got in the TRAP.

To good DAVID MATTHEWS (among other slops)
 I give my whole cargo of Mardant's drops,
 If they cannot do all, they may cure him in part,
 And scatter the poison that cankers his heart:

Provided, however, and nevertheless,
 That what other estate I enjoy and possess
 At the time of my death (if it be not then sold)
 Shall remain to the Tories, TO HAVE AND TO HOLD.

As I thus have bequeathed them both carcass and fleece,
 The least they can do is to wait my decease;
 But to give them what substance I have, ere I die,
 And be eat up with vermin, while living—not I—

In WITNESS whereof (though no ailment I feel)
 Hereunto I set both my hand and my seal;
 (As the law says) in presence of witnesses twain,
 'Squire John Coghill Knap, and brother Hugh Gains.

Freneau enjoyed the friendship of Adams, Franklin, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, and the last three were his constant correspondents while they lived. I have before me two letters, one written by Jefferson and the other by Madison, in which he is commended to certain citizens of New York, for his extensive information, sound discretion, and general high character, as a candidate for the editorship of a journal which it was intended to establish in that city. His application appears to have been unsuccessful: probably because the project was abandoned.

As a reward for the ability and patriotism he had displayed during the war, Mr. Jefferson gave him a place in the Department of State; but his public employment being of too sedentary a description for a man of his ardent temperament, he soon relinquished it to conduct in Philadelphia a paper entitled "The Freeman's Journal." He was the only editor who remained at his post, during the prevalence of the yellow fever in that city, in the summer of 1791. The "Journal" was unprofitable, and he gave it up, in 1793, to take the command of a merchant-ship, in which he made several voyages to Madeira, the West Indies, and other places. His naval ballads and other poems relating to the sea, written in this period, are among the most spirited and carefully finished of his productions.

Of the remainder of his history I have been able to learn but little. In 1810 he resided in Philadelphia, and he subsequently removed to Mount Pleasant, in New Jersey. He died, very suddenly, near Freehold, in that state, on the eighteenth day of December, 1832, in the eightieth year of his age.

The first collection of Freneau's poems was published in 1786; a second edition appeared in a closely printed octavo volume at Monmouth, in New Jersey, in 1795; and a third, in two duodecimo volumes, in Philadelphia, in 1809. The last is entitled "Poems written and published during the American Revolutionary War, and now republished from the original Manuscripts, interspersed with Translations from the Ancients, and other Pieces not heretofore in Print." In 1788 he published in Philadelphia his "Miscellaneous Works, containing Essays and additional Poems," and, in 1814, "A Collection of Poems on American Affairs, and a Variety of other Subjects, chiefly Moral and Political, written between 1797 and 1815." His house at Mount Pleasant was destroyed by fire, in 1815 or 1816, and in some of his letters he laments the loss, by that misfortune, of some of his best poems, which had never been printed.

SATIRICAL, DRAMATIC, AND OTHER POEMS ON PUBLIC AFFAIRS WRITTEN DURING THE REVOLUTION.

DOUBTLESS the cleverest satire written during the Revolution was Trumbull's McFingal. The first part of it was written in the spring of 1774, immediately printed in Philadelphia, where the Congress was then in session, and soon after republished in numerous editions in different parts of this country and in England. It was not finished until 1782, when it was issued complete in three cantos at Hartford, to which place Trumbull had removed in the preceding year. "McFingal" is in the Hudibrastic vein, and much the best imitation of the great satire of Butler that has been written. The hero is a Scottish justice of the peace residing in the vicinity of Boston at the beginning of the Revolution, and the first two cantos are principally occupied with a discussion between him and one, Honorius on the course of the British government, in which McFingal, an unyielding loyalist, endeavours to make proselytes, while all his arguments are directed against himself. His zeal and his logic are together irresistibly ludicrous, but there is nothing in the character unnatural, as it is common for men who read more than they think, or attempt to discuss questions they do not understand, to use arguments which refute the positions they wish to defend. The meeting ends with a riot, in which McFingal is seized, tried by the mob, convicted of violent toryism, and tarred and feathered. On being set at liberty, he assembles his friends around him in his cellar, and harangues them until they are dispersed by the Whigs, when he escapes to Boston, and the poem closes. These are all the important incidents of the story, yet it is never tedious, and few commence reading it who do not follow it to the end and regret its termination. Throughout the three cantos the wit is never separated from the character of the hero.

"The Battle of Bunker Hill, a Dramatic Piece in Five Acts," was published by Robert Bell, in Philadelphia, in 1776. The author was a native of Maryland, educated at Nassau Hall College, Princeton, and for civilities received during his student-life from the Hon. Richard Stockton, dedicated his play to that gentleman. The "Lieutenant Colonel of the Continental Army" who wrote the prologue was probably Humphries, of Connecticut. The piece, though much praised when first published, possesses little merit. Some of the characters—especially Gage and Burgoyne—are, however, well enough drawn, and the style, for the time, is chaste and harmonious. The fourth act opens with the following soliloquy by the British Commander in Chief—

GAGE, solus.—Oh sweet tranquillity and peace of soul,
That in the bosom of the cottager
Tak'st up thy residence, cannot the beams
Of royal sunshine call thee to my breast?
Fair honour waits on thee, renown abroad,
And high dominion o'er this continent,
Soon as the spirit of rebellious war
Is scourged into obedience. Why, then, ye gods,
Thou inward gnawing and remorse of thought
For perfidy and breach of promises?
Why should the spouse or weeping infant babe,
Or meek-eyed virgin with her sorrow cheek—
The rose, by famine, wither'd out of it—
Or why the father or his youthful son
By me detain'd from all their relatives,
And in low dungeons and in jails chain'd down
Affect my spirit when the mighty cause
Of George and Britain is endanger'd?
For nobly struggling in the cause of kings,
We claim the high, the just prerogative
To rule mankind, and with an iron rod
Exact submission, due, though absolute.
What though they style me villain, murderer,
And imprecate from heaven dire thunderbolts
To crush my purposes?..... Was that a gun
Which thunders o'er the wave? Or is it guilt
That plays the coward with my trembling heart,
And cools the blood with frightful images?
Oh, guilt! thy blackness hovers on the mind,
Nor can the morning dissipate thy shades—
Yon ruddy morn which over Bunker Hill
Advancing slowly, blushes to the bay,
And tips with gold the spires of Charles's-town.

Burgoyne and Howe then enter with intelligence of the operations of Gardiner and his companions on Bunker Hill. "Sir Jack," as he is styled in some of the ballads of the time, uses the ambitious phrase of the sophomore, garnishing all his speeches with classical allusions and high sounding words. "You hear," he says—

You hear the sound
Of spades and pickaxes upon the Hill—
Incessant pounding, like old Vulcan's forge,
Urged by the Cyclops.

Gage, left once more alone, exclaims—

May heaven protect us from their rage, I say.
When but a boy, I dream'd of death, in bed,
And ever since that time I hated things
Which put him, like a pair of spectacles,
Before my eyes. The thought lies deep in fate,
Nor can a mortal see the bottom of it.
'Tis here—'tis there—I could philosophize—
Eternity is like a winding-sheet—
The seven commandments like—I think there's seven—
I scratch my head—but yet in vain I scratch—
Oh Bute and Dartmouth, know ye what I feel!
You sure would pity an old drinking man,
That has more heartache than philosophy.

In the next scene Howe, addressing the soldiers, urges them by an exhibition of their ancient bravery to put down the "foul rebellion"—

Which spurns that love—
That fond maternal tenderness of soul
Which on this dreary coast first planted them;
Restrain'd the rage of murdering savages
Who, with fierce inroad on their settlements,
Made frequent war; struck down the arm of France,
Just raised to crush them in their infancy;
And since that time has bade their cities grow
To marts of trade; call'd fair-eyed commerce forth

To share dominion on the distant wave,
And visit every clime and foreign shore.
Yet this, brave soldiers, is the proud return
For the best blood of England, shed for them.

In the last scene but one, endeavouring to rally his forces after a second repulse from the Hill, he claims—

But that so many mouths can witness it,
I would deny myself an Englishman,
And swear this day that with such cowardice
No kindred or alliance has my birth.
Oh base, degenerate souls, whose ancestors
At Cressy, Poitiers, and at Agincourt,
With tenfold numbers combated, and pluck'd
The budding laurels from the brows of France—
Back to the charge once more! and rather die
Burn'd up or wither'd on this bloody hill,
Than live the blemish of your country's fame,
With everlasting infamy oppress'd.

"The part acted by General Putnam in this battle has recently been a subject of some controversy, and Mr. Bancroft, among others, has endeavoured to deprive the veteran of the laurels he had won so worthily for seventy years. Our author, writing but a few months after the battle, and, doubtless, familiar with all the published accounts of it, would not have been likely to make him one of the most prominent actors in the American camp, if he had not been present, as is now contended. While leading a last assault upon the British, Putnam says to his followers—

Swift rising fame on early wing mounts up
To the convexity of bending Heaven,
And writes their names who fought with us this day
In fairest characters amidst the stars.

And Clinton, giving an account of the day to a brother officer, says—

Their left wing gave way,
And with their shatter'd infantry the whole,
Drawn off by Putnam, to the causeway fled.

We have room but for the titles of the principal works of this description. In 1774 were published in Philadelphia, besides "McFingal," "The Association, &c. of the Delegates of the Grand Congress, versified and adapted to music, calculated for grave and gay dispositions," etc.; "A Dialogue between a Southern Delegate and his Spouse, on his return from the Grand Continental Congress: Inscribed to the Married Ladies of America;" "Dominion lost in America by the British: an Humble Imitation of the History of Happiness lost in Heaven by the Devils, as recorded by Milton;" "The Fall of British Tyranny, or American Liberty Triumphant, a tragedy-comedy;" and several others. In Boston appeared "A Poem on the Enemy's Coming to Boston;" "Nebuchadnezzar's Dream;" "The Group, a Farce, as lately acted and reacted to the Wonder of all Superior Intelligences," &c. At Danvers, near Boston, was published "America Invincible, a poem in Ten Books, by an Officer of Rank in the Continental Army," and in various places many other small volumes in the elegiac or satirical vein, few of which are remarkable for any other quality than their "patriotism." But the best of all, as we have elsewhere remarked, were the satires of Freeman. His "Life of Hugh Gaine," "British Prison Ship," "Gage's Soliloquy," "The Midnight Consultations," and other pieces, were read every where and approved by people of all classes

MINSTRELSY OF THE INDIAN WARS AND THE REVOLUTION.

Permettez que je fasse les chansons d'un peuple, et il a les lois qui le veut, remarked, in substance, some old Frenchman; and that he rated not too high the use of song is shown by numerous instances in both ancient and modern history. It has been lamented that we have in America no martial lyrics comparable those of the older nations. Holmes exclaims in one of his admirable poems—

When Gallia's flag its triple fold displays,
Her marshaled legions peal the Marseillaise;
When round the German close the war-clouds dim,
Far through their shadows floats his battle hymn;
When, crown'd with joy the camps of England ring,
A thousand voices shout "God save the King!"
When victory follows with our eagle's glance,
Our nation's anthem is a country dance.*

It the martial song belongs to more warlike countries. France, Germany and England are vast fortified countries, echoing forever the din of conflict or the notes of military preparation; while America is the strong-place of peace, whence her influence is to irradiate the world. Or, if a different destiny awaits us, there is little danger but that—

When the roused nation bids her armies form,
And screams her eagle through the gathering storm,
When from our ports the bannered frigate rides,
Her black bows scowling to the crested tides,
Ome proud muse

Will read the silence of our tented plains,
And bid the nations tremble at her strains.

The puritan settlers of New England, while carrying a war against the Indian tribes, deemed it right to spend no hours their enemies devoted to profane dances and incantations, in singing verses, half military and half religious; and their actions in the field were celebrated in ballads which lacked none of the spirit and fidelity of the songs of the old bards, however efficient they may have been in metrical array and sentiment. "Lovewell's Fight," "The Gallant Church,"
"Smith's Affair at Sidelong Hill," and "The Godless French soldier," are among the best lyrical compositions of the early period in which they were written, and are not without value as historical records. Lovewell's Fight took place near the present town of Fryeburg, in Maine, on the margin of a small lake since called Lovewell's Pond, in 1725. The following ballad is said to have been written in the same year, and was for a long time well known throughout the country:

LOVEWELL'S FIGHT.

Of worthy Captain Lovewell,
I purpose now to sing,
How valiantly he served
His country and his king;
He and his valiant soldiers
Did range the woods full wide,
And hardships they endured
To quell the Indian's pride.
'T was nigh unto Pigwacket,
Upon the eighth of May,
They spied a rebel Indian
Soon after break of day;
He on a bank was walking,
Upon a neck of land,
Which leads into a pond, as
We're made to understand.

Our men resolved to have him,
And travel'd two miles round,
Until they met the Indian,
Who boldly stood his ground;
Then speaks up Captain Lovewell,
"Take you good heed," says he;
"This rogue is to decoy us,
I very plainly see.

"The Indians lie in ambush,
In some place nigh at hand,
In order to surround us
Upon this neck of land;
Therefore we'll march in order,
And each man leave his pack,
That we may briskly fight them
When they shall us attack."

They came unto this Indian,
Who did them thus defy;
As soon as they were nigh him,
Two guns he did let fly,
Which wounded Captain Lovewell,
And likewise one man more;
But while this rogue was running,
They laid him in his gore.

Then having scalped the Indian,
They went back to the spot,
Where they had laid their packs down,
But there they found them not;
For the Indians having spied them,
When they them down did lay,
Did seize them for their plunder,
And carry them away.

These rebels lay in ambush,
This very place hard by,
So that an English soldier
Did one of them spy,
And cried out, "Here's an Indian!"
With which they started out,
As fiercely as old lions,
And hideously did shout.

With that our valiant English
All gave a loud huzza,
To shew the rebel Indians
They feared them not a straw;
And now the fight beginning,
As fiercely as could be,
The Indians ran up to them,
But soon were forced to flee.

Thus out spake Captain Lovewell,
When first the fight began,
"Fight on, my valiant heroes!
You see they fall like rain."
For, as we are inform'd,
The Indians were so thick,
A man could scarcely fire a gun,
And some of them not hit.

Then they all their best did try
Our soldiers to surround,
But they could not accomplish it,
Because there was a pond,
To which our men retreated,
And cover'd all the rear,—
The rogues were forced to flee them,
Although they skulk'd for fear.

Two logs there were behind them,
That close together lay,
Without being discover'd,
They could not get away;
Therefore our valiant English
They travel'd in a row,
And at a handsome distance,
As they were wont to go,

* The popular air of "Yankee Doodle," like the dagger of Yudibras, serves a pacific as well as a martial purpose.

'Twas ten o'clock in the morning
When first the fight begun,
And fiercely it continued
Until the set of the sun;
Excepting that the Indians,
Some hours before 't was night,
Drew off into the bushes
And ceased awhile to fight :

But soon again returned,
In fierce and furious mood,
Shouting as in the morning,
But yet not half so loud ;
For, as we are inform'd,
So thick and fast they fell,
Scarce twenty of their number
At night did get home well.
Also our valiant English
Till midnight there did stay,
To see whether the Indians
Would have another fray ;
But they no more returning,
They made off towards their home,
And brought away their wounded
As far as they could come.

Of all our valiant English
There were but thirty-four,
And of the rebel Indians
There were about fourscore ;
And sixteen of our English
Did safely home return ;
The rest were killed and wounded,
For which we all must mourn.

Our worthy Captain Looseell
Among them there did die ;
They kill'd Lieutenant Robbins,
And wounded good young Frye,
Who was our English chaplain ;
He many Indians slew,
And some of them he scalped
When bullets round him flew.

Young Fullam too I'll mention,
Because he fought so well ;
Endeavouring to save a man,
A sacrifice he fell,
And yet our valiant Englishmen
In fight were ne'er dismay'd,
But still they kept their motion,
And Wyman captain made ;

Who shot the old chief Paugus,
Which did the foe defeat,
Then set his men in order,
And brought off the retreat ;
And braving many dangers
And hardships in the way,
They safe arrived at Dunstable,
The thirteenth day of May.

At the commencement of the Revolution, Barlow, Trumbull, Dwight, Humphreys, and other "Connecticut wits," employed their leisure in writing patriotic songs for the soldiers and the people, "which," says a life of Putnam, "had great effect through the country." "I do not know," wrote Barlow on entering the army, "whether I shall do more for the cause in the capacity of chaplain, than I could in that of poet; I have great faith in the influence of songs; and I shall continue, while fulfilling the duties of my appointment, to write one now and then, and to encourage the taste for them which I find in the camp. One good song is worth a dozen addresses or proclamations." The great song-writer of the Revolution, however, was Freneau, whose pieces were everywhere sung with enthusiasm.

He was a keen satirist, and wrote with remarkable facility; but his lyrics were often profane and vulgar while those written in New England, on account of their style and cast of thought, were stigmatized by the celebrated Parson Peters as "psalms and hymns adapted to the tastes of Yankee rebels." The following is a characteristic specimen:—

WAR SONG.—Written in 1776.

Hark, hark, the sound of war is heard,
And we must all attend;
Take up our arms and go with speed
Our country to defend.

Our parent state has turn'd our foe,
Which fills our land with pain;
Her gallant ships manned out for war
Come thundering o'er the main.

There's Carleton, Howe, and Clinton too,
And many thousands more,
May cross the sea, but all in vain;
Our rights we'll ne'er give o'er.

Our pleasant land they do invade,
Our property devour;
And all because we won't submit
To their despotic power.

Then let us go against our foes,
We'd better die than yield;
We and our sons are all undone
If Britain win the field.

Tories may dream of future joys,
But I am bold to say,
They'll find themselves bound fast in chains
If Britain wins the day.

Husbands must leave their loving wives
And sprightly youths attend,
Leave their sweethearts and risk their lives
Their country to defend.

May they be heroes in the field,
Have heroes' fame in store;
We pray the Lord to be their shield
Where thundering cannons roar.

The oldest of the revolutionary lyrics we shall press is the "Patriot's Appeal," printed in the Pennsylvania Chronicle, at Philadelphia, on the 4th of July, just eight years before the Declaration of Independence. We copy it from a ballad sheet, dated in 1775.

THE PATRIOT'S APPEAL

Come join hand and hand brave Americans all,
Awake through the land at fair Liberty's call;
No tyrannous acts shall suppress your just claims,
Or stain with dishonour America's name!

In freedom we're born, in freedom we'll live;
Our purses are ready—
Steady, friends, steady!—

Not as slaves, but as freemen, our money we'll give!

Our worthy forefathers (let's give them a cheer!)
To climates unknown did courageously steer;
Through oceans to deserts for freedom they came,
And, dying, bequeathed us their freedom and fame!
In freedom, etc.

Their generous bosoms all dangers despised,
So highly, so wisely, their birthrights they prized;
What they gave let us cherish and piously keep,
Nor frustrate their toils on the land or the deep.
In freedom, etc.

The tree their own hands had to liberty rear'd,
They lived to behold growing strong and rever'd—
With transport they cried, "Now our wishes we gain,
For our children shall gather the fruits of our pain."
In freedom, etc.

low sweet are the labours that freemen endure,
 & which they enjoy all the profits secure!
 No longer such toils shall Americans know,
 Britons may reap what Americans sow!
 In freedom, etc.

warms of placemen and pensioners e'en now appear like locusts deforming the charms of the year!
 Quins vainly will rise and showers vainly descend,
 For we are to drudge for what others may spend.
 In freedom, etc.

Then join hand and hand, brave Americans all,
 By uniting we stand, by dividing we fall;
 In so righteous a cause we may hope to succeed,
 For Heaven approves every generous deed.
 In freedom, etc.

All ages and nations shall speak with applause
 Of the courage we show in support of our cause,
 No die we can bear, but to serve we disdain,
 For shame is to freemen more dreadful than pain.
 In freedom, etc.

A bumper to Freedom! and as for the king,*
 When he does deserve it his praises we'll sing!
 We wish Britain's glory immortal may be,
 If she is but just and we are but free!
 In freedom we're born, in freedom we'll live,
 Our purses are ready—
 Steady, boys, steady!—

Our money as freemen, not slaves, we will give!

The following specimen of the much ridiculed
Kankee Psalms is said to have been written by Joel Barlow. It was published first in 1775, and afterward frequently reprinted:

THE BURNING OF CHARLESTOWN.

Palmira's prospect, with her tumbling walls,
 Huge piles of ruin heap'd on every side,
 From each beholder, tears of pity call,
 Sad monuments, extending far and wide.

Yet far more dismal to the patriot's eye,
 The drear remains of Charlestown's former show,
 Behind whose walls did hundred warriors die,
 And Britain's centre felt the fatal blow.

To see a town so elegantly form'd,
 Such buildings, graced with every curious art,
 Spoil'd in a moment, on a sudden storm'd,
 Must fill with indignation every heart.

But when we find the reasons of her fate
 To be but trifling—trifling did I say?
 For being noble! daring to be great,
 Nor calmly yielding to tyrannic sway!

To see the relics of that once famed place,
 Pointing to Heaven as 't were in ardent cry,
 By lawless power robb'd of every grace,
 Yet calling bolts of vengeance from on high!—

To find, I say, such dealings with mankind,
 To see those royal robbers planted near
 Those glorious buildings, turning into wind,
 And loath to mingle with the common air!—

And such chastisement coming from a state
 Who calls herself our Parent, Nurse and Friend—
 Must rouse each soul that's noble, frank and great,
 And urge us on our lives and all to spend!

Oh! spot once graceful; but, alas! no more;
 Till signs shall end, and time itself shall cease,
 Thy name shall live, and on fame's plain soar
 To mark grim blackness on Great Britain's face.

* In the copies of this song printed during the Revolution the last stanza is altered. In the Pennsylvania Chronicle, which we have examined, it is printed—

This bumper I crown for our sovereign's health,
 And this for Britannia's glory and wealth, etc.

Nor shall the blood of heroes, on the plain,
 Who nobly fell that day in Freedom's cause,
 Lie unrevenge'd, though with thy thousands slain,
 Whilst there's a king who fears nor minds thy laws.

Shall Cain, who madly spilt his brother's blood,
 Receive such curses from the God of all?
 Is not that Sovereign still as just and good
 To hear the cries of children when they call?

Yes, there's a God whose laws are still the same,
 Whose years are endless, and whose power is great:
 He is our God: Jehovah is his name;
 With him we trust our sore oppressed state.

When he shall rise, (oh, Britain, dread the day, Nor can I stretch the period of thy fate!)
 What heart of steel, what tyrant then shall sway
 A throne that's sinking by oppression's weight?

Thy crimes, oh North, shall then like spectres stand,
 Nor Charlestown hindmost in the ghastly roll,
 And faithless Gage, who gave the dread command,
 Shall find dire torments gnaw upon his soul.

Yea, in this world, we trust those ills so dread,
 Which fill the nation with such matchless woes,
 Shall fall with double vengeance on thy head,
 Nor escape those minions which thy court composes.

General Warren was a song writer as well as an orator, but his verses, though very popular at the commencement of the Revolution, have less merit than his reputation as a man of cultivated taste would lead us to anticipate. The following song was probably written near the close of his life:

FREE AMERICA.

That seat of science, Athens,
 And earth's proud mistress, Rome;
 Where now are all their glories?
 We scarce can find their tomb.
 Then guard your rights, Americans,
 Nor stoop to lawless sway;
 Oppose, oppose, oppose, oppose,
 For North America.

We led fair Freedom hither,
 And lo, the desert smiled!
 A paradise of pleasure
 Was open'd in the wild!
 Your harvest, bold Americans,
 No power shall snatch away!
 Huzza, huzza, huzza, huzza,
 For free America.

Torn from a world of tyrants,
 Beneath this western sky,
 We form'd a new dominion,
 A land of liberty;
 The world shall own we're masters here;
 Then hasten on the day:
 Huzza, huzza, huzza, huzza,
 For free America.

Lift up your hands, ye heroes,
 And swear with proud disdain,
 The wretch that would ensnare you,
 Shall lay his snares in vain;
 Should Europe empty all her force,
 We'll meet her in array,
 And fight and shout, and shout and fight
 For North America.

Some future day shall crown us
 The masters of the main;
 Our feet shall speak in thunder
 To England, France, and Spain;
 And the nations over the ocean spread
 Shall tremble and obey
 The sons, the sons, the sons, the sons,
 Of brave America.

Soon after the passage of the stamp act many patriotic lyrics appeared in various parts of the country, one of the best of which is the following, by Doctor Prime, of New York, the author of "Muscipula sive Cambromyomachia," a satire, and of several other poems of considerable merit.

A SONG FOR THE SONS OF LIBERTY

In story we're told,
How our fathers of old
Braved the rage of the wind and the waves;
And crows'd the deep o'er,
To this desolate shore,
All because they were loath to be slaves, brave boys!
All because they were loath to be slaves.

Yet a strange scheme of late,
Has been form'd in the state,
By a knot of political knaves;
Who in secret rejoice,
That the Parliament's voice
Has resolved that we all shall be slaves, brave boys! etc.

But if we should obey,
This vile statute the way
To more base future slavery paves;
Nor in spite of our pain,
Must we ever complain,
If we tamely submit to be slaves, brave boys! etc.

Counteract, then, we must
A decree so unjust,
Which our wise constitution depraves;
And all nature conspires,
To approve our desires,
For she cautions us not to be slaves, brave boys! etc.

As the sun's lucid ray
To all nations gives day,
And a world from obscurity saves;
So all happy and free,
George's subjects should be,
The Americans must not be slaves, brave boys! etc.

Heaven only controls
The great deep as it rolls,
And the tide which our country laves
Emphatical roars
This advice to our shores,
O, Americans! never be slaves, brave boys! etc.

Hark! the wind, as it flies,
Though o'er-ruled by the skies,
While it each meaner obstacle braves,
Seems to say, "Be like me,
Always loyally free,
But ah! never consent to be slaves," brave boys! etc.

To our monarch, we know,
Due allegiance we owe,
Who the sceptre so rightfully waves;
But no sovereign we own,
But f'oe king on his throne,
And we cannot, to subjects, be slaves, brave boys! etc.

Though fools stupidly tell,
That we mean to rebel,
Yet all each American craves,
Is but to be free,
As we surely must be,
For we never were born to be slaves, brave boys! etc.

But whoever, in spite
At American right,
Like insolent Haman behaves;
Or would wish to grow great
On the spoils of the state,
May he and his children be slaves, brave boys! etc.

Though against the repeal,
With intemperate zeal,
Proud Granville so brutishly raves;

Yet our conduct shall show,
And our enemies know,
That Americans scorn to be slaves, brave boys! etc.

With the beasts of the wood,
We will ramble for food,
We will lodge in wild deserts and caves;
And live poor as Job,
On the skirts of the globe,
Before we'll submit to be slaves, brave boys! etc.

The birth-right we hold
Shall never be sold,
But sacred maintain'd to our graves,
And before we'll comply,
We will gallantly die,
For we must not, we will not be slaves, brave boys!
For we must not, we will not be slaves!

We have copies of four metrical accounts of the destruction of the tea in Boston Harbour, two of which appear to have been written since the close of the war. We give one of the oldest, which was sung to the tune of "The Hosier's Ghost."

BALLAD OF THE TEA PARTY.

As near beauteous Boston lying
On the gently swelling flood,
Without jack or pennant flying,
Three ill-fated tea-ships rode;
Just as glorious Sol was setting,
On the wharf a numerous crew,
Sons of Freedom, fear forgetting,
Suddenly appear'd in view.

Arm'd with hammers, axes, chisels,
Weapons new for warlike deed,
Toward the tax'd-tea-freighted vessels
They came boldly and with speed.

O'er their heads in lofty mid-sky,
Three bright angel forms were seen,
This was Hampden, that was Sidney,
With fair Liberty between.

"Soon," they cried, "your foes you'll banish,
Soon the triumph will be won,
Scarce the setting sun shall vanish
Ere the glorious deed is done!"

Quick as thought the ships were boarded,
Hatches burst and chests display'd;
Axes, hammers, help afforded,
What a crash that eve was made!
Deep into the sea descended Cursed weed of China's coast;
Thus at once our fears were ended!—
British rights shall ne'er be lost!

Captains, once more hoist your streamers,
Spread your sails and plough the wave,
Tell your masters they were dreamers
When they thought to cheat the brave!

One of the most ingenious poets of our revolutionary era was Dr. J. M. Sewall, of New Hampshire. He translated the works of Ossian, which were then attracting much attention, into English verse, and wrote numerous songs, odes, elegies, and dramatic pieces. His epilogue to Addison's Cato, beginning,

We see mankind the same in every age, is still familiar, from having been incorporated into two or three books of reading lessons for the schools in a time when it was thought to be of some consequence that works of that description should inculcate patriotic sentiments. The most famous of his productions, however, was "War and Washington," written soon after the battle of Lexington, and sung with enthusiasm, in all parts of the country, until the of the Revolution. It has been too often printed & regarded now as a curiosity, and we therefore omit it but a few verses.

Britons boast no longer, with proud indignity,
 Your conquering legions, or of your strength at sea,
 Ye, your braver sons, incensed, our arms have girded on,
 Ah, huzza, huzza, huzza, for War and Washington!
 Deaf to mild entreaties, still blind to England's good,
 Have, for thirty pieces, betray'd their country's blood.
 Esop's greedy cur they'll gain a shadow for their bone,
 And us fearful shades indeed, inspired by Washington!
 Exiles! unexampled! incomprehensible!
 Blundering schemes of Britain, her folly, pride and zeal,
 Show how they growl and threat, like asses blunder on!
 Their aim are all their efforts still, against our Washington!
 O God! is this the nation, whose arms so oft were hurled across Europe, Afric, India? whose Navy ruled a world!

 Lustre of her former deeds, whose ages of renown,
 In a moment, or transferr'd, to us and Washington!
 Ah George, too choice of Britons, to foreign realms apply, madly arm half Europe, yet still we would defy

 The Hessian, Jew or Infidel, or all those powers in one,
 Whom Adams guides our senate, our army Washington!

We have not room to copy, in extenso, more of
 The songs which served no less than the most eloquent Orations of the time to kindle the patriotic enthusiasm
 Of our fathers, in the first years of the struggle for Independence; and after giving specimen verses of Two or three others, will pass to the more strictly historical Ballads. We may as well here remark that the Geography and rhythmical construction of many of
 The old songs and ballads varies in the different editions
 The earliest usually being most correct—and that we Have copied from the least inharmonious and corrupt,
 Sometimes giving one verse from one and another
 From another impression of the same production.
 The following stanzas are from "The Rallying Song," Written soon after the friendly disposition of the Government of the unfortunate Louis XIV., was made Known in this country.

Freedom's sons who wish to shine

Bright in future story,

Haste to arms and join the line

Marching on to glory.

Leave the scythe and seize the sword,

Brave the worst of dangers!

Freedom is the only word—

We to fear are strangers.

From your mountains quick advance

Hearts of oak and iron arms—

Lo! the cheering sounds from France

Spread amid the foe alarms!

Leave the scythe and seize the sword,

Brave the worst of dangers!

Freedom is the only word—

Come and join the Rangers!

From "The Green Mountain Boys' Song," composed, apparently, in the early part of the contest, we have space for the chorus only. Though less poetical than some others, the entire production is animated in sentiment and smoothly versified. We have no clue to the authorship, though, like "The Rallying Song," "The American Rifleman," and many other lyrics of the same description, it appears to have been written in Vermont.

Then draw the trusty blade, my boys,
 And fling the sheath away—

Blow high, blow low, come weal, come wo,
 Strike for America!
 Strike for America, my boys,
 Strike for America!
 Come weal, come wo, blow high, blow low,
 Strike for America!

We have discovered but one ballad relating to the Battle of Trenton, and that was probably written a year or two after the event.

BATTLE OF TRENTON.

On Christmas day in '76,
 Our ragged troops with bayonets fix'd,
 For Trenton marched away.

The Delaware see! the boats below!

The light obscured by hail and snow!

But no signs of dismay.

Our object was the Hessian band,
 That dared invade fair Freedom's land,
 And quarter in that place.

Great Washington he led us on,

Whose streaming flag, in storm or sun

Had never known disgrace.

In silent march we pass'd the night,
 Each soldier panting for the fight,

Though quite benumb'd with frost.

Greene, on the left, at six began,

The right was led by Sullivan,

Who ne'er a moment lost.

Their pickets storm'd, the alarm was spread,

That rebels risen from the dead

Were marching into town.

Some scamper'd here, some scamper'd there,

And some for action did prepare,

But soon their arms laid down.

Twelve hundred servile miscreants,

With all their colours, guns and tents,

Were trophies of the day.

The frolic o'er, the bright canteen,

In centre, front, and rear was seen

Driving fatigue away.

Now, brothers of the patriot bands,

Let's sing deliverance from the hands

Of arbitrary sway.

And as our life is but a span,

Let's touch the tankard while we can,

In memory of that day.

Burgoyne, more frequently than any other British officer, was the butt of the continental wits. His verses were parodied, his amours celebrated in songs of the mess-table, and his boasts and the weaker points in his nature caricatured in ballads and petite comedies. We obtained a manuscript copy of the song from which the following verses are quoted, from an octogenarian Vermonter who, with the feeble frame, shrill voice and silvered locks of eighty-seven, would give the echoing chorus with as much enthusiasm as when he joined in it with his camp-companions more than half a century ago.

THE PROGRESS OF SIR JACK BRAG.

Said Burgoyne to his men, as they pass'd in review,

Tullalo, tullalo, tullalo, boys!

These rebels their course very quickly will rue,

And fly as the leaves 'fore the autumn tempest sew,

When him who is your leader they know, boys!

They with men have now to deal,

And we soon will make them feel—

Tullalo, tullalo, tullalo, boys!

That a loyal Briton's arm and a loyal Briton's steel

Can put to flight a rebel as quick as other foes, boys!

Tullalo, tullalo, tullalo—

Tullalo, tullalo, tullalo-o-o-o, boys!

As to Sa-ra-tog' he came, thinking how to jo the game,
 Tullalo, tullalo, tullalo, boys!
 He began to see the grubs, in the branches of his fame,
 He began to have the trembles lest a flash should be the flame,
 For which he had agreed his perfume to forego, boys!
 No lack of skill, but fates,
 Shall make us yield to Gates,
 Tullalo, tullalo, tullalo, boys!
 The devils may have leagued, as you know, with the States,
 But we never will be beat by any mortal foe, boys!
 Tullalo, tullalo, tullalo—
 Tullalo, tullalo, tullalo-o-o-o, boys!

We believe the "Progress of Sir Jack Brag" has never been printed. The only clue to its authorship with which we are acquainted is the signature, "G. of H." It was probably written soon after the defeat of its hero at Saratoga. Another ballad on the same subject is thus—

THE FATE OF JOHN BURGOTNE.

When Jack the king's commander
 Was going to his duty,
 Through all the crowd he smiled and bow'd
 To every blooming beauty.
 The city rung with feats he'd done
 In Portugal and Flanders,
 And all the town thought he'd be crown'd
 The first of Alexanders.
 To Hampton Court he first repairs
 To kiss great George's hand, sirs;
 Then to harangue on state affairs
 Before he left the land, sirs.
 The "Lower House" sat mute as mouse
 To hear his grand oration;
 And "all the peers," with loudest cheers,
 Proclaimed him to the nation.
 Then off he went to Canada,
 Next to Ticonderoga,
 And quitting those away he goes Straightway to Saratoga.
 With great parade his march he made
 To gain his wished-for station,
 While far and wide his minions hied
 To spread his "Proclamation."
 To such as staid he offers made
 Of "pardon on submission";
 But savage bands should waste the lands
 Of all in opposition.
 But ah, the cruel fates of war!
 This boasted son of Britain,
 When mounting his triumphal car
 With sudden fear was smitten.
 The sons of Freedom gathered round,
 His hostile bands confounded,
 And when they'd fain have turn'd their back
 They found themselves surrounded!
 In vain they fought, in vain they fled,
 Their chief, humane and tender,
 To save the rest soon thought it best
 His forces to surrender.
 Brave St. Clair when he first retired
 Knew what the fates portended;
 And Arnold and heroic Gates
 His conduct have defended.
 Thus may America's brave sons
 With honour be rewarded,
 And be the fate of all her foes
 The same as here recorded.

The "North Campaign" was written by a private of Colonel Brooks's regiment. It was for a long period sung throughout New England; but we believe has never until now been printed.

THE NORTH CAMPAIGN.

Come unto me ye heroes,
 Whose hearts are true and bold,
 Who value more your honour
 Than others do their gold;
 Give ear unto my story,
 And I the truth will tell Concerning many a soldier,
 Who for his country fall.
 Burgoyne, the king's commander,
 From Canada set sail
 With full eight thousand reg'lars,
 He thought he could not fail;
 With Indians and Canadians,
 And his cursed Tory crew,
 On board his fleet of shipping
 He up the Champlain Jew.
 Before Ticonderoga,
 The first day of July,
 Appear'd his ships and army,
 And we did them espy.
 Their motions we observed
 Full well both night and day,
 And our brave boys prepared
 To have a bloody fray.
 Our garrison they viewed them,
 As straight their troops did land,
 And when St. Clair, our chieftain,
 The fact did understand
 That they the Mount Defiance
 Were bent to fortify,
 He found we must surrender,
 Or else prepare to die.
 The fifth day of July, then,
 He order'd a retreat,
 And when next morn we started,
 Burgoyne thought we were bent.
 And closely he pursued us,
 Till when near Hubbardton,
 Our rear guards were defeated,
 He thought the country won.
 And when 't was told in Congress,
 That we our forts had left,
 To Albany retreated,
 Of all the North bereft,
 Brave General Gates they sent us,
 Our fortunes to retrieve,
 And him with shouts of gladness
 The army did receive.
 Where first the Mohawk's waters
 Do in the sunshine play,
 For Herkimer's brave soldiers
 Sellinger* ambush'd lay;
 And them he there defeated,
 But soon he had his due,
 And scared† by Brooks and Arnold
 He to the North withdrew.
 To take the stores and cattle
 That we had gather'd then,
 Burgoyne sent a detachment
 Of fifteen hundred men;
 By Baum they were commanded,
 To Bennington they went;
 To plunder and to murder
 Was fully their intent.

* St. Leger.

† A man employed by the British as a spy, was told by Arnold, and at the suggestion of Colonel Brooks, to go back to St. Leger with such deceptive accounts of the strength of the Americans as induced him to retreat toward Montreal.

But little did they know then,
 With whom they had to deal;
 It was not quite so easy
 Our stores and stock to steal;
 Bold Starke would give them only
 A portion of his lead;
 With half his crew ere sunset
 Baum lay among the dead.

The nineteenth of September,
 The morning cool and clear,
 Brave Gates rode through our army
 Each soldier's heart to cheer;
 "Burgoyne," he cried, "advances,
 But we will never fly;
 No—rather than surrender,
 We'll fight him till we die."

The news was quickly brought us,
 The enemy was near,
 And all along our lines then,
 There was no sign of fear;
 It was above Stillwater
 We met at noon that day,
 And every one expected
 To see a bloody fray.

Six hours the battle lasted,
 Each heart was true as gold,
 The British fought like lions,
 And we like Yankees bold;
 The leaves with blood were crimson.
 And then brave Gates did cry—
 " 'T is diamond now cut diamond!
 We'll beat them, boys, or die."

The darkness soon approaching,
 It forced us to retreat
 Into our lines till morning,
 Which made them think us beat;
 But ere the sun was risen,
 They saw before their eyes
 Us ready to engage them,
 Which did them much surprise.

Of fighting they seem'd weary,
 Therefore to work they go
 Their thousand dead to bury,
 And breastworks up to throw:
 With grape and bombs intending
 Our army to destroy,
 Or from our works our forces
 By stratagem decoy.

The seventh day of October,
 The British tried again,—
 Shells from their cannons throwing
 Which fell on us like rain,—
 To drive us from our stations
 That they might thus retreat;
 For now Burgoyne saw plainly
 He never us could beat.

But vain was his endeavour
 Our men to terrify;
 Though death was all around us,
 Not one of us would fly.
 But when an hour we'd fought them,
 And they began to yield,
 Along our lines the cry ran
 "The next blow wins the field!"

Great God, who guides their battles
 Whose cause is just and true,
 Inspired our bold commander
 The course he should pursue.
 He order'd Arnold forward,
 And Brooks to follow on;
 The enemy were routed!
 Our liberty was won!

Then, burning all their luggage,
 They fled with haste and fear,
 Burgoyne with all his forces
 To Saratogue did steer;
 And Gates our brave commander,
 Soon after him did hie,
 Resolving he would take them
 Or in the effort die.

As we came nigh the village,
 We overtook the foe;
 They'd burn'd each house to ashes,
 Like all where'er they go.
 The seventeenth of October,
 They did capitulate—
 Burgoyne and his proud army
 Did we our prisoners make.

Now here's a health to Arnold,
 And our commander Gates;
 To Lincoln and to Washington,
 Whom ev'ry Tory hates;
 Likewise unto our Congress,
 God grant it long to reign,
 Our Country, Right and Justice
 For ever to maintain.

Now finish'd is my story,
 My song is at an end;
 The freedom we're enjoying
 We're ready to defend;
 For while our cause is righteous,
 Heaven nerves the soldier's arm,
 And vain is their endeavour
 Who strive to do us harm.

The last specimen of revolutionary verse relating to the battle of Saratoga for which we have room, is the following curious account of that event, published in the newspapers of the day—

Here followeth the direful fate
 Of Burgoyne and his army great
 Who so proudly did display
 The terrors of despotic sway.
 His power and pride and many threats
 Have been brought low by fort'nate Gates
 To bend to the United States.

British prisoners by Convention,	9428
Foreigners—by Contra-vention,	2198
Tories sent across the Lake,	1100
Burgoyne and his suite, in state,	12
Sick and wounded, bruised and pounded, Ne'er so much before confounded,	} . . 528
Prisoners of war before Convention,
Deserters come with kind intention,	300
They lost at Bennington's great battle, Where Starke's glorious arms did rattle,	} . . 1230
Kill'd in September and October,
Ta'en by brave Brown,* some drunk, some sober, Slain by high-famed Herkimer,†	} . . 600
On both flanks, on rear and van, Indians, suttlers, butchers, drovers,
Enough to crowd large plains all over, And those whom grim Death did prevent From fighting against our continent; And also those who stole away, Lost they down their arms should lay, Abhorring that obnoxious day;	} . . 4413
The whole make fourteen thousand men, Who may not with us fight again.
	14,000

This is a pretty just account
 Of Burgoyne's legion's whole amount,
 Who came across the Northern Lakes
 To desolate our happy States.

* Col. John Brown, of Mass.

† Gen. Herkimer, of New York, (probably.)

Their brass cannons we have got all—
Fifty-six—both great and small;
And ten thousand stand of arms,
To prevent all future harms;
Stores and implements complete,
Of workmanship exceeding neat;
Cover'd wagons in great plenty,
And proper harness, no way scanty.
Among our prisoners there are Six generals, of fame most rare;
Six members of their Parliament—
Reluctantly they seem content;
Three British lords, and Lord Belcarras,
Who came, our country free to harass.
Two baronets, of high extraction,
Were sorely wounded in the action.

The Massacre of Wyoming was minutely described in several ballads written before the year 1785, which, we were surprised to find, are unnoticed by Mr. Stone and the other historians of that celebrated valley. We quote a few stanzas from the longest one in our possession.

Now as they fly, they quarters cry,
Oh hear, indulgent Heaven!
How hard to state their dreadful fate,
No quarters must be given!

Some men were found, a-flying round,
Sagacious to get clear;
In vain they fly, the foe is nigh,
On flank, in front, and rear!

The enemy did win the day,
Methinks their words were these:

"You cursed rebel Yankee race,
Will this your Congress please?"

The death of Andre—just and necessary as it unquestionably was—has been lamented in a hundred songs; while the chivalrous and accomplished Hale, murdered with a brutality that would have shocked the sensibilities of the most depraved and desperate brigands, is alluded to in but a single ballad among those which have been preserved until our own time. We transcribe, from the oldest copy in our possession, the once popular lyric called

BRAVE PAWLING AND THE SPY.

Come, all you brave Americans,
And unto me give ear,
And I'll sing you a ditty
That will your spirits cheer,
Concerning a young gentleman
Whose age was twenty-two;
He fought for North America;
His heart was just and true.

They took him from his dwelling,
And they did him confine,
They cast him into prison,
And kept him there a time;
But he with resolution
Resolved not long to stay;
He set himself at liberty,
And soon he ran away.

He with a scouting-party
Went down to Tarrytown,
Where he met a British officer,
A man of high renown;
Who says unto these gentlemen,
"You're of the British cheer,
I trust that you can tell me
If there's any danger near?"

Then up stept this young hero,
John Pawling was his name,
"Sir, tell us where you're going
And also whence you came?"
"I bear the British flag, sir;
I've a pass to go this way,
I'm on an expedition,
And have no time to stay."

Then round him came this companion,
And bid him to dismount;
"Come tell us where you're going,
Give us a strict account;
For we are now resolv'd
That you shall ne'er pass by."
Upon examination
They found he was a spy.

He begged for his liberty,
He plead for his discharge,
And oftentimes he told them,
If they'd set him at large,
"Here's all the gold and silver
I have laid up in store,
But when I reach the city,
I'll give you ten times more."

"I want not the gold and silver
You have laid up in store,
And when you get to New York
You need not send us more;
But you may take your sword in hand
To gain your liberty,
And if that you do conquer me,
O, then you shall be free."

"The time it is improper
Our valour for to try,
For if we take our swords in hand,
Then one of us must die;
I am a man of honour,
With courage true and bold,
And I fear not the man of clay,
Although he's clothed in gold."

He saw that his conspiracy
Would soon be brought to light;
He begg'd for pen and paper,
And ask'd leave to write
A line to General Arnold,
To let him know his fate,
And beg for his assistance;
But now it was too late.

When the news it came to Arnold,
It put him in a fret;
He walk'd the room in trouble,
Till tears his cheek did wet;
The story soon went through the camp,
And also through the fort;
And he call'd for the Vulture,
And sail'd for New York.

Now Arnold to New York is gone,
A-fighting for his king,
And left poor Major Andre
On the gallows for to swing;
When he was executed,
He look'd both meek and mild;
He look'd upon the people,
And pleasantly he smiled.

It moved each eye with pity,
Caused every heart to bleed;
And every one wish'd him released
And Arnold in his stead.
He was a man of honour,
In Britain he was born;
To die upon the gallows
Most highly he did scorn.

A bumper to John Pawling!
 Now let your voices sound,
 Fill up your flowing glasses,
 And drink his health around;
 Also to those young gentlemen
 Who bore him company;
 Success to North America,
 Ye sons of liberty!

In connection with this we give a specimen of the astrelsy of the other party. The British and Tories re not often in a singing mood, and their ballads, in few exceptions, are inferior in spirit and temper those of the Whigs. There is some wit, however, the following, which is said to have been written by Jor Andre—

THE COW CHASE.

PART I.

To drive the kine one summer's morn,

'The tanner* took his way;
 The calf shall rue that is unborn
 The jumbling of that day.

And Wayne descending steers shall know
 And tauntingly deride,
 And call to mind in every low
 The tanning of his hide.

Yet Bergen cows still ruminate
 Unconscious in the stall,
 What mighty means were used to get
 And loose them after all.

For many heroes bold and brave
 From New-bridge and Tappan,
 And those that drink Passaic's wave,
 And those that eat saupan;
 And sons of distant Delaware,
 And still remoter Shannon,
 And Major Lee with horses rare,
 And Proctor with his cannon.

All wond'rous proud in arms they came,
 What hero could refuse
 To tread the rugged path to fame,
 Who had a pair of shoes!

At six, the host with sweating buff
 Arrived at Freedom's pole,
 When Wayne, who thought he'd time enough,
 Thus specified the whole—

"O ye whom glory doth unite,
 Who Freedom's cause espouse,
 Wether the wing that's doom'd to fight
 Or that to drive the cows.

"Ere yet you tempt your further way
 Or into action come,
 Hear, Soldiers, what I have to say,
 And take a pint of rum.

"Intemperate valour then will string
 Each nervous arm the better,
 So all the land shall IO sing,
 And read the General's letter.

"Know that some paitry refugees,
 Whom I've a mind to fight,
 Are playing h—I amongst the trees,
 That grow on yonder height.

"Their fort and block-houses we'll level,
 And deal a horrid slaughter,
 We'll drive the scoundrels to the devil,
 And ravish wife and daughter.

"I under cover of the attack,
 Whilst you are all at blows,
 From English Neighbourhood and Nyack
 Will drive away the cows;

* Alluding to Wayne's early occupation.

"For well you know the latter is
 The serious operation,
 And fighting with the refugees
 Is only demonstration."

His daring words from all the crowd
 Such great applause did gain,
 That every man declared aloud
 For serious work with Wayne.

Then from the cask of rum once more
 They took a heady gill,*
 When one and all they loudly swore,
 They'd fight upon the hill.

But here the muse hath not a strain
 Befitting such great deeds,
 Huzza! they cried, huzza for Wayne,
 And shouting—

PART II.

Near his meridian pomp, the sun
 Had journey'd from the horizon,
 When fierce the dusky tribe moved on,
 Of heroes drunk as pison.

The sounds confused of boasting oaths,
 Re-echo'd through the wood,
 Some vow'd to sleep in dead men's clothes,
 And some to swim in blood.

At Irving's nod 't was fine to see
 The left prepare to fight,
 The while the drovers, Wayne and Lee,
 Drew off upon the right.

Which Irving 't was, fame don't relate,
 Nor can the muse assist her,
 Whether 't was he that cocks a hat,
 Or he that gives a clyster.

For greatly one was signalized,
 That fought at Chestnut Hill,
 And Canada immortalized
 The vender of the pill.

Yet the attendance upon Proctor,
 They both might have to boast of;
 For there was business for the doctor,
 And hats to be disposed of.

Let none uncandidly infer,
 That Stirling wanted spunk,
 The self-made peer had sure been there,
 But that the peer was drunk.

But turn we to the Hudson's banks,
 Where stood the modest train,
 With purpose firm, though slender ranks,
 Nor cared a pin for Wayne.

For them the unrelenting hand
 Of rebel fury drove,
 And tore from every genial band
 Of friendship and of love.

And some within a dungeon's gloom,
 By mock tribunals laid,
 Had waited long a cruel doom
 Impending o'er each head.

Here one bewails a brother's fate,
 There one a sire demands,
 Cut off, alas! before their date,
 By ignominious hands.

And silver'd grandires here appear'd
 In deep distress wrung,
 Of reverent manners that declared
 The better days they'd seen.

* It was a favourite idea with the Tories that the Whig party "embraced none of the temperate and respectable portion of the community."

Oh, cursed rebellion, these are thine,
Thine are these tales of wo,
Shall at thy dire insatiate shrine
Blood never cease to flow?

And now the foe began to lead
His forces to the attack;
Balls whistling unto balls succeed,
And make the Block-House crack.

No shot could pass, if you will take
The General's word for true;
But 'tis a d—ble mistake,
For every shot went through.

The firmer as the rebels press'd,
The loyal heroes stand;
Virtue had nerved each honest breast,
And industry each hand.

"In* valour's phrensy, Hamilton,
Rode like a soldier big,
And secretary Harrison,
With pen stuck in his wig."

"But least their chieftain Washington,
Should mourn them in the mumps,
The fate of Withrington to shun,
They fought behind the stumps."

But ah, Thaddeus Posset, why
Should thy poor soul olope?
And why should Titus Hooper die,
Ay, die—without a rope?

Apostate Murphy, thou to whom Fair Sheila ne'er was cruel,
In death shalt hear her mourn thy doom,
"Och! would you die, my Jewel?"

Thee, Nathan Pumpkin, I lament,
Of melancholy fate,
The grey goose stolen as he went,
In his heart's blood was wet.

Now as the fight was further fought,
And balls began to thicken,
The fray assum'd, the generals thought,
The colour of a lakin'.

Yet undismay'd the chiefs command,
And to redeem the day,
Ory, Soldiers, charge! they hear, they stand,
They turn and run away.

PART III.

Not all delights the bloody spear,
Or horrid din of battle,
There are, I'm sure, who'd like to hear
A word about the cattle.

The chief whom we beheld of late,
Near Schralenberg haranguing,
At Yan Van Poop's unconscious sat
Of Irving's hearty banging;

Whilst valiant Lee, with courage wild,
Most bravely did oppose
The tears of woman and of child,
Who begg'd he'd leave the cows.

But Wayne of sympathizing heart,
Required a relief
Not all the blessings could impart
Of battle or of beef.

For now a prey to female charms,
His soul took more delight in
A lovely hamadryad's arms,
Than cow drying or fighting.

* Vide Lee's Trial.

* A disorder prevalent in the rebel lines.

A nymph, the refugees had drove Far from her native tree,
Just happen'd to be on the move,
When up came Wayne and Lea.

She in mad Anthony's fierce eye
The hero saw portray'd,
And all in tears she took him by ——The bride of his jade.

"Hear," said the nymph, "O great commander!
No human lamentations;
The trees you see them cutting yonder,
Are all my near relations."

"And I, forlorn! implore thine aid,
To free the sacred grove;
So shall thy prowess be repaid
With an immortal's love."

Now come, to prove she was a goddess,
Said this enchanting fair
Had late retired from the bedies,*
In all the pomp of war;

That drums and merry fife had play'd
To honour her retreat,
And Cunningham himself convey'd
The lady through the street.

Great Wayne, by soft compassion sway'd
To no inquiry stoops,
But takes the fair afflicted maid
Right into Yan Van Poop's.

So Roman Anthony, they say,
Disgraced the imperial banner,
And for a gypsy lope a day,
Like Anthony the tanner.

The hamadryad had but half
Received address from Wayne,
When drums and colours, cow and calf,
Came down the road amain.

All in a cloud of dust were seen,
The sheep, the horse, the goat,
The gentle heifer, ass obscene,
The yearling and the shent.

And pack-horses with fowls came by,
Be feather'd on each side,
Like Pegasus, the horse that I
And other poets ride.

Sublime upon his stirrups rose
The mighty Lee behind,
And drove the terror-smitten cows
Like chaff before the wind.

But sudden see the woods above
Pour down another corps,
All helter-skelter in a drove,
Like that I sung before.

Irving and terror in the van,
Came flying all abroad,
And cannon, colours, horse, and man
Ran tumbling to the road.

Still as he fled, 't was Irving's cry,
And his example too,
"Run on, my merry men—For why?
[The shot will not go through."

As when two kennels in the street,
Swell'd with a recent rain,
In gushing streams together meet,
And seek the neighbouring drain,

* A cant appellation given amongst the soldiery to the corps that had the honour to guard his Majesty's person.

† Five refugees (tis true) were found
Stiff on the block-house floor,
But then, 'tis thought, the shot went round,
And in at the back door.

So met these dung-born tribes in one,
As swift in their career,
And so to Newbridge they ran on—
But all the cows got clear.

Poor parson Caldwell, all in wonder,
Saw the returning train,
And mourn'd to Wayne the lack of plunder
For them to steal again.

For 't was his right to steal the spoil, and
To share with each commander,
As he had done at Staten-Island
With frost-bit Alexander.

In his dismay the frantic priest
Began to grow prophetic,
You'd sworn, to see his labouring breast,
He'd taken an emetic.

"I view a future day," said he,
"Brighter than this day dark is,
And you shall see what you shall see,
Ha! ha! my pretty Marquis!

And he shall come to Paulse-Hook,
And great achievements think on,
And make a bow and take a look,
Like Satan over Lincoln.

And every one around shall glory
To see the Frenchman caper,
And pretty Susan tell the story
In the next Chatham paper."

This solemn prophecy, of course,
Gave all much consolation,
Except to Wayne, who lost his horse
Upon that great occasion.

His horse that carried all his prog,
His military speeches,
His corn-stock whiskey for his grog,
Blue stockings and brown breeches.

And now I've closed my epic strain,
I tremble as I show it,
Lest this same warrior-drover, Wayne,
Should ever catch the poet.

From a large collection of naval ballads, we select the following, as one of the most curious of its class, and because, like several others in this collection, it has never before been printed. It was written by the surgeon of the "Fair American," and was familiar to the Massachusetts privateersmen during the last years of the Revolution. The "noble captain" was an ancestor of the inimitable author, Nathaniel Hawthorne, of Salem.

BOLD HAWTHORNE.

The twenty-second of August,
Before the close of day,
All hands on board our privateer,
We got her under weigh;
We kept the Eastern Shore along,
For forty leagues or more,
Then our departure took for sea,
From the Isle Mauhegan shore.

Bold Hawthorne was commander,
A man of real worth,
Old England's cruel tyranny
Induced him to go forth;
She, with relentless fury,
Was plundering all our coast,
And thought, because her strength was great,
Our glorious cause was lost.

Yet boast not, haughty Britons,
Of power and dignity,
Of all your conquering armies,
Your matchless strength at sea!

Since, taught by numerous instances,
Americans can fight,
With valour can equip their stand,
Your armies put to flight.

Now farewell fair America,
Farewell our friends and wives,
We trust in Heaven's peculiar care,
For to protect their lives,
To prosper our intended cruise
Upon the raging main,
And to preserve our dearest friends,
Till we return again.

The wind it being leading,
It bore us on our way,
As far unto the southward
As the Gulf of Florida,
Where we observed a British ship,
Returning from the main;
We gave her two bow chasers,
And she return'd the same.

We hauled up our courses,
And so prepared for fight;
The contest held four glasses,
Until the dusk of night;
Then having sprung our mainmast,
And had so large a sea,
We dropp'd astern and left our chase
Till the returning day.

Next morn we fish'd our mainmast,
The ship still being nigh,
All hands made for engaging,
Our luck once more to try;
But wind and sea being boisterous,
Our cannon would not bear,
We thought it quite imprudent,
And so we left her there.

We cruised to the eastward
Near the coast of Portugal;
In longitude of twenty-seven
We saw a lofty sail;
We gave her chase, and soon we saw
She was a British scow,
Standing for fair America,
With troops for General Howe.

Our captain did inspect her
With glasses, and he said—
"My boys, she means to fight us,
But be you not afraid;
All hands now beat to quarters,
See everything is clear,
We'll give her a broadside, my boys,
As soon as she comes near."

She was prepared with nettings,
And had her men secured,
She bore directly for us,
And put us close on board;
When cannon roar'd like thunder,
And muskets fired amain,
But soon we were alongside,
And grappled to her chain.

And now the scene it alter'd,
The cannon ceased to roar,
We fought with swords and boarding-pikes,
One glass or something more,
Till British pride and glory
No longer dared to stay,
But cut the Yankee grapplings,
And quickly bore away.

Our case was not so desperate
As plainly might appear;
Yet sudden death did enter
On board our wretched

Mahoney, Crew, and Clemmons,
The valiant and the brave,
Fell glorious in the combat,
And met a watery grave.

Ten other men were wounded
Among our warlike crew,
With them our noble captain,*
To whom all praise is due;
To him and all our officers,
Let's give a hearty cheer:
*Success to fair America,
And our good privateer!*

FRANCIS HOPKINSON was one of the greatest wits of his time, and his satires, epigrams, songs, and other compositions, in verse and prose, were among the happiest productions of their kind written during the Revolution. The "Battle of the Kegs," is the most celebrated of his songs. It was occasioned by a real incident. Certain machines, in the form of kegs, charged with gunpowder, were sent down the river to annoy the British shipping then at Philadelphia. The danger of these machines being discovered, the British manned the wharves and shipping, and discharged their small arms and cannons at every thing they saw floating in the river during the ebb tide.

THE BATTLE OF THE KEGS.

Gallants attend and hear a friend,
Trill forth harmonious ditty,
Strange things I'll tell which late befell
In Philadelphia city.

'Twas early day, as poets say
Just when the sun was rising,
A soldier stood on a log of wood,
And saw a thing surprising.
As in amaze he stood to gaze,
The truth can't be denied, sir,
He spied a score of kegs or more
Come floating down the tide, sir.

A sailor too in jerkin blue,
This strange appearance viewing,
First damn'd his eyes, in great surprise,
Then said some mischief's brewing.

These kegs, I'm told, the rebels bold,
Pack'd up like pickling herring;
And they're come down t' attack the town,
In this new way of ferrying.

The soldier flew, the sailor too,
And scared almost to death, sir,
Wore out their shoes, to spread the news,
And ran till out of breath, sir.

Now up and down throughout the town,
Most frantic scenes were acted;
And some ran here, and others there,
Like men almost distracted.

Some fire cry'd, which some denied,
But said the earth had quaked;
And girls and boys, with hideous noise,
Ran through the streets half naked.

Sir William he, smug as a sea,
Lay all this time a snoring,
Nor dream'd of harm as he lay warm,
In bed with Mrs. L——g.

Now in a fright, he starts upright,
Awaked by such a clatter;
He rubs both eyes, and boldly cries,
For God's sake, what's the matter?

* Captain Hawthorne was wounded in the head by a musket ball. His ship was called "The Fair American."

At his bed-side he then cry'd,
Sir Erskine at command, sir,
Upon one foot, he had one boot,
And th' other in his hand, sir.

"Arise, arise, Sir Erskine cries,
The rebels—more's the pity,
Without a boat, are all about
And rang'd before the city.

"The motley crew, in vessels new,
With Satan for their guide, sir;
Pack'd up in bags, or wooden kegs,
Come driving down the tide, sir.

"Therefore prepare for bloody war,
These kegs must all be routed,
Or surely we despoiled shall be,
And British courage doubted."

The royal band, now ready stand
All ranged in dread array, sir;
With stomach stout to see it out,
And make a bloody day, sir.

The cannons roar from shore to shore,
The small arms make a rattle;
Since war's began I'm sure no man
E'er saw so strange a battle.

The rebel dales, the rebel vales,
With rebel trees surrounded;
The distant wood, the hills and floods,
With rebel echoes sounded.

The flash below swam to and fro,
Attack'd from every quarter;
Why sure, thought they, the devil's to pay
'Mongst folks above the water.

The kegs, 't is said, though strongly made,
Of rebel staves and hoops, sir;
Could not oppose their powerful foes,
The conquering British troops, sir.

From morn to night these men of might Display'd amazing courage;
And when the sun was fairly down
Retired to sup their porrage.

An hundred men with each a pen,
Or more upon my word sir,
It is most true would be too few,
Their valour to record, sir.

Such feats did they perform that day,
Against these wicked kegs, sir,
That years to come, if they get home,
They'll make their boasts and brags, sir.

We give but one other specimen of the minstrelsy of the revolution: American Taxation, written by a schoolmaster of Connecticut, named St. John. We know of nothing produced in this country at so early a period that is equal to it:

AMERICAN TAXATION.

While I relate my story,
Americans give ear;
Of Britain's fading glory,
You presently shall hear;
'I give a true relation,
Attend to what I say,
Concerning the taxation
Of North America.

The cruel lords of Britain,
Who glory in their shams,
The project they have hit on
They joyfully proclaim;
'Tis what they're striving after,
Our right to take away,
And rob us of our charter
In North America.

There are two mighty speakers,
Who rule in Parliament,
Who ever have been seeking
Some mischief to invent;
'Twas North, and Bute his father,
The horrid plan did lay,
A mighty tax to gather
In North America.

They search'd the gloomy regions
Of the infernal pit,
To find among their legions
One who excell'd in wit;
To ask of him assistance,
Or tell them how they may Subdue without resistance
This North America.

Old Satan, the arch traitor,
Who rules the burning lake,
Where he's chief navigator,
Resolved a voyage to take.
For the Britannie ocean
He launches far away,
To land he had no notion
In North America.

He takes his seat in Britain,
It was his soul's intent,
Great George's throne to sit on,
And rule the Parliament;
His comrades were pursuing
A diabolic way,
For to complete the ruin
Of North America.

He tried the art of magic
To bring his schemes about,
At length the gloomy project
He artfully found out:
The plan was long indulg'd
In a clandestine way,
But fatefully was divulg'd
In North America.

These subtle arch-combiners
Address'd the British court,
All three were undersigners
Of this obscure report—
There is a pleasant landscape
That lieth far away,
Beyond the wide Atlantic,
In North America.

There is a wealthy people,
Who sojourn in that land,
Their churches all with steeples
Most delicately stand,
Their houses, like the gilly,
Are painted red and gay;
They flourish like the lily,
In North America.

Their land with milk and honey
Continually doth flow,
The want of food or money
They seldom ever know;
They heap up golden treasure,
They have no debts to pay,
They spend their time in pleasure,
In North America.

On turkeys, fowls, and fishes,
Most frequently they dine,
With gold and silver dishes
Their tables always shine,
They crown their feasts with butter,
They eat and rise to play,
In silks their ladies flutter,
In North America.

With gold and silver laces
They do themselves adorn,
The rubies deck their faces,
Refulgent as the morn!
Wine sparkles in their glasses,
They spend each happy day
In merriment and dances,
In North America.

Let not our suit affront you,
When we address your throne,
O king, this wealthy country
And subjects are your own,
And you, their rightful sovereign,
They truly must obey,
You have a right to govern
This North America.

O king, you've heard the sequel
Of what we now subscribe,
Is it not just and equal
To tax this wealthy tribe?
The question being asked,
His majesty did say,
My subjects shall be taxed
In North America.

Invested with a warrant,
My publicans shall go,
The tenth of all their current
They surely shall bestow;
If they indulge rebellion,
Or from my precepts stray,
I'll send my war battalion
To North America.

I'll rally all my forces
By water and by land,
My light dragoons and horses
Shall go at my command,
I'll burn both town and city,
With smoke becloud the day,
I'll show no human pity
For North America.

Go on, my hearty soldiers,
You need not fear of ill—
There's Hutchinson and Rogers,
Their functions will fulfil—
They tell such ample stories,
Believe them sure we may,
One half of them are tories
In North America.

My gallant ships are ready
To hoist you o'er the flood,
And in my cause be steady,
Which is supremely good;
Go ravage, steal, and plunder,
And you shall have the prey
They quickly will knock under
In North America.

The laws I have enacted,
I never will revoke,
Although they are neglected,
My fury to provoke,
I will forbear to flatter,
I'll rule the mighty sway,
I'll take away the charter
From North America.

O George! you are distracted,
You'll by experience find
The laws you have enacted
Are of the blackest kind.
I'll make a short digression,
And tell you by the way,
We fear not your oppression,
In North America.

Our fathers were distressed,
While in their native land;
By tyrants were oppressed,
As I do understand;
From freedom and religion
They were resolved to stray,
And try the desert regions
Of North America.

Kind Heaven was their protector
While on the roaring tide,
Kind fortune their director,
And Providence their guide;
If I am not mistaken,
About the first of May,
This voyage was undertaken
For North America.

To sail they were commanded
About the hour of noon,
At Plymouth shore they landed,
The twenty-first of June;
The savages were nettled,
With fear they fled away,
So peaceably they settled
On North America.

We are their bold descendants,
For liberty we'll fight,
The claim to independence
We challenge as our right;
'Tis what kind Heaven gave us,
Who can it take away?
O, Heaven, hure, will save us,
In North America.

We never will knock under,
O, George, we do not fear
The rattling of your thunder,
Nor lightning of your spear:
Though rebels you declare us,
We're strangers to dismay;
Therefore you cannot scare us,
In North America.

We have a bold commander,
Who fears not sword nor gun,
The second Alexander,
His name is Washington;
His men are all collected,
And ready for the fray,
To fight they are directed
For North America.

We've Greene and Gates and Putnam
To manage in the field,
A gallant train of footmen,
Who'd rather die than yield;
A stately troop of horsemen,
Trained in a martial way,
For to augment our forces
In North America.

Proud George, you are engaged
All in a dirty cause,
A cruel war have waged
Repugnant to all laws.
Go tell the savage nations
You're crueler than they,
To fight your own relations
In North America.

Ten millions you've expended,
And twice ten millions more;
Our riches, you intended
Should pay the mighty score.
Who now will stand your sponsor,
Your charges to defray?
For sure you cannot conquer
This North America.

I'll tell you, George, in metre,
If you'll attend awhile:
We forced your bold Sir Peter
From Sullivan's fair isle,
At Monmouth too we gained
The honours of the day—
The victory we obtained
For North America.

Surely we were your betters
Hard by the Brandywine;
We laid him fast in fetters
Whose name was John Burgoyne;
We made your Howe to tremble
With terror and dismay;
True heroes we resemble,
In North America.

Confusion to the Tories,
That black infernal name,
In which Great Britain glories,
For ever to her shame;
We'll send each foul revoler
To smutty Africa,
Or noose him in a halter,
In North America.

A health to our brave footmen,
Who handle sword and gun,
To Greene and Gates and Putnam
And conquering Washington;
Their names be wrote in letters
Which never will decay,
While sun and moon do glitter
On North America.

Success unto our allies
In Holland, France and Spain,
Who man their ships and galleys,
Our freedom to maintain;
May they subdue the rangers
Of proud Britannia,
And drive them from their anchors
In North America.

Success unto the Congress
Of these United States,
Who glory in the conquests
Of Washington and Gates;
To all, both land and seamen,
Who usher in the day,
When we shall all be freemen
In North America.

Success to legislation,
That rules with gentle hand,
To trade and navigation,
By water and by land;
May all with one opinion
Our wholesome laws obey,
Throughout this vast dominion
Of North America.

The "old and antique songs" we have quoted are not eminently poetical, and the fastidious reader may fancy there are in some of them qualities that should have prevented their publication. We appeal to the antiquaries. The "Cow Chase" will live long after the light airs and recollected terms

Of these most brisk and giddy-paced times are forgotten, and, with other songs and ballads of our Revolution, will in the next century be prized more highly than the richest gems of Percy or Motherwell. They are the very mirrors of the times in which they were sung. As may have been observed, we have given none of the lyrics of Freedom. Free, daring, honest, and with sarcastic powers which made his pen as terrible to the Tories and the British officers as that of Coleridge was to Napoleon, he did as good service to the great cause from his obscure printing office, as many a more celebrated patriot did in camp or legislature. The energy and exultation with which he recounted, in rapidly written songs, the successes of the Whigs, were equaled only by the keenness of his wit, and the appositeness of his humour. Nor was it in satire and song alone that he excelled. Though we claim not for him, superior as he was to his American contemporaries, the praise due to a true poet, some of his pieces are distinguished for a directness of expression, a manliness, fervour, and fine poetical feeling, that will secure for them a permanent place in our literature. Yet Freneau—the patriot, poet, soldier—died miserably poor, within the last ten years, while the national legislature was anxiously debating what should be done with the “surplus money in the treasury.”

MATHER BYLES AND JOSEPH GREEN.

THE facetious MATHER BYLES was in his time equally famous as a poet and a wit. A contemporary bard exclaims—

Would but Apollo's genial touch inspire
Such sounds as breathe from Byles's warbling lyre,
Then might my notes in melting measures flow,
And make all nature wear the signs of woe.

And his humour is celebrated in a poetical account of the clergy of Boston, quoted by Mr. Samuel Kettell, in his “Specimens of American Poetry,”—

There's punning Byles, provokes our smiles,
A man of stately parts.
He whits folks to crack his jokes,
Which never mend their hearts.

With strutting gait, and wig so great,
He walks along the streets,
And throws out wit, or what's like it,
To every one he meets.

Byles was graduated at Cambridge in 1725, and was ordained the first minister of the church in Hollis street, in 1732. He soon became eminent as a preacher, and the King's College at Aberdeen conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Divinity. He was one of the authors of “A Collection of Poems by several Hands,” which appeared in 1744, and of numerous essays and metrical compositions in “The New England Weekly Journal,” the merit of which was such as to introduce him to the notice of Pope and other English scholars. One of his poems is entitled “The Conflagration;” and is “applied to that grand catastrophe of our world when the face of nature is to be changed by a deluge of fire.” The following lines show its style—

Yet shall ye, flames, the wasting globe refine,
And bid the skies with purer splendour shine.
The earth, which the prolific fire consumes,
To beauty burns, and withers into bloom;
Improving in the fertile flame it lies,
Fades into form, and into vigour dies:
Fresh-dawning glories blush amidst the blaze,
And nature all renews her flowery face.
With endless charms the everlasting year
Rolls round the seasons in a full career;
Spring, ever-blooming, bids the fields rejoice;
And warbling birds try their melodious voice;
Where'er she treads, lilies unbidden blow,
Quick talips rise and sudden roses glow:

6*

Her pencil paints a thousand beauteous scenes
Where blossoms bud amid immortal greens;
Each stream, in mazes, murmurs as it flows,
And floating forests gently bend their boughs.
Thou, autumn, too, sit'st in the fragrant shade,
While the ripe fruits blush all around thy head:
And lavish nature, with luxuriant hands,
All the soft months in gay confusion blends.

Byles was earnestly opposed to the Revolution, and in the spring of 1777, was denounced in the public assemblies as a tory, and compelled to give bonds for his appearance before a court for trial. In the following June he was convicted of treasonable conversation, and hostility to the country, and sentenced to be imprisoned forty days on board a guard-ship, and at the end of that period to be sent with his family to England. The board of war, however, took his case into consideration, and commuted the punishment to a short confinement under a guard in his own house; but, though he continued to reside in Boston during the remainder of his life, he never again entered a pulpit, nor regained his ante-revolutionary popularity. He died in 1788, in the eighty-second year of his age.

He was a favourite in every social or convivial circle, and no one was more fond of his society than the colonial governor, Belcher, on the death of whose wife he wrote an elegy ending with—

Meantime my name to thine allied shall stand,
Still our warm friendship, mutual flames extend;
The muse shall so survive from age to age,
And Belcher's name protect his Byles's page.

The doctor had declined an invitation to visit with the governor the province of Maine, and Belcher resorted to a stratagem to secure his company. Having persuaded him to drink tea with him on board the Scarborough ship of war, one Sunday afternoon, as soon as they were seated at the table the anchor was weighed, the sails set, and before the punning parson had called for his last cup, the ship was too far at sea for him to think of returning to the shore. As every thing necessary for his comfort had been thoughtfully provided, he was easily reconciled to the voyage. While making preparations for religious services, the next Sunday, it was discovered that there was no hymn book on board, and he wrote the following lines, which were sung instead of a selection from Sternhold and Hopkins—

Great God, thy works our wonder raise;
To thee our swelling notes belong
While skies and winds, and rocks and seas,
Around shall echo to our song.

Thy power produced this mighty frame,
Aloud to thee the tempests roar,
Or softer breezes tune thy name
Gently along the shelly shore.

Round thee the scaly nation roves,
Thy opening hands their joys bestow,
Through all the blushing coral groves,
These silent gay retreats below.

See the broad sun forsake the skies,
Glow on the waves, and downward glide;
Anon heaven opens all its eyes,
And star-beams tremble o'er the tide.

Each various scene, or day or night,
Lord! points to thee our mourner's soul;
The glories fix our whole delight:
So the touch'd needle courts the pole.

JOSEPH GREEN, a merchant of Boston, who had been a classmate of Byles at Cambridge, was little less celebrated than the doctor for humour; and some of his poetical compositions were as popular ninety years ago as in our own time have been those of "Croker & Co.," which they resemble in spirit and playful ease of versification. The abduction of the Hellis street minister was the cause of not a little merriment in Boston; and Green, between whom and Byles there was some rivalry, as the leaders of opposing social factions, soon after wrote a burlesque account of it—

In David's Psalms an oversight
Byles found one morning at his tea,
Alas! that he should never write
A proper psalm to sing at sea.

Thus ruminating on his seat,
Ambitious thoughts at length prevail'd;
The bard determined to complete
The part wherein the prophet fall'd.

He sat awhile and stroked his muse,*
Then taking up his tuneful pen,
Wrote a few stanzas for the use
Of his seafaring bretheren.

The task perform'd, the bard content,
Well chosen was each flowing word;
On a short voyage himself he went,
To hear it read and sung on board.

Most serious Christians do aver,
(Their credit sure we may rely on,)
In former times that after prayer,
They used to sing a song of Zion.

Our modern parson having pray'd,
Unless loud fame our faith beguiles,
Sat down, took out his book and said,
"Let's sing a psalm of Mather Byles."

At first, when he began to read,
Their heads the assembly downward hung,
But he with boldness did proceed,
And thus he read, and thus they sung.

THE PSALM.

With vast amazement we survey
The wonders of the deep,
Where mackerel swim, and porpoise play,
And crabs and lobsters creep.

Fish of all kinds inhabit here,
And throng the dark abode.
Here haddock, hake, and flounders are,
And eels, and perch, and cod.

From raging winds and tempests free,
So smoothly as we pass,
The shining surface seems to be
A piece of Bristol glass.

But when the winds and tempest rise,
And foaming billows swell,
The vessel mounts above the skies
And lower sinks than hell.

Our heads the tottering motion feel,
And quickly we become
Giddy as new-dropp'd calves, and reel
Like Indians drunk with rum.

What praises then are due that we Thus far have safely got,
Amarecoggin tribe to see,
And tribe of Penobscot.

In 1750 Green published "An Entertainment for a Winter Evening," in which he ridicules the freemasons; and afterward, "The Sand Bank," "A True Account of the Celebration of St. John the Baptist,"

* Byles's favourite cat, so named by his friends.

and several shorter pieces, all of which I believe were satirical. His epigrams are the best written in this country before the Revolution; and many anecdotes are told to show the readiness of his wit and his skill as an improvisator. On one occasion, a country gentleman, knowing his reputation as a poet, procured an introduction to him, and solicited a "first rate epiph" for a favourite servant who had lately died. Green asked what were the man's chief qualities, and was told that "Cole excelled in all things, but was particularly good at raking hay, which he could do faster than anybody, the present company, of course, excepted." Green wrote immediately—

Here lies the body of John Cole,
His master loved him like his soul;
He could rake hay, none could rake faster
Except that raking dog, his master.

In his old age Green left Boston for England, rather from the infirmities of age, than from indifference to the cause of liberty.

EDWARD RANDOLPH.

EDWARD RANDOLPH, says Moore, was called the "evil genius" of New England, and was the most inveterate and indefatigable of those intriguing men who found access to the royal ear of Charles II., with complaints against the colonies. On this mischievous business, he made no less than eight voyages in nine years across the Atlantic. In 1676, he was sent over by royal authority to inquire into the state of the colonies. He brought with him copies of the petitions of Mason and Gorges relative to their patent of New Hampshire, the limits of which interfered with the grants to Massachusetts.

While he was in Boston, he represented that the province was refractory, and disobedient to the requisitions of the crown. He was zealous to promote the cause of episcopacy, and to destroy the New England churches; and he was the principal instrument of depriving the inhabitants of Massachusetts of their charter privileges, the people against whom he had conceived a most violent antipathy. When the charter was taken away, and James II. succeeded to the crown, the king appointed a council to govern the province, of which Dudley was president, and Randolph was one named in the commission. The next year, Sir Edmund Andros arrived with a commission to be governor of New England. Randolph was a conspicuous character during his short administration, and involved in his fate. How much the people were exasperated against him, appears by their refusing him bail when he applied, and when it was granted to others. The house of representatives, June 23, 1688, voted "that Mr. E. Randolph is not bailable, he having broken a capital law of the colony, in endeavouring and accomplishing the subversion of our government, and having been an evil counsellor." Randolph died in the West Indies. It was said, that he always retained his prejudices against the churches and people of Massachusetts. On the other hand, the inhabitants of that province, who once held him in abhorrence, regarded him and his reproaches with the utmost contempt.

From a letter of Randolph to Governor Winslow, written January 29, 1679,* published in the Collections of the Mass. Hist. Soc. vol. vi, p. 92, it appears that he had just returned from New Hampshire, where he

* The date ought undoubtedly to be 1680 remained from the 27th December to the 22d of January. In this letter he gives some account of the establishment of the royal government in this province under President Cutts, and also alludes to his reception at Boston. He says, "I am received at Boston more like a spy, than one of his majesty's servants. They kept a day of thanks for the return of their agents; but have prepared a welcome for me, by a paper of scandalous verses, all persons taking liberty to abuse me in their discourses, of which I take the more notice, because it so much reflects upon my master, who will not forget it."

"RANDOLPH'S WELCOME BACK AGAIN."

Welcome, Sir, welcome from ye easterne shore
With a commission stronger than before
To play the horse-leach: robb us of our fleeces,
To rend our land, and teare it all to pieces.
Welcome now back againe; as is the whip
To a ffoole's back; as water in a ship.
Boston make room, Randolph's return'd, that hector,
Confirm'd at home to be ye sharp Collector;
Whoe shortly will present unto yr viewes
The greates broad scale, that will you all amuse,
In welcome tidings, and unhappy newes. }
New England is a very loyall shrubb
That looses her Sovereigne, hates a Betsetub,
That's willing (let it to her praise be spoken)
To doe obedience to the Royall Oake,
To pay the Tribute that to it belongs,
For shielding her, from injuries and wrongs:
But you the Agent, Sir, she cannot brook,
He likes the meate, but can't abide the cook.
Alas, shes would haue Caesar haue his due,
But not by such a wicked hand as you:
For an acknowledgement of Right, wee scorne
To pay to our greates Lord a pepper-corne
(To haulke the tearmes of our most gracious deed
But would ten thousand times the same exceed.

Some call you Randall—Rend-all I you name,
See you'l appear before you've played yr game.
Is that keeps a Plantacon, Custome-house,
One year, may bee a man, the next a mouse.
For brother Dyer bath the Divell play'd,
Made the New-Yorkers at the first affraide,
He vapour'd, swagger'd, hector'd, (whoe but he?)
But soon destroy'd himself by villanie.
Well might his curst name with D begin,
Whoe was a Divell in his hart for sin,
And currantly did passe, by common vogue,
For the doocstfull'st wretch and greatest rogue.
By him you'r furnish't with a sad example—
Take heed that those you crush don't on you trample.
We verriy believe we are not bound
To pay one mite to you, much less a pound.
If there were need New-England you must know,
Fifty p. cent we'd on our King bestow,
And not begrutch the offering, shes see franck,
But hates to pay where she will have no thanks.

We doe presume Secundus Carrolus Rex
Kent you not here a countrye's heart to vex.
See gives an Inch of power; you take an ell.
Should it be knowne, he would not like it well.
If you do understand yr occupation,
Fis to keep acts of trade from violation.
If merchants in their traffique will be faire,
You must, Camelion-like, live on the aire.
Should they not trade to Holland, Spain, and Ffrance,
Directly you must seeke for maintenance.
The custome and the fees will scarce supply
Helly and back. What's left for's Majesty?
What you collect won't make you to look bigg
With modish nick-nacks, dagger, perriwig;

A courtier's garbe too costly you will see
To be maintain'd where is noe gift nor fee.
Pull downe the mill, rente the ground, you'l finde
That very few will come to you to grinde.
Merchants their corne will alwayes carry there,
Where the tole's easy, and the charge faire.
Wee'll kneele to the mill owner, as our cheife;
But doe not like the miller; he's a theife
And entertaine him not with joy, but greife. }

When Heaven would Job's signall patience try,
He gave Hell leave to plott his misery,
And act it too according to it's will.
With this exco'tion, don't his body kill.
See Royall Charles is now about to proue
Our Loyalty, A legiance, and Love,
In giving Licence to a Publican,
To pinch the purse, but not to hurt the man.
Patience raised Job unto the height of flame,
Lett our obedience doe for us the same.

PETER FOULGER.

PETER FOULGER was a schoolmaster of Nantucket, and the maternal grandfather of Doctor Franklin. In 1676 he published a poem entitled "A Looking-glass for the Times," addressed to men in authority, in which he advocates religious liberty, and implores the government to repeal the uncharitable laws against the Quakers and other sects. He says—

The rulers in the country
I do owne them in the Lord;
And such as are for government,
With them I do accord.
But that which I intend hereby,
Is that they would keep bound;
And meddle not with God's worship,
For which they have no ground.
And I am not alone herein,
There's many hundreds more,
That have for many years ago
Spoke much more upon that score.
Indeed, I really believe,
It's not your business,
To meddle with the church of God
In matters more or less.

In another part of his "Looking-Glass" he says—

Now loving friends and countrymen
I wish we may be wise;
'Tis now a time for every man
To see with his own eyes.
'Tis easy to provoke the Lord
To send among us war;
'Tis easy to do violence,
To envy and to jar;
To show a spirit that is high;
To scorn and domineer;
To pride it out as if there were
No God to make us fear;
To covet what is not our own;
To cheat and to oppress;
To live a life that might free us
From acts of righteousness;
To swear, and lie, and to be drunk
To backbite one another;
To carry tales that may do hurt
And mischief to our brother;
To live in such hypocrisy,
As men may think us good,
Although our hearts within are full
Of evil and of blood.
All these, and many evils more,
Are easy for to do;
But to repent and to reform
We have no strength thereto.

The following are the concluding lines:

I am for peace, and not for war,
And that's the reason why
I write more plain than some men do,
That use to daub and lie.
But I shall cease, and set my name
To what I here insert:
Because, to be a libeller,
I hate it with my heart.
From Sherbontown, where now I dwell,
My name I do put here,
Without offence, your real friend,
It is PETER FOULGER.

MICHAEL WIGGLESWORTH.

THE Reverend MICHAEL WIGGLESWORTH was born in 1631, and graduated at Harvard College soon after entering upon his twentieth year. When rendered unable to preach, by an affection of the lungs,

In costly verse and most laborious rhymes,
He dish'd up truths right worthy our regard.

His principal work, "The Day of Doom, or a Poetical Description of the Great and Last Judgment, with a Short Discourse about Eternity," passed through six editions in this country, and was reprinted in London. A few verses will show its style—

Still was the night, serene and bright,
When all men sleeping lay;
Calm was the season, and carnal reason
Thought so't would last for aye.
Soul, take thine ease, let sorrow cease,
Much good thou hast in store;
This was their song their cups among,
The evening before.

After the "sheep" have received their reward, the several classes of "goats" are arraigned before the judgment-seat, and, in turn, begin to excuse themselves. When the infants object to damnation on the ground that

Adam is set free
And saved from his trespass,
Whose sinful fall hath split them all,
And brought them to this pass,— the puritan theologist does not sustain his doctrine very well, nor quite to his own satisfaction even; and the judge, admitting the palliating circumstances, decides that although in bliss

They may not hope to dwell,
Still unto them He will allow
The easiest room in hell.

At length the general sentence is pronounced, and the condemned begin to wring their hands, their caitiff hands,

And gnash their teeth for terror;
They cry, they roar for anguish sore,
And gnaw their tongues for horror.
But get away without delay,
Christ pities not your cry:
Depart to hell, there may ye yell,
And roar eternally.

Wigglesworth died in 1705.

AN AMERICAN GOVERNOR OPPOSED TO EDUCATION.

It has been the general policy of the American States to encourage the education of their children by all practicable means, but among their rulers there have been some who saw in the ignorance of the people the sweet foundation of power. One remarkable instance of this is worthy of being particularly noted. Sixty-four years after the first settlement of Virginia, Sir William Berkely, then governor of that province, in an official communication to the lords of the colony, observed, "I thank God, that there are no free-schools nor printing-presses here; and I hope that we shall not have them here these hundred years; for learning has brought disobedience, and heresy, and sects into the world, and printing hath divulged them in black against the best governments. God keep us free both."

Within a few years past, a man of a similar spirit, who represented a portion of Virginia in Congress, gave God thanks that in his district there were published no newspapers. Such a suspicion had been in the public mind from the time of the member's election.

THE FIRST AMERICAN DRAMATIC WRITER.

THOMAS GODFREY of Philadelphia has been called "the first American dramatic poet," but I believe a play superior to "The Prince of Parthia" had been composed by some students at Cambridge before his time. Godfrey was a son of the inventor of the quadrant claimed in England by Hadley. He was a lieutenant in the expedition against Fort Du Quene in 1759, and on the disbanding of the colonial forces went to New Providence, and afterward to North Carolina, where he died, on the third of August, 1763, in the twenty-seventh year of his age. His poems were published in Philadelphia in 1765, in a quarto volume of two hundred and thirty pages. "The Prince of Parthia, a Tragedy," contains a few vigorous passages, but not enough to save it from condemnation as the most worthless composition in the dramatic form that has been printed in America. The following lines from the fifth act, might pass for respectable prose—

O may he never know a father's fondness,
Or know it to his sorrow; may his hopes
Of joy be cut like mine, and his short life
Be one continued tempest. If he lives,
Let him be cursed with jealousy and fear:
May torturing Hope present the flowing cup,
Then, hasty, snatch it from his eager thirst,
And, when he dies, base treachery be the means.

The "Court of Fancy," a poem in the heroic measure, is superior to his tragedy in its diction, but has little originality of thought or illustration.

JAMES RALPH.

THE only American immortalized in "The Dunciad" was JAMES RALPH, who went to England with Franklin. Pope exclaims—

Silence, ye wolves! while Ralph to Cynthia howls,
And makes night hideous; answer him, ye owls!

Ralph wrote a long "poem" entitled "Zembla, or the Love of Liberty," which appeared in London in 1729; "Night," and "Sawney," a satire, in which I suppose he attempted to repay the debt he owed to Pope, as it is but an abusive tirade against that poet and his friends. I quote a few lines from "Zembla."

Tiascala's vaunt, great Zagnar's martial aim,
Extended on the rack, no more complains
That realms are wanting to employ his sword
But, circled with innumerable ghosts,
Who print their keenest vengeance on his soul,
For all the wrongs, and slaughters of his reign,
Howls out repentance to the deafen'd skies,
And shakes hell's concave with continual groans.

AUTHORSHIP OF THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

THOMAS JEFFERSON desired it to be recorded on his account that he was the "author of the Declaration of American Independence." Since his death, much discussion has been produced by the fact that many expressions in this celebrated document have been found to be identical with the language used in the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence," a paper of earlier date, and it is conceded that the resemblances between the two instruments are not accidental. In 1819, John Adams found a copy of the Mecklenburg Declaration in the "Essex Register;" into which gazette it had been copied from the "Raleigh Register;" and perceiving its similarity to the Congressional Declaration, and that it purported to be an older document, he inclosed it to Mr. Jefferson, with whom he was then in frequent correspondence. The Sage of Monticello" replied to Mr. Adams, informing him that he did not believe the paper to be authentic. "I believe it to be spurious," he says: "I deem it very unjustifiable quiz." "Nor do I affirm positively at this paper is a fabrication, because the proof of a forgery can only be presumptive; but I shall believe such until positive and solemn proof of its authenticity shall be produced." The document is as follows:

THE MECKLENBURG DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

(20th of May, 1775.)

"That whosoever directly or indirectly abets, or in any way, form, or manner, countenances the unchartered and dangerous invasion of our rights, as claimed by Great Britain, is an enemy to this country, to America, and to the herent and undeniable rights of man.

"That we, the citizens of Mecklenburg county, do hereby dissolve the political bands which have connected us with our mother country, and hereby absolve ourselves from all allegiance to the British crown, and abjure all political connection, contract, or association with that nation, who we wantonly trampled on our rights and liberties, and humanely shed the blood of American patriots at Lexington.

"That we do hereby declare ourselves a free and independent people; are, and of right ought to be, a sovereign self-governing association, under the control of no power other than that of our God, and the general government Congress; to the maintenance of which independence, we solemnly pledge to each other, our mutual co-operation, lives, our fortunes, and our most sacred honour.

"That as we acknowledge the existence and control of law nor legal officer, civil or military, within this county we do hereby ordain and adopt as a rule of life, all the laws, and every of our former laws; wherein, nevertheless, the crown of Great Britain never can be considered as holding rights, privileges, immunities, or authority therein.

"That it is further decreed, that all, each, and every military officer in this county, is hereby reinstated in his former command and authority, he acting conformably to the regulations. And that every member present of this declaration shall henceforth be a civil officer, viz., a justice of the peace, in the character of a committee man, to issue process, hear, and determine all matters of controversy, according to said adopted laws; and to preserve peace, union, and harmony in said county, and to use every exertion to extend the love of country and fire of freedom throughout America, until a more general and organized government established in this province.

"ABRAHAM ALEXANDER, Chairman.

"JOHN M'KNITT ALEXANDER, Secretary."

The letter of Mr. Jefferson having been published, the Legislature of North Carolina, influenced by a natural state-pride, made a thorough investigation of all the facts connected with the Mecklenburg Declaration, the result of which was the establishment of the authenticity of that document by the most conclusive testimony. Professor Tucker, in his Life of Jefferson, is forced to admit that there is a plagiarism in the case, but decides that Mr. Jefferson could not be the plagiarist. He does not deny that on the 20th of May, 1775, the citizens of Mecklenburg county, North Carolina, made some sort of a Declaration of Independence, but he contends that it was not in the words of the instrument now published; and that the second and third paragraphs or resolves which this contains are interpolations, copied from Mr. Jefferson's Declaration after the 4th of July, 1776. This position of Professor Tucker has been overthrown, and the perfect authenticity of the Mecklenburg document so conclusively and satisfactorily established, that it is unnecessary at this time to enter into any discussion of that point. We now give the Declaration of Independence as written by Mr. Jefferson, with passages from the other documents to which it bears any resemblance, from an article in the New York Review, written soon after the appearance of Professor Tucker's Memoir, by the Rev. Dr. Hawkes—

The Declaration of Independence. Documents resembling the Declaration, as drawn by Mr. Jefferson.

When in the course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the powers of the earth the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and of nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to that separation.

We hold these truths self-evident; that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with inherent and inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it, and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to effect their safety and happiness. Prudence, indeed, will dictate that governments long established, should not be changed for light and transient causes; and accordingly that all men are by nature created equal; that they are equally free and independent, and have certain inherent rights"—namely, the enjoyment of life and liberty,"—"and pursuing and obtaining suit of happiness; that to happiness and safety."—"Virginia declaration of Rights, secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it, and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to effect their safety and happiness. Prudence, indeed, will dictate that governments long established, should not be changed for light and transient causes; and accordingly posed to suffer while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, begun at a distinguished period, and pursuing invariably the same object, evinces a design to reduce them under absolute despotism: it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such government, and to provide new guards for their future security. Such has been the patient sufferance of these colonies; and such is now the necessity which constrains them to expunge their former systems of government. The history of the present king of Great Britain is a history of unremitting injuries and usurpations, among which appears no solitary fact to contradict the uniform tenor of the rest, but all have in direct object, the establishment of an absolute tyranny over these states. To prove this, let facts be submitted to a candid world, for the truth of which we pledge a faith yet unshaken by falsehood.

He has abdicated government here, withdrawing his authority, and declaring us free and independent states.

He has abdicated government here, withdrawing his authority, and declaring us free and independent states.

He has plundered our seas, ravaged our coasts, burnt our towns, and destroyed the lives of our people.

He is at this time transporting large armies of foreign mercenaries to complete the works of death, desolation and tyranny, already begun, with circumstances of cruelty and perfidy unexampled in the annals of civilized nations.

He has constrained our fellow-citizens taken captive on board ships to bear arms against their country, to become the executioners of their friends and brethren, or fall themselves by their hands.

He has endeavoured to bring upon the inhabitants of our frontiers the merciless Indian savages, whose known rule of warfare is an undistinguished destruction of all ages, sexes, and conditions of men.

Then follow two clauses adopted by the Committee, relative to exciting "treasonable insurrections of our fellow-citizens," and the "trade." The first of these is in these words: "He has incited treasonable insurrections of our fellow-citizens, with the allurements of forfeiture and confiscation of property."

At every stage of these operations, we have petitioned; and we have petitioned for redress in the most humble manner; but our repeated petitions have been answered by repeated injuries. The prince whose character has marked by every act which may define a tyrant, is unfit to be the ruler of a people who mean to be free. [The residue of this paragraph was not adopted by the Committee.]

Nor have we been wanting in attentions to our British brethren. We have warned them from time to time of attempts by their legislature to extend jurisdiction over these our States. We have reminded them of the circumstances of our emigration and settlement here; we appealed to their native justice and magnanimity, [as well as to] the ties of our common kindred, to disavow these usurpations which [were likely to] interrupt our connection and correspondence. They too have been deaf to the voice of justice and conciliatory. We must therefore acquiesce in the necessity which denounces our [eternal] separation, and hold them as we hold the rest of mankind, enemies in war, in peace, friends.

We therefore, the Representatives of the United States of America, in General Congress assembled, do hereby declare that the thirteen united States of America, from that time forth, be and they shall be free and independent States; that they shall have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and to do all other acts and things which independent States may of right do.

And for the support of this declaration, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honour.

Every instrument from which a quotation is made in the column of resemblances it should be remarked, purports to be of earlier date than the declaration of independence. Thus the Virginia declaration of rights was adopted June 12th, 1776.* The Constitution of Virginia was adopted June 29, 1776.† Governor Jay's address to the people of England was written and published in September, 1774.* Judge Drayton's charge was delivered on the 23d of April, 1776, and published in May of the same year.† And the declaration by the citizens of Mecklenburg county in North Carolina, was made on the 20th of May, 1775.‡

An attempt has been made to show that the Constitution of Virginia, or more properly, the List of Grievances prefixed to that Document, was written by Mr. Jefferson, but there is no proof of this. Mr. Tucker says it was written by Mr. Jefferson, in Philadelphia, and forwarded to Mr. Wythe in Virginia. But on the 11th of August, 1775, Mr. Jefferson was elected a delegate to Congress for one year, by the convention of Virginia,§ and on the 20th of June, 1776, was re-elected for another year.|| The Journals, shew us that George Wythe, also, was elected with Mr. Jefferson, on both the occasions referred to; and as the list of members in the Virginia convention presents us with the name, at one time, of Mr. Edmund Randolph; and at another, of Mr. Prentiss, sitting for Mr. Wythe, we infer that in 1776, when the Virginia constitution was under consideration, Mr. Wythe was in Philadelphia with Mr. Jefferson, attending to his duties in Congress: if this be so, we do not perceive how this list of grievances could have been transmitted to him in Virginia. It may, indeed, have been sent to some other friend named Wythe; or the professor may have mistaken the person to whom it was sent; in which case it is plain that the original letter of Mr. Jefferson containing these grievances was not before his biographer. It may be a received opinion, in Virginia, that Mr. Jefferson furnished the list of grievances prefixed to the constitution; nor would we be understood as denying that he did so. If he did, he only borrowed very largely from himself; and it is to be lamented that he has left no explanation of the resemblance between the declaration and the charter of Virginia; while in another case, of much less moment, he has been at the pains to account for the likeness of a Virginia document, which was penned by himself, to a public paper which he prepared as a member of Congress.¶ If a letter to any one in Virginia, can be produced, from Mr. Jefferson's pen, which contains this list of grievances, and if they were thus communicated before the 29th of June, 1776, Mr. Jefferson's friends owe it to his memory, and, as Americans, they owe it also to their countrymen, to let the testimony be forthcoming. If there be no such letter in being, let inferior evidence be produced, if it exists to establish the fact that Mr. Jefferson wrote both papers. The respective dates of the papers render it important; for, unexplained by satisfactory proof, posterity may accuse Mr. Jefferson of a plagiarism more extensive than that from the Mecklenburg document. On the 15th of May, 1776, the convention of Virginia appointed the committee to prepare a declaration of rights, and a constitution; on the 27th of May, the declaration of rights was reported, and on the 11th of June, was adopted; on the 29th of June, the constitution was adopted.

¶ See Autobiography, p. 10.

On the 10th of June, Congress appointed the committee to draw the Declaration of Independence one day before the declaration of rights was adopted in Virginia; and, that this last named paper, which is not pretended he wrote, was used by Mr. Jefferson in preparing the first part of the congressional declaration, is obvious, upon a comparison of the instruments. If this were sent to him in Philadelphia by his Virginia friends, as it must have been, why not the copy of the proposed constitution, with very list of grievances, have also been sent? We learn from the journals of the Convention, that it was not that body as early as the 26th of June, for on that day it was discussed, and the committee had been employed on it from the 15th of the previous May; so that we cannot tell how long before the 26th of June it had been in existence in Virginia, if it originated there; it is certainly within the range of possibility. It was prepared before the 10th of June, when the committee on the national document was appointed to Congress; and within the range of probability, if prepared, it was sent with the declaration of rights, which we have seen was used by Mr. Jefferson. These facts render it important, to establish most emphatically the point, that Mr. Jefferson did prepare this list of grievances in Philadelphia, and did send it to Virginia some time between the 15th of May and 29th of June; and if this point be not sustained, the presumption is against his claim to the authorship.

It is not questionable that Mr. Jefferson did use from the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence whatever may be the truth in regard to the Virginia constitution, and if he did, Dr. Hawkes well asks, not his letter to Mr. Adams something more "suspectable" than a "quix?" There are not many so able to read the evidence in the case without believing Mr. Jefferson a plagiarist, and few will doubt that he knew he had used the Mecklenburg instrument when he wrote his extraordinary answer to the letter of Mr. Adams.

LORD DEXTER.

"LORD TIMOTHY DEXTER" was born in Melbury, Massachusetts, in 1743. He is said to have been industrious and ingenious when a youth, as he was foolish and fortunate in mature age. He was apprenticed by his father to a leather-dresser, and, on attaining the age of twenty-one years, embarked in the business on his own account, and for a considerable period carried it on successfully. He also amassed a large sum of money by buying depreciated notes, and selling them for their full nominal value, and by marrying a rich widow. Having secured a liberal fortune, "set up for a lord," and for many years lived in the garb of magnificence at Newburyport, where he had a splendid mansion and a fine estate. Everything about him was unique and absurd. Fifteen thousand dollars worth of wooden statues adorned his grounds; his dress was a mixture of the militia captain's and the Roman senator's; his coach was like the car of a deity; and his "literary compositions" were as odd and as stupid as he was himself. His "Fiddle the Knowing Ones, Or, Plain Truth in a Homely Dress," is a collection of proverbs, aphorisms, and observations, new and old, so wretchedly written that it is difficult to discover their meaning. It has, within a few years, however, been reprinted, and a life of the author was written by the late Samuel L. Knapp.

DEDICATIONS AND INTRODUCTORY POEMS.

MANY of the works of the early New Englanders are dedicated in "laborious rhymes" to the friends or strans of their authors, and more are commended to a reader's favourable regard in "introductory verses" by the writer's associates or admirers. We have before mentioned the "Poetical Meditations" of Roger Wolst, Governor of Connecticut, and Major General in the Expedition against Louisburg, in 1745. They were dedicated to the Rev. Timothy Edwards, in the follow-g very modest address:

TO THE REVEREND MR. TIMOTHY EDWARDS.

At sight of this, you scarcely will excuse
My broken numbers should affront your muse,
Whose single elegance outdoes the Nine,
And all their off' rings at Apollo's shrine.

But, sir, they come not to affront, but stand Trembling before your awful seat, to hear
From you their sentence that's definitive,
Whether they shall be kill'd, or saved alive.

Yet, where you censure, sir, don't make the verse
You pinn'd to Glover's venerable hearse,
The standard for their trial; nor enact
You never will acquit what's less exact.

Sir, that will never do; rules so severe
Would ever leave Apollo's altars bare,
His priests no service: all must starve together,
And fair Parnassus' verdant tops must wither.

Sure that was not the purpose or design
Of the fair sisters when they did combine
Themselves in your assistance; no, their mind
In that great work, was otherwise design'd.

They, having often to their trouble seen
Many bold poets launch on Hippocrene,
Men too that might a handsome voyage have made,
Had they but kept them to the coasting trade;

But ranging far upon those swelling seas,
Come home with broken lines and voyages;
Grieved at their losses and miscarriages,
A council met at Hippocrenides;

They vote a remedy; which to effect,
That their Herculean pillar to erect,
And, to advise adventurers once for all,
Wrote no plus ultra on its pedestal:

Since which, there's none that dare presume to go Beyond that wonder then set up by you;
No, nor attain it in their navigation:—
That sacred work is not for imitation!

Conscious of this, you see my muse ne'er soars
To Hibia's top, nor the Sentian shores;
Nor doth pretend to raptures that might suit
Pindarus' muse or great Apollo's lute.

Then weigh them candidly, and if that you Shall once pronounce a longer life their due;

And, for their patron, will yourself engage,
They may, perhaps, adventure on the stage:
But if deny'd they, blushing, back retire
To burn themselves on their own funeral pyre.

From the "copy of verses" prefixed to Wigglesworth's "Day of Doom," we have room for the following specimen only:

David's Affliction bred us many a Psalm,
From Caves, from mouth of Graves that Sinner sweet
Of tun'd his Soul-fee!-notes: For not in Calm
But storm, to write most Psalms God made him meet.
Affliction turn'd this Pen to Poetry,
Whose serious strains do here before thee lie.

This Man with many griefs Afflicted sore,
Shut up from speaking much in sickly Cave;
Thence painful seizure hath to write the more,
And send thee Counsels from mouth of the Grave.
One foot i' th' other world long, true hath been—
Read, and thou 'lt say, His heart is all therein.

Oh, happy Cave, that 's to mount Job's turn'd!
Oh, happy Prisoner that 's at liberty
To Walk through th' other World! the Bonds are burn'd
(But nothing else) in Furnace fiery.

Such Fires unfetter Saints, and set more free
Their unscorch'd Souls for Christ's sweet company.

Chear on, sweet Soul, although in briny tears
Steep is thy need, though dying every day;
Thy sheave shall joyful be, when Christ appears
To change our death and pain to life for aye.
The weepers now shall laugh; the joyful laughter
Of vain ones here, shall turn to tears hereafter.

Judge right, and his restraint is our Reproof;
The Sins of Hearers, Preachers Lips do close,
And make their Tongue to cleave unto its roof,
Which else would check and cheerful freely those
That need. But from this Eater comes some Meat,
And sweetness good from this Affliction Great.

In those vast Woods a Christian Poet Sings
(Where whilome Heathen wild are only found)
Of things to come, the last and greatest things,
Which in our Ears aloud should ever sound.

Of Judgement dread, Hell, Heaven, Eternity;
Reader, think oft, and help thy thoughts thereby.

Mather's Magnalia was accompanied by commendatory poems, in English and Latin, by nearly all the verse makers of the time. Nicholas Noyes writes "to the candid reader"—

*Heads of our tribes, whose corps are under ground,
Their names and fames in chronicles renown'd,
Begemm'd on goldenouches he hath set,
Past envy's teeth and time's corroding fret:
Of Death and malice, he brush'd off the dust,
And made a resurrection of the just:
And clear'd the land's religion of the gloom,
And copper-cuts of Alexander Ross.
He hath related academic things,
And paid their first fruits to the King of kings;
And done his Alma Mater that just favour,
To show sal gantium hath not lost its savour
He writes like an historian, and divine,
Of Churches, Synods, Faith, and Discipline.
Illustrious Providences are display'd,
Mercies and judgments are in colours laid;
Subventions wonderful by sea and land,
Themselves are assay'd by his pious hand.
The Churches' wars, and various enemies
Wild saboteurs, and wilder sectaries,
Are notify'd for them that after rise.*

The modesty of the authors of that age, we presume, rarely prevented the publication of such ingenious praises.

THE AMERICAN CADMUS.

THE invention of the Cherokee alphabet is one of the most remarkable events in the history of the Aborigines. The best account we have seen of it is by Samuel L. Knapp, who became acquainted with See-quah-yah, its author, in 1828. The English name of this celebrated Indian was George Guess. He is said to have been a half-breed, but whether he was so or not, he never associated with the whites, or spoke any language but that of the Cherokees. Prompted by his own curiosity, and urged by several literary friends, Mr. Knapp applied to See-quah-yah, through the medium of two interpreters, one a half-blood, Capt. Rodgers, and the other a full-blood chief, whose assumed English name was John Maw, to relate to him, as minutely as possible, the mental operations, and all the facts, in his discovery. He cheerfully complied with the request, and gave very deliberate and satisfactory answers to every question; and was at the same time careful to know from the interpreters if Mr. Knapp distinctly understood his answers. No stoic could have been more grave in his demeanour than was See-quah-yah; he pondered, according to the Indian custom, for a considerable time after each question, before he made his reply, and often took a whiff of his calumet, while reflecting on an answer. The substance of his communications to Mr. Knapp was as follows: That he, See-quah-yah, was now about sixty-five years old; that in early life he was gay and talkative; and although he never attempted to speak in Council but once, yet was often, from the strength of his memory, his easy colloquial powers, and ready command of his vernacular, story-teller of the convivial party. His reputation for talents of every kind gave him some distinction when he was quite young, so long ago as St. Clair's defeat. In this campaign, or some one that soon followed it, a letter was found on the person of a prisoner, which was wrongly read by him to the Indians. In some of their deliberations on this subject, the question arose among them, whether this mysterious power of the talking leaf, was the gift of the Great Spirit to the white man, or a discovery of the white man himself? Most of his companions were of the former opinion, while he as strenuously maintained the latter. This frequently became a subject of contemplation with him afterwards, as well as many other things which he knew, or had heard, that the white man could do; but he never sat down seriously to reflect on the subject, until a swelling on his knee confined him to his cabin, and which at length made him a cripple for life, by shortening the diseased leg. Deprived of the excitements of war, and the pleasures of the chase, in the long nights of his confinement, his mind was again directed to the mystery of the power of speaking by letters,—the very name of which, of course, was not to be found in his language. From the cries of wild beasts, from the talents of the mocking-bird, from the voices of his children and his companions, he knew that feelings and passions were conveyed by different sounds, from one intelligent being to another. The thought struck him to try to ascertain all the sounds in the Cherokee language. His own ear was not remarkably discriminating, and he called to his aid the more acute ears of his wife and children. He found great assistance from them. When he thought that he had distinguished all the different sounds in their language, he attempted to use pictorial signs, images of birds and beasts, to convey that sounds to others, or to mark them in his own mind. He soon dropped this method, as difficult or impossible, and tried arbitrary signs, without any regard to appearances, except such as might assist him in recollecting them, and distinguishing them from each other. At first, these signs were very numerous; and when he got so far as to think his invention was nearly accomplished, he had about two hundred characters in his alphabet. By the aid of his daughter, who seemed to enter in the genius of his labours, he reduced them, at last, to eighty-six, the number he now used. He then undertook to make these characters more comely to the eye, and succeeded. As yet he had not the knowledge of the pen as an instrument, but made his letters on a piece of bark, with a knife or nail. At the time he sent to the Indian agent, or some trader in the nation, for paper and pen. His ink was easily made from some of the bark of the forest trees, when colouring properties he had previously known; and after seeing the construction of the pen, he soon learned to make one; but at first he made it without a slit; this inconvenience was, however, quickly removed by his sagacity. His next difficulty was to make his invention known to his countrymen; for by this time he had become so abstracted from his tribe and their usual pursuits, that he was viewed with an eye of suspicion. His former companions passed his wigwam without entering it, and mentioned his name as one who was practising improper spells, for notoriety or mischievous purposes; and he seemed to think that he should have been hardly dealt with, if his docile and unambitious disposition had not been so generally acknowledged by his tribe. At length he summoned some of the most distinguished of his nation, in order to make his communication to them; and after giving them the best explanation of his principle that he could, stripping it of all supernatural influence, he proceeded to demonstrate to them, in good earnest, that he had made a discovery. His daughter, who was now his only pupil, was ordered to go out of hearing, while he requested his friends to name a word or sentiment, which he put down, and then she was called in and read it to them; then the father retired, and the daughter wrote. The Indians were wonder-struck, but not entirely satisfied. See-quah-yah then proposed, that the tribe should select several youths from among their cleverest young men, that he might communicate the mystery to them. This was at length agreed to, although there was some lurking suspicion of necromancy in the whole business. John Maw, with several others, was selected for this purpose. The tribes watched them for several months with anxiety; and when they offered themselves for examination, the feelings of all were wrought up to the highest pitch. The youths were separated from their master, and from each other, and watched with the greatest care. The uninitiated directed what the master and pupil should write to each other, and these tests were varied in such a manner, as not only to destroy their infidelity, but most firmly to fix their faith. The Indians, on this, ordered a great feast, and made See-quah-yah conspicuous at it. How nearly is man alike in every age! Pythagoras did the same on the discovery of an important principle in geometry. See-quah-yah became at once schoolmaster, professor, philosopher, and a chief. His countrymen were proud of his talents, and held him in reverence as one noured by the Great Spirit. The inventions of early men were shrouded in mystery. See-quah-yah disdained all deception. He did not stop here, but carried his discoveries to numbers. He, of course, knew nothing of Arabic digits, nor of the power of Roman numerals in the science. The Cherokees had mental numerals to one hundred, and had words for all numbers up to that; but they had no signs or characters to assist them in enumerating, adding, subtracting, multiplying, or dividing. He reflected upon this until he had created their elementary principle in his mind; and he was at first obliged to make words to express meaning, and then signs to explain it. By this process he soon had a clear conception of numbers up to a million. His great difficulty was, at the threshold, to fix the powers of his signs according to their places. When this was overcome, his next step was in adding up his different numbers in order to put down the fraction of the decimal, and give the whole number to his next place. But when Mr. Knapp saw him in Washington, he had overcome all these difficulties, and was a ready arithmetician in the fundamental rules. He adhered to all the customs of his country; and when he associated chiefs on the mission assumed our costume, he was dressed in all respects like an Indian. He was a man of varied abilities, and he passed from metaphysical and philosophical investigation to mechanical occupations with the greatest ease. The only practical mechanics he was acquainted with, were a few blacksmiths, who could make a rough tomahawk, or repair the lock of a rifle; yet he became a white and silver smith, without any instruction, and made purs and silver spoons with neatness and skill, to the great admiration of the people of the Cherokee nation. See-quah-yah had also a great taste for painting. He mixed his colours with skill; acquainting himself with all the art and science of his tribe upon the subject, he added many chemical experiments of his own, some of which were very successful. For his drawings he had no models but such as nature furnished, and he often copied nature with astonishing faithfulness. His portraits are coarse, but often spirited and correct, and he gave action, and sometimes grace, to his representations of animals. He had never seen an artist's pencil, but he made use of the hair of wild animals for his brushes. Some of his productions evinced considerable knowledge of perspective; but he could not have formed rules for this. The painters in the early ages were many years in coming to a knowledge of this part of their art; and their successors even now are more successful in the art than perfect in its principles. The manners of the American Cadmus were not easy, and his habits those of the most assiduous scholar. He understood and felt the advantages the white man had long enjoyed, of having the accumulations of every branch of knowledge, by means of a written language, while the red man could only commit his thoughts to uncertain tradition. He reasoned correctly, when he urged this to his friends as the cause why the red man had made so few advances in knowledge in comparison with us. To remedy this was his great aim.

It may not, perhaps, be known that the government of the United States had a font of types cast for his alphabet; and that a newspaper, printed partly in the Cherokee language, and partly in the English, has been established at New Echota, which is characterized by decency and good sense; and that thus many of the Cherokees are able to read both languages. Mr. Knapp, in his account of this remarkable person, mentions seeing the head chief of the Cherokees, who confirmed the statement of See-quah-yah, and added, that he was an Indian of the strictest veracity and sobriety. The western wilderness is not only to blossom like the rose; but there, man has started up, and proved that he has not degenerated since the primitive days of Cecrops, and the romantic ages of wonderful effort and god-like renown.

DR. DWIGHT AND MR. DENNIE.

DENNIE was once esteemed the finest prose writer of the United States; but were they now to make their first appearance, his essays would be thought to be but little above mediocrity. We could readily name a dozen magazines who are superior to him in style and thought. He was admired, however, and, among others, by Dr. Dwight, of whose first encounter with him the following story is related. While travelling in New Jersey, the learned President chanced to stop for a night at a stage hotel, in one of its populous towns. Late in the evening arrived also at the inn Mr. Dennie, who had the misfortune to learn from the landlord that his beds were all paired with lodgers except one occupied by the celebrated Dr. Dwight. "Show me to his apartment," exclaimed Dennie; "although I am a stranger to the reverend Doctor, perhaps I can bargain with him for my lodgings." The landlord accordingly waited on Mr. Dennie to his guest's room, and there left him to introduce himself. The Doctor, although in his night-gown, cap and slippers, and just ready to resign himself to the refreshing arms of somnus, politely requested the strange intruder to be seated. He was struck with the peculiar physiognomy of his companion, unbent his austere brow, and commenced an animated colloquy. The names of Washington, Franklin, Rittenhouse, and a host of literary and political characters for some time gave a zest and interest to their conversation, until Dwight chanced to mention the writings of Dennie. "Dennie, the editor of the Port Folio, said the Doctor in a rhapsody, "is the Addison of the United States—the father of American Belles Lettres. But, sir," continued he, "is it not astonishing, that a man of such genius, fancy and feeling, should abandon himself to the intoxicating bowl, and to bacchanalian revels?" "Sir," said Dennie, "you are mistaken: I have been intimately acquainted with Dennie for several years, and I never knew or saw him intoxicated." "Sir," says the Doctor; "you err; I have my information from a particular friend. I am confident that I am right, and that you are wrong." Dennie now ingeniously changed the conversation to the clergy, remarking, "that Doctors Abercrombie and Mason were amongst our most distinguished divines, yet that he considered Dr. Dwight, President of Yale College, the most learned theologian, the first logician, and the greatest poet that America had ever produced. But, sir," continued Dennie, "there are traits in his character unworthy so great and wise a man—of the most detestable description—he is the greatest bigot and dogmatist of the age!" "Sir," said the Doctor, "you are grossly mistaken. I am intimately acquainted with Dr. Dwight, and I know to the contrary."—"Sir," says Dennie, "you are mistaken, I have it from an intimate acquaintance of his, who I am confident would not tell an untruth." "No more slander," says the Doctor, "I am Dr. Dwight, of whom you speak?" "And I too," exclaimed Dannie, "am Mr. Dannie, of whom you spoke!" The astonishment of Dr. Dwight may be better conceived than told. Suffice it to say, they mutually shook hands, and were extremely happy in each other's acquaintance.

PRIVATE CORRESPONDENCE OF DOCTOR MAYHEW.

THE celebrated JONATHAN MAYHEW, D.D., was married at thirty-five to Miss Elizabeth Clarke, then but twenty-two. Bradford, in his life of the Doctor, gives several characteristic letters from him to Miss Clark, and to her brother, written during his courtship. They show that a studious and literary man may be susceptible of the tender passion, yet do not make this author appear quite as ridiculous as the excellent Dr. Doddridge was made to seem by the publication of some of his letters of the same kind. The first of the following is addressed to Dr. William Clark:

March 10, 1756.*

"DEAR SIR,—One Mr. Jo. Bill, has promised, by his curious art of cookery, to turn a calf's-head and pluck into a good sea-turtle for us to-day. I did not suppose that you have any particular love of such sort of food, and hope I have not myself. However, this metamorphosed calf's-head may possibly be a curiosity to you; and if you will come and partake of it with me, you will have the pleasure of Mr. Quincy's company, who may at present, perhaps, find no inconvenience from such a diet.

"Yours most affectionately,

"J. MAYHEW.

"P. S. I was going to request you to present my compliments to Miss Betsey;† but I do not like the formality of that word. I desire you would, in plain old English, give my hearty love to her; but do not, for the world, let her know a syllable of what I have written about turtle food. For you know ministers ought, in all propriety and prudence, to be very grave, not to say stupid; and for them to jest, in any way, about such things, is almost as bad as Aerisy."§

This is to the lady herself:

"BOSTON, June 10, 1756.

"DEAR BETSEY,—This is one of the most unnecessary, impertinent letters that ever you received; the chief design of it being to tell you, only what you know so well already, that I never can forget you: and that no distance of place can lessen my love and regards to you. I intend, with submission to Providence, to see you at Waltham, on Saturday next, or at the farthest on Monday. I would not willingly indulge a suspicion

* This familiar note may be thought hardly proper to be given; as not being sufficiently grave for such a man as Dr. Mayhew. But it is indicative of a trait of characteristic pleasantness, which his intimate friends often mentioned. Dr. Clark, to whom it is addressed, was a brother of the lady whom Dr. Mayhew married soon after.

† Edmund Quincy, his intimate friend and one of his parish, who wrote a character of Dr. Mayhew, soon after his death.

‡ Afterwards Mrs. Mayhew.

§ Dr. Mayhew was a Unitarian, and an attempt had just before been made, by certain meddlesome people, to prevent a connection between him and Miss Clark, on a charge of Aerisy, which had some effect on the mind of Mrs. Clark, and served to delay the connection.

that any advantage will be taken of my thus prejudging me in your esteem. However, if attempts of this nature should be made I assure they will be in vain. I am persuaded, from the experience I have had of your constancy and fidelity, I am concerned with a person of the greatest love and generosity; and accordingly place the most served confidence in you. Believe me, dear creature, I most ardently long to see you; but, in mean time, must content myself with giving you epistolary testimony of my regards; the best idea it is in my power to give at present:

'Heaven first taught letters for some wretch's ail,
Some banish'd lover, or some captive maid;
They live, they speak, they breathe what love inspires,
Warm from the soul, and faithful to its fires:
Speed the soft intercourse from soul to soul,
And waft a sigh from India to the pole.'

"Pleased to admire these lines, before I was allowed now I feel their force and propriety. I need not multiply words; or rather, it would be to no purpose to do it; because words, however multiplied, cannot express how much, and how sincerely, I am yours.

"J. MAYHEW.

"P. S.—The hurry I am in, must be my apology for sending you a letter with so many blots, and so incorrectly written in other respects. It has only truth and sincerity to recommend it; which, though of little consideration with many of your sex, will not, I hope, be wholly disregarded by you. My duty to your mamma, if you think proper to present it.

"J. M."

The following letter was written at an earlier period to the Rev. Samuel Cooper, D.D., afterward pastor of the Brattle-Square church, in Boston:

"CAMBRIDGE, Dec. 5, 1742.

"SIR,—I received yours some days since, and must beg your pardon for not acknowledging the favour sooner; though I must, like other half-penitents, endeavour to extenuate my fault, by saying it was unavoidable. For the omission proceeded partly from my having a great deal of business on my hands at late—and partly from laziness—the college discommodated. Now, sir, you will readily acknowledge the first to be a good excuse, so far as it goes; and as to the latter, laziness that is so deep-rooted as mine, as effectually hinders the person from doing any thing, as if he was bound down head and foot, with all the new bumpers, green withs, and braided hair, that the wicked Jezebel (Delilah, I would have said) tied her lady spouse with. Now you know that a physical inability is (by some divines) alleged as a good apology for a man's not doing what would otherwise have been his duty; and, on this account, I hope you will not be very severe, but show that you are not implacable in your resentments, by giving me a speedy answer: for to tell the truth, your delaying to write me, would be the greatest punishment of my indolence that I can imagine.

"I have now, before I was aware of it, by telling you what would be the most severe way to revenge yourself on me, put it into your power to play the tyrant. But since you are a man, and not a woman, I am in some hopes you will not catch at every favourable opportunity to torment me.

"There is our good friend, Brandom, has laid under the Lady Clio's wrath and discipline ever since we ring, till the poor thing is quite emaciated, he not ing more bulky at present than two ordinary men.

I expect to see him swell to his former dimensions
a short time: for I must tell you that he has appeased anger of the little tyranness at last, got out of pur-sory, and is to be blest above the lot of mortals, in itting on the lady to * * * *, to-morrow, with me other company going to attend Mr. P * * * * d his new-married wife out of town. I hope, in pity the wedded couple, that the severity of the weather ll abate; for it will be hard indeed to have winter th without and within doors. I say winter within, cause it is said that a cold season comes about a nth after marriage, when all the springs of affection e commonly exhausted or frozen up, even in those o just before were sweltering in the sultry dog-days love.

"Well, I have been rambling, I know not where. It time to return home, and conclude, lest I should ve occasion to make a long apology for being tedious.
hope your next will be in doggerel; not but I like your see as well as any man's living—but yet, methinks a the jingle of yours would make my soul all ear and harmony. Your honest friend,

"J MAYHEW."

EPITAPHS, ANAGRAMS, ELEGIES, &c., OF THE PURITANS.

NOTHING more admirably illustrates the character
the founders of New England than their epitaphs, gies, anagrams, and other portraiture of each other.
ave doctors of divinity—men more learned in clasal literature and scholastic theology than any since sir time—prided themselves upon the excellence of sir puns and epigrams, and the cleverness shewn by few celebrated persons in this species of fashionable fing constituted their principal claim to immortality.
the Magnalia Christi Americana, Thomas Shepard, minister of Charlestown, is described as "the great anagrammatizer since the days of Lycophron," and e pastoral care of the renowned Cotton Mather himlf is characteristically described as distinguished for Care to guide his flock and feed his lambs / words, works, prayers, psalms, alms and—anagrams /
e of the anagrams upon the name of Mather makes t of Cottonus Matherus, Tu tantum Conors ea, oether Tuos tecum ornasti, etc.; and on the death of e Rev. Thomas Wilson, Shepard wrote,

JOHN WILSON, anagr. JOHN WILSON.

O change it not! no sweeter name or thing
Throughout the world within our ears shall ring!

We have collected a few specimens of the epitaphs of r first century, which, from their ingenuity or quaintness, cannot fail to amuse the reader. The first is on samuel Danforth, a minister of Roxbury, who died in 174, a few days after the completion of a new meet-g-house, and was written by Thomas Welde, a poet
f considerable reputation in his day—

Our new-built church now suffers by this—Larger its Windows, but its Lights one less.

Thomas Dudley, who came to Massachusetts in 1630 deputy-governor, was subsequently chief magistrate f the colony for several years. He died on the last y of July, 1653, in the seventy-third year of his age, nd was buried in Roxbury, where, in the records of e Congregational church, is preserved an anagram said to have been sent to him by some anonymous writ-ter, in 1645.

THOMAS DUDLEY, anagr. Ah, old must dye!

A death's head on your hand you need not wear—
A dying head you on your shoulders beare—
You need not one to mynd you you must dye—
You in your name may spell mortalitye.
Young men may dye, but old men, they iye must,
'Twill not be long before you turn to dust.
Before you turn to dust! Ah! must old dye?—
What shall young doe, when old in dust doe iye?
When old in dust iye, what New Englands doe?
When old in dust doe iye, it's best dye too.

The following was found in his pocket, after his death:

ON HIMSELF—BY THOMAS DUDLEY.

Farewell, dear wife, children and friends!
Hate heresy, make blessed ends,
Bear povertye, live with good men,
So shall we live with joy agen.
Let men of God in courts and churches watch
O'er such as doe a Toleration hatch,
Lest that ill egg bring forth a cockatrice
To poison all with heresy and vice.
If men be left and otherwise combine,
My epitaph's—I dyed no Libertyne!

This is characteristic of the Puritans. The reader should, however, understand that the old meaning of the word Libertine was tolerant or liberal, so that the governor merely designed to enjoin conformity to his doctrines. Dudley was a narrow-minded man, as much distinguished for his miserly propensities as for his bigotry. Among the epitaphs proposed for his monument was one by Governor Belcher—

Here lies Thomas Dudley, that trusty old stud—
A bargain's a bargain, and must be made good!

Donne nor Cowley ever produced any thing more full of quaint conceits, antithesis, and puns, than the elegy written by Benjamin Woodbridge, in 1654, on John Cotton—

Here lies magnanimous humility,
Majesty, meekness, Christian apathy,
On soft affections: liberty, in thrall—
A simple serpent, or serpentine dove.—
Neatness embroider'd with itself alone,
And devils canonized in a gown,—
A living, breathing Bible; table where Both covenants at large engraven are;
Gospel and law, in 's heart, had each its column;
His head an index to the sacred volume;
His very name's a title-page, and next
His life a commentary on the text.
Oh, what a monument of glorious worth,
When in a new edition he comes forth,
Without errata, may we think he'll be
In leaves and covers of eternity.

The celebrated epitaph of Dr. Franklin is supposed to have been suggested by this; but the lines of Joseph Capeen, a minister of Topsfield, on Mr. John Foester, an ingenious mathematician and printer, bear to it a still closer resemblance—

Thy body which no activeness did lack,
Now 's laid aside, like an old almanack;
But for the present only 's out of date;
'Twill have at length a far more active state;
Yea, though with dust thy body soiled be,
Yet at the resurrection we shall see
A fair edition, and of matchless worth,
Free from errata, new in heaven set forth;

'Tis but a word from God, the great Creator,
It shall be done when He saith Imprimatur.

One of the most poetical of the epitaphs of this period is that by Cotton Mather on the Rev. Thomas Shepard, after mentioned, who died in 1649.

Hearse lies intomb'd a heavenly orator,
From the great King of kings Ambassador—
Mirror of virtues, magazine of aries,
Crown to our heads, and loadstone to our hearts.

The following lines are from the monument of the Rev. Richard Mather, who died in Dorchester, in 1669, aged 73:

Richardus hic dormit Matherus,
Sed nec totus nec mora diu tuma,
Latatus genuisse parat.
In certum est utrum doctior an melior
Anima et gloria non queant humani.

Divinely rich and learned Richard Mather,
Sons like him, prophets great, rejoiced his father.
Short time his sleeping dust here's cover'd down;
Not his ascended spirit or renewa.

The Rev. Edward Thompson, a preacher of considerable reputation in his day, died at Marshfield, Massachusetts, in 1705. His epitaph is preserved by Alden—

Here, in a tyrant's hand, doth captive lye
A rare synopsis of divinitye.
Old patriarchs, prophets, gospel bishops meet
Under deep silence in their winding sheet.
All rest awhile, in hopes and full intent,
When their King calls, to sit in Parliament.

Governor Theophilus Eaton, of New Haven, died at an advanced age, on the 7th of January, 1657. His son-in-law, Deputy-Governor William Jones, and his daughter, are buried near him, and are alluded to in the lines upon the monument erected to his memory.

Eaton, so famed, so wise, so meek, so just—
The phoenix of our world—here lies in dust.
His name forgot New England never must.
'T attend you, syr, undr these framed stones
Are come yr hound son and daughter Jones,
On each hand to repose yr weary bones.

The next is from an old monument in Dorchester.

Hearc lyes our capitaine, who major
Of Suffolk was withail,
A goodly magistrate was he,
And major generall!
Two troops of horse with him here come,
Such worth his love did crave,
Ten companies of foot, also,
Mourning marcht to his grave,
Let all who read be sure to keep
The faith as he hath don;
With Christ he now lives crown'd; his name
Was Humphrey Atherton.
He died the 16th of November, 1661.

In the same cemetery "lies the body of James Humphrey, one of the ruling elders of Dorchester, who departed this life the 12 May, 1686, in the 78 year of his age." His epitaph, like many of that period is in the form of an acrostic—

I encosed within this shrine is precious dust,
And only waits the rising of the just;
Most useful while he lived, adorn'd his station,
Even to old age he served his generation;
Since his decease, thought of with veneration.

How great a blessing this ruling elder, he Uto this church and town, and pastors three;

Ma' ther the first did by him help receive,
F hat he did next his burden much relieve.
R enowned Danforth did he assist with skill;
E steemed high by all, bearing fruit until Yielding to death, his glorious seat did fill.

The most ingenious of the Puritan poets was the Rev. Michael Wigglesworth, whose "Day of Doom" is the most remarkable curiosity in American literature. "He was as skilled," says one of his biographers, "in physic and surgery as in diviner things, and when he could neither preach nor prescribe the physical sufferings of his neighbours,

"In costly verse, and most laborious rhymes,
He dish'd up truths right worthy our regard."

He was buried in Malden, near Boston, and his epitaph was written by Mather—

THE EXCELLENT MICHAEL WIGGLESWORTH,

Remembered by some good tokens.

His pen did once meet from the ocean's fetch;
And now he's gone beyond the ocean's reach.
His body, once so thin, was next to none;
From hence he's to unbodied spirits flown.
Once his rare skill did all diseases heal;
And he does nothing now unhappy feel.
He to his Paradise is joyful come,
And waits with joy to see his Day of Doom.

The last epitaph we shall give is from the monument of Dr. Clark, a grandson of the celebrated Dr. John Clark, who came to New England in 1630.

He who among physicians shone so late,
And by his wise prescriptions conquer'd Fate,
Now lies extended in the silent grave,
Nor him alive would his vast merit save.
But still his fame shall last, his virtues live,
And all sepulchral monuments survive.
Still flourish shall his name; nor shall this stone
Long as his piety and love be known.

Many of the elegies preserved in the Magnifi Morton's New England Memorial, and other work of the time, are not less curious than the brief tributes engraven upon the tomb-stones of the Puritans. The following lines on the death of the Rev. Thomas Hooker, of Hartford, were written by John Cotton, the first minister of Boston, and one of the most distinguished men of the colonies, whose elegy by Woodbridge we have already quoted—

To see three things was holy Austin's wish,
Rome in her Flower, Christ Jesus in the Field,
And Paul in Pulpit; lately, men might see,
Two first and more in Hooker's ministry.

Zion, in Beauty, is a fairer sight,
Than Rome in Flower, with all her glory dight,
Yet Zion's Beauty did most clearly shine
In Hooker's Rule and Doctrine; both divine.

Christ i' the Spirit's more than Christ in Field,
Our souls to quicken, and our states to mend!
Yet Christ in spirit, broke forth mightily,
In faithful Hooker's searching ministry.

Paul, in the pulpit, Hooker could not reach;
Yet did he Christ in spirit, so lively preach,
That living hearers thought he did inherit
A double portion of Paul's lively spirit.

Prudent in rule, in argument quick,
Fervent in prayer, in preaching powerful;
That well did learned Amos record bear,
The like to him he never went to hear.

'Twas of Geneva's worthies said, with wonder,
(Those worthies three) Paul was wont to thunder!

Not, like rain, on tender grass to shower;
But Calvin, lively oracles to pour.

All these in Hooker's spirit did remain,
A son of thunder, and a shower of rain;
A pourer forth of lively oracles,
A saving souls, the sum of miracles.

How blessed Hooker, thou'rt set on high,
Above the thankless world, and cloudy sky;
So thou of all thy labour reap the crown,
Whilst we, here, reap the seed which thou hast sown!

The following lines are by Peter Bulkeley, of Concord, who was thought to be a fine Latin and English st, by the critics of his time:

A lamentation for the death of that precious and worthy sister of Jesus Christ, Mr. John Hooker, Anno Domini, 7.

Some sighs, some sorrows, let's lament this rod,
Which hath bereaved us of this man of God;
A man of God, which came from God to men,
And now from them, is gone to God agen.
His joy depart: his merriment begone;
His friends stand by; sit mournful and alone.
But oh! what sorrow can be to suffice,
Though heaven and earth were filled with our cries.
Let Hartford sigh, and say, "I've lost a treasure;"
Let all New England mourn at God's displeasure,
In taking from us one more gracious
Than is the gold of Ophir precious.
Sweet was the savour which his grace did give,
It seasoned all the place where he did live.
His name did, as an ointment, give it's smell,
And all here witness that it savour'd well.

A few years after writing the eulogy of his friend, Cotton died, and was thus praised by John Norton, who wrote his history:

And after Winthrop's, Hooker's, Shepard's heaves,
Both Cotton's death call for a mourning verse!
They will be done! yet, Lord, who deal'st thus,
Make this great death expedient for us.
Neither pulled down the pope, Calvin, the prelate slew:
No Calvin's lapses, chief curses to Cotton due.
Cotton, whose learning, temper, godliness,
The German Phoenix, lively did express.
Mather's all—may Mather's word but pass—Mather's all in our great Cotton was;
"Him in flesh, scarce dwelt a better one,
O great's our loss, when such a spirit's gone.
Whilst he was here, life was more life to me;
Now he is not, death hence, less death shall be.
That comets great men's death do oft forego,
His present comet doth too sadly shew;
His prophet dead, yet must in 's doctrine speak,
His comet saith, else must New England break.
Phat'er it be, may heaven avert it far,
That meteors should succeed our greatest star.
A Boston's orb, Winthrop and Cotton were;
These lights extinct, dark is our hemisphere.
A Boston, once, how much shined of our glory,
We now lament, posterity will story.
At Boston live, who had and saw their worth,
And did them honour, both in life and death.
To him New England trust in this distress,
Who will not leave his exiles comfortless.

The following lines are from Cotton Mather's "Remarks on the Bright and the Dark Side of that American Pillar, the Reverend Mr. William Thomson:"

Apollyon owing him a cursed spleen
Who an Apollo in the church had been,
Dreading his traffic here would be undone
By numerous proselytes he daily won,

Accused him of imaginary faults,
And push'd him down so into dismal vaults:
Vaults, where he kept long ember-weeks of grief,
Till Heaven alarm'd sent him a relief.
Then was a Daniel in the lion's den,
A man, oh, how beloved of God and men!
By his bedside an Hebrew sword there lay,
With which at last he drove the devil away.
Quakers, too, durst not bear his keen replies,
But fearing it half-drawn the trembler flies.
Like Lazarus, new-raised from death, appears
The saint that had been dead for many years.
Our Nehemiah said, "Shall such as I Desert my flock, and like a coward fly?"
Long had the churches begg'd the saint's release;
Released at last, he dies in glorious peace.
The night is not so long, but Phosphor's ray Approaching glories doth on high display.
Faith's eye in him discerns the morning star,
His heart leap'd; sure the sun cannot be far.
In ecstasies of joy, he ravish'd cries,
"Love, love the Lamb, the Lamb!" in whom he dies.

The excellent President, Urian Oakes, styled by Mather the "Lactantius of New England," was one of the most distinguished poets of his time, and contributed very largely to its churchyard literature. The following verses are from his Elegy on the death of Thomas Shepard, minister of Charlestown:

Art, nature, grace, in him were all combined
To show the world a matchless paragon;
In whom of radiant virtues no less shined,
Than a whole constellation; but he's gone!
Hee's gone, alas! down in the dust must ly
As much of this rare person, as could die.

To be descended well, doth that commend?
Can sons their fathers' glory call their own?
Our Shepard justly might to this pretend,
(His blessed father was of high renown,
Both Englands speak him great, admire his name,) But his own personal worth's a better claim.

His look commanded reverence and awe,
Though mild and amiable, not austere;
Well humour'd was he, as I eves saw,
And ruled by love and wisdom more than fear.
The muses and the graces too, conspired
To set forth this rare piece to be admired.

He breathed love, and pursued peace in his day,
As if his soul were made of harmony;
Scarce ever more of goodness crowded lay
In such a piece of frail mortality.

Sure Father Wilson's genuine son was he,
New-England's Paul had such a Timothy.

My dearest, inmost, bosome friend is gone!
Gone is my sweet companion, soul's delight!
Now in a huddling crowd, I'm all alone,
And almost could bid all the world good night.
Blest be my rock! God lives: O! let him be
As he is all, so all in all to me.

CONTROVERSIAL MENDACITY.

ONE of the most common failings of religious writers, of the hunters up of incident, illustrative or confirmative of peculiar principles, is an utter recklessness of veracity in the narration of circumstances. The excellent tendencies of fabricated histories, and the truth of the ideas they inculcate, are the pleas most frequently offered in extenuation of their manufacture; but the ruin of the sacred reputations of the dead can not thus be justified, if even the presentation of false testimony, where it is so little needed, deserves no reproach. Every body has read the history of the fearful agonies, pretended to have been witnessed by those who saw the last hours of Voltaire; and but few, owing to the general disinclination to expose errors that may be productive of a benefit, while they can scarcely have an injurious tendency, have seen the evidences of the perfect falsity of that popular tale. We should like it well if there were any proof that the philosopher had been convinced of the errors of his life; but no such proof exists, and the story industriously reported, in tracts and in religious journals, that in his last moments a recollection of his efforts to overthrow Christianity, "with terror froze his cowering blood," is known to its intelligent propagators to be without foundation. Voltaire's death-scene, for aught that was ever shown to the contrary, was as quiet and as peaceful as were those of Jonathan Edwards or John Eliot. The well-known statement that Volney, when in imminent peril of shipwreck, besought the mercy of the power he had all his life derided, is equally false. The commentator on the ruin of empires was never in any such peril. Similar stories about Thomas Paine, though so frequently repeated that their inventors may now possibly credit them, have been proved time after time to be untrue. The whole life and character of the man have been misrepresented, in opposition to the clearest testimony. Gibbon, whose manner of life was as commendable as his religious belief was false, has been the hero of many a pathetic history; but the purity of his morality and the quiet of his last hours have been so demonstrated that the slanders of unscrupulous religionists have sunk into oblivion. We have been led to these remarks by seeing in the journals an old story revived, of which Ethan Allen is made the hero. Allen was a man of dauntless bravery, and of the most rare intelligence; but unfortunately he was a sceptic in religion, and he vaunted of the discernment which he imagined had enabled him to detect the falsity of the Bible. A great proportion of the anecdotes told to illustrate his character and belief are probably inventions; but it is beyond controversy that he was an infidel, and vain of his opposition to Christianity. In the story to which we have alluded, it is stated that—

"His wife was a pious woman, and taught her children in the way of piety, while he told them it was a delusion; and that there was an hour coming when Colonel Allen's confidence in his own sentiments would be closely tried. A beloved daughter was taken sick; he received a message that she was dying; he hastened to her bedside, anxious to hear her last words. 'Father,' said she, 'I am about to die; shall I believe in the principles which you have taught me, or shall I believe what my mother has directed?' This was an affecting scene. The intrepid Colonel became extremely agitated, his lips quivered, his whole frame shook; and, after waiting a few moments, he replied, 'Believe as your mother has learned you.'"

This is a very pretty anecdote, but not a single sentence of it relates to any actual occurrence. The hero of Ticonderoga never lost a daughter during his own lifetime, and his wife was not a pious woman; at least, she pretended to have experienced no religious influences. The falsity of the story, which has found its way into histories, and into hundreds of printed collections of memorabilia, was asserted to us by the excellent daughter of the hardy chief, who yet survives, and who, perhaps, was herself the heroine of the tale.

Truth is the best policy; especially with politicians and among politicians even it has been found that "corruption wins not more than honesty." The pious frauds of monkish times answered a very good purpose, until they were detected; but when the people found that the assenting nods of marble statues were caused by well devised machinery, they laughed at the imposture, or sacrificed its authors to their passions. The witless falsehoods echoed in more modern pulpits frequently send the less simple of the congregation away, breathing contempt for every holy sentiment, while an honest presentation of the unanswerable evidences of inspiration, would have made them stout defenders of the faith. At Tammany Hall the mountebank's attacks on the life and intellect of Thomas Paine are read with a mock gravity, and then by incontestible evidence proved false, and the degraded creatures who congregate at that polluting fountain, with some show of reason call in question the truth of a religion that is supposed to need such juggling to maintain it.

The dawn of the day of death is not always welcome to the pure in heart, nor is it invariably cheerless to the infidel. There is no reason to doubt that Hume was as happy in his last hours as his friend Robertson; and if Adam Smith is to be credited, none ever bade adieu to life with more serenity than that free-thinking philosopher exhibited. La Place, Gibbon, and Cooper, strong in their disbelief of truth, had no fears of danger in the after life. Nor had the worshipper of law in old time, nor has the Moslem, now, more frequently than the Christian; albeit the hope of the last a better and his light more clear. These things are so much dependent on national or individual character and temperament as upon religious teaching; and the last hour of a man's mortality furnishes no better index of his future life than the last day of a month does of its succeeding period of time. Forgetful of this, and anxious to make a strong array in behalf of the right, well enough disposed persons have coined counterfeited histories, which, having been almost invariably proved false, have done much more injury than good. "Honesty" in politics, morals, religion, and law, is always "the best policy."

ROBERT TREAT PAINE.

ALTHOUGH this writer is now rarely mentioned by the organs of public opinion in New England, he was once ranked among the great masters of English verse; and it was believed that his reputation would endure as long as the language in which he wrote. The absurd estimate of his abilities shows the wretched condition of taste and criticism in his time, and perhaps caused the faults in his later works which have won for them their early oblivion.

Robert Treat Paine, junior, was born at Taunton, Massachusetts, on the ninth of December, 1773. His father, an eminent lawyer, held many honorable offices under the state and national governments, and was one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. The family having removed to Boston, when he was about seven years old, the subject of this memoir received his early education in that city, and entered Harvard University in 1788. His career here was brilliant and honourable; no member of his class was so familiar with the ancient languages, or with elegant English literature; and his biographer says that he was personally popular among his classmates and the officers of the university. When he was graduated, "he was as much distinguished for the opening tones of his heart, as for the vivacity of his wit, the force of his imagination, and the variety of his knowledge. A liberality of sentiment and a contempt of selfishness are usual concomitants, and in him were striking characteristics. Urbanity of manners and a delicacy of feeling imparted a charm to his benignant temper and social disposition."

While in college he had won many praises by his poetical "exercises," and on the completion of his education he was anxious to devote himself to literature as a profession. His father, a man of singular sterility, had marked out for him a different career, and obtained for him a clerkship in a mercantile house in Boston. But he was in no way fitted for the successful prosecution of commerce; and after endeavouring for a few months to apply himself to business, he abandoned the counting-room, and determined to rely on his pen for the means of living. In 1794, he established the "Federal Orrery," a political and literary gazette, and conducted it two years, but without industry or discretion, and therefore without profit. Soon after leaving the university, he had become a constant visitor of the theatre, then recently established in Boston. His intimacy with persons connected with the stage led to his marriage with an actress, and this and his exclusion from fashionable society, and a disagreement with his father, which lasted until his death.

He was destitute of true courage, and of that kind of pride which arises from a consciousness of integrity and worth. When, therefore, he found himself unpopular with the town, he no longer endeavoured to deserve regard; but neglected his personal appearance, became intemperate, and abandoned himself to indolence. The office of "master of ceremonies" in the theatre, an anomalous station, created for his benefit, still yielded him a moderate income, and notwithstanding the irregularity of his habits, he never exerted his poetical abilities without success. For his poems and other productions he obtained prices unparalleled in his country, and rarely equalled by the rewards of the most popular European authors. For the "Invention of Letters," written at the request of the President of Harvard University, he received fifteen hundred dollars, or more than five dollars a line. "The Raging Passion," a poem recited before the Phi Beta Kappa Society, was little less profitable; and he was paid seven hundred and fifty dollars for a song of half-a-dozen stanzas, entitled "Adams and Liberty."

His habits, in the sunshine, gradually improved, and his friends who adhered to him endeavoured to wean him from the wine-cup, and to persuade him to study the law, and establish himself in an honourable position in society. They were for a time successful; he entered the office of the Honourable Theophilus Parsons, of Newburyport; applied himself diligently to his studies; was admitted to the bar, and became a popular advocate. No lawyer ever commenced business with more brilliant prospects; but his indolence and recklessness returned; his business was neglected; his reputation decayed; and, broken down and disheartened by poverty, disease, and the neglect of his old associates, the evening of his life presented a melancholy contrast to its morning, when every sign gave promise of a bright career. In his last years, says his biographer, "without a library, wandering from place to place, frequently uncertain whence or whether he could procure a meal, his thirst for knowledge astonishingly increased; neither sickness nor penury abated his love of books and instructive conversation." He died in "an attic chamber of his father's house," on the eleventh of November, 1811, in the thirty-eighth year of his age.

Dr. Johnson said of Dryden, of whom Paine was a servile but unsuccessful imitator, that "his delight was in wild and daring sallies of sentiment, in the irregular and eccentric violence of wit;" that he "delighted to tread upon the brink of meaning, where light and darkness begin to mingle; to approach the precipice of absurdity, and hover over the abyss of unideal vacancy." The censure is more applicable to the copy than the original. There was no freshness in Paine's writings; his subjects, his characters, his thoughts, were all commonplace and familiar. His mind was fashioned by books, and not by converse with the world. He had a brilliant fancy, and a singular command of language; but he was never content to be simple and natural. He endeavoured to be magnificent and striking; he was perpetually searching for conceits and extravagances; and in the multiplicity of his illustrations and ornaments, he was unintelligible and tawdry. From no other writer could so many instances of the false sublime be selected. He never spoke to the heart in his own language.

Paine wrote with remarkable facility. It is related of him by his biographers, that he had finished "Adams and Liberty," and exhibited it to some gentlemen at the house of a friend. His host pronounced it imperfect, as the name of Washington was omitted, and declared that he should not approach the sideboard, on which bottles of wine had just been placed, until he had written an additional stanza. The poet mused a moment, called for a pen, and wrote the following lines, which are, perhaps, the best in the song:

Should the tempest of war overshadow our land,
Its bolts could ne'er rend Freedom's temple asunder;
For, unmoved, at its portal would Washington stand;
And repulse, with his breast, the assaults of the thunder!
His sword, from the sleep
Of its scabbard would leap,
And conduct, with its point, every flash to the deep!
For ne'er shall the sons, etc.

He had agreed to write the "opening address," on the rebuilding of the Boston Theatre, in 1798. Hodgkinson, the manager, called on him in the evening, before it was to be delivered, and upbraided him for his negligence; the first line of it being yet unwritten. "Pray, do not be angry," said Paine, who was dining with some literary friends; "sit down and take a glass of wine." "No, sir," replied the manager; "when you begin to write, I will begin to drink." Paine took his pen, at a side-table, and in two or three hours finished the address, which is one of the best he ever wrote.

SANDS—FABRICATION OF AUTHORITIES.

ROBERT C. SANDS was one of the cleverest literary men of the country. Of all authors he was the most industrious, and wrote most from a love of writing. Though the editor of one of the leading gazettes of New York, his daily task of political or literary discussion was far from giving him sufficient literary employment. His mind overflowed in all directions into other journals, even some of different political opinions from those which he supported. He had a propensity for innocent and playful literary mischief. It was his sport to excite public curiosity by giving extracts, highly spiced with fashionable allusions and satire, "from the forthcoming novel;" which novel, in truth, was, and is yet to be written; or else to entice some unhappy wight into a literary or historical newspaper discussion, then to combat him anonymously, or, under the mask of a brother editor, to overwhelm him with history, facts, quotations, and authorities, all, if necessary, manufactured for the occasion; in short, like Shakespeare's "merry wanderer of the night," to leave his unsuspecting victim around "through bog, through bush, through brier." One instance of this sportive propensity occurred in relation to a controversy about the material of the Grecian crown of victory, which arose during the excitement in favour of Grecian liberty some years ago. Several ingenious young men, fresh from their college studies, had exhausted all the learning they could procure on this grave question, either from their own acquaintance with antiquity, or at second hand from the writers upon Grecian antiquities, Lempriere, Potter, Bartholemi, or the more erudite Paschalis de Corona; till Sands grew tired of seeing so much scholarship wasted, and ended the controversy by an essay filled with excellent learning, chiefly fabricated by himself for the occasion, and resting mainly on a passage of Pausanias, quoted in the original Greek, for which it is in vain to look in any edition of that author, ancient or modern.

RAPID COMPOSITION.—A. H. BOGART AND OTHERS.

MR. BOGART was a native of the city of Albany, where, at the early age of twenty-one years, he died, in 1826. He was engaged in the study of the law at the time of his decease, and, as we have learned from an eminent member of the bar in that city, gave the highest promise of professional reputation, when his studies were interrupted by the illness which terminated in his death. He wrote with singular rapidity, and would frequently astonish his companions by an improvisation equal to the elaborate performances of some poets of distinguished reputation. It was good-naturedly hinted on one occasion that his impromptus were prepared beforehand, and he was asked if he would submit to the application of a test of his poetical abilities. He promptly acceded, and a most difficult one was immediately proposed. Among his intimate friends were the late Colonel John B. Van Schaick and Charles Fenno Hoffman, both of whom were present. Said Van Schaick, taking up a copy of Byron, "The name of Lydia Kane—a lady distinguished for her beauty and cleverness, who died a year or two since, but who was then just blushing into womanhood—"the name of Lydia Kane has in it the same number of letters as a stanza of 'Childe Harold'; write them down in a column." They were so written by Bogart, Hoffman and himself. "Now," he continues, "I will open the poem at random; and for the ends of the lines in Miss Lydia's acrostic shall be used the words ending those of the verse on which my finger may rest." The stanza thus selected was this:—

And must they fall? the young, the proud, the brave,
To swell one bloated chief's unwholesome reign?
No step between submission and a grave?
The rise of rapine and the fall of Spain?
And doth the Power that man adores ordain
Their doom, nor heed the suppliant's appeal?
Is all that desperate valour sets in vain?
And counsel sage, and patriotic zeal,
The veteran's skill, youth's fire, and manhood's heart of steel?

The following stanza was composed by Bogart within the succeeding ten minutes—the period fixed in a wager—finished before his companions had reached a fourth line, and read to them as we print it—

Lovely and loved, o'er the unconquer'd	leave
Your charms resistless, matchless girl, shall	reign!
Dear as the mother holds her infant's	grave
I a Love's own region, warm, romantic	Spain!
And should your Fate to courts your steps	ordain,
Kings would in vain to regal pomp	appeal,
And lordly bishops kneel to you in	vain,
Nor Valour's fire, Law's power, nor Churchman's zeal
Endure 'gainst Love's (time's up!) untarnish'd	steel!

We need not inform the reader that few of the most facile versifiers could have accomplished the task in hours. Bogart nearly always composed with the same rapidity, and his pieces were marked by the liveliest wit and most apposite illustration.

The rapidity with which Robert Treat Paine composed his verses we have mentioned elsewhere. His best pieces were "struck off at a heat." The poet Brainard wrote his "Lines on Niagara" to fill out a column of a newspaper of which he was editor, in a few moments, while the printer's boy was waiting for copy. E. D. Griffin, Sands, and others, wrote with nearly equal rapidity.

LITERARY CONFEDERACIES.

LITERARY associations—for joint authorship—have been common in this country. The first one of which we read was established by "the Connecticut wits" at Hartford, and Joel Barlow, Doctor Hopkins, Colonel Humphries, and Trumbull, the author of "McFingal," were members of it. They produced numerous essays on literary, moral, and political subjects, none of which attracted more applause than a series of papers in imitation of the "Rolliad," (a popular English work, ascribed to Fox, Sheridan, and their associates,) entitled "American Antiquities" and "Extracts from the Anarchiad," originally printed in the New Haven Gazette for 1786 and 1787. These papers have never been collected, but they were republished from one end of the country to the other in the periodicals of the time, and were supposed to have had considerable influence on public taste and opinions, and by the boldness of their satire to have kept in abeyance the leaders of political disorganization and infidel philosophy.

The only other association of the kind which we shall mention was formed by Robert C. Sands and three of his friends, under the name of the Literary Confederacy. The number was limited to four; and they bound themselves to preserve a friendly communication in all the vicissitudes of life, and to endeavour, by all proper means, to advance their mutual and individual interest, to advise each other on every subject, and to receive with good temper the rebuke or admonition which might thus be given. They proposed to unite, from time to time, in literary publications, covenanting solemnly that no matter hostile to the great principles of religion or morals should be published by any member. This compact was most faithfully kept to the time of Sands' death, though the primary objects of it were gradually given up, as other duties engrossed the attention of its members. In the first year of its existence, the confederacy contributed largely to several literary and critical gazettes, besides publishing in one of the daily papers of the city a series of essays, under the title of the "Amphilogist," and a second under that of the "Neologist," which attracted much attention, and were very widely circulated and republished in the newspapers of the day. Sands wrote a large portion of these, both in prose and verse.

BARLOW—HIS LIFE, WRITINGS, AND OPINIONS.

THE author of the "Columbiad" was born in the village of Reading, in Connecticut, in 1755. He was the youngest in a family of ten, and his father died while he was yet a child, leaving to him property sufficient only to defray the costs of his education. On the completion of his preparatory studies, he was placed by his guardians at Dartmouth College, but was soon induced to remove to New Haven, where he was graduated, in 1778. Among his friends here were Dwight, then a college tutor, Colonel Humphreys, a revolutionary hero of some reputation, and Trumbull, the author of "McFingal." Barlow recited an original poem, on taking his bachelor's degree, which is preserved in the "American Poems," printed at Litchfield, in 1793. It was his first attempt of so ambitious a character, and possesses little merit. During the vacations of the college he had on several occasions joined the army, in which four of his brothers were serving; and he participated in the conflict at White Plains, and a number of minor engagements, in which he is said to have displayed much intrepidity.

For a short time after completing his academic course, Barlow devoted his attention chiefly to the law; but being urged by his friends to qualify himself for the office of chaplain, he undertook the study of theology, and in six weeks became a licensed minister. He joined the army immediately, and remained with it until the establishment of peace, cultivating the while his taste for poetry, by writing patriotic songs and ballads, and composing, in part, his "Vision of Columbus," afterward expanded into the "Columbiad." When the army was disbanded, in 1783, he removed to Hartford, to resume his legal studies; and, to add to his revenue, established "The Mercury," a weekly gazette, to which his writings gave reputation and an immediate circulation. In 1785, he was admitted to the bar, and in the same year, in compliance with the request of an association of Congregational ministers, he prepared and published an enlarged and improved edition of Watts's version of the Psalms, to which were appended a collection of hymns, several of which were written by himself.

"The Vision of Columbus" was published in 1787. It was dedicated to Louis XVI., with strong expressions of admiration and gratitude, and in the poem were corresponding passages of applause; but Barlow's feelings toward the amiable and unfortunate monarch appear to have changed in after time, for in the "Columbiad" he is coldly alluded to, and the adulatory lines are suppressed. The "Vision of Columbus" was reprinted in London and Paris, and was generally noticed favourably in the reviews. After its publication the author relinquished his newspaper and established a bookstore, principally to sell the poem and his edition of the Psalms, and as soon as this end was attained, resumed the practice of the law. In this he was, however, unfortunate, for his forensic abilities were not of the most popular description, and his mind was too much devoted to political and literary subjects to admit of the application to study and attention to business necessary to secure success. He was engaged with Colonel Humphreys, John Trumbull, and Dr. Lemuel Hopkins, a man of some wit, of the coarser kind, in the "Anarchiad," a satirical poem published at Hartford, which had considerable political influence, and in some other works of a similar description; but obtaining slight pecuniary advantage from his literary labours, he was induced to accept a foreign agency from the "Sciota Land Company," and sailed for Europe, with his family, in 1788. In France he sold some of the lands held by this association, but deriving little or no personal benefit from the transactions, and becoming aware of the fraudulent character of the company, he relinquished his agency and determined to rely on his pen for support.

In 1791, Barlow published in London "Advice to the Privileged Orders," a work directed against the distinguishing features of kingly and aristocratic governments; and in the early part of the succeeding year, "The Conspiracy of Kings," a poem of about four hundred lines, educed by the first coalition of the continental sovereigns against republican France. In the autumn of 1792, he wrote a letter to the French National Convention, recommending the abolition of the union between the church and the state, and other reforms; and was soon after chosen by the "London Constitutional Society," of which he was a member, to present in person an address to that body. On his arrival in Paris he was complimented with the rights of citizenship, an "honour" which had been previously conferred on Washington and Hamilton. From this time he made France his home. In the summer of 1793, a deputation, of which his friend Gregorie, who before the Revolution had been Bishop of Blois, was a member, was sent into Savoy, to organize it as a department of the republic. He accompanied it to Chamberry, the capital, where, at the request of its president, he wrote an address to the inhabitants of Piedmont, inciting them to throw off allegiance to "the man of Turin who called himself their king." Here too he wrote "Hasty Pudding," the most popular of his poems.

On his return to Paris, Barlow's time was principally devoted to commercial pursuits, by which, in a few years, he obtained a considerable fortune. The atrocities which marked the progress of the Revolution prevented his active participation in political controversies, though he continued, under all circumstances, an ardent republican. Toward the close of 1795, he visited the North of Europe, on some private business, and on his return to Paris was appointed by Washington consul to Algiers, with power to negotiate a commercial treaty with the dey, and to ransom all the Americans held in slavery on the coast of Barbary. He accepted and fulfilled the mission to the satisfaction of the American government, concluding treaties with Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli, and liberating more than one hundred Americans, who were in prisons or in slavery to the Mohammedans. He then returned to Paris, where he purchased the splendid hotel of the Count Clermont de Tonnerre, and lived several years in a fashionable and costly manner, pursuing still his fortunate mercantile speculations, revising his "great pic," and writing occasionally for the political gazettes.

Finally, after an absence of nearly seventeen years, the poet, statesman, and philosopher returned to his native country. He was received with kindness by many old friends, who had corresponded with him while abroad, or been remembered in all his wanderings; and, after spending a few months in travel, marking, with patriotic pride, the rapid progress which the nation had made in greatness, he fixed his home on the banks of the Potomac, near the city of Washington, where he built the splendid mansion, known afterward as "Kalorama," and expressed an intention to spend there the remainder of his life. In 1806, he published a prospectus of a National Institution, at Washington, to combine a university with a naval and military school, academy of fine arts, and learned society. A bill to carry his plan into effect was introduced into Congress, but never became a law.

In the summer of 1808, appeared the "Columbiad," in a splendid quarto volume, surpassing in the beauty of its typography and embellishments any work before that time printed in America. From his earliest years Barlow had been ambitious to raise the epic song of his nation. The "Vision of Columbus," in which the most brilliant events in American history had been described, occupied his leisure hours when in college, and afterward, when, as a chaplain, he followed the standard of the liberating army. That work was executed too hastily and imperfectly, and for twenty years after its appearance, through every variety of fortune, its enlargement and improvement engaged his attention.

The events of the Revolution were so recent and so universally known, as to be inflexible to the hand of fiction; and the poem could not therefore be modelled after the regular epic form, which would otherwise have been chosen. It is a series of visions, presented by Hesper, the genius of the western continent, to Columbus, while in the prison at Valladolid, where he is introduced to the reader uttering a monologue on his ill-requited services to Spain. These visions embrace a vast variety of scenes, circumstances, and characters: Europe in the middle ages, with her political and religious reformers; Mexico and the South American nations, and their imagined history; the progress of discovery; the settlement of the states now composing the federation; the war of the Revolution, and establishment of republicanism; and the chief actors in the great dramas which he attempts to present.

The poem, having no unity of fable, no regular succession of incidents, no strong exhibition of varied character, lacks the most powerful charms of a narrative; and has, besides, many dull and spiritless passages, that would make unpopular a work of much more faultless general design. The versification is generally anæsthetic, but mechanical and passionless, the language sometimes incorrect, and the similes often inappropriate and inelegant. Yet there are in it many bursts of eloquence and patriotism, which should preserve it from oblivion. The descriptions of nature and of personal character are frequently condensed and forceful; and passages of invective, indignation and fall of energy. In his narrative of the expedition against Quebec, under Arnold, the poet exclaims:

Ah, gallant troop! deprived of half the praise
That deeds like yours in other times repay,
Since your prime chief (the favourite erst of Fame)
Hath sunk so deep his hateful, hideous name,
That every honest muse with horror shings
It forth unsounded from her sacred strings;
Else what high tones of rapture must have told
The first great actions of a chief so bold!

These lines are characteristic of his manner.

The "Columbiad" was reprinted in Paris and London, and noticed in the leading critical gazettes, but generally with little praise. The London "Monthly Magazine" attempted, in an elaborate article, to prove its title to a place in the first class of epics, and expressed a belief that it was surpassed only by the "Iliad," the "Æneid," and "Paradise Lost." In America, however, it was regarded by the judicious as a failure, and reviewed with even more wit and severity than in England. Indeed, the poet did not in his own country receive the praise which he really merited; and faults were imputed to his work which it did not possess. Its sentiments were said to be hostile to Christianity,* and the author was declared an infidel; but there is no line in the "Columbiad" unfavourable to the religion of New England, the Puritan faith which is the basis of the national greatness; and there is no good reason for believing that Barlow at the time of his death doubted the creed of which in his early manhood he had been a minister.

The orthography of the "Columbiad" was in some instances peculiar, but many of Barlow's innovations have since been generally adopted, and in his notes he defends them with force and ingenuity. It has been said that he was wildly visionary in his plans and expectations, and his predictions in regard to short-hand writing have been quoted in proof of the correctness of this opinion. But a man who had seen the revolution produced in navigation by the application of steam, ought hardly to be censured for believing that the time might come when the whole train of impressions now made upon the mind by reading a long and well written treatise would be conveyed by a few strokes of the pen, and be received at a glance of the eye.

* It is now generally believed that Barlow, while in France, abjured the Christian Religion. The Reverend Thomas Robbins, a venerable clergyman of Rochester, Massachusetts, in a letter written in 1840, remarks that "Barlow's deistical opinions were not suspected previous to the publication of his 'Vision of Columbus,' in 1787;" and further, that "when at a later period he lost his character, and became an open and bitter reviler of Christianity, his psalm-book was laid aside; but for that cause only, as competent judges still maintained that no revision of Watts possesses as much poetic merit as Barlow's." I have seen two letters written by Barlow during the last year of his life, in which he declares himself "a sincere believer of Christianity, divested of its corruptions." In a letter to M. Gregorie, published in the second volume of Dennie's "Port Folio," pages 471 to 479, he says, "the sect of Puritans, in which I was born and educated, and to which I still adhere, for the same reason that you adhere to the Catholics, a conviction that they are right," etc. The idea that Barlow disbelieved in his later years the religion of his youth, was probably first derived from an engraving in the "Vision of Columbus," in which the cross, by which he intended to represent monkish superstition, is placed among the "symbols of prejudice." He never "lost his character" as a man of honourable sentiments and blameless life; and I could present numerous other evidences that he did not abandon his religion, were not the above apparently conclusive.

After the publication of the "Columbiad," Barlow made a collection of documents, with an intention to write a history of the United States; but, in 1811, he was unexpectedly appointed minister plenipotentiary to the French government, and immediately sailed for Europe. His attempts to negotiate a treaty of commerce and indemnification for spoiliations were unsuccessful at Paris; and in the autumn of 1812 he was invited by the Duke of Bassano to a conference with Napoleon at Wilna, in Poland. He started from Paris, and traveled without intermission until he reached Zarnowitch, an obscure village near Cracow, where he died, from an inflammation of the lungs, induced by fatigue and exposure in an inhospitable country, in an inclement season, on the twenty-second day of December, in the fifty-fourth year of his age. In Paris, honours were paid to his memory as an important public functionary and a man of letters; his eulogy was written by Dupont de Nemours, and an account of his life and writings was drawn up and published, accompanied by a canto of the "Columbiad," translated into French heroic verse. In America, too, his death was generally lamented, though without any public exhibition of mourning.

Barlow was much respected in private life for his many excellent social qualities. His manners were usually grave and dignified, though when with his intimate friends he was easy and familiar. He was an honest and patient investigator, and would doubtless have been much more successful as a metaphysical or historical writer than as a poet. As an author he belonged to the first class of his time in America; and for his ardent patriotism, his public services, and the purity of his life, he deserves a distinguished rank among the men of our golden age.

JOHN BEVERIDGE.

BEVERIDGE was a celebrated teacher, in Philadelphia, before the Revolution, and many of the most eminent men of the time studied under him the languages and mathematics. His acquirements in Latin and backgammon were unequalled in this country, and he is deserving of remembrance as the author of the first volume of Latin poems published in the colonies. Among his pupils was Alexander Graydon, who wrote the most interesting book of personal memoirs* yet produced in the United States. Graydon furnishes the following reminiscences of him—

"Various were the rogueries that were played upon him; but the most audacious of all was the following. At the hour of convening in the afternoon, that being found the most convenient, from the circumstance of Mr. Beveridge being usually a little beyond the time; the bell having rung, the ushers being at their posts, and the scholars arranged in their classes, three or four of the conspirators concealed themselves without, for the purpose of observing the motions of their victim. He arrives, enters the school, and is permitted to proceed until he is supposed to have nearly reached his chair at the upper end of the room, when instantly the door and every window-shutter is closed. Now, shrouded in utter darkness, the most hideous yells that can be conceived, are sent forth from at least three score of throats; and Ovids, and Virgils, and Horaces, together with the more heavy metal of dictionaries, whether of Cole, of Young, or of Ainsworth, are hurled without remorse at the head of the astonished preceptor, who, on his side, groping and crawling under cover of the forms, makes the best of his way to the door. When attained, and light restored, a death-like silence ensues. Every boy is at his lesson: no one has had a hand or a voice in the recent atrocity: what then is to be done, and who shall be chastised.

Sæviti atrox Volscena, nec telli conspicit usquam
Auctorum, nec quo se ardens immittere possit.

Pierce Volscens foams with rage, and gasing round
Descries not him who aim'd the fatal wound;
Nor knows to fix revenge.—

"This most intolerable outrage, from its succeeding beyond expectation, and being entirely to the taste of the school, had a run of several days; and was only then put a stop to by the interference of the faculty, who decreed the most exemplary punishment on those who should be found offending in the premises, and by taking measures to prevent a further repetition of the enormity. I have said, and with truth, that I was no promoter of mischief; but I will not take upon me to assert, that I was proof against the irresistible contagion of such a scene, or that I did not raise my voice in the discordant concert of the screamers: though I can safely declare, that I never threw at the master, and that I was wholly ignorant of the contrivers and ringleaders of this shameful proceeding.

"In the year 1765, Mr. Beveridge published by subscription a small collection of Latin poems. Of their general merit I presume not to judge, but I think I have heard they were not much commended by the British reviewers. The Latinity probably is pure, the prosody correct, the versification sufficiently easy and sounding, and such as might serve to evince an intimate acquaintance with the classics of ancient Rome: But I should doubt their possessing much of the soul of poetry. One of them is neither more or less than a humble petition in hexameters, and certainly a very curious specimen of pedantic mendacity. It is addressed to Thomas Penn, the proprietary of Pennsylvania; and the poet very modestly proposes, that he should bestow upon him a few of his acres, innumerable, he observes, as the sands of the Delaware: in return for which, his verse shall do its best to confer immortal fame upon the donor. By way of further inducement to the gift, he sets before his excellency the usual ingratitude of an enriched and unknown posterity, on the one hand; and on the other, the advantages which Ajax, Æneas, and Mæcenas derived from the muses of Homer, of Virgil, and Horace. But lest I might be suspected of misrepresentation, let my good quondam preceptor speak for himself.

"Might not one here be tempted to exclaim in the spirit of Prior to Boileau:

Pindar, that eagle, mounts the skies,
 While virtue leads the noble way:
 Too like a vulture Beveridge flies
 Where sordid interest lures the prey.

"I never heard, however, that the poet was the better for his application: I rather think that the proprietor was of opinion, there was a want of reciprocity in the proposal, and that, whatever the carmen Horati vel Maronis might have been worth, that of Mr. Beveridge did not amount to a very valuable consideration. Another of the principal poems in this collection is a pastoral, which, if Mr. Beveridge had had the salutary fear of Boileau before his eyes, he certainly would not have written; since never was production more completely under the lash of the following satirical lines:

Viendrai-je, en une Eglogue entoure de troupeaux.
 Au milieu de Paris enfermer mes chalumaux,
 Et dans mon cabinet assis au pied des beures,
 Faire dire aux échos des sottises champêtres?

"The complainant in this pastoral is an Edinburgh cit, whom he appropriately calls Urbanus: nevertheless he is, without the smallest difficulty, transformed into a shepherd, surrounded with sheep, and proclaiming to the echoes his sottises champêtres, in strains like these:

Audit et planctus gemitibus remurmurat Echo,
 Echo sola meos miserata est, inquit amores;
 Tristitia nam mœstis ex saxis ammonat imis,
 Flebile luctisonis resonat et usque cicutia.
 Me miserum quoties exclamo, lugubris illa
 Me miserum ingeminat gelidis e vallibus: Eheu,
 Clamanti exclamat, repetitis vocibus, Eheu!

But after all, it is perhaps too much to expect from a modern, good Latin, good poetry, and good sense, all at the same time."

EDITORIAL RECANTATIONS.

WE have mentioned elsewhere the confessions of Rivington, editor of the Royal Gazette, in New York. During the Revolution the Vicars of Bray were frequently compelled to change their positions so suddenly as not to allow of the shows of "consistency" made by the politicians of our own time, and some of their bulletins are curious and amusing. Benjamin Towne became editor of the Pennsylvania Evening Post in 1775. He was a Whig until the British took possession of Philadelphia, when he excelled all the Tories in his loyalty to His Majesty's government. On the evacuation of the city, Towne remained, and assumed a second time the language of the Whig party. One day, soon after the meeting of Congress, he met the celebrated Dr. Witherspoon, in Aitkin's bookstore, and requested him to become a writer for his paper. The Doctor refused, unless Towne would first make his "peace with the country." "How shall I do it?" "Why, write a piece, acknowledging your fault, professing repentance, and asking forgiveness." "But what shall I say?" Witherspoon gave some hints, upon which Towne said, "Doctor, you write expeditiously, and to the purpose: I will thank you to write some thing for me, and I will publish it." He assented, obtained paper and ink, and immediately wrote "The Humble Confession, Recantation, and Apology of Benjamin Towne," which was afterward published as the genuine composition of the editor, and greatly increased his reputation as a writer. We give a few characteristic paragraphs from it:

"The following facts are well known—1st. That I Benjamin Towne, used to print the Pennsylvania Evening Post, under the protection of Congress, and did frequently, and earnestly solicit sundry members of the said Congress for dissertations and articles of intelligence, professing myself to be a very firm and zealous friend to American Liberty. 2d. That on the English taking possession of Philadelphia, I turned fairly round, and printed my Evening Post under the protection of General Howe and his army, calling the Congress and all their adherents, Rebels, Rascals, and Raggamuffins, and several other unsavoury names, with which the humane and Polite English are pleased to honour them—neither did I ever refuse to insert any dissertation however scurrilous, or any article of intelligence sent to me, altho' many of them I well knew to be, as a certain gentleman elegantly expresses it, facts that never happened. 3d. That I am now willing and desirous to turn once more, to unsway all that I have last said, and to print and publish for the United States of America, which are likely to be uppermost, against the British Tyrant; nor will I be backward in calling him, after the example of the great and eminent author of Common Sense, The Royal Brute, or giving him any other appellation still more opprobrious, if such can be found."

"The rational moralists of the last age used to tell us that there was an essential difference between virtue and vice, because there was an essential difference to be observed in the nature and reason of things. Now, with all due deference to these great men, I think I am as much of a Philosopher as to know that there are no circumstances of action more important than those of time and place, therefore, if a man pay no regard to the changes that may happen in these circumstances, there will be very little Virtue, and still less Prudence in his behaviour. Perhaps I have got rather too deep for common readers, and therefore shall ask any plain Quaker in this city, what he would say to a man who should wear the same coat in summer as in winter in this climate? He would certainly say, 'Friend, thy wisdom is not great.' Now whether I have not had as good reason to change my conduct as my coat, since last January, I leave to every impartial person to determine. 2dly, I do hereby declare and confess, that when I printed for Congress, and on the side of Liberty, it was not by any means from principle, or a desire that the cause of Liberty should prevail, but purely and simply from the love of gain. I could have made nothing but tar and feathers by printing against them as things then stood. I make this candid acknowledgment not only as a penitent to obtain pardon, but to show that there was more consistency in my conduct than my enemies are willing to allow. They are pleased to charge me with hypocrisy in pretending to be a Whig when I was none. This charge is false; I was neither Whig nor Tory, but a Printer. I detest and abhor hypocrisy. I had no more regard for General Howe or General Clinton, or even for Mrs. Lowring* or any other of the Chaste Nymphs that attended the fete Champetre, alias Mischianza,† when I printed in their behalf, than for the Congress on the day of their retreat. It is pretended that I certainly did in my heart incline to the English, because that I printed much bigger lies and in greater number for them, than for the Congress. This is a most false and unjust insinuation. It was entirely the fault of the Congress themselves, who thought fit (being but a new potentate upon the earth,) to be much more modest, and keep nearer the truth than their adversaries. Had any of them brought me in a lie as big as a mountain it should have issued from my press. This gives me an opportunity of showing the folly as well as malignity of those who are actuated by party spirit; many of them have affirmed that I printed monstrous and incredible lies for General Howe. Now pray what harm could incredible lies do? the only hurt, I conceive, that any lie can do, is by obtaining belief, as a truth; but an incredible lie can obtain no belief, and therefore at least must be perfectly harmless. What will those cavaliers think, if I should turn this argument against them, and say that the most effectual way to disgrace any cause is to publish monstrous and incredible lies in its favour! In this view, I have not only innocence, but some degree of merit to plead. However, take it which way you will, there never was a lie published in Philadelphia that could bear the least comparison with those published by James Rivington, in New York. This in my opinion is to be imputed to the superiority not of the Printer, but of the Prompter or Prompters. I reckon Mr. T.— to have excelled in that branch; and he had probably many coadjutors. —What do you think of 40,000 Russians and 20,000 Moors, which Moors too were said by Mr. Rivington to be dreadful among the women? as also the boats building at the forks of the Monongahela to carry the Congress down the Ohio to New Orleans? these were swimmers. —As to myself and friend H——, we contented ourselves with publishing affidavits to prove that the King of France was determined to preserve the friendship that subsisted between him and his good brother the King of England, of which he has given a new proof by entering into and communicating his treaty with the United States of America. Upon the whole I hope the public will attribute my conduct, not to disaffection, but to attachment to my own interest and desire of gain in my profession; a principle, if I mistake not, pretty general and pretty powerful in the present day. Silly. I hope the public will consider that I have been a timorous man, or, if you will, a coward, from my youth, so that I cannot fight—my belly is so big that I cannot run—and I am so great a lover of eating and drinking that I cannot starve. When those three things are considered, I hope they will fully account for my past conduct, and procure me the liberty of going on in the same uniform tenor for the future. No just judgment can be formed of a man's character and conduct unless every circumstance is taken in and fairly attended to; I therefore hope that this justice will be done in my case. I am also verily persuaded that if all those who are cowards as well as myself, but who are better off in other respects, and therefore ease and do run whenever danger is near them, would befriend me, I should have no inconsiderable body on my side. Peace be with the Congress and the army: I mean no reflections; but the world is a wide field, and I wish everybody would do as they would be done by. Finally, I do hereby recant, draw back, eat in, and swallow down, every word that I have ever spoken, written or printed to the prejudice of the United States of America, hoping it will not only satisfy the good people in general, but also all those scatter-brained fellows, who call one another out to shoot pistols in the air, while they tremble so much they cannot hit the mark. In the meantime I will return to labour with assiduity in my lawful calling, and essays and intelligence as before shall be gratefully accepted by the Public's most obedient humble servant,

BENJAMIN TOWNE."

THOMAS PAINE.

THE popularity of Paine's writings resulted rather from accident than from any merit which they possessed, but his political essays made him famous for a day, and every one connected with the press became anxious to engage his services. Aitken, the publisher of the Pennsylvania Magazine, contracted with him to write a certain number of pages for each number of that periodical, but Paine's indolence was such that he could rarely procure his articles in season, and on one occasion he went to his lodgings and complained with severity of his not finishing articles in the proper time. Paine heard him patiently, and coolly answered, "You shall have them in time." Aitken expressed some doubts on the subject, and insisted on Paine's accompanying him and proceeding immediately to business, as the workmen were waiting for copy. He accordingly went home with Aitken, and was soon seated at the table with the necessary apparatus, which always included a glass, and a decanter of brandy. Aitken observed, "he would never write without that." The first glass put him in a train of thinking; Aitken feared the second would disqualify him, or render him untractable; but it only illuminated his intellectual system; and when he had swallowed the third glass, he wrote with rapidity, intelligence, and precision; and his ideas appeared to flow faster than he could commit them to paper. What he penned from the inspiration of the brandy, was perfectly fit for the press without any alteration, or correction.
